

3 1761 06864975 5

(9) A Complete Edition of the Poets
of
GREAT BRITAIN.

Volume the Eleventh.

Containing

Wilkie, Dodsley, Shaw, Smart, Langhorne, Bruce, Chatterton, (Graeme, Glover, Lovibond, Penrose, Mickle, Jago, Scott),
Johnson, W. Whitehead, Jenyns, Logan, Warton, Cotton & Blacklock.

Caesar's Dream. Langhorne's Poems.

LONDON:

Printed for John & Arthur Arch, 23. Gracechurch Street:
and for Bell & Bradfute and I. Mundell & Co. Edinburgh.

665025

18.9.57

THE WORKS
OF THE
BRITISH POETS.

WITH PREFACES,
BIOGRAPHICAL AND CRITICAL,

BY ROBERT ANDERSON, M. D.

VOLUME ELEVENTH.

Containing

WILKIE, DODSLEY,
SMART,
LANGHORNE,
BRUCE,
CHATTERTON, GRÆME,

|| GLOVER, SHAW, LOVIBOND, PENROSE, MICKLE, JAGO,
SCOTT,

|| JOHNSON,
WHITEHEAD, (W.)
JENYNS,
LOGAN, WARTON, COTTON, AND BLACKLOCK.

L O N D O N :

PRINTED FOR JOHN & ARTHUR ARCH; AND FOR BELL & BRADFUTE, AND J. MUNDELL & CO. EDINBURGH.

1795;

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

PHYSICS DEPARTMENT

RESEARCH REPORT NO. 110

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO
PHYSICS DEPARTMENT
RESEARCH REPORT NO. 110
BY
J. R. OPPENHEIMER AND
H. YUKAWA
1935

1935

THE LIFE OF WILKIE.

Of the personal history of WILKIE, "the Scottish Homer," there is no written memorial. Though his writings are not more distinguished for learning and genius, than his life was remarkable for originality of manners, his name is not to be found in any collection of literary biography.

In 1783, a design was formed of writing his life, to be prefixed to a new edition of his poems, by the Rev. Dr. William Thomson, whose abilities, in other literary provinces, have justly obtained him the sanction of public applause. In the prosecution of this design, Dr. Thomson was encouraged, by the approbation of the late Earl of Lauderdale, and assisted by information obtained by Mr. Andrew Dalzel, Professor of Greek in the University of Edinburgh, from his cousin, the Rev. Robert Liston, minister of Aberdour, the Rev. James Robertson, minister of Ratho, and the Rev. Dr. Thomas Robertson, minister of Dalmeny. After having made some progress in digesting the materials, the intended edition of his poems not meeting with suitable encouragement, Dr. Thomson was compelled to desist; and his friends are disappointed in the hope of seeing justice done to his memory, by the same masterly pen that has enriched English literature by the "Continuation of Watson's History of Philip III." the "Translation of Cuninghame's History of Great Britain," and other ingenious and elegant performances.

It is with becoming diffidence the present writer takes upon him a task which has been declined by Dr. Thomson; but, in collecting the works of this poet with those of other eminent poets of our nation, it is incumbent upon him to prefix some account of his life, which, however inadequate to his merits, or unsatisfactory to his friends, may not be altogether unwelcome to the public, who, it has been often observed, will always take an interest in those persons from whose labours they have derived profit or delight.

The facts stated in the present account, are partly taken from some detached portions of Dr. Thomson's unfinished narrative, and partly from the original information furnished by Mr. Robertson, Mr. Liston, and Dr. Robertson, obligingly communicated to the present writer, by Dr. Thomson, through the kindness of Professor Dalzel, whose laudable endeavours to vindicate the fame, and to preserve the memory of this poet, entitle him to the gratitude of the lovers of classical and polite literature:

William Wilkie was born at Echlin, in the parish of Dalmeny, in the county of West-Lothian, October 5. 1721. His great-grandfather was a younger son of the family of Wilkie, of Rathobyres, in the parish of Ratho, one of the oldest families in Mid-Lothian; and the undoubted chief of the Wilkies. His grandfather rented the farm of Echlin, and purchased a part of the estate of Rathobyres, which he transmitted with the farm to his son, the poet's father, who was a worthy, liberal, and intelligent man, never opulent, on the contrary, poor, and rather unfortunate through life. His mother was a woman of distinguished prudence and understanding, and able, it is said, to express her thoughts in the most grammatical manner, and proper words on every subject.

He received his early education at the parish school of Dalmeny, under the care of Mr. Riddel, a very respectable and successful teacher. At school, he obtained the reputation of a boy of excellent parts, and on many occasions discovered marks of that peculiarity and fertility of genius that so remarkably characterized his future life.

He discovered an early propensity to the study of poetry, and began to write verses in his tenth year, as appears by the following description of a Storm, written at that age, and published by Dr. Robertson, in the 9th vol. of "The Statistical Account of Scotland," which must be allowed to be a very correct and manly performance for a boy of ten.

What penetrating mind can rightly form
 A faint idea of a raging storm?
 Who can express of elements the war;
 And noisy thunder roaring from afar?
 This subject is superior to my skill;
 Yet I'll begin, to show I want not will.
 A pitchy cloud displays itself on high;
 And with its sable mantle veils the sky:
 Fraught with the magazine of heaven does throw
 Bolts barb'd with fire upon the world below.
 All nature shakes and the whole heavens smoke;
 Nor can the gross black cloud sustain the shock:
 But opening from his magazines doth roll,
 Thick smoke and flames of fire from pole to pole.
 Thence hail, snow, vapour, mix'd with flames of fire,
 With conjunct force against the earth conspire.
 Monsters of sea and land do loudly roar,
 And make the deep resound from shore to shore.
 The spumy waves come rolling from afar,
 And with loud jars declare the wat'ry war.
 They upward mount, and raise their crests on high,
 And beat the middle regions of the sky.
 Downwards they fall upon the swelling deep,
 And toss the rigging of some low sunk ship:
 Upwards they tow'r and falling down again,
 They bury men and cargo in the main.
 The boiling deep doth from her low sunk cell
 Throw out black waves resembling those of hell.
 They forward roll and hideously do roar,
 And vent their rage against the rocky shore.

At the age of thirteen, he was sent to the University of Edinburgh, where he distinguished himself in the different classes of languages, philosophy and theology; and formed many of those friendships and connections which afforded him much happiness through life.

Among the number of his fellow collegians, with whom he lived in habits of the closest intimacy, were Dr. Robertson, Mr. John Home, Dr. M'Ghie, and Professor Cleghorn. Dr. Robertson afterwards and Mr. Home figured high in the literary world. Dr. M'Ghie went to London, obtained the friendship of Dr. Johnson, and became a member of the Ivy-lane Club. Professor Cleghorn, a man of great promise, died young.

His intellectual faculties of every sort now began to make a rapid progress, the cause of which may, in a great measure, be attributed to the conversation of the companions he chanced to find in the university, and to the societies which, about that time, began to be formed among the students for their mutual improvement in literary composition, philosophical disquisition, and public speaking, in which his talents found ample scope and encouragement.

His conversation with men of taste and learning, and the excitement which their example would give to his emulation, would do more towards the improvement of his mind than any lectures he could attend, or any mode of study he could pursue. The present writer would not, however, have it thought, that he conceives either of these to be without their use; he would only affirm, that they hold a secondary place, when compared with the society of such men as it was his felicity to find contemporary students in the university.

It was likewise very fortunate for him, that, during the course of his education at Edinburgh, he became known to David Hume and Dr. Ferguson, and, at a later period, to Dr. Smith, by all of whom he was held in a higher light than a common acquaintance.

In literary societies, and private conversation, he had an opportunity of being thoroughly acquainted with the capacities, as well as the tempers and dispositions of his contemporaries.

Of all his acquaintance, he regarded Dr. Smith with the greatest admiration, and Dr. Ferguson with the greatest affection. He considered Dr. Smith as a superior genius to Mr. Hume. He possessed, in his opinion, equal learning, and greater originality and invention; for what may appear strange, he by no means considered Mr. Hume as an original or inventive genius. The subtlety of his reasoning, the extent of his reading, the depth and solidity of his reflections, he greatly admired, but still he thought that he did not draw so much as Dr. Smith, or even Lord Kames, from the stores of his own mind. He said that he trod in the footsteps of Bolingbroke, and certain French philosophers; that he greedily imbibed their ideas, and was studious to glean what they left behind them; that he informed himself with great industry of the opinions and views of great men, in all ages of the world, compared them together, preferred what he thought best, drew corollaries from their reasoning, and, on the whole, exhibited a striking example of industry and of judgment. But he availed himself of the ignorance of the world to pass that as new, which in reality was old; and that his ideas were either borrowed from other writers, or deductions and improvements on conclusions already established.

Such was the opinion entertained by Wilkie concerning Mr. Hume. Invention is a power which must needs stand high in the admiration of a poet, and Wilkie spoke like a poet, when he magnified its praise, as if it had been a divine impulse, an immediate inspiration, which operated its effects instantaneously, and without that leisurely and gradual process which takes place in every production of human genius.

The ideas of men are linked together by a chain of association. Wilkie, perceiving, or thinking that he perceived the steps by which Mr. Hume was led to the doctrines he advanced, but not discerning, in like manner, the process by which Dr. Smith was led to the formation of his theories, pronounced the former a man of industry and judgment, and the latter a man of industry and genius.

It certainly matters not whether a hint be derived from a book, or from conversation, or an accidental occurrence in the material or moral world. Every idea is derivative. What is said of genius and invention, in contradistinction to memory and judgment, is commonly vague and indefinite.

Wilkie appears to have had a predilection for Dr. Smith, otherwise in the exuberance of his own invention, he might have discovered or conjectured that the first hints of the "Theory of Moral Sentiments," a theory so amiable, so useful in life, and to a certain and important extent, so just, may have been originally suggested by some thoughts in the "De Augmentis Scientiarum" of Bacon, or from Dr. Butler's "Sermons on Human Nature."

While he was prosecuting his literary studies at Edinburgh, his father died, and left him no other inheritance than the stock and unexpired lease of his farm at the Fisher's Tryste, about two miles west from that city, and the charge of his three sisters; having sold his property at Rathobyres, a short time before his death, and applied the purchase-money to the payment of his debts.

For the occupation of a farmer, which this melancholy event devolved upon him, he was eminently qualified, both by his habits of speculation and experience; having been accustomed, as he grew up, to divide with his father the business of the farm, which, as is usual in those of small extent, was chiefly cultivated by the common labour of the family.

Confiding, however, in the powers of which he was conscious, he seems not to have trusted for his future maintenance to his exertions as a farmer; for, while he managed his farm, he prosecuted his studies in divinity, and commenced preacher of the gospel.

The narrowness of his circumstances obliged him to live with great economy, and it was during this period, owing particularly to the necessities of his situation, that he contracted an uncommon degree of parsimony, which he practised more than was necessary in his future life.

About this time one of his sisters was married to Mr. John Cleghorn, farmer at Granton, in the parish of Cramond, a man of strong parts, very amiable disposition, and great ability in his profession. With him he contracted the most intimate habits of friendship and correspondence. In all matters of husbandry and common life, he quoted Mr. Cleghorn's practice and maxims, as the standard of perfection in every conversation. He was his most confidential friend through life, and they died about the same time.

From Mr. Cleghorn he probably derived many of those maxims and principles in husbandry which he practised with amazing success in the management of his farm. He became eminent in many branches of science; but in nothing did he excel more than in a thorough and profound knowledge of the art of husbandry. He used often to say, that to discern properly the real qualities of different soils, and to apply, with success, the culture proper for each, required the highest exertion of the human understanding.

Though he was, in many respects, the most speculative and fanciful man in the world, yet he was very careful, in the character of a farmer, to avoid the chemical theories, and to adhere to the plain, direct, and sure road of experience. He was fully convinced that, to open the earth for the admission of the fostering influences of heaven, and to return into her lap her own produce, whether in the form of vegetables or animals, was the great art of promoting her fertility, and preparing her for the important work of reproduction. Dead horses, dogs, cats, and animals of all kinds, he was at pains to pick up, and to convert them into a pabulum for useful vegetables. Every thing that abounded with the principles of vegetation he was eager to add to his dunghill. He watched his people, often shared in their labour, and made it a rule to encourage good servants, both by better wages, and by encomiums and little premiums; but, on no account, would suffer the vicious, or the slothful, to live with him on any terms. He seemed to be particularly successful in the culture of potatoes, and was often, from this circumstance, denominated the Potatoe-Minister.

In this course of life, he had much intercourse with the country people in the way of making bargains; from which he took occasion to make many curious remarks on human nature. There was nothing about the lower ranks of men that struck him so much as their cunning. "I can raise crops," he would exclaim, "better than any of my neighbours; but I am always cheated in the market."

In the midst of all these operations of agriculture, he found leisure to cultivate the study of polite literature, and aspired to the renown of an epic poet.

There is not a doubt that poets are moved by the divine impulse of the "heavenly muse;" the "spirit that inspired on Horeb the chosen shepherd;" the "powers of song;" the "philosophic power of melancholy;" or by whatever name that invisible cause is called, which produces that inward thrilling which seeks to express itself in verse; yet do local and political circumstances incline the poet to stir up the gift that is within him; and, but for these circumstances, Wilkie would not perhaps have known that he was born a poet. He made no scruple of confessing, that he thought it good policy to rouse his poetical talents, and to listen to the dictates of the "powers of song."

When he had quitted the college, and found himself destitute of powerful friends, he began to meditate on the most probable means of introducing himself to the notice of the great. To compose a book in philosophy would be doing nothing: it might be read by a few men of learning, most of whom had, in all likelihood, fixed their philosophical creed, and imagined, that whatever was contradictory to their notions was false, and whatever passed the circle of their knowledge, superfluous. He once intended to write a novel; but that species of writing, though it required the finest parts, was not likely to lead to any preferment. The world, though well pleased to laugh at the fancies of the novelist, would not, he apprehended, think of rewarding him. In the whole circle of science and art, there was not any study that appeared to him at once so congenial to his powers, and so conducive to his interest, as poetry. He, therefore, determined to write an epic poem.

Among the various analogies which the active fancy of man delights to trace between political and human bodies, there is none more striking than that similarity which is remarked between their different geniuses in the different stages of their existence. In youth, and in manhood, we look forward to some object which is to increase our happiness, and to raise our fame. Animated by such pleasing hopes, our spirits are lively, and our pursuits are active; but, in more advanced years, men turn back their attention to the more early period of their lives, and are fond of recollecting and relating the joys and the achievements of their youth. There is, in like manner, a time when nations look forward to future glory, when they are emulous to excel in every honourable enterprise, and are eager to strike out new paths in science and art. And there is also a time when, either through satiety or despair, they are more inclined to remember what has been, than to anticipate what shall be; when history becomes the favourite study, and is deemed the most entertaining subject, as well as the most useful object of human attention and reason. Such is the genius of our nation at the present moment. And this turn of the nation, coinciding with that ardour for literary fame, which, for more than forty years past has distinguished the northern part of this island, has determined the most eminent Scottish writers to try their strength in the arduous attempt of history.

Had Wilkie been born and educated in the present reign, it is probable that he would have courted the historic muse. But the general taste for poetry which prevailed when he received the first impressions of education, a sprightly and luxuriant imagination, and the political motive, which has been already mentioned, conspired to raise his views to Parnassus. A few years before his birth, senators and statesmen were proud of writing verses; and a talent for poetry was considered as a requisite, as it was in reality a step to preferment in the offices of government. The princes, in whose reign he was born and educated, were not indeed patrons of the muses: But poetry continued to be in fashion. The translations of Pope had excited a general admiration of his own powers, and revived a veneration for those of Homer. Criticisms were written on the Epopœa, and comparisons made between Homer, Virgil, Lucan, Camoens, Ariosto, Tasso, Milton, Voltaire, and Glover.

In such circumstances, Wilkie conceived the design of writing a poem after that great poet, whose praises were re-echoed throughout the world, and for whom he entertained the highest veneration. He drew the subject of his poem from the fourth book of the "Iliad," where Sthenelus gives Agamemnon a short account of the sacking of Thebes. After the fall of those heroes celebrated by Statius, their sons, and, among the rest, Diomed, undertook the siege of that city, and were so fortunate as to succeed in their enterprise, and to revenge, on the Thebans and the tyrant Creon, the death of their fathers. These young heroes were known to the Greeks under the title of the Epigoni, or the Descendants; and, for this reason, Wilkie gave to his poem the title of the Epigoniad.

There remained a tradition among the Greeks, that Homer had taken this second siege of Thebes for the subject of a second poem, which is lost; and Wilkie seems to have pleased himself with the thoughts of reviving the work, as well as of treading in the steps of his favourite author.

The principles upon which, as a Christian and a philosopher, in an age which rejects ancient fable as wholly incredible, he engaged in an undertaking, the nature of which was intimately connected with ancient mythology, may be collected from the following eulogium on the influence of poetry, more particularly that species of poetry which supposes the truth of heathen fables, pronounced in conversation with Dr. Thomson, many years after, in the Earl of Kinnoul's library at Dupplin-Castle, which, though long, is too valuable to be withheld.

"There cannot be a more proper amusement for a person whose office it is to humanise the mind by inculcating the Christian graces and virtues than the poets. All literature has a tendency to purify the mind from dissingenuity and brutality, by habituating it to the contemplation of truth, in contradistinction to falsehood and error; of fitness and propriety, as distinguished from what is incongruous, monstrous, and absurd; and of human nature placed in situations fitted to excite our sympathetic feelings, and to exercise our noble and virtuous emotions and passions. It is in this last manner, it is by a constant appeal to our moral feelings, that poetry, especially the sublimer kinds of poetry, wears off the antipathies of the barbarian, and disposes the man of letters and taste in the intercourse of life, to overlook many causes of animosity and resentment, and to sympathize with human nature in the midst of a thousand frailties and follies. By the sublime kinds of poetry I understand the ode, tragedy, and epopœa: These not only recommend whatever is excellent and great in human conduct, to the cool and dispassionate views of reason, but powerfully impress it on the heart, and gradually incorporate it with the moral character. In human events and actions there is a sameness which cloy, and an imperfection which displeases the mind. Heroic or epic poetry remedies these defects, by exhibiting a picture as various as the wanderings of the imagination, and examples of virtue that correspond to those abstracted ideas of excellence that are formed by the intellect, and which alone come up to the desires of the soul. Although the whole of a composition of this kind abounds in grave instructions, yet there is one lesson which is taught above all others, one truth which it principally inculcates, and which is called the moral of the poem. This truth or moral is illustrated by a story or fable; and as the heroic poet does not shoot directly and rapidly towards the end he has in view, but, on the contrary, keeps long on the wing, and aims, in his flight, to warm the mind, and to gratify its vast desires by frequent views of the grandeur, magnificence, and beauty of nature. This fable, story, or plot, various and intricate in itself, is still farther diversified by manifold incidents and digressions; various scenes are opened, various actors introduced, various characters and manners, and, corresponding to these, various sentiments. The variety and gravity of the diction are suited to the variety and gravity of the subject; and musical numbers, with beautiful imagery, adorn every part of the complicated production."

"He illustrated the truth of these sentiments" says Dr. Thomson, by whom the conversation is reported, "from the works of Tasso and of Milton, but chiefly from the "Iliad" of Homer. I mentioned the incredibility of Homer's fables, and hinted that they were scarcely proper for the contemplation of a Christian. On this head, I was not myself very scrupulous, being convinced that, to suffer the imagination to wander, for a time, over the fields of fancy, is no crime. It is easy to call back the wanderer, and to dismiss the illusion: But I wished to draw an answer from Wilkie. With respect to the incredibility of fable, the imagination, he answered, can render any thing credible, if it is well described, that is not absurd or impossible. As to the unchristianness of attending to heathen fables, he said that there were many fables in the Bible, introduced for the express purpose of conveying and inculcating truths, religious and moral. Many of the heathen fables, he maintained, had, in like manner, a moral tendency: For example, the furious Achilles and Diomed are about to vent their rage in some act of cruelty and injustice. Minerva presents herself in some form or other that they respect, and diverts their purpose. That is, the voice of reason restrains the impetuosity of passion."

The differences of time and place had no effect upon Wilkie's genius. While he cultivated the ground, his poem of The Epigoniad was going forward; and, with the scythe in his hand, he meditated on the times when princes and heroes boasted of their powers and skill, in cutting hay, ploughing land, and feeding swine. The rural scenes and simple manners that were ever present in his imagination, accorded well with the tone of a poem, the subject of which was taken from a very early period of society, and contributed to give a justness and exactness to his images, which are not to be found in the compositions of city poets, who draw little from nature, and take every thing at second hand.

It was reported, that while he was writing the Epigoniad, it is said, he read it in pieces to an old woman in the neighbourhood, named Margaret Paton, without communicating to any other person what he was doing; and what she disapproved of, he scored and altered, till pure nature was pleased. A similar story is told of Moliere, with more probability.

There is a tradition also, that, upon some occasion, he submitted his verses to the correction of Mr. Hume. Mr. Hume addressed Wilkie, by telling him, that he had made a great many emendations. Wilkie, upon looking slightly at them, replied: "Well, I will be even with you; for I will not adopt so much as one of your corrections."

His manner of life at the Fisher's Tryst was the most respectable that could be imagined. He prosecuted his literary studies, he tilled the ground, employed the poor, provided for his sisters, and on Sundays occasionally preached the gospel. This, indeed, was no hardship to him; for so general was his knowledge, so lively his imagination, and so quick his recollection, that he preached not only without writing his sermons, but sometimes even without longer premeditation than that of eight or ten minutes. He went one day to hear sermon in the church of Ratho, and, as he walked along with] the minister from the manse to the church, was closely pressed by him to preach for him. He at first made many excuses, but was so extremely urged, that he at last consented, provided the minister would name the text; a condition which was readily complied with. This anecdote is related by Dr. Thomson, who was told by a nobleman who was present, and who was a good judge, that the sermon was excellent.

In the rebellion 1745, a generous spirit of loyal fervour had excited the young people about Edinburgh, many of them Wilkie's companions, to take the field; but the absurdity of risking the flower of the country made it soon be overruled; and Wilkie was remarked to have been the only person who left the ranks: Hence insinuations against his personal courage. Perhaps he saw the foolishness of the thing: At least, there are no other evidences of the kind against him; and it is certain, that being once dogged by a foot-pad, in a dark night, on his way to Ratho, he turned upon him, and, with one blow of his cane across the temples, brought him to the ground. This anecdote is related upon the authority of Dr. Robertson.

After the close of the rebellion, and the restoration of the peace of the country, he returned to his farm, and resumed the quiet occupations of agriculture and literature, in which he spent several years, little known to the world, and holding little intercourse with it, excepting with a few literary friends and companions.

The Fisher's Tryste, lying in the immediate vicinity of Gorgie, the property of Mr. Lind sheriff-substitute of Mid-Lothian, he became acquainted with Wilkie at an early period, and, from their first acquaintance, strongly attached himself to his interests.

Mr. Lind was very capable of discerning his merit, gave him a general invitation to his house, introduced him into the company of his numerous acquaintance, and made him known to the Duke of Argyll, the Earl of Lauderdale, Lord Milton, Lord Kames, Mr. Charles Townshend, and many other persons of rank.

In 1752, Mr. Guthrie, minister of Ratho, being rendered incapable, by age and infirmities, of discharging the duties of his office, an assistant was found necessary. Mr. Lind recommended Wilkie to the Earl of Lauderdale, the patron of that parish, for that office, and obtained his Lordship's consent to allow him to preach at Ratho.

When Wilkie was introduced at Hatton, Lord Lauderdale was much pleased with the originality of his genius and extensive knowledge; and so much entertained with a thousand peculiarities in his manner of thinking and reasoning on every subject, that he resolved immediately to make him assistant and successor to Mr. Guthrie; and, for this purpose, he generously established a fund of 30*l.* for his annual support, without diminishing the stipend during the life of the old man.

Accordingly, on the 17th of May 1753, Wilkie was ordained, by the Presbytery of Edinburgh, assistant and successor to the minister of Ratho. In this situation, he continued three years and a half, living all that time on his little farm, about four miles distant, and faithfully performing the duties of his office in the parish. On the death of Mr. Guthrie, Feb. 28th 1756, he came into possession of the whole living, and settled, with his sisters, in the manse of Ratho.

Agriculture had been a peculiar object of his attention from his youth; and he now gave full scope to his genius for improvement, though on a small scale. His glebe, which he found in great disorder, he immediately enclosed in a judicious manner, and cultivated it with such ability, that it continued to produce the most abundant crops.

A piece of marshy ground belonging to the glebe, in the name of pasture-ground, of near five acres, which, from time immemorial, had been of so little value, that the highest rent given for it was half-a-guinea yearly, he enclosed with a deep ditch and hedge; and intersected it with such a variety of drains, most judiciously disposed, that it became matter of astonishment to the country in general, and of ridicule to many; but the event justified his ability, for it produced a series of most beneficial crops, and still continues valuable.

He also projected a society for the improvement of agriculture and rural economy, called The Husbandry Club, which met at Ratho, and consisted of a great number of the gentlemen and principal farmers in the neighbourhood. The excellent regulations, established for the government of the club, and the great variety of interesting and judicious questions, proposed as subjects of their deliberation and discussion, in all which he had a principal share, will long continue to do honour to his memory.

This society, of which Wilkie may be considered as the founder, was conducted, for many years, with great spirit and success. Its records, according to the information of Mr. Robertson, contain dissertations on many practical subjects in agriculture, of much merit. The name of the celebrated Dr. Cullen appears in the list of the members.

While he resided at Ratho, he had much intercourse with the Lauderdale family, and was, at all times, a welcome visitant at Hatton. His noble patron was fond of his conversation, and often engaged him in disputation; and, perhaps, he never met with an antagonist who afforded him greater scope for the exertion of all his powers. Through life, he retained the strongest attachment to the Earl of Lauderdale, and valued him more for his good understanding, his great knowledge of men and manners, and his uncommon humanity, than for his high rank. His sentiments, with respect to the Earl, were well known to all his acquaintances; for there was nothing more common than his retailing his Lordship's maxims and opinions in every company and conversation.

In 1757, he published at Edinburgh The Epigoniad, a Poem, in Nine Books, 12mo, the result of fourteen years study and application, and claimed the honours of an epic poet. His claim, however, to this distinction was not generally allowed. His work was applauded by a few men of taste and learning, but was coldly received by the public, and censured, with great severity, by the writers of periodical criticism, on account of a few mistakes in expression and prosody, excusable in a Scottish poet, who had never been out of his own country. The title, it must be confessed, was somewhat unfortunately chosen; for as the story of the Epigoni was known only to a very few of the learned, the public were not able to conjecture what could be the subject of the poem, and were apt to neglect what it was impossible to understand. The Preface contained some judicious and spirited remarks on the beauties and defects of epic poetry, but afforded little information concerning the subject of the poem. There was no general plan prefixed to the whole, nor argument, as might be expected, at the head of each book. It was inscribed, in the manner of Camoens and Tasso, to Archibald Duke of Argyll, a nobleman, who, by patronizing the arts and sciences, rivalled the glory of his elder brother Duke John, whose political and military talents made him to be deservedly esteemed one of the first statesmen and heroes of his time.

*Argyll, the state's whole thunder born to wield,
And shake alike the senate and the field.*

POPE.

In 1759, he published a second edition of The Epigoniad, &c. by William Wilkie, P. D. M. Carefully corrected and improved. To which is added, a Dream, in the manner of Spenser, 12mo. In this edition, all or most of the Scotisms, and other trivial mistakes in the first edition, were corrected. A passage also in the Preface, containing a rash censure of "the quaintness of Mr. Pope's expression, in his translation of the "Iliad" and "Odyssey," as not at all suitable either to the antiquity or majestic gravity of his author," was very properly omitted. Mr. Hume gives the following account of its reception in London, in a letter to Dr. Smith, dated April 12. 1759: "The Epigoniad, I hope, will do, but it is somewhat up-hill work. You will see in the "Critical Review," a letter upon that poem, and I desire you to employ your conjectures in finding out the author." The letter in the "Critical Review," was written by Mr. Hume, to recommend The Epigoniad to the public, "as one of the ornaments of our language." The success was not answerable to his expectations. Too antique to please the unlettered reader, and too modern for the scholar, it was neglected by both, read by few, and soon forgotten by all.

Soon after his coming to Ratho, he was seized with an unformed ague, from which he was never perfectly relieved during the rest of his life. For this complaint, he thought an extraordinary perspiration was necessary. He slept with an immoderate quantity of bed-clothes, and sweated so much, that it was thought to have had an effect in relaxing his constitution. The blankets under which he slept became a wonder to the country; stories are told of twenty-four pair of blankets being above him: And this may have been the case when he was not in his own bed; but, in general, his covering was much lighter.

The supposed unhealthiness of the manse of Ratho gave him the first inclination to change his situation, and the professorship of Natural Philosophy in the University of St. Andrew's becoming vacant in May 1759, by the death of Mr. David Young, he became a candidate for that office. Several candidates appeared, and Wilkie was not then acquainted with one member in the University. As it happened to be the time of the meeting of the General Assembly, he was introduced to such of them as were then at Edinburgh, and found avenues of application to them all; but Dr. Watson was the only member who discerned his merit, and effectually promoted his interest; for, when the day of election came (July 1759), the other professors had attached themselves, in equal numbers, to two other candidates; and when neither party could, by any influence, alter Dr. Watson, one of the parties joined him, and gave the election in favour of Wilkie.

When he left Ratho, he was worth about 200*l.* from the sale of the stock upon his farm, and savings from his stipend. With this money he purchased some acres of land in the neighbourhood of St. Andrew's. He enclosed and cultivated his little fields with such judgment and success, as excited the astonishment, commanded the imitation, and promoted the improvement of the country round him, and contributed, in a high degree, to his own emolument. He gradually extended his purchases, his improvements, and his profits, and is supposed to have acquired a property in land worth 3000*l.*; and has, in his so rapid accumulation, left an equally eminent example of ability and economy.

As a teacher of natural philosophy, his usual merit did not forsake him. Natural philosophy, he said himself, was his forte. Though, by an universal genius, he shone in this department of science, yet his friends generally imagined that, languages, logic, metaphysics, or moral philosophy, would have been more suitable to his taste and inclinations.

In 1768, he published his Fables, 8vo. They are sixteen in number, and a frontispiece, designed by Wale, is prefixed to each fable. Previous to the publication of his Fables, the University of St. Andrew's conferred upon him the degree of Doctor in Divinity.

From this time nothing of importance occurred in the life of Wilkie. He is said to have broke off connection with Mr. Hume and Dr. Robertson, some time before his death.

After a lingering indisposition, he died at St. Andrew's, October 10th 1772, in the 31st year of his age. His two sisters, to whom he left his property, are still living at St. Andrew's. He left his MSS. to the care of Mr. Liston, who has not published any of his literary remains.

No edition of his Epigeniad or Fables has been called for since his death. They are now, reprinted from the edition 1759 and 1768, for the first time, received into collection of classical English poetry.

In 1768, when the present writer was at Lanark school, his admiration of Wilkie induced him, to transcribe from a manuscript in the Earl of Hyndford's library at Carmichael-house, a poem, intitled; "Whitton, a descriptive poem, with notes, inscribed to the Duke of Argyll, by W. W." supposed to mean William Wilkie; but he has not ventured to give it to Wilkie upon supposition.

Of his character, private habits, domestic manners, and opinions, curiosity will require more ample information than is to be found in the following notices, which the diligence of Professor Dalzel has collected, and the zeal and veneration of Mr. Robertson, Mr. Liston, Dr. Thomson, and Dr. Robertson have supplied.

"He was always," says a paper, communicated by an ingenious but not literary friend of Wilkie, to Professor Dalzel, "fond of being in the company of old men and old women, from the 8th year of his age; and they always liked him, as he delighted in their conversation; and he raff out something new, whatever was the subject. He had read the ancient philosophers and poets very early. Hesiod was a favourite poet of his, and he very often quoted him to persons who knew nothing about him. His conversation was most original and ingenious. It had a mixture of knowledge, acuteness and singularity, which rendered it peculiarly delightful; and every person who spent an hour with him, carried away something which he was glad to repeat. He had a firm faith in the truth of the Christian religion. He employed a considerable portion of his time in reading the Scriptures, and he kept up the worship of God regularly in his family. While he was a parish minister, he was acceptable to his people; and, in every situation of his life, he was kind to persons in distress, and very liberal in his private charity. His temper was hasty, but void of malice or fierceness; and he was always cheerful. He was fond of agriculture, and remarkable for his knowledge of the different branches of it. The people in the neighbourhood of St. Andrew's acknowledge to this day, that they have derived many useful lessons from Dr. Wilkie's management of his farm."

"In his public capacity as a preacher," says Mr. Robertson, "he was rather original and ingenious than eloquent; and, though he never pursued the ordinary acts of popularity, never failed to fix the attention of his audience. The peculiarity, variety, and even eccentricity of his sentiments or reasoning, invariably procured him approbation. In his public character, he observed a thousand oddities and inattentions. He generally preached with his hat on his head, and often forgot to pronounce the blessing after public service. Once I saw him dispense the sacrament without consecrating the elements. On being told, he made a public apology, consecrated, and served the second table; after which, he went to the pulpit to superintend the service, forgetting to communicate himself, till informed of the omission by his elders. In his dress, he was uncommonly negligent and slovenly, and, in his whole manner of life, totally inattentive to all those little formalities on which the generality of mankind are apt to value themselves. He was immoderately addicted to the use of tobacco, particularly chewing, in which he went to such extreme excess, that it was thought, by all his acquaintance, highly prejudicial to his health, and perhaps a cause of his premature death. He was fond of medical aid, but always disputed, and often rejected the prescriptions of doctors: Hence was thought whimsical, both in his compliments, and in his management of them. He slept with an immoderate quantity of bed-clothes. One day he visited a farmer in the neighbourhood, a relation of his own; when prevailed on to stay all night, he begged he might have plenty of bed-clothes. His female friends in the family collected and put on his bed 24 pair of blankets. When asked, next morning, if he had plenty of bed-clothes, he answered, he had just enough, and had slept well. He abhorred nothing so much as clean sheets, and whenever he met with such, he wrapt them up, threw them aside, and slept in the blankets. One evening, at Hatton, being asked by Lady Lauderdale to stay all night, he expressed an attachment to his own bed, but said, if her ladyship would give him a pair of foul sheets, he would stay."

"Hard circumstances," says Dr. Robertson, "oppressed Wilkie for the greater part of his life, and produced that strong attention to money-matters, with which he has been reproached by those who could not explain it. It proceeded, in fact, from a singular love of independence, the passion of a stately mind. He shuddered at the thought of coming under the power of any man, and could hardly think of walking the streets, lest any person, to whom he was indebted, should meet him. When his father died, he had to borrow the money that was to bury him. He went to an uncle for £100 and was refused. These events could but ill fit upon his mind. After he came to better days, "I have often heard him say," says Mr. Liston, "I have shaken hands with poverty up to the very elbow, and I wish never to see her face again." Hence a parsimony to the extreme. Yet, in wealth, would we brand him with the love of money for its own sake. Another passion came in: He loved his relations; and it was his common maxim, that no man should ever break with his kindred. He was not long minister of Ratho, till he apprehended his life would be short: He had two sisters that he feared would be left destitute, immediately upon his death. Apprehensive on their account, he always lived plain, heaped up every penny, and at last died worth two or three thousand pounds; not so much acquired by savings, however, as by a rapid profit from his own favourite act of agriculture, in the perfect skill of which no man excelled him. At the same time, after the short period that he became possessed of money, his friends could see that he could part with it. It was his custom to pay the bill, even when travelling with several of his relations that could afford their share. After he settled at St. Andrew's, his private charities were not less than 20*l.* a year. Born for intense thought; for total absence of mind upon ordinary matters; plunged in poverty in early life, without a domestic about his person, and even without the means of any elegance whatever, he naturally became slovenly, dirty, and even nauseous. He chewed tobacco to excess, and at last made himself believe, that it was good for his health. It seems, on all hands agreed, that no mortal was equal to him in conversation and argument. His own explanation of it was, that he took the right side, while his antagonists took the wrong, to display their ingenuity and learning. I have heard the late Dr. Wallace, author of the "Dissertation on the Numbers of Mankind," say, nobody could venture to cope with him. His knowledge, in almost all things, was deep, solid, and unanswerable: His reasoning was plain to a child. In shrewdness, he had no rival. Both his manner and thoughts were masculine, in a degree peculiar to himself. Dr. Smith says, it was an observation of the late Lord Elibank, that wherever Wilkie's name happened to be mentioned in a company, learned or unlearned, it was not soon dropped: Every body had much to say. In short, he was a great and an odd man. His character, I will venture to say, will never be successfully written, but by a great hand; and even, when written, the theory of the man is above common comprehension."

"With regard to Wilkie's faith in Christianity," says Dr. Thomson, "I know, that he said prayers in his family every evening, after he had laid aside the character of a divine, and grace at table, with his eyes shut, and his hands folded together, in a posture of supplication, and with every mark of the greatest fervour. He would sometimes prolong his graces, at the College-table, beyond the bounds that the keen appetites of the hungry students would have prescribed to it. Even in these short prayers there was often some thought not more devout than pleasing and ingenious. For example: "O Lord! thou art the author of all our wants, and thou suppliest them, from the inexhausted stores of thy bounty." He appeared to be a firm believer in God. The existence of a deity he considered as the simplest, and, therefore, the most rational method of solving the phenomena of the universe. This was agreeable to the Newtonian System, which supposes a vacuum and liberty of action; and that a voluntary fat of God launched forth the heavenly orbs with that degree of impulse or momentum precisely, which corresponded with centripetal force, and which would not carry them beyond their orbits. The moral doctrines of Christianity, the divine character of Jesus Christ, he held in the most profound veneration. That sacred person he undoubtedly considered as an angel sent from God, to enlighten and to bless the world. Whether he believed in the necessity of an atonement (a doctrine which, as Dr. Smith observes in his "Theory of Moral Sentiments," is so consistent with the natural sentiments of mankind), and the other peculiar doctrines of the Christian religion, I cannot, with certainty, affirm. He sometimes lamented, that he doubted. But whether this doubt settled into scepticism, or that reason, and an imagination, sensible in the highest degree, to the ravishing prospects held out in the gospel, triumphed over doubt, and confirmed his wavering mind in the Christian faith, I know not. He would often exclaim to his most intimate friends: "O! if I could firmly believe all the doctrines of Christianity, how vain and insipid every enjoyment and every pursuit in this world would appear!"

"It was remarkable," says Professor Dalzel, "that Wilkie, with all his learning, could neither read nor spell. I myself was witness to his ignorance of the art of reading. When I was a very young man, residing at Hatton, Wilkie came from St. Andrew's, on a visit to Lord Lauderdale. He staid a few days, and all the personal knowledge I had of Wilkie was acquired during that time. "The Judgment of Paris," a poem by Dr. Beattie, was brought to Hatton one of those days, as a new publication. Wilkie asked me to retire with him, that we might read and criticise the poem together. At first, when he began to read, I imagined he did not understand the verses at all, as he surely committed the saddest havoc, in point of quantity and pronunciation, that can well be imagined, and even miscalled several of the words: And yet his criticisms were so just, and so happily expressed, that I was charmed with the elegance of his taste, and the propriety of his observations."

As a poet, his compositions are not less distinguished by imagination and judgment, than his manners were remarkable for eccentricity and originality. In both, we are pleased to find that feeling disposition which characterises the good man, and the ingenious, sublime and moral poet.

His Epigoniad, if he had written nothing else, is sufficient to entitle him to an honourable rank among the poets of our nation, with whom he is now associated. It is a legitimate epic poem, of the same species of composition with the "Iliad" and the "Æneid," which is universally allowed to be, of all poetical works, the most dignified, and, at the same time, the most difficult in execution.

"To contrive a story," says Dr. Blair, in his excellent "Lectures," "which shall please and interest all readers, by being at once entertaining, important, and instructive, to fill it with suitable incidents, to enliven it with a variety of characters and of descriptions, and, throughout a long work, to maintain that propriety of sentiment, and that elevation of style, which the epic character requires, is unquestionably the highest effort of poetical genius."

What talents are necessary to so arduous an attempt! What vigour of imagination, extent of knowledge, solidity of understanding, and powers of language! In order to judge whether Wilkie has succeeded in this exalted species of writing, or not, an appeal should be made, not so much to the abstracted rules of criticism, as to the taste and feeling of the sympathetic and judicious reader: For it is sentiment only that can judge of sentiment. When the heart of the reader remains cold and unaffected, the most elaborate performance is defended, in vain, by all the art of the most expert rhetorician; and, on the contrary, where nature is displayed in just colours, and the imagination astonished by scenes of terror, or expanded by such as are sublime, a satisfaction is enjoyed, which is but little marred by a deviation from unity of time, place, or action.

In forming an estimate of the epic poem of Wilkie, we are to consider what degree of importance there is in his moral, and what of artifice, in his fable; what kind of manners and characters he has exhibited, and if his characters are properly supported by their sentiments and actions. Are his digressions natural? Are his views sublime? Is his imagery beautiful, and his diction varied with his varying subject?

It would extend this narrative to an undue length, to examine the Epigoniad, with respect to each of these heads, particularly. We shall, therefore, content ourselves with briefly running over the moral, and giving a short analysis of the fable, occasionally observing on other particulars, as we go along, and collecting a few specimens of those great beauties in which it abounds.

As the end or moral of the "Paradise Lost" is to show the bitter fruits that spring from disobedience to the laws of God; and as the end or moral of the "Iliad" is to display the fatal effects of furious and deep resentment and discord, so the moral of the Epigoniad teaches the dire disasters that flow from the passion of love. This lesson is inculcated by a story interwoven with primeval manners, and with Grecian mythology. The first of these circumstances is rather an advantage than a disadvantage, as we are acquainted with the manners, described, not only from the writings of Homer, but also from those of Moses, and as they diffuse over the poem an air of venerable simplicity: The second could not, be avoided, it being an article in the Grecian creed, that the gods often interpose visibly and bodily in human affairs: nor is the incredibility of mythology so great a disadvantage in poetry, as may be imagined; For, first, as there is a degree of belief that attends the vivid perception of every object, the beautiful and consistent tales that are told by the poets, of the gods and other superior beings, gain a temporary credit; and this is sufficient for the purpose of the poet. Secondly, The heathen mythology operates on our minds, with the more facility that it has been impressed on our minds in our youth. We are acquainted with the different characters of the gods and goddesses; we know, beforehand, what part they are likely to act on particular occasions, and are pleased when we find the poet supporting, with propriety, the character of each. A like observation may be extended to the heroes and other famous personages of antiquity. We are acquainted, as it were, with their persons; we are interested in their fortunes, and, therefore, we are infinitely more affected by scenes in which they appear as actors, than we would be by scenes in which a poet should introduce persons and fictions with which we are wholly unacquainted. Boileau, the greatest critic of the French nation, was of this opinion;

"La fable offre à l'esprit mille agréments divers,
Là tous les noms heureux semblent nez pour les vers.
Ulysse, Agamemnon, Oreste, Idomeneé,
Hélène, Menelas, Paris, Hector, Enécé."

It is certain, that there is, in that poetic ground, a kind of enchantment which allures every person of a tender and lively imagination: nor is this impression diminished, but rather much increased by our early introduction to the knowledge of it, in our perusal of the Greek and Latin classics. The same great French critic makes the apology of Wilkie in his use of the ancient mythology.

“ Ainsî dans cet amas de noble fictions,
Le poete s'engage en mille inventions,
Orne, eleve, embellit, agrandit toutes choses,
Et trouve s'ons sa main des fleurs toujours ecloses.”

It would seem, indeed, that, if some supernatural machinery be not admitted, epic poetry, at least all the marvellous part of it, must be entirely abandoned. “ Without admiration,” says Dr. Hurd, in his “ Letters on Chivalry and Romance” (which cannot be effected but by the marvellous of celestial intervention, I mean the agency of superior natures really existing, or by the illusion of the fancy taken to be so), no epic poem can be long-lived. The Christian religion, for many reasons, is unfit for the fabulous ornaments of poetry: The plan of Milton's work being altogether theological, his supernatural beings form not the machinery, but are the principal actors in the poem. The introduction of allegory, after the manner of Voltaire, is liable to many objections; and though a mere historical epic poem like “ Leonidas,” may have its beauties, it will always be inferior to the force and pathetic words of tragedy, and must resign to that species of poetry the precedency which the former composition has always challenged among the productions of human genius.

The fable of the Epigoniad is this: The poet supposes, that Cassandra, the daughter of Alcander King of Pelignium in Italy, was pursued by the love of Echetus, a barbarous tyrant in the neighbourhood, and as her father rejected his addresses, he drew on himself the resentment of the tyrant, who made war upon him, and forced him to retire into Eolia, where Diomed gave him protection. This hero falls himself in love with Cassandra and is so fortunate as to make equal impressions on her heart; but, before the completion of his marriage, he is called to the siege of Thebes, and leaves, as he supposes, Cassandra in Eolia with her father. But Cassandra, anxious for her lover's safety, and unwilling to part from the object of her affections, had secretly put on a man's habit, had attended him in the camp, and had fought by his side in all his battles. The poem opens with the appearance of the Epigoni before the walls of Thebes, resolute to signalize their own names, and to redeem the Argive glory, by its reduction. The gods, assembled on the hundred heads of high Olympus, view from afar Thebes doomed to perish by the Argives, and principally by the hands of Diomed. Juno and Pallas, favourable to the Argives, seek the ruin of Thebes. Venus, in order to frustrate the design of both Juno and Pallas, deliberates concerning the proper method of raising the siege. The fittest expedient seems to be the exciting in Diomed a jealousy of Cassandra and persuading him, that her affections were secretly engaged to Echetus, and that the tyrant had invaded Eolia in pursuit of his mistress. Zelotype, a Paphian nymph, sprung from Cupid and Alecto, offers her services, for this end, to the goddess.

Goddess these shafts shall compass what you aim,
My mother dipt their points in Stygian flame;
Where'er my father's darts their way have found,
Mine follow deep, and poison all the wound.
By these, we soon, with triumph, shall behold
Pallas deceiv'd, and Juno's self controll'd.

Her person and flight are painted in the most characteristic habiliments and splendid colours that poetry affords.

First to her feet the winged shoes she binds,
Which tread the air and mount the rapid winds;
Aloft they bear her through th' ethereal plain,
Above the solid earth and liquid main;

THE LIFE OF WILKIE.

Her arrows next she takes, of pointed steel,
 For sight too small, but terrible to feel.—
 A figur'd zone, mysteri ally design'd,
 Around her waist her yellow robe confin'd;
 There dark Suspicion lurk'd, of sable hue,
 There hasty Rage, her deadly dagger drew;
 Pale Envy inly pin'd, and by her side
 Stood Frenzy raging with his arms unty'd.
 Affronted Pride, with thirst of vengeance burn'd,
 And Love's excess to deepest hatred turn'd.
 The virgin last, around her shoulders flung
 The bow, and by her side the quiver hung:
 Then, springing up, her airy course she bends
 For Thebes; and lightly o'er the tents descends.
 The son of Iydeus 'midst his bands she found
 In arms complete, reposing on the ground;
 And as he slept, the hero thus address'd;
 Her form to fancy's waking eye express'd.

Diomed, moved by the instigations of jealousy, and eager to defend his mistress and his country, calls an assembly of the confederated kings, and proposes to raise the siege of Thebes, on account of the difficulty of the enterprise and dangers which surround the army. The kings debate concerning the proposal; and here appears a great diversity of characters and sentiments, suitable to each. Thebes, the general, breaks out into a passion at the proposal; but is pacified by Nestor. Idomeneus rises, and reproaches Diomed for his dishonourable counsel; and, among other topics, upbraids him with his degeneracy from his father's bravery. The debate is closed by Ulysses, who informs the princes, that the Thebans are preparing to march out in order to attack them, and that it is vain to deliberate any longer concerning the continuance of the war. The kings resolve to prosecute the war, and Diomed, though stung with love, and jealousy of Echetus, yields to their voice. The nations and tribes that opposed the Argives, being described in the manner of Homer, a battle commences before the walls of Thebes; and the Theban troops, led on by the brave Leopbron, the son of Cress the king, repulse the enemy. Pallas descends to the aid of the Argives, in the form of Homo leon, Diomed's charioteer being slain. Cassandra, still concealed under the arms and dress of a foldier, presenting herself to Diomed, offers to take that office upon herself. Diomed declines the offer. Pallas herself assumes the reins, and conducts Diomed in the fight. He kills Leopbron. Every thing gives way to this chief, guided by the wisdom, and fortified by the arms of the immortal goddesses of Prudence and Wisdom: But Mercury, at the command of Jupiter, gives order to Phabus to lash his steeds, and to conclude the day, lest the rapid success of Diomed should precipitate the fall of Thebes before the time fixed by Fate. The darkness of the night interrupts the fight, and Diomed is stripped by Mercury of his divine armour. This battle is full of the spirit of Homer. And now the Theban princes, according to ancient custom, sat in council in the gate; the king oppressed with public cares, and with private grief for the death of his son Leopbron, proposes to sue for a truce of seven days, that they might grace the dead with funeral obsequies. The priest of Apollo, accompanied by Clytophon, repairs to the Argive tents, to ask a truce; and here follows a long, but very interesting episode, that enchants the reader with the wildness of Salvator Rosa, and astonishes him with the terrors of Sophocles. This episode is intended as an experiment in that kind of fiction which distinguishes the "Odyssey." The Theban heralds are conducted, with safety, to the royal tent, where the Argive princes receive them with marks of kindness. After a splendid repast, Clytophon, with great art, addresses the Pylian chief Nestor, reminds him that he was his guest (a circumstance which formed a strong band of friendship, as it does still among barbarous nations) when he fled from the desert shores of Trinacria: Having gained the favour and the attention of Nestor, he relates the wonderful story of his life. Clytophon was the youngest son of Orsilochus, king of Rhodes.

His youngest hope I was, and scarce had seen
The tenth returning summer clothe the green,
When pirates snatch'd me from my native land, &c.

He relates how he arrived at Trinacria, escaped from the pirates, and how that lawless crew perished by the inhuman hands of a Cyclops. In this desert island he remained for ten years. His solitary life, his terror of the Cyclops, his escape from the domain and from the threats of that monster, who discovered him in his flight, form a wild and romantic tale, which affords a satisfaction of a pleasing though melancholy nature. The Argive chiefs, won by the eloquence of Nestor, agree to the truce. Diomed alone remonstrates, and retires sullenly to his tent. The poet, in imitation of Homer, describes the funeral obsequies and various games in honour of the dead. The games he has chosen are different from those which are to be found among the ancients, and the incidents are new and curious. He meditates a design to attack the unarmed Thebans, confiding in the truce, and busied in burying their dead. His friend, and the guardian of his youth, Deiphobus, dissuades him from such enormous injustice, and expostulates on this subject, with a freedom which provokes the fiery temper of Diomed to lift his hand against his friend, and to put him to death. This incident, which is apt to surprise us, seems to have been copied by the poet from that circumstance in the life of Alexander, where the heroic conqueror, moved by a sudden passion, stabs Clytus, his ancient friend, by whom his life had been formerly saved in battle. The repentance of Diomed is equal to that of Alexander. No sooner had he struck the fatal blow than his eyes are opened; he is sensible of his guilt and shame; he refuses all consolation; abstains even from food, and shuts himself up alone in his tent. His followers, struck with horror at the violence of his passion, keep at a distance from him. A tumult ensues, which is quelled by the eloquence of Ulysses. While Diomed, abandoned by all, lay outstretched in the dust, resigned to melancholy, remorse, and despair, Cassandra enters his tent with a potion, which she had prepared for him. The virgin endeavours, by an artful tale, to shun discovery, and to conceal her love. While she stands before him alone, her timidity and passion betray her sex; and Diomed immediately perceives her to be Cassandra. As his repentance for the murder of Deiphobus was now the ruling passion in his mind, he is not moved by tenderness for Cassandra; on the contrary, he considers her as the cause, however innocent, of the murder of his friend, and of his own guilt.

Those eyes I see, whose soft enchantment stole
My peace, and stirr'd a tempest in my soul;
By their mild light, in innocence array'd,
To guilty madness was my heart betray'd.
Deiphobus is dead: his mournful ghost
Lamenting, wanders on the Stygian coast;
And blames my wrath. Oh! that the sun which gave
Light to thy birth, had set upon thy grave:
And he had liv'd! now lifeless on the plain,
A corse he lies, and number'd with the slain.

Overwhelmed with grief at the treatment she received, Cassandra repairs to a rural temple, sacred to Ceres, whose protection she implores, prostrate on the ground, and bathed in a flood of tears. At this instant, Zelotype descended from Venus, but her counsels were overthrown by Pallas, disguised in the shape of Amyclea, Cassandra's mother. Cassandra's address to Amyclea will not lose, by a comparison, with the address of Anchises to Aeneas in the Elysian fields. She resolves to return to her father's house, and had begun to put her design in execution, when she fell into the hands of the Thebans. The fierce chiefs decree, that she shall fall a sacrifice to the ghosts of Leopbron and Andremon. This stern purpose is opposed by Pbericles, who insists upon the faith of treaties. A dispute arises on the subject; some of the princes insist on the death of Cassandra, others declare themselves ready to protect her life, at the risk of their own. And this discord had rag'd in civil blood, had not Clytophon appeas'd the tumult, by proposing to practise on the passions of Diomed, by means of so dear a pledge of his love, and to engage him to withdraw his forces from the walls of Thebes. Diomed, his rage subsiding into grief, inquires at every leader for Cassandra, and is stung with compunction for his barbarous usage of that lovely, affectionate, and patient maid. Whilst his mind is thus softened, an herald appears from the gates of Thebes, relates the fate of Cassandra, and delivers the king's message, threatening to put her to death if Diomed would not agree to a separate truce with Thebes. This proposal raises in the mind of Diomed opposite contending passions. Agreeably to the furious character of that chief, the poet supposes that his predominant passion for revenge is first excited. He rages and vows vengeance, if the Thebans should dare to violate the captive. An embroidered scarf, a present from Cassandra, brings her full into the view of Diomed, with all her charms. His rage is suspended, and he resigns his mind to love, to grief, and tender fear. He proposes a truce of twenty days, which the Thebans accept. In the mean time, Dionises returns, who had been sent to the wilderness of Ceta to recal Hercules for the protection of his native city. He relates the death of Hercules, and the excruciating pains of the envenomed robe, which had been sent him by the hands of the jealous Dejanira. He relates also the fate of Cleon, son of the king of Thebes, slain by Philoctetes for an attempt to steal away the arms of his friend Hercules, now enrolled among the gods. This episode is an attempt towards heroic tragedy, in the manner of Sophocles, and breathes all the horrors, and vehemence and atrocity of that great poet. If the sublimity of his imagination, and the energy of his style appear any where conspicuous, it is in this episode, which we shall not scruple to compare with any poetry in the English language. Nothing can be more pathetic than the complaints of Hercules, when the poison of the envenomed robe begins first to prey upon him.

O cool my boiling blood, ye winds that blow
 From mountains loaded with eternal snow,
 And crack the icy cliffs: in vain! in vain!
 Your rigour cannot quench my raging pain!
 For round this heart the furies wave their brands,
 And wring my entrails with their burning hands.

The virtue of Hercules, sustaining him under the weight of infernal pain, is described in a manner not unworthy of the supreme grandeur of the subject; and is a spectacle, if we may be allowed, with Wilkie, to adopt the sentiments and the style of the ancients, we would say even the immortal gods would regard with complacency and approbation.

The Theban king, enraged by the death of his sons, even to madness, despair, and hatred of the gods, instigates his martial powers to attack the Argives, secure in the truce, and employed in burying the dead. The Argives, encouraged by Pallas, in the form of Mentor, rally their forces and resist the Thebans with bravery, but without success. The Argive bands give way, and would have perished by the hands of an enraged victorious enemy, had not Pallas dispatched Ulysses to solicit the aid of Diomed. The speech of Ulysses, in which the character of the speaker is well supported, had its full influence on the mind of a generous warrior, ambitious of glory, and quickly sensible to the stings of reproach. He confesses his passion for the captive Cassandra; whom he describes with all the exaggerations of love. Ulysses, having now learned the cause of Diomed's inactivity, addresses himself to him with success. He shows, that no faith was to be expected from the perfidious Thebans, and that the safety of Cassandra might be obtained by force, but was not to be hoped for from a regard to justice. Moved by this reasoning, Diomed takes the field. The Thebans are forced to retreat, and the ruthless Creon dispatches an assassin to murder Cassandra. Here opens a scene truly affecting. The queen of Thebes and her maids sat lamenting with the fair captive, talking to her in the language of complacency and tenderness, assuring her that her innocence, her sex, would protect her, and that nine short days would restore her freedom: But Cassandra, prepared to meet her fate, by a dream, arms herself with magnanimous resolution, and, when the murderer approached, with the sword bared for execution, in the midst of her weeping attendants, she alone appeared erect and undaunted.

THE LIFE OF WILKIE.

———For the blow prepar'd,
 With both her hands her shining neck she bar'd,
 And round her head a purple garment roll'd,
 With leaves of silver mark'd, and flowing gold.
 Rais'd for the stroke, the glittering faulchion hung,
 And swift descending, bore the head along.
 A tide of gore, diffus'd in purple streams,
 Dashes the wall, and o'er the pavement swims.
 Prone to the ground, the headless trunk reclines,
 And life, in long convulsive throbs, resigns.

In the mean time, Diomed advises the Argive chiefs to take Thebes by assault. Idomeneus opposes for rash a design; and in the midst of this dispute, Creon displays, on the point of a spear the head of Cassandra. Diomed leads on his powers to the assault of Thebes, while the other Argive bands, in favour of his attempt, distract the foe by mock approaches. The city is taken. The queen, made captive, implores the mercy of Diomed. Ulysses advises him to offer her up a victim to the manes of Cassandra. The generous hero rejects the barbarous counsel; and the poem concludes with the death of Creon.

It is a manifest advantage in the Epigoniad, that the scenes it describes lie within a very narrow space of time; that events follow events in rapid succession; and that, on the whole, it maintains the closest and most perfect unity of time, place, and action. The moral is no other than what is the moral of many tragedies, the fatal effects of love. But the poet has found means artfully to extend the moral to passion in general: For Diomed, in a kind of peroration to the whole of what had passed, deploras the predominancy of passion, ever deaf to reason and cool reflection.

While I, unhappy, by its dictates sway'd,
 My guardian murder'd, and the host betray'd.

The fable is evidently ingeniously artificial; but the execution is better than the design, the poetry superior to the fable, and the colouring of the particular parts more excellent than the general plan of the whole. Of the four great epic poems which have been the admiration of mankind, the "Iliad," "Æneid," "Jerusalem," and "Paradise Lost," the "Jerusalem" alone would make a tolerable novel, if reduced to prose, and related without that splendour of versification and imagery by which it is supported; yet, in the opinion of many great judges, the "Jerusalem" is the least perfect of these productions, chiefly because it has least nature and simplicity in the sentiments, and is most liable to the objection of affectation and conceit. The story of a poem, whatever may be imagined, is the least essential part of it; the force of the versification, the vivacity of the images, the justness of the descriptions, the natural play of the passions, are the chief circumstances which distinguish the great poet from the prosaic novelist; and we will venture to affirm, that all these advantages, especially the three former, are to be found in an eminent degree in the Epigoniad. Wilkie, inspired with the true genius of Greece, and smit with the most profound veneration for Homer, disdains all frivolous ornaments; and, relying entirely on his sublime imagination and his nervous and harmonious expression, has ventured to present to his reader the naked beauties of nature, and challenges, for his partizans, all the admirers of genuine antiquity.

There is one circumstance in which Wilkie has carried his boldness of copying antiquity beyond the practice of many, even judicious moderns. He has drawn his personages, not only with all the simplicity of the Grecian heroes, but also with some degree of their roughness, and even of their ferocity. This is a circumstance which a mere modern is apt to find fault with in Homer, and which, perhaps, he will not easily excuse in his imitator. It is certain that the ideas of manners are much changed since the age of Homer, and though the "Iliad" was always, among the ancients, conceived to be a panegyric on the Greeks, yet the reader is now almost always on the side of the Trojans, and is much more interested for the humane and soft manners of Priam, Hector, Andromache, Sarpedon, Æneas, Glaucus, nay, even of Paris and Helen, than for the severe and cruel bravery of Achilles, Agamemnon, and the other Grecian heroes. Sensible of this inconvenience, Fenelon, in his "Telemaque," has softened extremely the harsh manners of the heroic ages, and has contented himself with retaining that amiable simplicity by which these ages were distinguished. If the reader be displeas'd that the British poet has not followed the example of the French writer, he must at least allow, that he has drawn a more exact and faithful copy of antiquity, and has made fewer sacrifices of truth to ornament.

The characters of the Epigoniad are mostly the same with those of the "Iliad." Diomed, Agamemnon, Menelaus, Ulysses, Nestor, Idomeneus, Merion, and even Tberistes, all appear in different parts of the poem, and, in general, act parts suitable to the characters drawn of them by Homer. The episodes are artfully inserted, interesting and natural. The language is simple and artless in narration; but in description, often bold, figurative and sublime. The images are taken from rural life, or the great and beautiful objects of nature. There is a littleness in the most ingenious arts. Nature only corresponds to the elevated tone of the epic poet. The similes are perhaps too frequent. This frequency Wilkie would doubtless have defended by the example of Homer; but Homer himself seems to offend in this particular. The numbers are elaborately correct, delicately polished, and exquisitely harmonious. Pope seems to have been his model for versification, and he has borrowed many lines and expressions from him. But he is not a servile imitator. He has judiciously diversified the uniformity of Pope, by adopting the variety of pause, accent, cadence, and diction, so eminently conspicuous in Dryden, and so absolutely essential to the harmony of true poetry.

An ingenious foreigner, whose mind seems far superior to bigotry and national prejudice, in his "Essay on the Revolutions of Literature," has mentioned the Epigoniad in terms of high respect, and accounted for the fewness of its readers, not from any fault in the poem, but from the circumstance that the English are acquainted with Homer, not only in the original, but by means of the celebrated translation of Pope.

"The Epigoniad of Wilkie," says Professor Denina, "would have been a most admirable poem, had it been written 2000 years ago: But as Homer is now so well known in England, we cannot be surpris'd that Wilkie has not a greater number of readers. We Italians, at present, neglect the Avarchide di Lingi Almanni, which, like the Epigoniad, is too close an imitation of the "Iliad."

There are others, no doubt, besides Professor Denina, who, while they will not hesitate to allow no small share of merit to this poet, will yet be ready to consider his poem as too close an imitation of Homer; and think that he has been unfortunate in the choice of his subject.

Wilkie, aware of these objections, has endeavoured to obviate them in his Preface, which has been universally admired, and than which there has not appeared a piece of juster or more manly criticism since the times of Aristotle and Horace. He justifies himself, at great length, in having formed his poem upon historical circumstances already known, and introduced characters with which the reader is before acquainted, and also shows the necessity he was under of taking many of the historical circumstances from the ancient poets; for tradition, the proper foundation of epic poetry, is only to be found in their writings, and, therefore, must be used like a common stock, and not considered as the property of individuals.

"Tradition," says the Preface, "is the best ground on which a fable can be built, not only because it gives the appearance of reality to things that are merely fictitious, but likewise because it supplies a poet with the most proper materials for his invention, to work upon."

We might have expected, from this remark, that he had not only taken tradition as the ground of his fable, but employed it also to guide him through the narration: But we find that he has not only forsook, but contradicted it on several occasions.

Eustathius, in his Commentary upon the fourth book of the "Iliad," gives us a list of the nine warriors who were called the Epigoni, most of whom Wilkie never mentions in the Epigoniad, but instead of them, introduces, not the descendants of those unfortunate heroes who fell before Thebes in a former expedition, but several of their contemporaries; as Thebes and Nestor, who had no motives of revenge to prompt their undertaking. Thebes, in particular, was not there, for we find in the "Suppliants" of Euripides, that Thebes went upon a former expedition to Thebes, to procure funeral honours for the seven fathers of the Epigoni, who lay unburied before the walls of that city; and, at the end of the same tragedy, we are told, that the capture of the city was reserved for the Epigoni alone. Wilkie also gives Thebes the conduct of the war, in contradiction to Diodorus Siculus, who affirms, that by the advice of the oracle of Apollo, Alcæon was constituted generalissimo: He likewise makes Creon king of Thebes, but Creon had been dead four years before; and Eustathius positively says, that Laodamas was, at that time, their king. Contrary to all order of time, Agamemnon and Menelaus are introduced as principal characters, an anachronism which he endeavours to excuse, by alleging that it was a fact of little consequence, and that he did not therefore choose to deprive himself of two illustrious names. Instead of Sthenelus, who is said to have accompanied Diomed in this expedition, he has substituted "Ulysses, a first-rate hero, in the place of a second-rate one, and a name which every body is acquainted with, in the place of one little known."

But though Wilkie's disagreement with Homer in point of fact, is not more remarkable than his disregard of the traditions of the ancients, we must acknowledge, that, in giving up the conduct of his poem to an invention fruitful of incidents, he has given us a regular heroic story, well connected in its parts, adorned with characters which strongly attach the reader, and make him take part in the dangers they encounter, embellished by mythological fictions, which gratify and fill the imagination, and abounding in interesting situations, which awaken the feelings of humanity. He is some times awful and august; often tender and pathetic; and intermingles valiant achievements with the gentle and pleasing scenes of love, friendship, and affection.

There is nothing more wonderful, in this admirable poem, than the intimate acquaintance it displays, not only with human nature, but with the turn and manner of thinking of the ancients, their history, opinions, manners, and customs. There are few books that contain more ancient learning than the Epigoniad. To the reader, acquainted with remote antiquity, it yields high entertainment; and we are so far from thinking, that an acquaintance with Homer hinders men from reading this poem, that we are of opinion it is chiefly by such as are conversant in the writings of that poet, that the Epigoniad is, or will be read. And as the manners therein described are not founded on any circumstances that are temporary and fugacious, but arise from the original frame and constitution of human nature, and are consequently the same in all nations and periods of the world; it is probable, if the English language shall not undergo very material and sudden changes, that the epic poem of Wilkie will be read and admired, when others, that are in greater vogue in the present day, shall be overlooked and forgotten.

In the Epigoniad, Wilkie has, in general, followed successfully the footsteps of Homer. In the Dream annexed to that poem, he has chosen Spenser for his model, and ventured to engage in a rivalry with the great father of allegorical poetry. In this small poem, in which the manner of Spenser is finely imitated, the poet supposes himself to be introduced to Homer, who censures his poem in some particulars, and excuses it in others. It is, indeed, a species of apology for the Epigoniad, written in a very lively and elegant manner. It may be compared to a well-polished gem of the purest water, and cut into the most beautiful form. He apologises for so closely imitating, and even borrowing from Homer. He alleges, that Plato and Virgil did so before him. His praise of Hesiod and Theocritus is such as might be expected from an agriculturist and a poet. Those who would judge of Wilkie's talents for poetry, without perusing his larger work, may satisfy their curiosity by running over this short poem. They will see the same force of imagination and harmony of numbers, which distinguish his longer performance, and may thence, with small application, receive a favourable impression of his genius.

His Fables discover an ingenious and acute turn of mind, and a thorough acquaintance with the nature and ways of men; but they are not recommended by any great degree of poignancy or poetical spirit. Simplicity is, indeed, the greatest excellence of fable: But, in the Fables of Wilkie, there is such an excess of simplicity, that they do not sufficiently command attention. They do not sufficiently rouse and exercise the mind; and this defect is the more inexcusable, that to rouse attention is the very end of fable: For the lessons that fable teaches are sufficiently obvious, and what she pretends to is only to incline men, by a species of surprise, to attend to them. If Wilkie cannot boast the ease of Gay, the elegance of Moore, or the humour and poignancy of Smart, yet he is, by no means, a contemptible fabulist. His Fables have the merit of an artless and easy verification, of just observation, and even, occasionally, of deep reasoning, and abound in strokes of a pathetic simplicity. The fable of the Rake and the Hermit possesses the two last mentioned qualities in an eminent degree.

THE WORKS OF WILKIE.

P R E F A C E.

As there is no class of writers more freely censured than poets, and that by judges of all sorts, competent and incompetent: I shall attempt to answer some objections that may be made to the following performance, by persons not sufficiently acquainted with epic poetry, and the rules upon which it ought to be formed.

The beauties of the piece, if it has any, shall be left to be discovered by the reader for himself. This is his undoubted privilege; and I have no intention to break in upon it: neither would it be of any advantage to do so; for poetical beauties, if they are real, will make themselves observed, and have their full effect without a comment.

Some will object to the choice of the subject, that it is taken from the history of an age and nation, the particular manners of which are not now well known, and therefore incapable of being justly represented by any modern author. This objection will appear to be of little consequence, when we consider that the fact upon which it proceeds is so far from being strictly true, that there are none who have any tolerable share of classical learning, that are not better acquainted with the manners and customs of the heroic ages, than with those of their own country, at the distance of a few centuries. Neither is this knowledge of ancient manners confined to the learned; the vulgar themselves, from the books of Moses, and other accounts of the first periods of the Jewish state, are sufficiently instructed in the customs of the earliest times, to be able to relish any work where these are justly represented. With what favour, for instance, has Mr. Pope's translation of the Iliad been received by persons of all conditions? and how much is it commonly preferred to the Faery Queen, a poem formed upon manners of a much more modern cast. But supposing the fact upon which the objection proceeds to be true, and that the customs and manners peculiar to the times from which the subject of the poem is taken, are not now well understood, I do not apprehend, that, even with this confession, the objection amounts to any thing considerable; for manners are to be distinguished into two kinds, universal and particular. Universal manners, are those which arise from the original form and constitution of the human nature, and which consequently are the same in all nations and periods of the world. Particular manners, on the other hand, consist of such customs and modes of behaviour, as proceed from the influence of partial causes, and that shift and vary as those causes do upon which they depend. To make myself understood by an example; it is agreeable to custom or universal manners, to be angry and resent an injury; but particular manners, in ordinary cases, determine the methods of revenge. For great offences, an Italian poisons his enemy; a Spaniard stabs him over the shoulder; and a Frenchman seeks satisfaction in duel. From this example, it will be easy to see that particular manners ought to appear but very little, either in epic poetry, tragedy, or any other of the higher kinds of poetical composition; for they are vulgar, and depend upon custom; but great passions and high characters reject ordinary forms; and therefore must, upon every occasion, break through all the common modes both of speech and behaviour. Though ancient manners, therefore, were not so precisely known as they are, I should imagine, that a story taken from the accounts which we have of the heroic ages, might very well serve for the subject of an epic poem, and have all the advantages necessary in respect of that species of composition.

It may likewise be alleged, that I have done wrong in choosing for my subject a piece of history which has no connection with present affairs; and that, if I had done otherwise my work would have been more interesting and useful.

This objection, seemingly a very material one, admits, notwithstanding, of an easy answer, viz. that subjects for epic poetry ought always to be taken from periods too early to fall within the reach of true history. And, if this rule is shown to be essential, which I shall attempt to do in what follows, it will be found to be impossible that any subject proper for that kind of writing should have a connection with present affairs. The proper business of epic poetry, is to extend our ideas of human perfection, or, as the critics express it, to excite admiration. In order to do this in any tolerable degree, characters must be magnified, and accommodated rather to our notions of heroic greatness, than to the real state of human nature. There appears a certain littleness in all men when truly known, which checks admiration, and confines it to very narrow limits; heroes, themselves, though possessed of the greatest qualities, are, in most circumstances of their condition, so much upon a level with the ordinary run of mankind, that such as have an opportunity of being intimately acquainted with them, do not admire them at the same rate that others do, who view them only at a distance. The common conditions of humanity lessen every man; and there are many little circumstances inseparably connected with our state of being, which we cannot easily reconcile with our idea of Epaminondas, Plato, Scipio, or Cæsar. From all this it plainly appears, that admiration claims for its object something superior to mere humanity; and therefore such poems as have it for their end to excite admiration, ought to celebrate those persons only that never have been treated of by regular historians. For history gives to all things their just and natural dimensions; and, if it should interfere with poetical fiction, would effectually confute those beautiful legends which are invented to raise our ideas of character and action, above the standard at which experience has fixed them.

Let it be observed, as a further confirmation of the maxim which I am establishing, that there is in our minds a principle which leads us to admire past times, especially those which are most remote from our own. This prejudice is strong in us; and, without being directed or assisted by art, forms in the mere vulgar of all countries, the most extravagant notions of the stature, strength, and other heroic qualities of their remote ancestors. This prejudice, so favourable to poetical fiction, true history effectually destroys: and therefore poets, that they may have the advantage of it, ought to celebrate those persons and events only that are of so great antiquity, as not to be remembered with any degree of certainty and exactness.

But, instead of a thousand arguments to this purpose, let us only consider the machinery which must be employed in an epic poem: how heaven and hell must both be put in motion, and brought into the action; how events altogether out of the common road of human affairs, and no ways countenanced either by reason or by experience, must be offered to mens imaginations, so as to be admitted for true. Let us consider all this, and it will appear, that there is nothing which poets ought more carefully to avoid, than interfering with such regular and well-vouched accounts of things as would effectually confute their fable, and make the meanest reader reject it with contempt. This is a point of prudence which no poet has yet neglected with impunity. Lucan, according to his usual rashness, has taken, for the subject of an epic poem, one of the best known events which he could have pitched upon in the whole series of human affairs; and, in order to distinguish himself from a mere historian, is often under the necessity of starting from his subject, and employing the whole force of a very lively and fruitful invention in unnecessary descriptions and trifling digressions. This, besides other inconveniences of greater importance, gives such an appearance of labour and straining to his whole performance, as takes much from the merit of it, with all who have any notion of ease, majesty, and simplicity of writing. He, and all other poets who have fallen into the same error, find always this disad-vantage attending it, that the true and scilicet parts of their work refuse to unite, and standing as it were at a distance, upon terms of mutual aversion, reproach each other with their peculiar defects. Fiction accuses truth of narrowness and want of dignity; and this again represents the other as vain and extravagant. Spenser, who, in his Faery Queen, not only treats of matters within the sphere of regular history, but describes even the transactions of his own time, in order to avoid the inconveniences which he knew to be almost inseparable from such an attempt, covers his story with a veil of allegory, that few of his readers are able to penetrate. This stratagem leaves him at full liberty in the exercise of his invention; but he pays, in my opinion, too dear for that privilege, by sacrificing to it all the weight and authority which a mixture of received tradition and real geography would have given to his fable. Milton takes the subjects of both his great poems from true history, yet does not succeed the worse upon that account. But it is to be remembered, that his chief actors are not men, but divine and angelic beings; and that it is the human nature only which suffers by a just representation, and loses in point of dignity, when truly known. Besides, the historical circumstances upon which he builds are so few, and of so extraordinary a nature, that they are easily accommodated to poetical fiction; and, therefore, instead of limiting him, and setting bounds to his invention, they serve only to countenance, and give a degree of credibility to whatever he pleases to feign. Shakspeare may likewise be quoted as an exception to the general rule, who takes the subjects of many of his pieces from periods of the English history not very remote, and notwithstanding, succeeds remarkably in exciting the heroic passion. That Shakspeare makes us admire his heroes, is undeniable; and no man of common sense will ever pretend to assert, that real characters of great men, touched up and heightened by a poetical fancy, will not very naturally excite admiration. But there are different degrees of this passion, as well as of all others; and it is evident that the degree of it which Shakspeare intends to raise, is not equal to that which Homer aims at, and the other writers of the epic tribe. We admire no character in Shakspeare's works more than that of Henry V., but the idea which Homer gives us of Achilles, is still more noble and august. The tragedian mixes so much of the ordinary man in the character of his hero, that we become too familiar with him to admire him in a high degree: for in those very pieces in which he is represented as performing his most remarkable exploits, he is often found at his leisure hours amusing himself with a knot of humourists, pick-pockets, and buffoons. I do not pretend to censure Shakspeare for this conduct; because it is not the business of a tragedian to make us admire, but to interest our other affections: and, to make his heroes very much objects of admiration, would possibly be one of the greatest errors that an author of that kind could fall into: for the principle of compassion, to which tragedy is peculiarly addressed, is incompatible with high admiration; and a man, in order either to be loved or pitied, must appear with evident symptoms of the weaknesses common to the rest of the human kind. It is our own image in distress which afflicts us; and we never pity one under calamities, who is not weak enough to be moved by them. Homer upon this account, never attempts to excite pity, but from such private and domestic distresses as show his heroes in the light of ordinary men. Sophocles likewise, from a just apprehension that the heroic passion interferes with the proper spirit of tragedy, lessens on purpose the great characters which he introduces, and strips them of more than half their dignity. Though therefore Shakspeare makes us admire his heroes as much as a tragedian ought to do, and even more in some instances than the rules of art would justify; yet as the degree of admiration which he excites is less by far than that which epic poetry aims at, it may well be raised from subjects that are strictly historical, though the higher degrees of that passion cannot. Were my judgment of sufficient authority in matters of criticism, I would have it understood as a rule; that the subjects of epic poetry should be taken from tradition only: that tragedy should keep within the limits of true history; and that comedy, without meddling at all with historical facts, should expose vice and folly in recent instances, and from living examples. That part of the rule which regards epic poetry, is sufficiently justified from what has been already said; and concerning tragedy, I have likewise observed, that it ought not to exalt its greatest characters above the standard of real life. From this it will follow that it may be strictly historical without losing any real advantage, and attain its full perfection without the assistance of fable. I believe it will be easily allowed, that where truth and fiction are equally subservient to the purposes of poetry, the first ought always to be preferred; for true history carries a weight and authority with it, which seldom attend stories that are merely fictitious, and has many other advantages for interesting our affections above the legends of remote antiquity. But as tragedy should never go so far back as the fabulous ages, neither should it, in my opinion, approach too near to present times; for though it does not aim at raising and gratifying the passion of admiration, yet it has a degree of dignity to maintain, which it would endanger by treating of events too recent, and characters too particularly remembered. Comedy, on the other hand, and indeed every species of satire whatsoever, ought to attack living characters only, and the vices and folly of present times. That imperfection which appears in every thing when viewed near, a circumstance so unfavourable to the genius of epic poetry and tragedy falls in precisely with that of comedy, a kind of writing which has no dignity to support, points always at what is ridiculous, and marks its objects with characters of littleness and contempt. We naturally admire past times, and reverence the dead; and consequently are not so much disposed to laugh at fools who have already finished their parts, and retired, as at fools who are yet upon the stage. The ancient comedy of the Greeks, which proceeded upon this maxim, was certainly, upon that account, the most perfect species of satire that ever was invented. Homer, as he exceeds all other poets in merit, has likewise the advantage of them in point of good fortune; the condition of the age in which he wrote gave him an opportunity of celebrating in his poems, events, which though they were in his days of no great antiquity, and consequently the more interesting, yet had fallen, through the want of authentic records, into so happy a degree of obscurity, that he was at full liberty to feign concerning them what he pleased, without any danger of confutation. This is an advantage which succeeding poets could not boast of; and therefore have found themselves under a necessity, either of taking their subjects from remote antiquity, as I have done, or (which in my opinion is worse) of attempting to mix fable with history, which never can be done with success.

P R E F A C E.

The mythology in the following poem will probably give offence to some readers, who will think it indecent for a Christian to write in such a manner as to suppose the truth of a heathen religion. They will be of opinion, that it would have been better, either to have introduced no religious system at all, or to have chosen such a subject as would have admitted of the true system. I shall endeavour to answer this objection, by establishing two maxims directly opposite to what is proposed in the preceding alternative, and show not only that divine beings are necessary characters in an epic poem, but likewise that it is highly improper to introduce the true God into a work of that nature. If these two points are fully made out, the force of the objection will be taken away. As to the first of them, let us again consider the end which epic poetry proposes to itself: it aims at exciting admiration, by setting before us images of whatever is great and noble in the human character: it is necessary for this purpose that a poet should give his heroes, not only all those intrinsic qualities which make men admired, but that he should magnify them likewise by a skilful management of outward circumstances. We do not form our notions either of persons or things from their real qualities only; circumstances of a foreign nature, and merely accessory, have as great an influence as these in determining our approbation and dislike. This observation shows the importance of mythology to epic poetry; for nothing can render a person of greater consequence in the eye of the world, than an opinion that the gods regard him with a peculiar degree of attention, and are much interested in all that relates to him. If people are once considered as the favourites of heaven, or instruments chosen for the accomplishment of its important purposes; poets may tell of them what great things they please, without seeming to exaggerate, or say any thing that exceeds the bounds of probability. Homer was certainly of this opinion, when he ascribed to his heroes, valour and other great qualities in so immoderate a degree: for, had the gods never interposed in any of the events which he celebrates: had his chief actors been nowise connected with them, either in point of favour or constancy, and represented, at the same time, as performing the high exploits which he ascribes to them instead of being applauded as the first of poets, he would have been censured as the most false and most credulous of historians. This argument in favour of poetical mythology, with another which might be taken from the advantage it is of in point of ornament, and a third from its use in allegory, has determined almost all the writers who have followed the epic or heroic style, to allow it a place in their compositions; such of them as have taken their subject from Greek or Roman story, have adopted the mythology of Homer; and the rest, in celebrating more modern heroes, have, instead of that, made use of the true religion, corrupted by an unnatural mixture of northern superstition and Grecian fable. From a practice therefore so universal, we may justly infer, that poets have looked upon mythology as a thing of great use in their compositions, and almost essential to the art.

It may be alleged, after all that has been said, that, to bring gods into epic poetry, is inconvenient on many accounts; that it prevents a proper display of character in the human actors, turning them all into so many machines, to be moved and guided by the immediate impulses of deity: that it breaks in upon the order of natural causes, and renders all art, either in plan or conduct of a work, superfluous and unnecessary. If what this objection supposes were true, and that the mixing of gods with men in the action of an epic poem, necessarily turned the whole into miracle; if it were an unavoidable consequence of this method, that the human actors should be governed in all they do by divine impulse determining them, without regard to their natural characters, and the probable motives which ought to influence them; in short, if mythology could have no place in a poem, but at the expence of manners, order, connection, and every other thing that can render a work either beautiful or instructive, it would be an argument against it of such weight, as nothing alleged in its favour would be able to counterbalance. But the objection is by no means well founded; for, though there may be an indiscreet application of mythology, productive of all those ill effects which have been mentioned; yet it is obvious, both from reason and experience, that mythology may be managed in such a manner as to be attended with none of them. And this will appear from a very obvious example: the greatest part of mankind, in every age, have believed that gods and superior beings govern and direct the course of human affairs. Many individuals, and even whole nations, have thought that all the actions and events of our lives are predetermined by an overruling power, and that we suffer the controul of an irresistible necessity in all we do: yet this opinion never changes the moral feelings of such as entertain it, and their judgment of characters and actions; they love and hate, approve, and disapprove, admire and despise, in the same manner as others do who believe that men are absolutely free, and that their final determinations proceed only from themselves. But when it is understood, that people act without consciousness, or that the organs of their bodies are not under the dominion of their own wills, but actuated by some other being without their consent: in short, when mere physical necessity is substituted in place of moral, all idea of character, all sense of approbation and disapprobation immediately ceases. From this fact, the truth of which nobody will dispute, it is easy to judge in what cases the interposition of gods in the action of a poem will prevent a proper display of the human characters; and when not. Volition, as appears by the example now given, is that upon which our moral ideas are founded: so long then as volition is exerted, there is a character, and, when that ceases, the character is lost. If therefore the deities in a poem are employed in animating and deterring the heroes, only by suggesting such motives as are proper to influence their wills; such interposition by no means interferes with the display of character, but rather favours it; for the quality of every mind may be known from the motives by which it is determined; and Minerva's prevailing with Pindarus to be guilty of a piece of treachery, by suggesting that Paris would reward him for it, discovered the venality of his temper as much as if he had done the same action from a like motive occurring to himself.

Poets often make the gods infuse an uncommon degree of vigour into their heroes, for answering some great occasion, and add to the grace and dignity of their figure. Sometimes they make a second rate hero the first in a particular action, and, with their assistance, he distinguishes himself above such as are at other times more remarkable for valour and success: all this is so agreeable to what happens naturally, and from mere mechanical causes, that we forget the gods, and interpret what happens as if they had not interposed at all. For every body knows, that when people are roused to any remarkable exertion of force, they become stronger than they are at other times; and that, when in this manner the spirits rise to an uncommon height, the whole body acquires new graces. Valour is not a fixed and permanent quality, nor is it found in any one always in the same degree. Plutarch observes that of all the virtues it exerts itself most irregularly, and rises by fits like a divine inspiration. The sense which every man has of these things, makes him look upon the interposition of gods in such cases as a mythological way of expressing what is merely natural, and allow such as perform the great actions in a poem to possess the whole merit of them. It never lessens our opinion of Hector's valour, for instance, that Apollo often assists him; nor do we think Ulysses less prudent, because he is guided by the influence of Minerva. We have as clear impressions of those, and the other Homeric characters as we have of any characters whatsoever, and discern their limits and distinguishing marks as clearly as if, they had acted altogether of themselves. That superior beings should be employed in governing the events of things, and interposing by thunder, earthquakes, inundations, pestilences, and the like, can never be thought unnatural in poetry, by any one who believes that Providence actually manages the affairs of the world by such means. It belongs to men to design and act, but to Heaven alone to determine.

events. Though a poet, therefore should represent an army weaker and worse conducted, prevailing, in consequence of that kind of interposition which has been mentioned, over another, evidently better and stronger, there would be nothing unnatural in such an account, or contrary to what is often experienced in real affairs.

After all that has been said, it must be owned, that if gods are brought in upon slight occasions, and for trifling purposes; if they are put upon working miracles in order to cover blunders, either in the plan or execution of a poem, and employed in cutting such knots as the author himself has not the skill or patience to untie; it must be owned, I say, that this is a very wrong application of mythology, and attended with all the disadvantages which the objection mentions. It is a stratagem, which, if often practised, would teach the reader at last to disregard all appearances, and, when the most important periods of affairs were approaching, to remain quite secure and uninterested, trusting that a god would always be at hand, in time of need, to manage every thing as the poet would have it, and put all to rights by the shortest and most effectual methods. I have considered this objection at greater length, because at first view it appears very plausible; and shall proceed to what remains, after I have taken notice of another, which has likewise some appearance of force. It will be thought inconvenient, as it is the design of epic poetry to raise and dignify human characters, that gods should appear with men in the same scenes of action. It will be alleged, that in this case the divine persons will necessarily overshadow the human, lessen them by a comparison, and consequently produce an effect directly opposite to what is intended. This objection, however plausible, does not seem to be supported by experience; at least I never found in any instance, that the splendour of divine characters in a poem, eclipsed the human. Besides, this is what cannot easily happen; for, let us suppose two parties of boys engaged in some trial, either of force or skill, and that a few men take part in the debate, dividing themselves between the opposite sides, and assisting them against each other, would the exploits of the full-grown men, however remarkable, lessen those of the boys? by no means; for things that are confessedly unequal, never come into competition, and therefore cannot be either lessened or magnified by appearing together. Are we less disposed to admire the valour of Achilles, because it is understood he was not a match for Jupiter? Or the sagacity of Ulysses, because his penetration was not equal to that of Minerva? But there is one circumstance which renders it absolutely impossible for the gods in epic poetry to eclipse the men in point of heroism; and it is this, that the gods are immortal, and consequently cannot exert that in which heroism chiefly consists, viz. the contempt of death. Homer, in order to give his deities as much of that quality as possible, has made them vulnerable and susceptible of pain; a freedom which has shocked some of the critics, who did not attend to the reason of his doing so. But Homer was too good a judge of propriety, not to be sensible that no person could appear with advantage in military actions who ventured nothing in point of personal safety; and that stature, force, magnificent armour, and even the highest achievements, will never constitute the heroic character, where patience and contempt of danger have no opportunity of appearing. It is this circumstance which gives the mortals in epic poetry a manifest advantage over the immortals; and Mais when ushered into the field with all the pomp and magnificence of Homeric description, is an object less to be admired than Diomed, Ajax, and many others who combat bravely, though conscious of mortality. Homer, who has managed his great characters with the truest judgment and strictest attention to circumstances, takes care to have Achilles early informed that he was to perish at Troy, else he might seem too conscious of safety, from his matchless valour and the armour which he wore, to be great in that which is to be admired, the contempt of death, when the danger of it is imminent. It must be acknowledged, that in Milton's Paradise Lost, the persons in the machinery overshadowed the human characters, and that the heroes of the poem are all of them immortals; but then it is to be remembered, that Paradise Lost is a work altogether irregular; that the subject of it is not epic, but tragic; and that Adam and Eve are not designed to be objects of admiration, but of pity: it is tragic in its plot, and epic in its dress and machinery: as a tragedy, it does not fall under the present question; and, as an epic poem, it evades it likewise, by a circumstance very uncommon, viz. that in the part of it which is properly epic, there are no human persons at all.

I have in this manner endeavoured to prove that mythology is necessary to an epic poem, and that the chief objections to the use of it are of little consequence. I proceed to establish the other proposition which I mentioned, and show, that the true God ought not to be brought into a work of that nature. And if this proposition can be made out, it will easily appear from it, and the preceding one taken together, that poets are under a necessity of having recourse to a false theology, and that they are not to be blamed for doing what the nature of epic poetry on the one hand, and respect to the true religion on the other, render necessary and unavoidable. For proving the point in question, I need only observe, that no person can appear with advantage in poetry, who is not represented according to the form and condition of a man. This art addresses itself chiefly to the imagination, a faculty which apprehends nothing in the way of character that is not human, and according to the analogy of that nature, of which we ourselves are conscious. But it would be equally impious and absurd to represent the Deity in this manner, and to contrive for him a particular character and method of acting, agreeable to the prejudices of weak and ignorant mortals. In the early ages of the church, he thought fit to accommodate himself, by such a piece of condescension, to the notions and apprehensions of his creatures: but it would be indecent in any man to use the same freedom and do that for God, which he only has a right to do for himself. The author of Paradise Lost has offended notoriously in this respect; and, though no encomiums are too great for him as a poet, he is justly chargeable with impiety, for presuming to represent the Divine Nature, and the mysteries of religion, according to the narrowness of human prejudice: his dialogues between the Father and the Son; his employing a Being of infinite wisdom in discussing the subtleties of school divinity; the sensual views which he gives of the happiness of heaven, admitting into it, as a part, not only real eating and drinking, but another kind of animal pleasure, too; by no means more refined: these, and such like circumstances, though perfectly poetical and agreeable to the genius of an art which adapts every thing to the human model, are, at the same time, so inconsistent with truth, and the exalted ideas which we ought to entertain of divine things, that they must be highly offensive to all such as have just impressions of religion and would not choose to see a system of doctrine revealed from heaven, reduced to a state of conformity with heathen superstition. True theology ought not to be used in an epic poem, for another reason, of no less weight than that which has been mentioned, viz. That the human characters which it represents should never be formed upon a perfect moral plan, but have their piety (for instance) tinged with superstition, and their general behaviour influenced by affection, passion, and prejudice. This will be thought a violent paradox, by such as do not know that imperfect characters interest us more than perfect ones, and that we are doubly instructed, when we see, in one and the same example, both what we ought to follow, and what we ought to avoid. Accordingly, Horace, in his epistle to Lollius, where he bestows the highest encomiums upon the Iliad, as a work which delineated vice and virtue better than the writings of the most celebrated philosophers, says of it, notwithstanding, that it is taken up in describing the animosities of foolish kings and insatuated nations. To go to the bottom of this matter, it will be proper to observe, that men are capable of two sorts of character, which may be distinguished by the names of natural and artificial. The natural character implies all those feelings, passions, desires, and opinions which men have from nature and common experience, independent of speculation and moral refinement. A person of this character looks upon outward prosperity as a real good, and considers the calamities of life as real evils; loves his friends, hates his enemies, admires his superiors, is assuming with respect to his inferiors, and stands upon terms of rivalry with his equals; in short, is governed by all those passions and opinions that possess the hearts, and determine the actions of ordinary men. The force and magnitude of this character is in proportion to the strength of these natural dispositions; and its virtue consists in having the generous and beneficent ones predominant. As to that sort of character, again, which I distinguish by the name of artificial: it consists in a habit of mind formed by discipline, according to the cool and dispassionate dictates of reason. This character is highly moral, but, in my opinion, far less poetical than the other, by being less fit for interesting our affections, which are formed by the wise author of our nature for embracing such beings which are of the same temper and complexion with ourselves, and are marked with the common infirmities of human nature. Persons of the high philosophic character, are too firm and unmoved, amidst the calamities they meet with, to excite much sympathy, and are too much superior to the fallies of passion and partial affection, the popular marks of generosity and greatness of mind, ever to be much admired by the bulk of mankind. If the most accomplished poet in the world should take a rigid philosopher for the chief character either of an epic poem or a tragedy, it is easy to conjecture what would be the success of such an attempt; the work would assume the character of its hero, and be cold, dispassionate, and uninteresting. There is, however, a species of panegyric proper for such sort of perfection, and it may be represented to advantage, either in history or prose dialogue, but it will never strike the bulk of mankind. Plato, in his apology of Socrates, deceives us: as Mr Addison likewise does in his tragedy of Cato: for both of them attempt to persuade us, that we are affected with the contemplation of unshaken fortitude, while we are only sympathizing with suffering innocence. The tenderness of humanity appearing through the hardness of the philosophic character, is that which affects us in both instances, and not that unconquered greatness of mind, which occasions rather wonder and astonishment than genuine affection.

From what has been said, it is easy to infer, that the great characters, both in epic poetry and tragedy, ought not to be formed upon a perfect moral plan; and therefore heroes themselves must often be represented as acting from such motives, and governed by such affections as impartial reason cannot approve of: but it would be highly indecent to make a being, whom religion teaches us to consider as perfect, enter into the views of such persons, and exert himself in order to promote their extravagant enterprizes. This would be to bring down the infinite wisdom of God to the level of human folly, and to make him altogether such an one as ourselves.

A false theology, therefore, ought rather to be employed in poetical compositions than the true; for, as the superior beings which are introduced, must of necessity be represented as assuming the passions and opinions of those whom they favour, it is surely much fairer to employ a set of imaginary beings for this purpose, than God himself, and the blessed angels, who ought always to be objects of our reverence.

The same reasoning which leads to this conclusion, will likewise make us sensible, that among false religions, these ought to be preferred which are least connected with the true; for the superstitions which priests and poets have built upon the Christian faith, dishonour it, and therefore should, if possible, be buried in oblivion. The ancient Greek theology seems upon all accounts the attest. It has no connection with the true system, and therefore may be treated with the greatest freedom, without indecency or ground of offence: It consists of a number of beautiful fables, suited to the taste of the most lively and ingenious people that ever existed, and so much calculated to ravish and transport a warm imagination, that many poets in modern times, who proceeded upon a different theology, have, notwithstanding, been so bewitched with its charms, as to admit it into their works, though it clashed violently with the system which they had adopted. Milton is remarkable in this respect; and the more so, as his poem is altogether of a religious nature, and the subject of it taken from holy writ.

Some may possibly imagine, that the following work would have had greater merit, if it had offered to the world a set of characters entirely new, and a story nowise connected with any thing that is already known. I am not of this opinion; but persuaded, on the contrary, that, to invent a story quite new, with a catalogue of names never before heard of, would be an attempt of such a nature, as could not be made with tolerable success; for every man must be sensible, that the wonders which epic poetry relates, will shock even the ignorant vulgar, and appear altogether ridiculous, if they are not founded upon something which has already gained a degree of credit. Our first ideas are taken from experience; and though we may be brought to receive notions, not only very different from those which experience suggests, but even directly contrary to them, yet this is not to be done suddenly and at one attempt: such, therefore, as would have their fictions favourably received, must lay it down as a rule, to accommodate what they feign to established prejudices, and build upon stories which are already in some measure believed. With this precaution, they may go great lengths without appearing absurd, but will soon shock the meanest understandings, if they neglect it. Had there been no fabulous accounts concerning the Trojan expedition current in Greece and Asia, at the time when Homer wrote, the stories which he tells, though the most beautiful that ever were invented, would have appeared to his cotemporaries altogether ridiculous and never been admired, till antiquity had procured them credit, or a tradition been formed afterwards to vouch for them to the world; for, in matters of an extraordinary kind, not only reason, but even imagination, requires more than a single testimony to ground its assent upon; and therefore, though I should have invented a set of characters entirely new, and framed a story for the subject of my poem nowise connected with any thing that has yet been heard of, and been so happy in this attempt as to produce what might equal, in point of perfection, any of the most beautiful fables of antiquity; it would have wanted, notwithstanding, what is absolutely necessary in order to success, viz. that credit which new invented fictions derive from their connection with such as are already become familiar to mens imaginations.

Tradition is the best ground upon which fable can be built, not only because it gives the appearance of reality to things that are merely fictitious, but likewise because it supplies a poet with the most proper materials for his invention to work upon. There are some fabulous stories that please more universally than others; and of this kind are the wonders which tradition reports; for they are accommodated to the affections and passions of the bulk of mankind, in the same manner as national proverbs are to their understandings. The strict accommodation in both instances proceeds from the same cause, viz. that nothing of either sort is the work of one man, or of one age, but of many. Traditions are not perfected by their first inventors, nor proverbs established upon a single authority. Proverbs derive their credit from the general consent of mankind; and tradition is gradually corrected and improved in the hands of such as transmit it to each other through a succession of ages. In its first periods; it is a narrow thing, but extends itself afterwards, and, with the advantage of time, and experiments often repeated, adapts itself so precisely to the affections, passions, and prejudices, natural to the human species, that it becomes at last perfectly agreeable to the sentiments of every heart. No one man, therefore, can pretend to invent fables that will please so universally, as those which are formed by the progress of popular tradition. The faculties of any individual must be too narrow for that purpose, and have too much of a peculiar cast to be capable of producing what will be so strictly adapted to the common feelings and sentiments of all. It is this sort of perfection which pleases us in archæology, or the traditional accounts which we have of the origins of nations; for we are often more agreeably entertained with stories of that kind, though we know them to be absolutely false, than with the justest representations of real events. But as tradition, while it continues in the hands of the people, must be rude and disagreeable in respect of its form, and have many things low and absurd in it, necessary to be palliated or suppressed, it does not arrive at that perfection of which it is capable, till it comes under the management of the poets, and from them receives its last improvement. By means of this progress, tales, that in the mouths of their first inventors, were the most absurd that can be imagined, the effects of mere superstition, ignorance, and national prejudice, rise up at last to astonish the world, and draw the admiration of all ages, in the form of an Iliad or Odyssey. It is not the business of a poet, then, to make fable, but to form, correct, and improve tradition: and it is to his following this method, that Homer undoubtedly owes his success: for it is obvious to any one who considers his works with attention, that he only collected the various traditions that were current in his days, and reduced them to a system. That infinite variety of independent stories which occur in his works, is a proof of this. These are told with so minute, and often so unnecessary a detail of circumstances, that it is easy to see that he followed accounts already current, and did not invent what he has recorded. I could as easily believe that Prometheus made a man of clay, and put life into him, or assent to any other of the most absurd fictions of antiquity; I could even as soon be persuaded that all that Homer has written is strict matter of fact, as believe that any one mortal man was capable of inventing that infinite variety of historical circumstances which occur in the works of that celebrated poet; for invention is by no means an easy thing; and to contrive a tale that will please universally is certainly one of the most difficult undertakings that can be imagined. Poets, therefore, have found themselves under a necessity of trusting to something more powerful than their own invention in this important article, viz. the joint endeavours of many, regulated and directed by the censure of ages.

What has been said, is not only sufficient to justify me in forming my poem upon historical circumstances already known, and introducing characters which the reader is before acquainted with; but shows the necessity likewise of taking many of the historical circumstances from the ancient poets. For tradition, the proper foundation of epic poetry, is now to be found only in their writings; and therefore must be used like a common stock, and not considered as the property of individuals.

For the immoderate length of the two episodes, viz. those in the fourth and seventh books, all that I can say, is, that they are both brought in for very important purposes, and therefore may be permitted to take up more room than is ordinarily allowed to things of that sort. Besides, the first of them is intended as an experiment in that kind of fiction which distinguishes Homer's Odyssey, and the other as an attempt to heroic tragedy, after the manner of Sophocles.

The language is simple and artless. This I take to be an advantage, rather than a defect; for it gives an air of antiquity to the work, and makes the style more suitable to the subject.

My learned readers will be surprised to find Agamemnon and Menelaus at the siege of Thebes, when, according to Homer, they were not there: and, at the same time, no notice taken of Sthenelus, the friend and companion of Diomed, whom the same author mentions as present in that expedition.

With respect to the first circumstance, I did not choose, for the sake of a fact of so little consequence, and that too depending only upon poetical authority; to deprive myself of two illustrious names very proper for adorning my catalogue of heroes. And as to the second; it will be easily allowed, that I could not have made Sthenelus appear, without assigning him that place in Diomed's friendship, and consequently in the action of the poem, which Ulysses now possesses; and which is the only part in the whole suited to his peculiar character. I must have put a second-rate hero in the place of a first-rate one; and a name little known, in the place of one which every body is acquainted with. Besides, I must have transferred, to Sthenelus, the valour, firmness, and address of Ulysses; because the part he was to act would have required these, and must, at the same time, have sunk Ulysses into the character of Sthenelus, for want of a proper opportunity of displaying him in his own. These are inconveniencies too great to be incurred for the sake of a scrupulous agreement with Homer in point of fact; and are therefore, in my opinion, better avoided.

I have explained myself upon the foregoing particulars, for the sake of the learned part of my readers only: and shall now drop a hint for such of them as do not fall under that denomination.

The following poem is called the Epigoniad, because the heroes, whose actions it celebrates, have got the name of the Epigoni (or Descendants), being the sons of those who attempted the conquest of Thebes in a former expedition.

Thus far I have endeavoured to apologise for the following performance. It may be censured, no doubt, upon many accounts besides those that have been mentioned: but I am persuaded, that what has been said will determine every candid reader, not to be peremptory in condemning what at first view he may dislike; for the specimen of criticism which has been given, will convince him that the real faults of epic poetry are not easily ascertained, and distinguished from these inconveniencies that must be allowed to take place, in order to prevent greater faults, and produce, upon the whole, a higher degree of perfection.

THE EPIGONIAD.

BOOK I.

YE pow'rs of song! with whose immortal fire
Your bard enraptur'd sung Pelides' ire,
To Greece so fatal, when in evil hour,
He brav'd, in stern debaté, the sov'reign pow'r,
By like example, teach me now to shew
From love, no less, what dire disasters flow.
For when the youth of Greece, by Theseus led,
Return'd to conquer where their fathers bled,
And punish guilty Thebes, by Heav'n ordain'd
For perfidy to fall, and oaths profan'd;
Venus, still partial to the Theban arms,
Tydeus' son seduc'd by female charms;
Who, from his plighted faith by passion sway'd,
The chiefs, the army, and himself betray'd.

This theme did once your fav'rite bard employ,
Whose verse immortaliz'd the fall of Troy:
But time's oblivious gulf, whose circle draws
All mortal things by fate's eternal laws,
In whose wide vortex worlds themselves are tost,
And rounding swift successively are lost,
This song hath snatch'd. I now resume the strain,
Not from proud hope and emulation vain,
By this attempt to merit equal praise
With worth heroic, born in happier days.
Sooner the weed, that with the spring appears,
And in the summer's heat its blossom bears,
But, shriv'ling at the touch of winter hoar,
Sinks to its native earth, and is no more;
Might match the lofty oak, which long hath stood,
From age to age, the monarch of the wood.
But love excites me, and desire to trace
His glorious steps, though with unequal pace.
Before me still I see his awful shade,
With garlands crown'd, of leaves which never fade;
He points the path to fame, and bids me scale
Parnassus' slippery height, where thousands fail:
I follow trembling; for the cliffs are high,
And hov'ring round them watchful harpies fly,
To snatch the poets wreath with envious claws,
And hiss contempt for merited applause.
But if great Campbell, whose auspicious smile
Bids genius yet revive to bless our isle,
Who, from the toils of state and public cares,
Oft with the muses to the shade repairs,
My numbers shall approve, I rise to fame;
For what he praises, envy dares not blame.

Where high Olympus' hundred heads arise,
Divide the clouds, and mingle with the skies,
The gods assembled met; and view'd, from far,
Thebes and the various combats of the war.
From all apart the Paphian goddess sat,
And pity'd in her heart her fav'rite state,
Decreed to perish, by the Argive bands,
Pallas's art, Tydides' mighty hands:
Pensive she sat, and ev'ry art explor'd
To charm the victor, and restrain his sword;

But veil'd her purpose from the piercing ray
Of Pallas, ever jealous of her sway:
Unseen the goddess, from th' Olympian height
To shady Cyprus bent her rapid flight,
Down the steep air, as, from the setting skies,
At ev'n's approach, a streaming meteor flies.
Where lofty shores the tempest's rage restrain,
And sleeps, in peace dissolv'd, the hoary main;
In love's fam'd isle a deep recess is found,
Which woods embrace, and precipices bound,
To Venus sacred; there her temple stands,
Where azure billows wash the golden sands,
A hollow cave; and lifts its rocky head,
With native myrtle crown'd, a lofty shade.
Whither resort the Naiads of the flood,
Assembl'd with the nymphs from ev'ry wood
Her heifers there they tend, and fleecy store,
Along the windings of the desert shore.
Thither the goddess, from th' Olympian height
Descending swift, precipitates her flight;
Conspicuous, on the yellow sand, she stood,
Above the margin of the azure flood,
From ev'ry grove and stream the nymphs attend,
And to their queen in cheerful homage bend.
Some hastening to the sacred grot repair,
And deck its rocky walls with garlands fair;
Others produce the gift which Autumn brings,
And sparkling nectar quench'd with mountain springs.

And now the queen, impatient to explain
Her secret griefs, address'd her list'ning train:
Ye rural goddesses, immortal fair!
Who all my triumphs, all my sorrows share;
I come, afflicted, from th' ethereal tow'rs,
Where Thebes is doom'd to fall by partial pow'rs.

Nor can entreaty save my fav'rite state,
Avert or change the rigour of her fate;
Though, breathing incense, there my altar stands,
With daily gifts supply'd from virgins hands.
Juno now rules the senate of the skies,
And with her dictates ev'ry pow'r complies;
Her jealous hate the guiltless town condemns
To wasteful havock, and the rage of flames;
Since, thither tempted by a stranger's charms,
The mighty thunderer forsook her arms.
Jove's warlike daughter too promotes her aim,
Who, for Tydides, seeks immortal fame;
For him employs a mother's watchful cares,
And the first honours of the war prepares:
To frustrate both, a monument would raise
Of lasting triumph, and immortal praise,
To draw the son of Tydeus from the field,
To whose victorious hands the town must yield;
For, by the all-decreeing will of fate,
He only can o'erthrow the Theban state:

A way which promises success I'll name :
 The valiant youth adorns a lovely dame,
 Alcander's daughter, whom the graces join'd
 With gifts adorn, above the human kind :
 She with her fire forsook th' Hesperian strand,
 By hostile arms expell'd their native land :
 For Echetus who rules, with tyrant force,
 Where Ausidus directs his downward course,
 And high Garganus th' Apulian plain,
 Is mark'd by failors, from the distant main ;
 Oft from her fire had claim'd the lovely maid,
 Who, still averse, to grant his suit delay'd :
 For, barb'rous in extreme, the tyrant feeds
 With mangl'd limbs of men his hungry steeds :
 Impatient of his love, by hostile arms
 And force declar'd, he claim'd her matchless charms.

Pelignium raz'd the hero's royal seat,
 Who fought in foreign climes a safe retreat ;
 His slight Ætolia's friendly shore receives,
 Her gen'rous lord protects him and relieves ;
 Three cities to possess the chief obtains,
 With hills for pasture fit, and fruitful plains.
 Cassandra for his bride Tydides claim'd ;
 For hymeneal rites the hour was nam'd,
 When call'd to arms against the Theban tow'rs
 The chief reluctant led his martial pow'rs.
 Hence jealousy and fear his breast divide,
 Fear for the safety of an absent bride ;
 Lest, by his passion rous'd, the tyrant rise,
 And unoppos'd usurp the lovely prize.
 He knows not, that, in martial arms conceal'd,
 With him she braves the terrors of the field ;
 True to his side, noon's sultry toil endures,
 And the cold damps that chill the midnight hours.
 If dreams, or signs, could jealousy impart,
 And what the cares that sting the hero's heart,
 Impatient of his pain he'd soon prepare,
 With all his native bands, to quit the war.

The goddess thus : a Paphian nymph reply'd,
 And drew the list'ning crowd on ev'ry side,
 Zelotypé, whom fell Alecto bore,
 With Cupid mixing on th' infernal shore.
 Goddess! these shafts shall compass what you
 aim,

My mother dipt their points in Stygian flame ;
 Where'er my father's darts their way have found,
 Mine follow deep and poison all the wound.
 By these we soon with triumph shall behold
 Pallas deceiv'd, and Juno's self controul'd.

They all approve ; and to the rural scene,
 Around their sov'reign, moves the joyful train ;
 The goddess plac'd, in order each succeeds,
 With song and dance the genial feast proceeds ;
 While to the sprightly harp the voice explains
 The loves of all the gods in wanton strains :
 But when arriv'd the silent hour, which brings
 The shades of ev'ning on its dewy-wings,
 Zelotypé, impatient to pursue
 Her journey, hast'ning to her cave, withdrew ;
 First to her feet the winged shoes she binds,
 Which tread the air, and mount the rapid winds ;
 Aloft they bear her through th' ethereal plain,
 Above the solid earth and liquid main :
 Her arrows next she takes of pointed steel,
 For fight too small, but terrible to feel ;
 Rous'd by their smart, the savage lion roars,
 And mad to combat rush the tusk'd boars,

Of wounds secure ; for where their venom lights,
 What feels their power all other torment flights.
 A figur'd zone, mysteriously design'd,
 Around her waist her yellow robe confin'd :
 There dark suspicion lurk'd, of sable hue ;
 There hasty rage his deadly dagger drew ;
 Pale envy inly pin'd ; and by her side
 Stood phrenzy, raging with his chains unt'y'd ;
 Affronted pride with thirst of vengeance burn'd,
 And love's excess to deepest hatred turn'd.
 All these the artist's curious hand express'd,
 The work divine his matchless skill confess'd.
 The virgin last, around her shoulders flung
 The bow ; and by her side the quiver hung :
 Then, springing up, her airy course she bends
 For Thebes ; and lightly o'er the tents descends.
 The son of Tydeus, midst his bands, she found
 In arms complete, repose on the ground ;
 And, as he slept, the hero thus address'd,
 Her form to fancy's waking eye express'd.

Thrice happy youth ! whose glory 'tis to share
 The Paphian goddess's peculiar care ;
 But happy only, as you now improve
 The warning sent, an earnest of her love.
 Her messenger I am : if in your heart
 The fair Hesperian virgin claims a part ;
 If, with regret, you'd see her matchless charms
 Destin'd to bless a happier rival's arms ;
 Your coasts defenceless, and unguarded tow'rs
 Consum'd and ravag'd by the Latian pow'rs ;
 Withdraw your warriors from the Argive host,
 And save what'er you value, ere 'tis lost.
 For Echetus, who rules with tyrant force,
 Where Ausidus directs his downward course ;
 And high Garganus, on th' Apulian strand,
 Marks to the mariner the distant land,
 Prepares, by swift invasion, to remove
 Your virgin bride, and disappoint your love.
 Before, excited by her matchless charms,
 He claim'd her from her fire by hostile arms ;
 Pelignium raz'd, the hero's royal seat,
 When in your land he sought a safe retreat.
 Cassandra follow'd with reluctant mind,
 To love the tyrant secretly inclin'd ;
 Though fierce and barb'rous in extreme, he feeds,

With mangl'd limbs of men, his hungry steeds.
 And now at anchor on the Latian tide,
 With all their train on board, his galleys ride :
 Prepar'd, when favour'd by the western breeze,
 With course direct to cross the narrow seas.
 This to your ear the Paphian goddess sends ;
 The rest upon your timely care depends.

She said ; and, turning, fix'd upon the bow
 A venom'd shaft, the cause of future woe :
 Then, with reverted aim, the subtle dart
 Dismis'd, and fix'd it in the hero's heart.
 Amaz'd he wak'd ; and, on his arm reclin'd,
 With sighs thus spok'd the anguish of his mind :

What dire disasters all my ways beset !
 How close around me pitch'd the fatal net !
 Here if I stay, nor quit the Argive host,
 Ætolia's ravag'd, and Cassandra's lost :
 For sure the pow'rs immortal ne'er in vain
 To mortals thus the secret fates explain.
 If I retire, the princes must upbraid
 My plighted faith infring'd, the host betray'd ;

And, to succeeding times, the voice of fame,
With cowardice and sloth, will blot my name.
Between these sad alternatives I find
No distant hopes to sooth my anxious mind ;
Unless I could persuade the Argive pow'rs
To quit at once these long-contested tow'rs :
Nor want I reasons specious in debate
To move the boldest warriors to retreat.
Divided thus, the shame would lighter fall ;
Reproach is scarce reproach which touches all.

Thus pond'ring in his mind the hero lay,
Till darkness fled before the morning ray :
Then rose ; and, grasping in his mighty hand
The regal staff, the sign of high command,
Pensive and sad forsook his lofty tent,
And sought the son of Dares as he went ;
Talthybius he sought, nor sought in vain ;
He found the hero 'midst his native train ;
And charg'd him to convene, from tent to tent,
The kings to Eteon's lofty monument.

Obedient to the charge, he took his way,
Where Theleus 'midst the bold Athenians lay,
The king of men ; in whose superior hand,
Consenting princes plac'd the chief command.
Adrastus next he call'd, whose hoary hairs
By age were whiten'd and a length of cares ;
Who first to Thebes the Argive warriors led :
In vain for Polynices' right they bled,
By fate decreed to fall ; he now inspires
The sons to conquer, and avenge their fires.
Ulysses heard, who led his martial train,
In twenty ships, across the founding main :
The youth, in Ithaca Zaeonthus, bred,
And Cephalenia crown'd with lofty shade.
The Spartan monarch, with his brother, heard
The herald's call ; and at the call appear'd :
Yet young in arms, but destin'd to command
All Greece, assembled on the Trojan strand,
The Cretan chief appear'd ; and he whose sway
Messenia and the Pylian realms obey.
Oileus next he call'd, whose martial pow'rs
From Bessa move and Scarphe's lofty tow'rs.
Elpenor too, who from the Chalcian strand
And fair Eretria led his martial band,
Appear'd : and all who merited renown
In ten years war before the Trojan town.
Achilles only, yet unfit to wield
The Pelian jav'lin, and the pond'rous shield,
In Phthia staid ; to Chiron's care resign'd,
Whose wise instructions form'd his mighty mind.
The chiefs were plac'd. Superior to the rest
The monarch sat, and thus the peers address'd :

Princes ! let Lydeus' valiant son declare
What cause convenes the senate of the war.
If of himself, or from advice he knows
Some secret mischief plotted by our foes,
Which prudence may prevent, or force resist,
We come prepar'd to counsel and assist :
The monarch thus. Tydides thus reply'd,
And drew attention deep on ev'ry side.

Princes ! I have not now the hoist conven'd,
For secrets by intelligence obtain'd ;
But openly my judgment to express
Of mischiefs seen, which prudence must redress :
By war's devouring rage, our martial pow'rs
Grow thin and waste before these hostile tow'rs ;

While Thebes, secure, our vain attempts withstands,

By daily aid sustain'd from distant lands.
Shall we proceed to urge this dire debate,
And press, with hostile arms, the Theban state ?
Or, by experience taught the worst to fear,
Consult the public safety, and forbear ?
Had our great fires, by happier counsels sway'd,
As prudence taught, necessity obey'd ;
Renounc'd in time this fatal strife, which brings
Alike to nations mischief, and to kings ;
Those heroes had not, with their martial train,
Distinguish'd by their fall a foreign plain.
The gods themselves in vengeance for our crimes,
With such disasters lash the guilty times ;
In judgment just, they sow'd the seeds of strife,
To sweep transgressors from the seats of life.

Let him, who obstinately will, proceed,
And wait the vengeance hov'ring o'er his head ;
Since Thebes grows stronger and the Argive pow'rs
Decrease, as famine or the sword devours,
To-morrow I withdraw my martial train ;
Nor stay to perish, like my fire, in vain.

Thus as the hero spoke, the kings divide,
And mingled murmurs round th' assembly glide,
Heard like the sound which warn the careful swain

Of sudden winds or thick descending rain ;
When mountain echoes catch the sullen roar
Of billows bursting on the sandy shore,
and hurl it round in airy circles tost,
Till in the distant clouds the voice is lost.
The king of men to sudden rage resign'd
At once, the empire of his mighty mind,
With sharp reproaches hast'ning to reply ;
but, more sedate, the Pylian monarch nigh,
To act to rise, the angry chief confin'd : [clin'd and, whispering, thus address'd with head de-
It ill becomes the prince, whose sov'reign hand
sways the dread sceptre of supreme command,
To be the first in discord ; and obey
As headlong passion blindly leads the way.

For when the kings in rash debate engage,
'Tis yours to check and moderate their rage ;
Since, of the various ills that can distress
Confed'rate councils and prevent success,
Discord is chief ; where'er the fury sways,
The parts she severs, and the whole betrays.

The hero thus. The king of men remain'd
By sound advice persuaded, and restrain'd.
Crete's valiant monarch rose ; and to the rest,
Thus spoke the dictates of his gen'rous breast :

Confed'rate kings, when any leader here
The war dissuades, and wants you to forbear,
I might approve ; for, safe beyond the sea,
Greece and Thebes can never injure me.
And when the barb'rous tyrant, unwit'hood,
H's hot revenge shall quench in Grecian blood ;
When Thrace and Macedon, by his command,
Shall ravage Argos and the Pylian strand ;
Secure and guarded by the ocean's stream,
Crete's hundred towns shall know it but by fame.
Yet would not I, though many such were found,
For open war, advise a peace unfound,
Let Macedon to Thebes her succours send, [scend ;
And Thrace, with all her barb'rous tribes, de,

By foreign aids the more our foes increase,
The greater glory waits us from success.
You all remember, on the Isthmean strand
Where neighb'ring seas beset the strait'ned land,
When Greece enleagu'd a full assembly held,
By public justice to the war compell'd;
That blood of slaughter'd victims drench'd the ground.

While oaths divine the willing nations bound,
Ne'er to return, till our victorious pow'rs,
Had level'd with the dust the Theban tow'rs.
Jove heard, and bid applauding thunders roll,
Loud on the right; they shook the starry pole:
For Jove himself is witness of our vows,
And him, who violates, his wrath pursues.
Our joyful shouts the earth, the ocean heard;
We claim'd the omen, and the god rever'd;
In confidence of full success we came,
To conquer Thebes, and win immortal fame.
But if the gods and fate our fears distrust,
To public justice and ourselves unjust;
Dishonour'd to our native seats we go,
And yield a lasting triumph to the foe. [ghost
Should now, from hence arriv'd, some warrior's
Greet valiant Tydeus on the Stygian coast,
And tell, when danger of distress is near,
That Diomed pursues the rest to fear;
He'd shun the synod of the mighty dead,
And hide his anguish in the deepest shade:
Nature in all an equal course maintains;
The lion's whelp succeeds to awe the plains;
Pards gender pards; from tygers tygers spring;
No doves are hatch'd beneath a vulture's wing:
Each parent's image in his offspring lives;
But nought of Tydeus in his son survives.

He said; and by his sharp reproaches stung,
And wav'ring in suspense the hero hung,
In words now prone to vent his kindl'd ire,
Or fix'd in fullen silence to retire.

As when a current, from the ocean wide,
Rolls, through the Cyclades, its angry tide;
Now here, now there, in circling eddies tosd'd,
The certain tenor of its course is lost,
Each wary pilot for his safety fears
In mute suspense, and trembles as he steers:
Such seem'd the tumult of the hero's breast,
And such amazement long restrain'd the rest.
Laertes' son at last the silence broke,
And, rising, thus with prudent purpose spoke:

Princes! I counsel wår; but will not blame
The chief dissenting, whose illustrious name
We all must honour: yet, with patience, hear
What now I offer to the public ear.
I freely own the unnumber'd ills that wait
On strife prolong'd, and war's disastrous state.
With war lean famine and diseases dwell,
And discord fierce, escap'd the bounds of hell.
Where'er on earth her course the fury bends
A crowd of mischiefs still her steps attends;
Fear flies before her swifter than the wind,
And desolation marks her path behind.
Yet her, attended thus, the gods ordain
Stern arbiters of right to mortal men;
To awe injustice with her lifted spear,
And teach the tyrants of the earth to fear.
If Thebes is perjurd, and exerts her might
For usurpation in contempt of right;

(If oaths despis'd, and all the ties which bind
The great society of human kind)
For Eteocles in the war she stood,
And drench'd her thirsty fields with Grecian blood;

The gods themselves have err'd, and plac'd in
The scepter'd kings injustice to restrain:
Else she deserves the last extremes to feel
Of wasteful fire and keen devouring steel.
Though prudence urg'd and equity approv'd,
Joining to second what Tydides mov'd,
We could not hope the war for peace to change;
Thebes thinks not now of safety but revenge.
Last night, disguis'd, I mingled with the foe,
Their secret hopes and purposes to know;
And found that Creon, with his martial train,
This day intends to brave us on the plain. [claim'd;
Greece too, I heard, by barb'rous sovereigns
Some Athens, Argos, some Mycæne nam'd;
Sparta and Pylos, with the various towns
Which grace, in prospect fair, th' Arcadian downs:
Others Ætolia challeng'd for their lot;
Nor was ev'n Ithaca itself forgot.

From such vain hopes to boasting they proceed;
Each promises to win some hero's head.
Leophron too, distinguish'd from the rest,
Superior pride and insolence express'd;
In form a god he 'midst th' assembly stood;
By all ador'd the idol of the crowd;
And promis'd, if he chanc'd in fight to meet
Th' Ætolian chief, to stretch him at his feet;
Unless some god oppos'd, or daftard fear,
By sudden flight, should snatch him from his spear.

Can we then hope by peace to end our toils,
When foes secure already share our spoils?
Peace to expect from flight itself were vain;
And flight, I know, your gen'rous souls disdain.

He said. The chiefs with indignation burn'd;
And Diomed submitting thus return'd:
Princes! I need not for myself profess,
What all have witness'd, all must sure confess;
That in the front of battle still engag'd,
I never thunn'd to mingle where it rag'd.
Nor now does fear persuade me to retire,
False Creon safe, and guilty Thebes entire;
But war and famine thin our martial pow'rs,
Whilst adverse fates protect the Theban tow'rs.
And as the careful shepherd turns his flock
Back from the dangers of the slippery rock,
And from the haunts where foxes mark the
ground,

Or rapid rivers flow with banks unbound;
So kings should warn the people to forbear
Attempts, when symptoms mark destruction near.
But since the leaders, with consenting voice,
For war already fix the public choice;
I freely yield, nor ever will divide,
Where all deliberate, and all decide.

The hero thus, and ceas'd. And thus the rest,
From his high feat, the king of men address'd:
Since war is now decreed, 'tis next our care
That all should speedily for fight prepare.
Creon, this day, intends with all his train
To try our valour on the equal plain;
And will, with diligence, improve an hour,
Which finds us inattentive and secure.

First let each leader with his hands in haste
Snatch, as the time allows, a short repast ;
Then arm for fight, and to the field proceed,
The phalanx following as the chariots lead,
Who arms the first, and first to combat goes,
Though weaker, seems superior to his foes ;

But such as lag are more than half o'erthrown,
Lies in the eyes of others and their own.

The monarch thus. The princes all assent.
Straight from the council through the host they
To arm their bands with diligence and care ; [went,
They all obey, and all for fight prepare.

B O O K II.

ASSEMBLED on the plain, the Theban pow'rs
In order'd ranks appear before the tow'rs ;
Creon their leader, whose superior sway
The partial sons of sacred Thebes obey.
The chiefs obedient to his high command,
Rul'd the whole war, and marshal'd every band.
His valiant son the first, his country's boast,
Her noblest hope, the bulwark of her host,
Leophron, to the field the warriors led,
Whom Thebes herself within her ramparts bred :
Peneleus, who from Medeon led his pow'rs,
Cecalia low, and Arne's lofty tow'rs :
Leitus from Thespia, where the verdant shades
Of Helicon invite the tuneful maids :
Porthenus rich, whose wide possessions lay
Where fam'd Æolus winds his wat'ry way ;
Beneath Cytheron's height, the lofty mound
Which parts Bœotian plains from hostile ground :
Phericles, who the valiant warriors led
In Mycaleffus, Harma, Aulis, bred :
Andremon, leader of his native band,
From lofty Schœnus on th' Ismenian strand :
And Anthëdon, where swift Euripus pent
Divides Eubœa from the continent :
These rul'd the Theban pow'rs, beneath the care
Of Creon, chief and sov'reign of the war.

The aids from Macedon the next were plac'd ;
Their shining casques with waving plumage
grac'd ;

A wolf's gray hide, around their shoulders slung,
With martial grace above their armour hung :
From high Dodona's sacred shades they came ;
Cassander led them to the fields of fame.
The Thracians next, a formidable band ;
And nations and tribes distinct, in order stand :
Byzantines fierce, whose crooked keels divide
The Pontic gulf, and stem the downward tide :
In Grecian arms the hardy warriors move,
With pond'rous shields and glitt'ring spears above.
The Thynians next were marshal'd on the field ;
Each with a Faulchion arm'd, and lunar shield,
Whose bending horns a verge of silver bound ;
And figures fierce their brazen helmets crown'd :
With these the Daci came, a martial race ;
Fierce as their climate, they rear the pond'rous mace ;

In giant strength secure, they scorn the spear,
And crush, with weighty blows, the ranks of war ;
From Ister's icy streams, a barb'rous crowd,
In shaggy furs, a herd promiscuous food ;
Swift as their savage game : for wide they roam
In tribes and nations, ignorant of home ;
Excelling all who boast superior skill
To send the winged arrow swift to kill :

These Rhœsus rul'd, of various tribes compos'd,
By various leaders on the field dispos'd.

To fight the Argives mov'd in close array :
Bright shone their arms, and flash'd redoubled day ;
Resolv'd, and still as silent night, they go ;
Nor with insulting flouts provoke the foe.
Thick from their steps, in dusky volumes, rise
The parched fields, and darken all the skies.
Beneath the shade, the ardent warriors close ;
Their shields and helmets ring with founding blows.

First Menelaus struck a Theban lord ;
His armed breast the weighty lance explor'd ;
Burst the close mail ; the shining breastplate tore ;
And from life's fountain drew a stream of gore.
Supine he fell amidst his native bands,
And wrench'd the fixed dart with dying hands.
To spoil the slain the son of Atreus flies ;
The Thebans interpose with hostile cries ;
And Creon's valiant son his buckler spread,
An orb of triple brass to guard the dead :
As Jove's imperial bird her wings extends,
And from the shepherds' rage her young defends ;
So stern Leophron bore his ample shield ;
Like Mars, he stood the terror of the field.
With dread unusual check'd, the Spartan band
Recoil'd ; Atrides only dar'd to stand.
He thus began. Presumptuous youth ! forbear
To tempt the fury of my flying spear.
That warrior there was by my javelin slain,
His spoils to guard you interpose in vain.
Atrides thus ; and Creon's son replies :
Thy lance I dread not, and thy threats despise.
This hand hath many a chief of high renown,
And braver warriors oft in fight o'erthrown :
Like theirs, thy fall shall dignify my spear,
And future boasters thence be taught to fear.
Thus as he spoke, his weighty lance he threw
At Atreus' son ; which rising as it flew
Upon the hero's crest with furious sway,
Glanc'd as it pass'd, and shav'd the plumes away.
Hissing amidst the Spartan ranks it came,
And struck a youth of undistinguish'd name :
Cold, through his breast, the steel and polish'd
wood

A passage forc'd, and drew a stream of blood.

His lance Atrides next prepares to throw ;
Poises it long, and meditates the blow.
Then, from his hand dismiss'd with happier aim,
Thund'ring against the Theban shield it came ;
Where wreath'd around a mimic serpent twin'd,
With plates of polish'd silver lightly join'd,
Thence turn'd with course oblique it drove along,
And spent its fury on the vulgar throng.

Leophron straight his flaming faulchion drew,
 And at his foe with eager fury flew :
 As stooping from above, an eagle springs
 To snatch his prey, and shoots upon his wings.
 The Spartan warrior dreads impending fate ;
 And, turning, meditates a quick retreat.
 As when a shepherd swain, in desert shades,
 The blood-nurs'd offspring of the wolf invades ;
 If, from the opening of some thicket near,
 With rage inflam'd, the angry dam appear,
 With darts at first, and threat'ning shouts he tries
 To awe the guardian, and assert the prize :
 But, when she springs, the close encounter dreads,
 And, trembling, from the angry foe recedes.
 So Menelaus fled. His native train,
 In wild disorder, scatters o'er the plain.

His valiant brother heard upon the right,
 Where in his lofty car he rul'd the fight ;
 And to his 'squire Nicomachus. With speed,
 Turn to the left, and urge the flying steed :
 For, if these sounds deceive not, Sparta fails ;
 And, with a tide of conquest, Thebes prevails.
 Quick as the word, the silver reins he drew,
 And through the fight the bounding chariot flew.
 Like some swift vessel, when a prop'rous gale
 Favours her course, and stretches ev'ry sail ;
 Above the parting waves she lightly flies,
 And smooth behind a track of ocean lies :
 So, 'midst the combat, rush'd the lofty car,
 Pierc'd the thick tumult, and disjoin'd the war.
 But Clytodeemon's son a jav'lin threw ;
 With force impell'd, it lighten'd as it flew,
 And struck the right-hand courser to the ground,
 Echon, for swiftness in the race renown'd.
 Behind his ear the deadly weapon stood.
 Loos'd his high neck, and drew a stream of blood.
 Groaning he sunk ; and spread his flowing mane,
 A shining circle on the dusty plain.
 Entangled deep the royal chariot stood,
 With hostile spears beset, an iron wood.

From his high feat the Spartan hero sprung
 Amid the foe ; his clanging armour rung,
 Before the king, the armed bands retire ;
 As shepherd swains avoid a lion's ire,
 When fierce from famine on their darts he turns,
 And rage indignant in his eyeballs burns.
 Amid the fight, distinguish'd like the star
 Of ev'ning, shone his silver arms afar ;
 Which, o'er the hills, its setting light displays ;
 And marks the ruddy west with silver rays.
 Pale and amaz'd his brother chief he found,
 An armed circle of his friends around.
 Alas, my brother, have I liv'd to see
 Thy life redeem'd with deathless infamy !
 (The hero cry'd), far better that a ghost
 You now had wander'd on the Stygian coast,
 And by a glorious fall preserv'd your name
 Safe and unblasted by the breath of fame ;
 Which soon shall tell the world, amaz'd to hear,
 That Menelaus taught the host to fear.

By conscious guilt subdu'd, the youth appear'd ;
 Without reply, the just reproach he heard :
 Confounded, to the ground he turn'd his eyes ;
 Indignant thus the great Atrides cries :
 Myceneans ! Spartans ! taught to seek renown
 From dangers greatly brav'd, and battles won ;
 Ah warriors ! will ye fly, when close behind
 Dishonour follows swifter than the wind ?

Return to glory : whether Jove ordains,
 With wreaths of conquest, to reward your pains,
 Or dooms your fall : he merits equal praise,
 With him who conquers, he who bravely dies.
 The hero thus ; and, like swift light'ning driv'n
 Through scatter'd clouds along the vault of heav'n
 By Jove's dread arm, his martial voice inspir'd
 The fainting host ; and ev'ry bosom fir'd.
 Again upon the conqu'ring toe they turn'd :
 The war again in all its fury burn'd.
 As when the deep, which ebbing from the land
 Along the coast displays a waste of sand,
 Returns ; and, blown by angry tempests' roars
 A stormy deluge 'gainst the rocky shores :
 So, rushing to the fight, the warriors came ;
 Ardent to conquer, and retrieve their fame.

Before his host the son of Creon stood,
 With labour'd dust obscure, and hostile blood ;
 He thus exclaim'd. And shall this dastard train
 (Warriors of Thebes) ! dispute the field again ?
 Their better chief, I know him, leads the band ;
 But fate shall soon subdue him by my hand.
 He said ; and at the king his jav'lin threw ;
 Which, aim'd amiss, with erring fury flew.
 Across the armed ranks it swiftly drove,
 The warriors stooping as it rush'd above.
 The Spartan hero aim'd his weighty spear ;
 And thus to Jove address'd an ardent prayer :
 Hear me, great sire of gods ! whose boundless sway
 The fates of men and mortal things obey ;
 Whose sov'reign hand, with unrelucted might,
 Depresses or exalts the scales of fight :
 Now grant success to my avenging hand,
 And stretch this dire destroyer on the sand.
 Jove, grant me now to reach his hated life,
 And save my warriors in this doubtful strife.
 The hero thus ; and sent his weighty spear,
 With speed it flew, and pierc'd the yielding air ;
 Swift as a falcon to her quarry springs,
 When down the wind she stretches on her wings.
 Leophron, stooping, shunn'd the deadly stroke,
 Which on the shield of Hegifander broke.
 Vain now his lute ; in vain his melting strains,
 Soft as Apollo's on the Lycian plains :
 His soul excluded, seeks the dark abodes
 By Styx embrac'd, the terror of the gods ;
 Where surly Charon, with his lifted oar,
 Drives the light ghosts, and rules the dreary shore.

With grief Leophron saw the warrior slain.
 He snatch'd a pond'rous mace from off the plain,
 Cut in the Thracian woods, with snags around
 Of pointed steel, with iron circles bound.
 Heav'd with gigantic force the club to throw,
 He swung it thrice, and hurl'd it at his foe.
 Thund'ring upon his armed head it fell ;
 The brazen helmet rang with stunning knell.
 As when a rock by forceful engines thrown,
 Where hostile arms invest a frontier town,
 Threat'ning destruction, rolls along the skies ;
 And war itself stands wond'ring as it flies :
 Falls on some turret's top, the structure bends
 Beneath the tempest, and at once descends
 With hideous crash : thus, stooping to the ground,
 Atrides sunk ; his silver arms resound.
 But Pallas, mixing in the dire debate,
 A life to rescue yet not due to fate,
 Had o'er his head her cloudy buckler held ;
 And half the fury of the blow repell'd.

The son of Creon rush'd to seize his prize,
 The hero's spoils; and thus exulting cries:
 Warriors of Thebes! your labours soon shall cease,
 And final victory restore your peace;
 For great Atreides, by my valour slain,
 A lifeless corse, lies stretch'd upon the plain.
 Only be men! and make the Argive bands
 Dread in succeeding times your mighty hands;
 That foes no more, when mad ambition calls,
 With fire alarms may shake your peaceful walls.
 Exulting thus, the hero rush'd along;
 And kindled, with his shouts, the vulgar throng.
 Resolv'd and firm the Spartan warriors stand
 Around their king, a formidable band.
 Their spears, protended thick, the foe restrain'd;
 Their bucklers join'd, the weighty war sustain'd.
 But as a mountain wolf, from tamine bold,
 On prey intent, surveys the midnight fold;
 Where, in the shelter of some arching rock,
 At ev'n the careful shepherd pens his flock:
 On spoil and ravage bent, he stalks around,
 And meditates to spring the lofty mound:
 Impatient thus the Theban chief survey'd
 The close-compacted ranks on ev'ry side;
 To find where least the ferred orb could bear
 The strong impression of a pointed war.
 Him Menelaus saw, with anguish stung;
 And, from amidst his armed warriors, sprung
 With wrath inflam'd; as starting from a brake,
 Against some trav'ler, darts a crested snake.
 His rage in vain the Theban ranks withstand;
 The bravest warriors sink beneath his hand.
 Clytander, Iphitus, Palemon, fam'd,
 For chariots rul'd and fiery coursers tam'd;
 And Iphialtes, like the god of light,
 Whose pointed arrows thinn'd the lines of sight:
 These the first transports of his fury feel.
 Against Leophron now he lifts his steel,
 And speeds to vengeance;—but, in full career,
 He stood arrested by a vulgar spear.
 Fix'd in his thigh the barbed weapon hung,
 Relax'd the muscles, and the nerves unstrung.
 The Spartan warriors to his succour flew;
 Against the darts their ample shields they threw,
 Which storm'd around; and, from the rage of war,
 Convey'd the wounded hero to his car.
 With fierce impatience Creon's son beheld
 The Spartan warriors still dispute the field.
 Before their leader fall'n, the hero stood;
 Their spears erected, like the sacred wood
 Which round some altar rises on the plain,
 The mystic rites to hide from eyes profane.
 Thither his native bands the hero turn'd;
 Drawn to a wedge, again the combat burn'd.
 Through all the air a storm of jav'lins sung;
 With founding blows each hollow buckler rung.
 First Enopæus felt a deadly wound,
 Who in Amycle till'd the fruitful ground;
 To great Andremon's spear he yields his breath,
 And starts and quivers in the grasp of death.
 Next Hegeleppus press'd th' insanguin'd plain;
 Leophron's jav'lin mix'd him with the slain.
 On Malea's cliffs he fed his fleecy store,
 Along the windings of the crazy shore.
 He vow'd to Phœbus, for a safe return,
 An hundred victims on his hearth to burn.
 In vain! the god, in justice, had decreed,
 His gifts condemn'd, the offerer to bleed:

For violence augmented still his store;
 And, unreliev'd, the stranger left his door.
 Prone on the bloody ground the warrior fell;
 His soul indignant sought the shades of hell.
 Next Arcas, Cleon, valiant Chromius, dy'd;
 With Dares, to the Spartan chiefs ally'd.
 And Phœmius, whom the gods in early youth
 Had form'd for virtue and the love of truth;
 His gen'rous soul to noble deeds they turn'd,
 And love to mankind in his bosom burn'd:
 Cold through his throat the hissing weapon glides,
 And on his neck the waving locks divides.
 His fate the graces mourn'd. The gods above,
 Who sit around the starry throne of Jove,
 On high Olympus bending from the skies,
 His fate beheld with sorrow-streaming eyes.
 Pallas alone, unalter'd and serene,
 With secret triumph saw the mournful scene:
 Not hard of heart; for none of all the pow'rs,
 In earth or ocean, or th' Olympian tow'rs,
 Holds equal sympathy with human grief,
 Or with a freer hand bestows relief;
 But conscious that a mind by virtue steel'd,
 To no impression of distress will yield;
 That, still unconquer'd, in its awful hour
 O'er death it triumphs with immortal pow'r.
 Now Thebes prevailing, Sparta's host retreats;
 As falls some rampart where the ocean beats:
 Unable to resist its stormy way,
 Mounds heap'd on mounds, and bars of rock give way;
 With inundation wide the deluge reigns,
 Drowns the deep valleys, and o'er spreads the plains.
 Thus o'er the field, by great Leophron led,
 Their foes repuls'd, the Theban squadrons spread.
 The hero, swooping where Atreides lay,
 Rent from his head the golden casque away;
 His mail unlock'd; and loos'd the golden chains,
 The zone which by his side the sword sustains.
 The monarch now amid the vulgar dead,
 For wheels to crush and armed hoofs to tread,
 Defenceless lay. But stern Leophron's hate
 Retriev'd him, thus expos'd, from certain fate.
 In semblance dead, he purpos'd to convey
 The body naked to some public way;
 Where dogs obscene, and all the ravenous race,
 With wounds unsightly, might his limbs disgrace.
 Straight he commands; and to a neighb'ring grove,
 His warriors, charg'd, the Spartan chief remove:
 On their broad shields they bore him from the plain,
 To sense a corse, and number'd with the slain.
 His fixed eyes in hov'ring shades were drown'd;
 His mighty limbs in death-like fetters bound.
 The shouts tumultuous, and the din of war,
 His ear receiv'd like murmurs from afar;
 Or as some peasant hurs, securely laid
 Beneath a vaulted cliff or woodland-shade,
 When o'er his head unnumber'd insects ring
 In airy rounds, the children of the spring.
 Adrastus' valiant son, with grief, beheld
 The Spartans to inglorious flight compell'd;
 Their valiant chief resign'd to hostile hands,
 He thus aloud address'd the scatt'ring bands:
 What shame, ye warriors! if ye thus expose
 Your leader to the injuries of foes!
 Though all should quit him, honour bids you bring
 His relics back, or perish with your king.

Leophron sure injuriously ordains,
 With insults, to deface his dear remains;
 Spurn'd by the feet of men, expos'd and bare,
 For dogs obscene, and rav'nous birds to share.
 Exclaiming thus, through all the field he flew;
 And call'd the host the conflict to renew.
 They stop, they charge; again the combat burns:
 They bleed, they conquer, and retreat by turns.
 Hegialus excites the dire debate;
 And, by example, leads the work of fate:
 For now he sees Atrides home afar,
 By hostile hands, beyond the lines of war.
 With indignation fierce his bosom glows;
 He rushes fearless 'midst a host of foes;
 And now had merited a deathless name,
 And with a deed immortal crown'd his fame,
 Atrides liv'd; but fate's supreme command
 That honour destin'd for a mightier hand.
 Leophron vex'd, that twice constrain'd to yield,
 The Spartan warriors re-affum'd the field,
 His pow'rs address'd: For ever lost our fame,
 Dishonour foul will blot the Theban name;
 If daftard foes, twice routed and pursu'd,
 Shall brave the victors, still with rage renew'd.
 Your glory gain'd with vigour now maintain;
 Nor let us conquer thus and bleed in vain.
 He said, and 'gainst the Argive hero turn'd;
 With martial wrath his ardent bosom burn'd;
 Who, fearless and undaunted, dar'd to wait;
 Nor by ignoble flight declin'd his fate.
 For at the Theban chief his lance he threw,
 Which, aim'd amiss, with erring fury flew:
 Beyond the hostile ranks the weapon drove;
 The warriors stooping as it rush'd above.
 Not for the Theban spear; with happier aim,
 Full to the centre of the shield, it came;
 And, rising swiftly from the polish'd round,
 His throat transfix'd, and bent him to the ground.
 To spoil the slain the ardent victor flew:
 The Spartan bands the bloody shock renew;
 Fierce to the charge with tenfold rage return,
 And all at once with thirst of vengeance burn.
 O'er all the field the raging tumult grows;
 And ev'ry helmet rings with sounding blows;
 But most around the Argive hero dead;
 There toil the mightiest, there the bravest bleed.
 As when outrageous winds the ocean sweep,
 And from the bottom stir the hoary deep;
 O'er all the wat'ry plain the tempest raves,
 Mixing in conflict loud the angry waves:
 But where some pointed cliff the surface hides,
 Whose top unseen provokes the angry tides,
 With tenfold fury there the billows fly,
 And mount in smoke and thunder to the sky.
 Adrastus, by unactive age restrain'd,
 Behind the army on a mount remain'd;
 Under an oak the hoary warrior sat,
 And look'd and listen'd to the dire debate.
 Now, tam'd by age, his courfers stood unbound;
 His useless arms lay scatter'd on the ground;

Two aged heralds there the chief obey'd;
 The 'quire attending by his master stay'd.
 And thus the king: What sounds invade mine ear?
 My friends! what sad disaster must we hear?
 Some hero's fall; for with the shouts, I know
 Loud lamentation mixt, and sounds of woe.
 So were we told, when mighty Tydeus fell,
 And Polynices trod the path to hell;
 So rag'd the combat o'er the hero slain,
 And such the din and tumult of the plain.
 He said; and list'ning (what he greatly fear'd) |
 Hegialus's name at least he heard
 Mix'd with the noise; and, sick'ning at the sound
 By grief subdu'd, fell prostrate on the ground.
 But rage succeeding, and despair, he rose
 Eager to rush amid the thickest foes.
 His spear he grasp'd, impatient for the fight;
 And pond'rous shield, unequal to the weight.
 Him frantic thus, his wife attendants held;
 And to retire with prudent care compell'd,
 Impatient of his state, by quick returns,
 With grief he melts, with indignation burns.
 And thus at last: Stern ruler of the sky!
 Whose sport is man, and human misery;
 What deed of mine has stirr'd thy boundless rage,
 And call'd for vengeance on my helpless age?
 Have I, by sacrilege, your treasures drain'd;
 Your altars slighted, or your rites profan'd?
 Did I forget my holy vows to pay?
 Or bid you witness, and my faith betray?
 Has lawless rapine e'er increas'd my store,
 Or, unreliev'd, the stranger left my door?
 If not; in justice, can your stern decree
 With wrath pursue my guiltless race and me?
 Here valiant Tydeus, Polynices fell;
 In one sad hour they trod the path to hell:
 For them my daughters mourn, their sorrows flow
 Still fresh, and all their days are spent in woe.
 Hegialus remain'd my hopes to raise;
 The only comfort of my joyless days:
 In whom I saw my vigorous youth return,
 And all our native virtues brighter burn.
 He's now no more; and to the nether skies,
 Banish'd by fate, a bloodless spectre flies.
 For what, ye gods! has unrelenting fate
 Curs'd my misfortunes with so long a date?
 That thus I live to see our ancient race
 At once extinguish'd, and for ever cease!
 Gods! grant me now, the only boon I crave,
 For all my sorrows past, a peaceful grave:
 Now let me perish, that my fleeting ghost
 May reach my son in Pluto's shady coast;
 Where, join'd for ever, kindred souls enjoy
 An union fix'd, which nothing can destroy.
 He said; and sinking prostrate on the ground,
 His furrow'd cheeks with floods of sorrow
 drown'd;
 And, furious in the rage of grief, o'erspread
 With dust the reverend honours of his head.

BOOK III.

THE Spartan bands, with thirst of vengeance fir'd,
 The fight maintain'd; nor from their toils respir'd.
 Before the hero fall'n the warriors stand,
 Firm as the chains of rock which guard the strand;
 Whose rooted strength the angry ocean braves,
 And bounds the fury of his bursting waves.
 So Sparta stood; their ferred bucklers bar
 The Theban phalanx, and exclude the war.
 While from the field, upon their shoulders laid,
 His warriors sad the Argive prince convey'd;
 Leophron saw, with indignation fir'd,
 And with his shouts the ling'ring war inspir'd.
 Again the rigour of the shock returns;
 The slaughter rages, and the combat burns;
 Till, push'd and yielding to superior sway,
 In slow retreat the Spartan ranks give way.
 As, in some channel pent, entangled wood
 Reluctant stirs before the angry flood;
 Which, on its loaded current, slowly heaves
 The spoils of forests mix'd with harvest sheaves.
 Pallas observ'd, and from th' Olympian height
 Precipitated swift her downward flight.
 Like Cleon's valiant son, the goddess came;
 The same her stature, and her arms the same.
 Descending from his chariot to the ground,
 The son of Tydeus, 'midst his bands, she found;
 His steeds unrul'd: for, stretch'd before the wheel,
 Lay the bold driver pierc'd with Theban steel.
 On the high car her mighty hand the laid,
 And thus address'd the valiant Diomed:
 The Spartan warriors, prince! renounce the fight,
 O'ermatch'd by numbers and superior might:
 While adverse fate their valiant chief restrains,
 Who dead or wounded with the foe remains;
 Hegialus lies lifeless on the earth,
 Brother to her from whom you claim your birth:
 The great Atrides, as he press'd to save,
 Leophron's jav'lin mark'd for him the grave.
 To vengeance haste; and, ere it is too late,
 With speedy succour stop impending fate:
 For stern Leophron, like the rage of flame,
 With ruin threatens all the Spartan name.
 The goddess thus: Tydides thus replies:
 How partial are the counsels of the skies!
 For vulgar merit oft the gods with care
 Honour, and peace, and happiness prepare;
 While worth, distinguish'd by their partial hate,
 Submits to all the injuries of fate.
 Adrastus thus with justice may complain
 His daughters widow'd, sons in battle slain.
 In the devoted line myself I stand,
 And here must perish by some hostile hand:
 Yet not for this I shun the works of war,
 Nor skulk inglorious when I ought to dare.
 And now I'll meet yon terror of the plain,
 To crown his conquests, or avenge the slain.
 But with some valiant youth to rule my car,
 And push the horses through the shock of war,
 Were present; so, extended in his gore,
 The brave Sthenippus knows his charge no more.

VOL. XI.

Thus as the hero spoke, Cassandra heard,
 And present, to assume the charge, appear'd,
 By love inspir'd, she fought the fields of war;
 Her hero's safety was her only care.
 A polish'd casque her lovely temples bound,
 With flowers of gold and various plumage crown'd;
 Confus'dly gay the peacock's changeful train,
 With gaudy colours mix'd of ev'ry grain:
 The virgin white, the yellow's golden hue,
 The regal purple, and the shining blue,
 With female skill compos'd. The shield she bore
 With flow'rs of gold was mark'd and spangled o'er:

Light and of slender make, she held a lance;
 Like some mock warrior armed for the dance,
 When spring's return and music's cheerful strain
 The youth invite to frolic on the plain.
 Illustrious chief, the armed virgin said,
 To rule your steeds on me the task be laid;
 Skill'd to direct their course with steady rein,
 To wake their fiery mettle, or restrain;
 To stop, to turn, the various arts I know;
 To push them on direct, or shun the foe.
 With ready hand your voice I shall obey,
 And urge their fury where you point the way.
 The virgin thus: and thus Tydides said:
 Your zeal I honour, but reject your aid.
 Fierce are my steeds; their fury to restrain
 The strongest hand requires, and stiffest rein:
 For oft, their mettle rous'd, they rush along;
 Nor feel the biting curb, or sounding thong.
 Oft have I seen you brave the toils of fight,
 With dauntless courage, but unequal might.
 Small is your force; and, from your arm unstrung,
 The harmless lance is impotently stung.
 Yet not for this you shun the martial strife;
 Patient of wounds, and prodigal of life.
 Where'er I combat, faithful to my side,
 No danger awes you, and no toils divide.
 Yet grudge not that your service I decline;
 Homocleon's better hand shall guide the rein;
 His manly voice my horses will obey,
 And move submissive to his firmer sway.

Th' Ætolian warrior thus; and, with a bound,
 Rose to his lofty chariot from the ground.
 The goddess to the driver's seat proceeds,
 Assumes the reins, and winds the willing steeds.
 On their smooth sides the sounding lash she plies,
 And through the fight the smoking chariot flies.
 Th' Athenians soon they pass'd; and Phocians strong;

Who from fair Crissa led their martial throng.
 Th' Arcadians next, from Alpheus' silver flood,
 And hardy Eleans, grim with dust and blood,
 In order rang'd. As when some pilot spies
 The rocky cliffs in long succession rise,
 When near the land his galley scours the shores,
 By prosperous winds impell'd and speeding oars;
 So, hastening to the fight, the hero flew;
 And now the Spartan host appears in view;

B

By wounds subdu'd, their bravest warriors lay;
Others, by shameful flight, their fear obey;
The rest in slow retreat forfake the field,
O'ermatch'd by numbers, and constrain'd to yield.
Th' Ætolian hero saw, and rais'd his voice,
Loud as the silver trumpet's martial noise,
And rush'd to fight: through all the field it flew;
The host at once the happy signal knew,
And joy'd, as they who, from the found'ring ship
Escap'd, had struggled long amid the deep:
Faint from despair, when hope and vigour fail,
If, hast'ning to their aid, appears a sail;
With force renew'd their weary limbs they strain,
And climb the slipp'ry ridges of the main.
So joy'd the Spartans to repulse the foe;
With hope restor'd their gen'rous bosoms glow:
While Thebes, suspended 'midst her conquest,
stands,

And feels a sudden check through all her bands.

Leophron only, far before the rest,
Tydides waited with a dauntless breast.
Firm and unaw'd the hardy warrior stood,
Like some fierce boar amid his native wood,
When armed swains his gloomy haunts invade,
And trace his footsteps through the lonely shade;
Resolv'd he hears approach the hostile sound,
Grinds his white teeth, and threat'ning glares
around;

So stood Leophron, trusting in his might,
And shook his armour, eager for the fight.
Tydides saw; and, springing from his car,
Thus brav'd the hero, as he rush'd to war:
O son unhappy, of a fire accurst!
The plague of all, and fated to the worst!
The injuries of Greece demand thy breath;
See in my hand the instrument of death.
Hegialus's ghost shall less deplore
His fate untimely on the Stygian shore, [come
When banish'd from the light, your shade shall
To mingle with the dark infernal gloom.
Tydides thus: and Creon's son replies:
Your fear in vain by boasting you disguise;
Such vulgar art a novice oft confounds,
To scenes of battle new and martial sounds;
Though lost on me, who dwell amid alarms,
And never met a greater yet in arms.

Thus as the warrior spoke, his lance with care
He aim'd, and sent it hissing through the air.
On Diomed's broad shield the weapon fell;
Loud rung the stunning brass with echoing knell:
But the strong orb, by Vulcan's labour bound,
Repell'd, and sent it blunted to the ground.

Tydides next his pond'rous jav'lin threw:
With force impell'd, it brighten'd as it flew;
And pierc'd the border of the Theban shield,
Where, wreath'd around, a serpent guards the field;

Through the close mail an easy passage found,
And mark'd his thigh, in passing, with a wound.
Now in close fight the angry chiefs engage,
Like two fell griffins rous'd to equal rage;
Pois'd on their rolling trains they fiercely rise
With blood-bespotted crests and burning eyes:
With poison fraught they aim their deadly stings,
Clasp their sharp fangs, and mix their rattling wings.

In combat thus, the ardent warriors clos'd,
With shield to shield, and foot to foot oppos'd.

First at his foe Leophron aim'd a stroke,
But on his polish'd casque the Faulchion broke:
From the smooth steel the shiver'd weapon sprung,
Aloft in air its hissing splinters sung.
Not so, Tydides, did thy weapon fail;
With force impell'd, it pierc'd the silver mail,
Whose sliding plates the warrior's neck surround:
A tide of gore came rushing from the wound.
Stagg'ring to earth, he sunk with head declin'd,
And life in long convulsive throbs resign'd.
Nor stoop'd Tydides to despoil the slain;
The warrior goddess led him, cross the plain,
Towards the grove where great Atrides lay;
Th' immortal spear she stretch'd, and mark'd the way.

Thither amid surrounding foes they haste,
Who fann'd them, still retreating as they pass'd;
And entering found the Spartan hero laid
On the green sward, beneath the bow'ring shade.
The guard secure, lay stretch'd upon the ground;
Their shields resign'd, their lances pitch'd around:
One only near a winding riv'let stood,
Which turn'd its wand'ring current through the wood;

His helmet fill'd with both his hands he rear'd,
In act to drink, when in the grove appear'd
Th' Ætolian prince. His armour's fiery blaze
The dark recesses illumin'd with its rays.
Amaz'd the Theban stood; and from his hand
The helmet slip'd, and roll'd upon the sand.
Not more afraid the wond'ring swain descries
'Midst night's thick gloom a flaming meteor rise;
Sent by the furies, as he deems, to fow
Death and diseases on the earth below.

Tydides comes! with fault'ring voice he cry'd,
And straight to flight his willing limbs apply'd.
With sudden dread surpris'd the guards retire,
As shepherd swains avoid a lion's ire,
Who roams the heights and plains, from famine
The stall to ravage, or assault the fold. [bold,

Now, lifeless as he lay, the martial maid
Atrides with a pitying eye survey'd;
And with her spear revers'd, the hero shook:
The touch divine his iron slumber broke;
As when his drowsy mate the shepherd swain
Stirs with his crook, and calls him to the plain;
When in the east he sees the morning rise,
And redd'ning o'er his head the colour'd skies.
When from the ground his head the hero rais'd,
In full divinity the goddesses blaz'd;
Her left, reveal'd, the dreadful Ægis bears,
Whose ample field the snaky Gorgon bears;
Th' immortal lance stood flaming in the right,
Which scatters and confounds the ranks of fight.
Speechless the chiefs remain'd; amazement strong,
In mute suspense and silence, held them long.
And thus the goddess: Atreus' son! arise,
Confess the partial favour of the skies.
For thee I leave the thund'rer's lofty seat,
To wake the slumb'ring on the verge of fate:
To you let Diomed his arms resign;
Unequal were your force to govern mine;
His stronger arm shall bear this pond'rous shield,
His better hand the weighty jav'lin wield.
Arise! be sudden, for your foes draw near;
Assur'd to conquer when the gods appear.
The goddesses thus; and, mixing with the wind,
Left in a heap her shining arms behind

Upbn the field; with loud harmonious peal,
Th' immortal buckler rung, and golden mail.
And thus Atrides, rising from the ground:
In this, approv'd is hoar tradition found;
That oft, descending from th' ethereal tow'rs,
To mix with mortals, come the heav'nly pow'rs:
But ne'er till now I saw a god appear,
Or more than human voice did ever hear.
Do you, my friend, assume these arms divine;
The mortal and inferior shall be mine.
Atrides thus; and Diomed reply'd:
To heav'n obedience must not be deny'd;
Else you yourself th' immortal arms should wield,
And I with these attend you on the field.
But of the pow'rs above, whose sov'reign sway
The fates of men and mortal things obey,
Pallas, with surest vengeance still pursues
Such as obedience to her will refuse.

He said, and straight his shining arms unbound,
The casque, the mail, the buckler's weighty round;
With secret joy th' immortal helmet took:
High on its crest the waving plumage shook.
This whoe'er wears, his sharp'ned eyes
All dangers mock of ambush and surprisè;
Their ray unquench'd, the midnight shade divides:
No cunning covers, and no darkness hides.
The breast-plate next he takes, whose matchless
Firm courage fixes in the bounding heart; [art
The rage of war, unmov'd, the wearer braves,
And rides serene amid the stormy waves!
The glitt'ring mail a stary baldrick bound,
His arm sustain'd the buckler's weighty round;
Impenetrably strong, its orb can bear
And turn, like softest lead, the pointed spear;
Nor yields to aught, in earth or heav'n above,
But the dread thunder of almighty Jove.
Th' immortal spear the hero last did wield,
Which fixes conquest, and decides a field;
Nor strength nor numbers can its rage withstand,
Sent by a mortal or immortal hand.

Thus arm'd to meet the foe Tydides mov'd,
And glory'd, conscious of his might improv'd;
Like the proud steed rejoicing in his force,
When the shrill trumpet wakes him to the course:
Fierce and impatient of restraint, he strains
With stiffen'd neck against the galling reins.
Taller he seem'd; as when the morning, spread
With golden lustre, crowns some mountain's head
In early spring; when, from the meads below,
A wreath of vapours binds his rocky brow;
In cloudy volumes settling as they rise,
They lift the lofty prospect to the skies.
So in immortal arms the chief appear'd,
His stature broad display'd, and higher rear'd.

Now from the field approaching to the grove,
Embattel'd thick, the Theban warriors move;
Slowly they move, as swains with doubtful steps
Approach the thicket where a lion sleeps.
Tydides saw; and, rushing from the shade,
The Spartan call'd, and to the combat led.
Unaw'd the hero met the hostile band;
Nor could united force his rage withstand.
They wheel'd aloof; as when a dragon springs
From his dark den, and rears his pointed wings
Against approaching swains, when summer burns,
And the fresh lakes to parched desert turns;
They fly dispers'd, nor tempt his fatal ire,
His wrath-swoln neck and eyes of living fire:

So fled the Thebans, nor escap'd by flight.
Amid their squadrons, like a faulcon light,
The hero sprung; who, stooping from the skies,
The feather'd race disperses as he flies.
Still from his hand th' immortal weapon flew;
And ev'ry flight an armed warrior flew.
Andremon first, beneath his mighty hand,
Of life bereft, lay stretch'd upon the sand.
Pherecydes gigantic press'd the plain;
And valiant Terens sunk amid the slain.
Warriors to those of vulgar names succeed;
And all his path is mark'd with heaps of dead.
As when some woodman, by incessant strokes,
Bestrews a mountain with its falling oaks;
Fells the thick plains, the hawthorn's flow'ry shade,

The poplar fair by passing currents fed,
The laurel with un fading verdure crown'd;
Heaps roll'd on heaps, the forest sinks around:
So spreads the slaughter, as the chief proceeds;
At every stroke an armed warrior bleeds.
Atrides combats by the hero's side,
To share his glory, and the toil divide:
Unmov'd amid the hostile ranks they go;
Before them far retreats the routed foe.

And now the Spartan host appear'd in sight,
By toil subdu'd, and ling'ring in the fight.
Their valiant leader saw, and rais'd his voice,
Loud as the silver trumpet's martial noise,
With hopes of victory his hands to cheer;
It swiftly flew: the distant Spartans hear
With glad surprisè. Polyctes thus address'd,
And rous'd the languid valour of the rest.
Myceneans! Spartans! taught to seek renown
From dangers greatly brav'd, and battles won;
With sorrow and regret I see you yield,
And Thebes victorious drive you from the field.
Atrides calls us; to his aid repair:
No foe subdues you but your own despair.
He yet survives, beset with hostile bands,
And, from your valour, present aid demands.
He said. The rigour of the shock returns;
The slaughter rages, and the combat burns.
As when a reaping train their sickles wield,
Where yellow harvest loads some fruitful field;
The master's heart, with secret joy, o'erflows;
He prompts the work, and counts the length'ning
rows;

So 'midst the war, the pow'r of battles stood,
Pleas'd with the carnage and the streams of blood.

Elpenor first lay lifeless on the plain,
By stern Plexippus with a jav'lin slain,
A grief to Thebes. Euryalus the bold,
Rich in his flocks, and rich in sums of gold,
Beneath the arm of Aristæus fell;
Loud rung his silver arms with echoing knell:
And like some flow'r, whose painted foliage fair
With fragrant breath perfumes the vernal air,
If the rude scythe its tender root invades,
It falls dishonour'd, and its lustre fades.
Thus fell Euryalus; whose matchless grace,
In youth's full bloom, surpass'd the human race;
For Cynthia only could with him compare,
In comely features, shape, and flowing hair.

Now o'er the fields the rage of war is spread;
And heaps on heaps ascend the hills of dead.
Ranks meeting ranks oppose with equal rage:
As when the north and stormy south engage;

Beneath their strife the troubled ocean roars;
 And rushing waves o'erwhelm the rocky shores;
 So rag'd the fight; when bursting from a crowd
 Of thick opposing foes the princes stood
 Between the hosts. And thus th' Ætolian lord:
 Spartans! behold your valiant chief restor'd;
 Ye owe his safety to Minerva's care;
 Let hecatombs your gratitude declare,
 Soon as 'from Thebes you reach your native
 ground,

Where flocks and herds for sacrifice abound;
 Now fight and conquer. let this signal day
 Your tedious toils, with victory repay;
 And, for Hegialus, let thousands dead
 With ample vengeance gratify his shade.
 As thus the hero spake, the warriors heard,
 And hope rekindling through the host appear'd;
 With joyful shouts they rent the trembling air,
 And bless'd the gods, and own'd Minerva's care.

Now, tow'ring in the midst, Atrides stood,
 And call'd his warriors to the fight aloud;
 As mariners with joy the fun deicry,
 Ascending, in his course, the eastern sky;
 Who, all night long, by angry tempests tost,
 Shunn'd with incessant toil some faithless coast;
 So to his wishing friends Atrides came;
 Their danger such before, their joy the same.
 Again the rigour of the shock returns;
 The slaughter rages, and the comat burns;
 With thirst of vengeance ev'ry bosom glows.
 Tydides leads, and rushes on his foes;
 Around his head a ray of lightning shone
 From the smooth helmet and the glitt'ring cone;
 Like that by night which streams with fiery glare,
 When some red meteor glides along the air,
 Sent by the angry gods, with tainted breath,
 To sow the seeds of pestilence and death:
 From look to look infectious terror spreads;
 And ev'ry wretch th' impending vengeance dreads.

Before the chief the Theban bands retire,
 As shepherd swains avoid the lion's ire.
 Clytander only, by the fates impell'd,
 Oppos'd him single, and disdain'd to yield;
 Lycaon's son; deceiv'd by glory's charms,
 Superior might he brav'd and matchless arms.
 Nor was his brother present by his side,
 To share the danger, and the toil divide;
 Himself a youth, and yet by time unsteep'd,
 Single, he met Tydides in the field.
 Against th' immortal shield his lance he flung,
 Whose hollow orb with deaf'ning clangour rung:
 The tow'rs of Thebes re-echo'd to the sound;
 The spear repuls'd, fell blunted on the ground.
 Tydides next th' immortal jav'lin threw;
 With force impell'd, it brighten'd as it flew:
 And pierc'd the Theban helmet to the cone;
 Behind his ear the starting weapon shone.
 Supine the warrior fell, his spirit fled,
 And mix'd with heroes in th' Elysian shade.
 To spoil the slain the ardent victor flew:
 First from the wound the fixed lance he drew,
 The helmet loos'd, the costly mail unbound,
 And shining shield with sculptor'd figures crown'd.
 These spoils the hero, in his grateful mind,
 A present for the gen'rous youth design'd;
 Who still in perilous battle fought his side,
 And proffer'd late his warlike steeds to guide.

Fatal the gift, the cause of future woe!
 But good and ill th' immortals only know.
 The armour to a vulgar hand assign'd,
 Again the hero, swifter than the wind,
 To combat rush'd.

But, from his throne above
 Declin'd, the all-surveying eye of Jove
 His progress mark'd. The herald pow'r, who brings

His sov'reign mandates on immortal wings,
 He thus address'd: To yonder sphere descend;
 Bid Phœbus straight his ev'ning charge attend:
 For, with reverted eye, he views the war,
 And checks the progress of his downward car.
 Let him not linger in th' ethereal way,
 But lash his steeds, and straight conclude the day;
 For, if the gods descend not to her aid,
 Or ev'ning interpose with friendly shade,
 Thebes now must perish; and the doom of fate,
 Anticipated, have an earlier date
 Than fate ordains; for, like devouring flame,
 Tydides threatens all the Theban name;
 Immortal arms his native force improve,
 Confer'd by Pallas, partial in her love.
 These to retrieve must be your next essay;
 Win them by art, and hither straight convey:
 For man with man an equal war shall wage:
 Nor with immortal weapons arm his rage.

He said. And Maia's son, with speed, address'd
 His flight to Phœbus hov'ring in the west.
 Upon a cloud his winged feet he stay'd;
 And thus the mandates of his fire convey'd.
 Ruler of light! let now thy car descend,
 And silent night her peaceful shade extend,
 Else Thebes must perish; and the doom of fate,
 Anticipated, have an earlier date
 Than fate decrees; for, like devouring flame,
 Tydides threatens all the Theban name;
 Immortal arms his native force improve,
 Confer'd by Pallas, partial in her love.

The son of Maia thus. The god obey'd;
 The sounding lash upon his steeds he laid.
 Swift to the goal with winged feet they flew;
 The night ascending as the day withdrew.

To Thebes the herald next pursu'd his way;
 Shot like a meteor with the setting ray.
 Behind Tydides in the fight he stay'd;
 And on his head the potent sceptre laid:
 Whose magic pow'r on waking sense prevails;
 Or, in profoundest sleep, the eye unseals;
 The struggling ghost unbinds from mortal clay.
 And drives it down the dark Tartarean way.
 Subdu'd the hero stood by pow'ful charms,
 'Till Hermes stript him of th' immortal arms;
 And, mounting to the starry roofs above,
 Dispos'd them in the armory of Jove.
 And, recollected, thus Tydides spake:
 Whate'er they give, th' immortals may revoke.
 I own their favour; that, of mortal line
 The first, I wore a panoply divine.
 But if the day were lengthen'd to my will,
 With light to-point my jav'lin where to kill,
 Thebes now should perish; but the morning ray
 Shall finish what the ev'ning shades delay.
 And now the night began her silent reign;
 Ascending, from the deep, th' ethereal plain,
 O'er both the hosts she stretch'd her ample shade,
 Their conflict to suspend: the hosts obey'd.

The field no more a noisy scene appears,
With steeds and chariots throng'd and glittering appears;
But still, and silent: like the hoary deep,
When, in their caves, the angry tempests sleep,

Peaceful and smooth it spreads from shore to shore,
Where storms had rag'd and billows swell'd before:
Such seem'd the field; the martial clangors cease;
And war tumultuous lulls itself to peace.

BOOK IV.

AND now the princes of the Theban state
In council sat assembled in the gate,
Where rows of marble pillars bound the space,
To judgment sacred in the days of peace.
And Creon thus, with public care oppress'd
And private griefs the senators address'd:
Princes of Thebes, and valiant aids from far,
Our firm associates in the works of war,
Heroes, attend! I shall not now propose
To supplicate for peace, our haughty foes:
No peace can grow, no friendship e'er be found,
When mutual hate has torn so wide a wound.
Yet for a truce of seven days space I plead,
And fun'ral obsequies to grace the dead.
Nor were it just, that they, who greatly fall
From rage of foes to guard their native wall,
Should want the honours which their merits claim,
Sepulchral rites deny'd and fun'ral flame.

Thus as he spoke, parental grief suppress'd
His voice, and swell'd within his lab'ring breast.
Silent amid the assembled peers he stands;
And wipes his falling tears with trembling hands;
For great Leophron, once his country's boast,
The glory and the bulwark of her host,
Pierc'd by a foe and lifeless on the plain,
Lay drench'd in gore and mix'd with vulgar stain:
Silent he stood; the Theban lords around
His grief partake, in streams of sorrow drown'd;
Till sage Palantes rose, and to the rest,
The monarch seconding, his words address'd.

Princes! renown'd for wisdom and for might,
Rever'd in council, and approv'd in fight;
What Creon moves the laws themselves require,
With obsequies to grace, and funeral fire,
Each warrior, who in battle bravely falls
From rage of foes to guard his native walls.
If all approve, and none will sure withstand
What Creon counsels and the laws command,
Charg'd with the truce, Apollo's priest shall go
To offer and conclude it with the foe.
His silver hairs a mild respect may claim,
And great Apollo's ever honour'd name.

The rest assent. The venerable man,
Slow from his seat arising, thus began: [hand
Princes of Thebes! and thou, whose sov'reign
Sways the dread sceptre of supreme command;
Though well I might this perilous task refuse,
And plead my feeble age a just excuse;
Yet nothing shall refrain me, for I go,
Pleas'd with the pious charge, to meet the foe.
Willing I go; our bleeding warriors claim
Sepulchral honours and the fun'ral flame.
If all approve, let Clytophon attend;
With just success our labours thus shall end:

For sure no Theban boasts an equal skill,
With pleasing words to bend the fixed will.
Sooth'd with the friendly praise, the hero said,
No self-regard shall hold me or dissuade;
The pious charge my inmost thoughts approve,
He said; and slow through yielding crowds they move;

While Thebes on every side assembled stands,
And supplicates the gods with lifted hands:
O grant that wrathful enemies may spare
These rev'rend heads, nor wrong the silver hair!
And now they pass'd the lofty gates, and came
Where slow Ixion winds his gentle stream;
Amphion's grove they pass'd, whose umbrage
his rural tomb defends on every side! [wide
The scene of fight they reach'd, and spacious fields
With mangled slaughter heap'd, and spears and shields.

Under their feet the hollow bucklers found;
And splinter'd faulchions glitter'd on the ground.
And now the stations of the camp appear,
Far as a shaft can wound the flying deer.
Thither, amid the wrecks of war, they go
With silent steps, and 'scape the watchful foe.
Now full in view before the guards they stand;
The priest displays his ensigns in his hand,
The laurel wreath, the gold-bespangled rod
With stars adorn'd the symbols of his god.

He thus began: ye Argive warriors! hear:
A peaceful message to your tents we bear:
A truce is ask'd, till the revolving sun,
Seven times from east to west his journey run,
Again ascends; and, from the ocean's streams,
Crowns the green mountains with his golden beams:
That mutually secure, with pious care,
Both hosts funereal honours may prepare
For every hero, whom the raging fight
Has swept to darkness and the shores of night.

Thus as he spoke, the lit'ning warriors heard
With approbation, and the priest rever'd,
The chief of Salamis, their leader, went
Himself to guide them to the royal tent; [night
Which shone conspicuous; through the shades of
Its spacious portal pour'd a stream of light.
Thither conducted by the chief they found
The king of men with all his peers around.
On thrones with purple spread each royal guest
In order sat, and shar'd the general feast.
Silent they enter'd. From his chair of state,
Full in the midst opposed to the gate,
The monarch saw; and rising thus express'd
The gen'rous dictates of his royal breast.

My guests, approach! no enemy is near;
This roof protects you, straight forget your fear,

Ev'n though from you devoted walls you come,
For vengeance mark'd by fate's eternal doom;
Here in my tent, with safety you shall rest,
And with the princes share the genial feast.
You freely then your message may propose.
When round the board the cheering vintage flows,
Which soothes impatience, and the open'd ear,
With favour and attention bends to hear.

The hero thus. Apollo's priest replies:
Humane thy manners, and thy words are wise;
With thee the noblest gifts the gods have plac'd,
And pow'r supreme with equal wisdom grac'd:
Though oft, by parts, for others they ordain,
The arts of sway, the privilege to reign;
In thee their partial favour has combin'd
The highest fortune with the greatest mind.

As thus the sage reply'd, the princely band
By turns presented each his friendly hand,
The sign of peace. For each a splendid throne,
Where fring'd with gold the purple covering shone,
The ready waiters, by command, prepar'd:
There sat the envoys and the banquer shar'd.
On ev'ry side the sparkling vintage flows,
The momentary cure of human woes.

The rage of thirst and hunger thus suppress,
To Nestor turning, Clytophon address'd.

Illustrious chief! an honour now I'll claim,
Which not to publish, sure, would merit blame.
Your father's guest I was: by fortune led,
When from Trinacria's desert shores I fled
With ill's beset: but in his friendly land,
His gen'rous heart I prov'd and lib'ral hand.
A grateful mind excites me to reveal
His sov'reign bounty, and attempt a tale
Of dear remembrance. But the fond design
Prudence dissenting, warns me to decline:
For when to public cares your thoughts you bend
A private story mingled must offend.

The artful Theban thus. The chief reply'd,
Whose sov'reign mandates all the host obey'd:
My honour'd guest! proceed, nor aught conceal
Which gratitude enjoins you to reveal:
For gen'rous deeds, improperly suppress,
Lie unapplauded in the grateful breast;
And now the feast, short interval of care,
To vocal symphony unbends the ear;
Or sweet discourse, which to the soul conveys
Sublimier joys than music's tuneful lays.

The monarch thus. The prudent sage suppress'd
His inward joy, and thus the peers address'd:
Each chief he strove to gain, but Nestor most,
Whose wisdom sway'd the councils of the host.

Confer'd rate kiags? and thou whose sov'reign hand
Sways the dread sceptre of supreme command,
Attend and hearken! since you seek to know
The sad beginnings of a life of woe.

In Rhodes my father once dominion claim'd,
Orsiloehus, for deeds of valour fam'd,
The Sporades his sov'reign sceptre own'd,
And Carpa thus with waving forests crown'd.
His youngest hope I was, and scarce had seen
The tenth returning summer clothe the green,
When pirates snatch me from my native land:
White with my infant equals on the strand
I play'd, of harm secure, and from the deep
With pleasure saw approach the fatal ship;
Pleas'd with the whiteness of the sails we stood,
And the red streamers shining on the flood:

And fearless saw the hostile galley land,
Where from the hills a current seeks the strand.
They climb'd the rocky beach, and far around,
Intent on spoil and rapine, view'd the ground;
If any herd were near, or fleecy store,
Or lonely mansion on the winding shore.
My young companions straight their fear obey.
I, bold and unsuspecting, dar'd to stay.
Me straight they seiz'd: and doom'd to servile toil
A wretched captive in a foreign soil.

Struggling in vain, they bore me down the bay,
Where, anchor'd near the beach, their vessel lay;
And plac'd me on the deck. With bitter cries,
To speeding gales I saw the canvass rise:
The boundlets ocean far before me spread;
And from my reach the shores at distance fled.
All day I wept; but when the setting light
Retir'd, and yielded to the shades of night,
Sleep stole upon my grief with soft surprise,
Which care ne'er banish'd long from infant eyes.

Nine days we sail'd; the tenth returning ray
Show'd us Trinacria rising in our way,
Far in the west; where, with his ev'ning beams,
The sun descending gilds the ocean's streams.
Thither the sailors ply, and blindly run
On hidden dangers which they ought to shun;
For whom the gods distinguish'd by their hate,
They first confound, and then resign to fate.
All day we sail'd; and with the evening hour,
Which calls the shepherd to his rural bow'r,
Approach'd the shore. The forests on the land
We mark'd, and rivers opening from the strand,
Then gladness touch'd my heart; the first I knew
Since fate had mix'd me with that lawless crew:
With joy I saw the rising shores appear,
And hop'd to find some kind deliverer near;
Some gen'rous lord, to whom I might relate,
Low bending on my knees, my wretched fate.
Vain was the hope; the Cyclopes ne'er know
Compassion, not to melt at human woe.

Near on the left, and where the parted tides
A promontory's rocky height divides,
A bay they found; and on the fatal strand
Descending, fix'd their vessel to the land.
They valleys straight and mountains they explore,
And the long windings of the desert shore;
And find, of sheep and goats, a mingled flock,
Under the shelter of a cavern'd rock.
The largest and the best the pirate band
Seiz'd, and prepar'd a banquet on the strand.
With joy they feasted; while the goblet, crown'd
With Mithymean vintage, flow'd around.
Of harm secure they sat; and void of fear
To mirth resign'd; nor knew destruction near.

Amid them there I meditating sat;
Some god inspir'd me, or the power of fate,
To 'scape their hated hands: and soon I found
The wish'd occasion; when along the ground,
Each where he sat, the ruffians lay supine,
With sleep oppress'd, and sense-subduing wine;
Softly I rose, and to a lofty grove,
Which shaded all the mountain tops above,
Ascending, in a rocky cavern lay,
Till darkness fled before the morning ray.
Then from above I saw the pirate band,
In parties, roaming o'er the desert strand;
The mountain-goats they drove, and fleecy store;
From all the pastures, crowded to the shore.

Me too by name they call'd; and oft, in vain,
 Explor'd each grove and thicket on the plain;
 While from above I saw, with careless eye,
 Them searching round and list'ning for reply.
 Some to the ship the bleating spoil convey'd;
 While others to prepare a banquet stay'd,
 And call'd their mates: to share the full repast
 With mirth they came, nor knew it was their last.

Then from the rocky summit where I lay,
 A flock appear'd descending to the bay;
 Which through a narrow valley rush'd along,
 Oxen and sheep, an undistinguish'd throng.
 With these the sloping hills were cover'd o'er,
 And the long windings of the sandy shore.
 Behind a Cyclops came; and, by degrees,
 Rose to my view, and tower'd above the trees.
 His giant stature, like a lofty rock,
 Appear'd: and in his hand a knotted oak
 Of tallest growth; around his shoulder slung
 His bag enormous, by a cable hung.
 Panting I lay; as when a lurking deer,
 From some close thicket, sees the hunter near.
 By dread subdu'd, confounded and amaz'd,
 My fixed eye-balls darken'd as I gaz'd.

Soon from above my wretched mates he knew,
 As on the level shore in open view,
 They sat secure, with flow'ry garlands crown'd;
 The signs of spoil and ravage scatter'd round.
 With indignation, for his wasted flock,
 Inflan'd he thus like distant thunder spoke.
 Whoe'er these are, who from their native soil
 To foreign climates thus, in quest of spoil,
 Licentious roam; they soon shall feel my hand,
 And rue that e'er they touch'd Trinacria's strand.
 As mutt'ring thus, along the craggy road
 He came, the mountain trembled as he trod.
 The wretches saw with horror and affright;
 Each limb enfeebled lost the power of flight.
 Their cries in vain the monster mov'd to spare;
 His club he rear'd and swung it thrice in air,
 Then hurl'd it cross the bay: it swiftly drove
 O'er the smooth deep, and raz'd the beach above.
 Threat'ning it rush'd along; but, bending low,
 Each, where he sat, escap'd the weighty blow.
 Beyond them far it pitch'd upon the land,
 Tore the green sward, and heav'd a mound of sand.
 Now starting from the ground they strove to fly,
 Press'd by despair and strong necessity;
 The woody summits of the cliffs to gain,
 With fault'ring haste they fled across the plain.
 But the impending mountains barr'd their flight,
 High and projecting from their airy height,
 Back from the slipp'ry arch, in heaps, they fall;
 And with imploring cries for mercy call,
 In vain. The moult' with gigantic strides,
 At twenty steps, the spacious bay divides;
 Around his knees the whit'ning billows roar,
 And his rude voice like thunder shakes the shore.

There thirty youths he slew; against the stones
 And ragged cliffs, he dash'd their crackling bones.
 Twenty his feet and heavy hands pursue,
 As to the ocean in despair they flew;
 Striving the summit of the beach to gain,
 With headlong course to rush into the main:
 For there they hop'd a milder fate to have,
 And less abhorr'd, beneath the whelming wave.
 These too he reach'd; and, with his weighty hand,
 Their flight oppres'd, and mix'd them with the sand.

Two yet surviv'd; who supplicating drove,
 With humble suit, his barb'rous soul to move.
 With trembling knees the sandy beach they press'd;
 And, as he came, the monster thus address'd:

O thou! with whom no mortal can compare
 For strength resistless, pity now and spare.
 O let the blood, already shed, atone,
 For our provoking guilt, and trespass done!
 O spare and pity! sure, the gods above,
 Who sit around the stary throne of Jove,
 Are won by pray'r; and he whose matchless might
 The solid earth sustains and stary height,
 Oft spares the guilty; for his soul approves
 Compassion, and the works of mercy loves.
 Let fo'r reign pity touch thy mighty breast;
 And him rever, the greatest and the best:
 Who pardons oft, but measures grief and pain
 To such as hear the wretched plead in vain.

As thus to touch his iron heart they try'd,
 The Cyclops smiling, scornful thus reply'd:
 The praife of mercy well your words proclaim;
 And vengeance mark, though merited, with blame.
 Well have you spoken; therefore, from my hand,
 More favour hope than any of your band;
 They, on the desert shore expos'd and bare,
 The wolves shall feast and ev'ry bird of air;
 But ye, prefer'd above the rest, shall have
 This body for your monument and grave.

He said, and seizing lifts them both on high,
 With hands and feet extended in the sky;
 Then dash'd them thrice against the rocky shore;
 Gnow'd their warm flesh, and drank their streaming gore.

Oft have I seen the havoc of the plain,
 The rage of tempests and the stormy main;
 But fate, in such a form, ne'er meet my eyes,
 And, while I speak, afresh its horrors rise
 To chill my veins; nor can the vary'd state
 Of sprightly youth, and middle age sedate,
 Or life's last stage with all its griefs oppress,
 Banish the dire impression from my breast.
 For still I see the monster, as he stood,
 His hairy visage dy'd in human blood:
 As the grim lion leaves the waded plains,
 Red from the ravage of the flocks and swains.

With vengeance pleas'd he view'd the shores
 around;

And, riding near the beach, our vessel found:
 Her by the mast he seiz'd; and to the land,
 With all her anchors, dragg'd along the strand.
 Exploring, next the solid deck he tore,
 And found, conceal'd below, his fleecy store.
 With scornful smiles he saw the theft bewray'd;
 And sidelong on the beach the galley laid;
 And call'd his flock: to open light they strain,
 Through the wide beach, and crowd upon the plain:
 Still, as they pass'd, his weighty hand he laid
 On their soft backs, and, stroaking gently, said:
 Go now, my flock! enjoy the verdant hills,
 The rivers cool, the sweet refreshing rills,
 The meads and shady forests, safe from harm;
 Your foes lie crush'd beneath your master's arm.
 The giant thus; and next the hold explor'd:
 Four jars he found with Lesbian vintage stor'd.
 These first he drain'd; then to his lips apply'd
 His flute, which like a quiver by his side,
 Of size enormous, hung. Its hollow sound
 The woods repeated and the caves around.

Its music such, as when a stormy gale
 Roars through a hollow cliff with hideous peal,
 Refounding deep, along the level shore :
 He ply'd, and drove his past'ring flock before.
 Horror and grief at once my heart assail'd ;
 Prefages sad o'er ev'ry hope prevail'd.
 My distant country rush'd upon my mind ;
 My friends, my weeping parents, left behind.
 Now loit to hope, and furious from despair,
 With both my hands I rent my rooted hair ;
 And in an agony of sorrow flung,
 With strokes repeated oft, my heaving breast.
 All day I mourn'd : but when the setting ray
 Retir'd, and ev'ning shades expell'd the day ;
 Encourag'd by the night, I fought the plain ;
 And, wand'ring anxious 'midst the mangled slain
 Oft call'd, to know if any of the band
 Did yet survive, escap'd the monster's hand ;
 But none reply'd. Along the desert shore
 All night I wander'd, 'midst the fullen roar
 Of bursting billows ; till the morning ray
 Appear'd to light my solitary way.
 'Twas then I reach'd a mountain's height, o'er-spread

With thickets close, and dark impending shade,
 Hung o'er the valley, where a river leads
 His wand'ring current through a grove of reeds.

Thither I went ; and, op'ning to the deep,
 A cavern found beneath the rocky steep ;
 The haunt of mountain goats, when wint'ry rains
 Have chas'd them from the hills and naked plains.
 Gladly I enter'd : for, deceiv'd by fear,
 I always thought the barb'rous Cyclops near ;
 His form descri'd in ev'ry free behind,
 And heard his voice approaching in the wind.
 Of honey there a sweet repast I found,
 In clusters hanging from the cliffs around,
 My hunger-foon appeas'd, the gentle pow'r
 Of sleep subdu'd me till the ev'ning hour.
 'Twas then I wak'd ; and to the deep below, [flow ;
 Through thickets, creep'd with careful steps and
 And gaz'd around if any hut were there,
 Or solitary wretch my grief to share :
 But none appear'd. I climb'd a mountain's head
 Where, wide before me, lay the ocean spread ;
 And there no object met my wishing eyes,
 But billows bounded by the setting skies.
 Yet still I gaz'd, till night's prevailing sway
 Extinguish'd, in the west, the evening ray.
 Hopeless and sad, descending from my stand,
 I wand'ring on the solitary strand,
 Through the thick gloom ; and heard the fullen

FOUR

Of billows bursting on the desert shore,
 Thus ten long years I liv'd, conceal'd by day,
 Under a rock on wither'd leaves I lay ;
 At dawn and twilight on the mountains stood,
 Exploring with my eyes the pathless flood ;
 Impatient till some friendly sail should come,
 To waft me to my fire and native home ;
 But none appear'd. The pilots shun the shores
 Where Ætna flames and dire Charibdis roars ;
 And where the curs'd Cyclopean brothers reign,
 The lonely tyrants of the desert plain.
 Preisd by despair, at last I dar'd to brave,
 Ev'n in a skiff, the terrors of the wave ;
 Contemning all the perils in my way,
 For worse it seem'd than death itself to stay.

Of ozers soft the bending hull I wove ;
 And ply'd the skins of mountain goats above.
 A slender fir, ten cubit lengths, I found
 Fall'n from a mould'ring bank, and stript it round.
 This for the mast, with bulrush ropes I ty'd ;
 A pole to steer the rudder's use supply'd :
 Four goat-skins join'd I fitted for the sail,
 And spread it with a pole to catch the gale.
 Each 'chink with gum against the brine, I clos'd :
 And the whole work beneath a shade dispos'd,
 Where, from the hills descending to the main,
 A winding current cuts the sandy plain.
 Nuts and dry'd figs in baskets next I starr'd ;
 And liquid stores in bags of skin prepar'd ;
 And waited anxious till the southern gale,
 From the dire coast, should bear my flying sail.
 Nine days I stay'd ; and still the northern breeze,
 From great Heperia, swept the whit'ning seas ;
 But on the tenth it chang'd ; and, when the hour
 Of twilight call'd the giant to his bow'r,
 Down from my grotto to the shore I came,
 And call'd the God who rules the ocean's stream ;
 Oblations vow'd, if, by his mighty hand
 Conducted safe, I found my native land.
 And, turning where conceal'd my yessel lay,
 The rope I loos'd, and push'd her to the bay ;
 The sail unfurl'd, and, steering from the strand,
 Behind me left with joy the hated land.

All night, by breezes sped, the prow divides
 The deep and o'er the billows lightly glides.
 But when the dawn, prevailing o'er the night,
 Had ting'd the glowing east with purple light,
 The air was hush'd : deserted by the gale,
 Loose to the mast descends the empty sail.
 And full against my course a current came,
 Which hurl'd me backwards, floating on its stream.
 Towards the land. I saw the shores draw near ;
 And the long billows on the beach appear.
 The cruel Cyclops spy'd me as he drove
 His past'ring flock along the hills above ;
 And winding through the groves his secret way,
 Conceal'd behind a promontory lay ;
 Prepar'd to snatch me, when his arm could reach
 My skiff, which drove ungovern'd to the beach.
 I mark'd his purpose ; furious from despair,
 With both my hands I rent my rooted hair ;
 And on the poop with desperate purpose stood,
 Prepar'd to plunge into the whelming flood.
 But Neptune sav'd me in that perilous hour ;
 The headlong current felt his present pow'r :
 Back from the shore it turn'd, at his command,
 And bore me joyful from the fatal strand.
 The Cyclops vex'd ; as when some fowler spies,
 Safe from his cover'd snares the quarry rise :
 His feat forsook, and, leaning o'er the steep,
 Strove with soft words to lure me, from the deep.
 Stranger, approach ! nor fly this friendly strand ;
 Share the free blessings of a happy land :
 Here, from each cliff, a stream of honey flows ;
 And ev'ry hill with purple vintage glows.
 Approach ; your fear forget ; my bounty share ;
 My kindness prove and hospitable care.
 As to allure me thus the monster try'd,
 His fraud I knew ; and rashly thus reply'd :
 Talk not of friendship ; well I know the doom
 Of such as to your dire dominions come.
 These eyes beheld when, with a ruthless hand,
 My wretched mates you murder'd on the strand.

Two su'd for mercy; but their limbs you tore
 With brutal rage, and drank their streaming gore.
 If heav'n's dread Sov'reign to my vengeful hand
 His wasting flames would yield, and forked brand,
 Scorch'd on the cliffs, your giant limbs should feed
 The mountain wolves, and all the rav'nous breed.

I said; and from the south a rising breeze
 Brush'd the thick woods, and swept the curling seas.
 Above the waves my vessel lightly flew;
 The ocean widen'd, and the shores withdrew.
 Ehrag'd the Cyclops, rushing down the steep,
 Eager to snatch me, plung'd into the deep;
 My flight he follow'd with gigantic strides,
 And stem'd with both his knees the rushing tides.
 Soon had I perish'd, but escap'd again,
 Protected by the god who rules the main.
 He sent a spectre from his wat'ry caves;
 Like mist it rose, and hover'd o'er the waves.
 A skiff like mine, by art divine, it grew;
 And to the left across the ocean flew.
 With course divided, where the pilot spies
 Amid the deep two desert islands rise,
 In shape like altars, so by sailors nam'd,
 A mark for pilots, else for nothing fam'd;
 The angry giant doubting stood, nor knew
 Which to forsake, the shadow or the true:
 For both seem'd equal. By the fates misled,
 He chas'd the airy image as it fled:
 Nor reach'd it: for it led him through the main,
 As the bright rainbow mocks some simple swain;
 Who still intent to catch it where it stands,
 And grasp the shining meteor with his hands,
 Along the dewy meadows holds his way;
 But still before him flies the coloured ray.
 The Cyclops so, along the wat'ry plain,
 The shadowy phantom chas'd, and chas'd in vain;
 The billows burst on his hairy sides,
 And far behind him rush'd the parted tides.
 Dissolv'd at last, its airy structure broke,
 And vanish'd hov'ring like a cloud of smoke.
 His error then, and my escape he knew;
 For, favour'd by the breeze, my vessel flew
 Far to the deep: yet plunging in the waves,
 Torn from its bed a pond'rous rock he heaves,
 Craggy and black, with dangling sea-weed hung;
 Pulv'd from his hand the weighty mass he flung,
 To crush my flight: along the ethereal plain
 It roll'd, and thund'ring downwards shook the main.

Behind it fell; and farther from the shore,
 Hurl'd on the mounting waves, my vessel bore
 Towards the deep. The giant saw with pain,
 His fraud detected, force essay'd in vain.
 He curs'd the partial pow'rs, and lash'd on high,
 With both his hands, the ocean to the sky.

Now safe beyond his reach, a prosp'rous gale
 Blew fresh behind, and stretch'd my flying sail:
 The shores retir'd; but, from the distant main,
 I saw him towering on the watery plain,
 Like a tall ship; and moving to the shore.
 Sullen and sad, to tend his fleecy store.
 Seven days I sail'd; the eighth returning light
 The Pylian shores presented to my sight,
 Far in the east; and where the sun displays,
 Along the glitt'ring waves, his early rays.
 Thither I steer'd, and where a point divides
 Extended in the deep, the parted tides,

A sane I mark'd; whose tow'ring summit, rear'd
 High in the air, with gilded spires appear'd.
 To Neptune sacred on the beach it stands,
 Conspicuous from the sea and distant lands.
 Assembled on the shore the people stood,
 On ev'ry side extended, like a wood:
 And in the midst I saw a pillar rise,
 Of fac'd smoke, ascending to the skies.
 'Twas there I reach'd the hospitable strand,
 And, joyful, fix'd my vessel to the land.

There, with his peers, your royal fire I found;
 And fell before him prostrate on the ground,
 Implo'ring aid; my lineage I reveal'd,
 Nor aught of all my tedious toils conceal'd.
 Attentive, as I spoke, the hero heard,
 Nor credulous nor diffident appear'd;
 For prudence taught him, neither to receive
 With easy faith, or rashly disbelieve.

O son of Neleus! though you justly claim,
 For eloquence and skill, superior fame:
 Yet to an equal glory ne'er aspire:
 Vain were the hope to emulate your fire.
 Eight days we feasted: still the flowing bowl
 Return'd, and sweet discourse, to glad the soul,
 With pleasure heard; as comes the sound of rain,
 In summer's drought, to cheer the careful swain.
 And when the ninth returning morn arose,
 Sixty bold mariners the hero chose,
 Skill'd, through the deep, the flying keel to guide,
 And sweep, with equal oars, the hoary tide:
 They trimm'd a vessel, by their lord's command,
 To wait me to my fire and native land.
 With gifts enrich'd of robes and precious ore,
 He sent me joyful from the Pylian shore.
 Such Neleus was! and such his matchless praise
 For hospitable deeds in former days;
 The friend, the patron, destin'd to redress
 The wrongs of fate, and comfort my distress.

But what is man! a reptile of the earth;
 To toils successive fated from his birth;
 Few are our joys; in long succession flow
 Our griefs; we number all our days in woe.
 Misfortune enter'd with my infant years;
 My feeble age a load of sorrow bears.
 Driv'n from my country by domestic foes.
 Thebes but receiv'd me to partake her woes.
 The sword I've seen, and wide devouring fire,
 Against her twice in fatal league conspire.
 The public griefs, which ev'ry heart must share,
 By nature taught to feel another's care,
 Augment my own: our matrons weeping stand;
 Our rev'rend elders mourn a ruin'd land:
 Their furrow'd cheeks with streams of sorrow flow;
 And wailing orphans swell the gen'ral woe;
 They mourn their dearest hopes, in battle slain,
 Whose limbs, unbury'd, load their native plain;
 And now by us entreat that war may cease,
 And, for seven days successive, yield to peace:
 That mutually secure, with pious care,
 Both hosts funereal honours may prepare
 For ev'ry warrior, whom the rage of fight
 Has swept to darkness and the coasts of night.
 To ratify the truce, if ye approve,
 We come alike commission'd, as to move.

Thus Clytophon; and he, whose sov'reign sway
 The warriors of the Pylian race obey,

Nestor, his partial favour thus express'd ;
 And to the Theban chief himself address'd :
 The truth you speak, nor do your words appear
 Prepar'd with art, or dictated by fear ;
 For what you tell, my memory recalls,
 When young I saw you at my native walls,
 Yourself a youth: though now a length of years,
 Imprinted deep, in all your form appears ;
 Yet still, with sure remembrance, can I trace
 Your voice the same, and lineaments of face.
 An infant then upon your knees I hung,
 And catch'd the pleasing wonders from your tongue :

Your woes I pity'd, as I pity still ;
 And, were the chiefs determin'd by my will,
 The truce should stand : for piety conspires
 With justice, to demand what Thebes requires.

The hero thus ; the king of men replies :
 Princes, in fight approv'd, in council wise !
 What Thebes propounds, 'tis yours alone to choose,
 Whether ye will accept it, or refuse :
 For though your votes consenting, in my hand
 Have plac'd the sceptre of supreme command ;
 Yet still my pow'r, obedient to my choice,
 Shall with its sanction join the public voice.

The monarch thus ; and thus the chief reply'd,
 Whom fair Ætolia's martial sons obey'd :
 Princes, attend ! and thou, whose sov'reign hand
 Sways the dread sceptre of supreme command !
 What Thebes requires, I do not now oppose,
 Because, insensible to human woes,
 The widow's tears I scorn, the mother's sighs,
 The groans of sisters, or the orphan's cries,
 Whole dearest hopes, in rage of battle slain,
 With wounds defac'd, lie scatter'd on the plain :
 Compassion for the host, which fruitless toil
 So long has wasted in a foreign soil,
 What Thebes propounds, impels me to dissuade,
 And for the living, disregard the dead.
 How long has war and famine thinn'd our pow'rs,
 Inactive camp'd around the Theban tow'rs ?
 And pestilence, whose dire infection flies,
 Blown by the furies through the tainted skies ?
 Many now wander on the Stygian shore,
 Whom fires and comforts shall behold no more :
 And many still, who yet enjoy the day,
 Must follow down the dark Tartarean way,
 If, blinded by the fates, our counsels bar
 The course of conquest, and protract the war.
 Since equity and public right demands
 That Thebes should fall, by our avenging hands,
 Now let us combat, till the gods above,
 Who sit around the starry throne of Jove,
 The judges of the nations, crown our toil,
 So long endur'd, with victory and spoil ;
 Or define us to fall in glorious fight,
 Elate and dauntless in the cause of right.
 Shall we delay till dire infection spreads
 Her raven wings o'er our devoted heads ?
 Till generous wrath, by slow disease suppress'd,
 Expires inactive in the warrior's breast,
 And life, the price of glory, paid in vain,
 Who die forgotten on a foreign plain.

Tydidès thus ; and he, whose sovereign sway
 The warriors of the Pylian race obey,
 Nestor reply'd, for eloquence approv'd,
 By Pallas and the tuneful sisters lov'd :

Conferr'd rate kings ! and thou, whose sov'reign
 hand

Sways the dread sceptre of supreme command,
 With patience hear the reasons which I plead
 For funeral rites, the honours of the dead.
 Well have you heard the various ills that wait
 On strife prolong'd, and war's disastrous state :
 And they who choose to dwell amid alarms,
 The rage of slaughter and the din of arms,
 Know little of the joys, when combats cease,
 That crown with milder bliss the hours of peace.
 Though gladly would I see, in vengeance just,
 The Theban tow'rs confounded with the dust ;
 That from the war releas'd, we might again
 Each share the pleasures of his native reign :
 Yet let us not presumptuously withstand
 What piety alike and right command,
 The honours of the dead : nor tempt the gods
 To curse our labours, from their bright abodes.
 Far in the heav'ns, above this mortal scene,
 In boundless light, the thund'rer sits serene ;
 He views the works of men : the good he knows,
 And on their just attempts success bestows ;
 But blasts impiety, and mocks its aim,
 With disappointment sure, and lasting shame.

Attend, ye princes ! and I shall unfold
 What sage Harmodius taught my fire of old.
 The Locri summon'd all their martial pow'rs,
 And fought around the Orchomenian tow'rs.
 From oxen seiz'd began the dire debate ;
 And wide and wasteful was the work of fate.
 The Orchomenians oft a truce propos'd
 For fun'ral rites ; the Locrian chiefs oppos'd.
 Nine days expir'd, the bleeding warriors lay ;
 Their wounds hot streaming to the solar ray.
 From Styx's fable shore their ghosts implor'd,
 With suppliant cries, hell's dread avenging lord.
 He heard, and from the gloomy deep below
 Of Erebus profound, the house of woe,
 A fury sent, the fiercest of the crew,
 Whose iron scourges human crimes pursue :
 Discord her name ; among th' infernal gods
 She dwells, excluded from the blest abodes ;
 Though oft on earth she rears her baleful head,
 To kindle strife, and make the nations bleed.
 The fury came ; and, hov'ring o'er the plain
 Devoted with her eyes the Locrian train.
 In form a raven, to a tow'r she flew,
 Which rose upon a precipice in view,
 And on the airy summit took her seat,
 With potent charms, to kindle dire debate.
 The howling dogs her presence first declare ;
 The war horse trembling snorts aloft in air ;
 On man at last the dire infection fell,
 The awful vengeance of the pow'rs of hell.
 Confusion straight through all the camp is found ;
 The wand'ring centinel deserts his ground,
 Fatally gay and crown'd with every weed,
 Which weeping matrons scatter o'er the dead ;
 Of dire portent : but when the silent reign
 Of night possess'd the mountains and the plain,
 Above the camp her torch the fury rear'd,
 Red, in the air, its baleful flame appear'd.
 Kindling debate : outrageous strife arose,
 Loud as the ocean when a tempest blows,
 O'er all the plain, and stunn'd the ear of night
 With shouts tumultuous and the din of fight.

Down from her airy stand the goddess came,
Shot like a meteor, with a stream of flame,
To kindle fiercer strife with stronger charms,
To swell the tumult and the rage of arms.
The combat burn'd; the Orchomenians heard
With horror, nor beyond their walls appear'd,
By awe divine restrain'd: but when the light
Return'd successive on the steps of night,
From ev'ry tow'r they saw the spacious plain
With havoc heap'd, and mountains of the slain.
The secret cause the augurs first declar'd;
The justice of the gods they own'd and fear'd.
No fun'ral rite the Orchomenian state
On them bestow'd, the vulgar or the great;
In one deep pit, whose mouth extended wide
Four hundred cubit length from side to side,
They whelm'd them all; their bucklers and their spears,

The steeds, the chariots, and the charioteers,
One ruin-mix'd; for so the will of Jove
The priests declar'd: and heap'd a mound above:
Such was the fate, by heav'n and hell decreed,
To punish bold contemners of the dead.
And let not us their fatal wrath provoke,
Nor merit by our guilt an equal stroke;
But seal the truce, and piously bestow
What to the reliques of the dead we owe.

He said; the peers their joint assent declare,
The dead to honour, and the gods revere.
The king of men commands a herald straight
The priests to call, and hasten ev'ry rite.
While thus the sov'reign mandate they obey'd,
Th' Ætolian leader rose, and frowning said:

O blind to truth! and fated to sustain
A length of woes, and tedious toils in vain!
By sounds deceiv'd, as to her fatal den
Some vocal forc'recs lures the steps of men;
O eloquence! thou fatal charm! how few,
Guided by thee, their real good pursue!
By thee, our maids, with magic fetters bound,
In all decisions, true and false confound.
Not the unnumber'd wracks, which lie along
The Syrens' coast the trophies of their song,
Nor there where Circe from the neighb'ring
deep,

With strong enchantments, draws the passing ship,
Can match thy spoils: O let me ne'er obey,
And follow blindly, as you point the way!
Confed'rate kings! since nothing can oppose
The truce you purpose with our treach'rous foes,
Nor these my eyes the fatal rite shall see;
Left it be said, when mischief shall succeed,
Tydides saw it, and approv'd the deed.

Speaking he grasp'd his spear and pond'rous
shield;
And mov'd like Mars, when, 'midst th' embattoll'd
Sublime he stalks to kindle fierce alarms,
To swell the tumult and the rage of arms.
Such seem'd the chief: the princes with surprise
Turn'd on the king of men, at once their eyes.

He thus began: Since now the public choice
The truce approves, with one consenting voice;
Tydides only, with superior pride,
Though youngest, still the readiest to decide,
Our gen'ral sense condemns; his haughty soul
Must not the counsels of the host controul,
Brave though he is: the altars ready stand;
In order waits the consecrated band;
Straight let us seal the truce with blood and wine,
And, to attest it, call the pow'rs divine.

The monarch thus; Tydides to his tent,
Through the still host, in fullen sorrow went.
Fix'd in his mind the fatal vision stay'd,
Snatch'd by invading force his lovely maid;
The fraud of Cytherea; fill his heart
Incessant anguish felt, and lasting smart;
And, as a lion, when his side retains
A barbed shaft, the cause of bitter pains,
Growls in some lonely shade; his friends declin'd
He breath'd in groans the anguish of his mind.

Now round the flaming hearth th' assembly
stands,

And Theseus thus invokes with lifted hands:
Hear me, ye pow'rs, that rule the realms of light!
And ye dread sov'reigns of the shades of night!
If, till the eighth succeeding sun displays,
Above the eastern hills his early rays,
Any bold warrior of the Argive bands,
Against a Theban lifts his hostile hands,
By us approv'd; let ev'ry curse succeed
On me, and all, for perjury decreed.
And as by blood our mutual oath we seal,
The blood of victims drawn by deathful steel;
So let their blood be shed, who, scornful right,
Profanely shall presume its ties to slight.
Apollo's priest, for Thebes resum'd the vow,
The gods above, invoking, and below,
Their vengeance to inflict, if force, or art,
The truce should violate on either part.

The rites concluded thus, the king commands
Two younger warriors of his native band.
A chariot to prepare; the driver's place
Sophronimus assum'd; with tardy pace,
Ascend the sage ambassadors; before
A lighted torch Asteropæus bore,
And led the way; the tents, the fields of war,
They pass'd, and at the gate dismiss'd the car.

BOOK V.

Soon as the sun display'd his orient ray,
And crown'd the mountain tops with early day;
Through ev'ry gate the Theban warriors flow,
Unarm'd, and fearless of th' invading foe:
As when, in early spring, the shepherd sees
Rush from some hollow rock a stream of bees,

Long in the cliffs, from winter's rage conceal'd,
New to the light, and strangers to the field;
In compass wide their mazy flight they steer,
Which wings of balmy zephyrs lightly bear
Along the meads, where some soft river flows,
Or forests, where the flow'ry hawthorn blows;

To taste the early spring their course they bend,
And lightly with the genial breeze descend:
So o'er the heights and plains the Thebans spread;
Some, 'midst the heaps of slaughter, fought their dead;

Others with axes to the woods repair'd,
Fell'd the thick forests, and the mountains bar'd.

With like intent the Argive warriors mov'd,
By Theseus led, whom virgin Pallas lov'd.
Ten thousand oxen drew the harness'd wains,
In droves collected from the neighb'ring plains;
Slow up the mountains move the heavy wheels,
The steep ascent each groaning axle feels:
In ev'ry grove the temper'd axes found;
The thick trees crackle, and the caves resound.
Now to the plain the moving woods descend,
Under their weight a thousand axles bend:
And round the camp, and round the Theban walls,

Heaps roll'd on heaps, the mingled forest falls.

Of this the Spartan chief, his native bands,
With speed to rear a lofty pile, commands;
Which for Hegialus, with grateful mind,
Adrastus' valiant son, the chief design'd;
Who to his aid, when ev'ry warrior fled,
Repair'd, and for his rescue greatly bled:
His native bands the hero thus address'd,
While sighs incessant labour'd from his breast.

The chief of Argos, warriors! first demands
Funeral honours from our grateful hands;
For him this lofty structure is decreed,
And ev'ry rite in order shall succeed:
His dear remains in my pavilion rest;
Nor can Adrastus at the rites assist;
Who to despair and frenzy has resign'd,
By age and grief subdu'd, his generous mind:
The other princes of the army wait
The obsequies to grace, with mournful state.

He said; and to his tent the warriors led,
Where stood already deck'd the fun'ral bed:
With Syrian oil bedew'd, the corse they found Fresh from the bath, and breathing fragrance
 round:

For Menelaus, with divided care,
Each rite domestic hasten'd to prepare.
Twelve princes to the pile the corse sustain'd:
The head on Agamemnon's hand reclin'd:
With mournful pomp the slow procession mov'd;
For all the hero honour'd and approv'd.

First on the top the fun'ral bed they place;
And next, the sad solemnity to grace,
And gratify the manes of the slain,
The blood of steeds and bullocks drench'd the plain.

The four fair steeds which drew the rapid car,
That bore the hero through the ranks of war,
Their lofty necks the pointed falchion tore,
With force impell'd, and drew a stream of gore:
Three groaning fell; but, fiercer from the stroke,

The silver reins the fourth with fury broke,
And fled around the field: his snowy chest,
Was dash'd with streaming blood, and lofty crest.
In circles still he wheel'd! at ev'ry round,
Still nearer to the pile himself he found;
Till drain'd of life, by blood alone supply'd,
Just where he felt the blow, he sunk, and dy'd.

By awe divine subdu'd, the warriors stand;
And silent wonder fixes ev'ry band:
Till thus Atrides: Sure th' immortal gods,
The glorious synod of the blest abodes,
Approve our rites; the good their favour share,
In death and life the objects of their care.

Atrides thus: and, further to augment
The mournful pomp, the martial goddesses went Through all the camp, in Merion's form ex-
 press'd,

And thus aloud the public ear address'd:
Warriors and friends! on yonder lofty pyre,
Hegialus expects the fun'ral fire:
For such high merit, public tears should flow;
And Greece assembled pour a flood of woe.
Now let us all his obsequies attend;
And, with the mournful rites, our sorrows blend.
Proclaiming thus aloud the goddesses went;
The army heard; and each forsakes his tent;
Her voice had touch'd their hearts; they mov'd along;

Nations and tribes, an undistinguish'd throng.
Around the pile the wid'ning circle grows;
As spreading in some vale, a deluge flows,
By mountain torrents fed, which stretches wide,
And floats the level lands on ev'ry side.
Distinguish'd in the midst the princes stand,
With sceptres grac'd, the ensigns of command.
Atrides, with superior grief oppress'd,
Thus to the fire of gods his pray'r address'd.

Dread sov'reign, hear! whose unresisted sway
The fates of men and mortal things obey:
From thee the virtue of the hero springs;
Thine is the glory and the pow'r of kings.
If e'er by thee, and virgin Pallas, led,
To noble deeds this gen'rous youth was bred:
If love to men, or piety, possess'd,
With highest purpose, his undaunted breast;
Command the winds in bolder gusts to rise,
And bear the flames I kindle to the skies.

The hero thus; and with the fun'ral brand
The structure touch'd; ascending from his hand,
Spreads the quick blaze: the ruler of the sky
Commands; at once the willing tempests fly:
Rushing in streams invisible, they came,
Drove the light smoke, and rais'd the sheeted
 flame.

The favour of the gods the nations own,
And, with their joint applause, the hero crown.
From morn till noon the roaring flames aspire,
And fat of victims added feeds the fire;
Then fall their lofty spires, and, sinking low,
O'er the pale ashes tremulously glow.
With wine, the smoke, and burning embers lay'd;
The bones they glean'd, and to a tomb convey'd
Under an oak, which, near the public way,
Invites the swains to slum the noontide ray.

Now twenty warriors of Atrides' train,
Loaded with treasure, brought a harness'd wain;
Vases and tripods in bright order plac'd,
And splendid arms with fair devices grac'd:
These for the games the Spartan chief decreed,
The fun'ral games in honour of the dead.
Amid the princes first a polish'd yew,
Unbent upon the ground the hero threw,
Of work divine; which Cynthus claim'd before,
And Chiron next upon the mountains bore;

Mis fire the third receiv'd it: now it lies,
For him who farthest shoots, the destin'd prize.

Heroes, approach! Atrides thus aloud,
Stand forth, distinguish'd from the circling crowd,
Ye, who, by skill or manly force, may claim
Your rivals to surpass, and merit fame.
This bow, worth twenty oxen, is decreed
For him who farthest sends the winged reed:
This bowl, worth eight, shall be reserv'd to grace
The man whose merit holds the second place.
He spoke. His words the bold Ajaces fir'd;
Crete's valiant monarch to the prize aspir'd;
Teucer for shooting fam'd; and Merion strong,
Whose force enormous dragg'd a bull along;
Prompt to contend, and rais'd with hope, they stood;

Laertes' son the last forsook the crowd.
Tydides too had join'd them, and obtain'd
Whatever could by skill or force be gain'd;
But in his tent, indulging sad despair,
He sat, subdu'd by heart-confuming care.

Straight in a casque the equal lots were thrown;
Each hero with his name had mark'd his own:
These, mix'd with care, the chief of Sparta drew;
Idomeneus the first he knew:
Teucer, with hope inspir'd, the second claim'd;
The third Oileus, much for shooting fam'd:
Next claim'd the wearer of the seven-fold shield,
Though young in arms, distinguish'd in the field:
Ulysses! then came next, and, last of all,
Bold Merion with a smile receiv'd his ball.

Prefs'd with incumbent force, the Cretan lord
Strain'd the stiff bow, and bent it to the cord;
Then from the full stor'd quiver, close with art,
Wing'd for the aerial flight a pointed dart.
Theicus commands the warriors to divide,
Who crowded thick and prefs'd on ev'ry side;
Straight they retire; as, at the word of Jove,
From day's bright face the scatt'ring clouds remove;

And through the host appear'd a spacious way,
Where woods and fields in distant prospect lay.
With force immense, the Cretan monarch drew,
Stretch'd the tough cord, and strain'd the circling
yew,

From his firm gripe the starting arrow sprung,
The stiff bow crack'd, the twanging cordage sung.
Up the light air the hissing weapon flies,
Pierces the winds, and streams along the skies:
Far to the distant plain it swiftly drove:
The host stood wond'ring as it rush'd above:
Descending there upon a mount it stood:
A depth of soil receiv'd the trembling wood.
Applause from all, tumultuous shouts declare,
By echoes wafted through the trembling air.
Such joy the hero feels, as praise inspires,
And to the circle of the kings retires.

The valiant Teucer next receiv'd the bow,
And to Apollo thus address'd a vow:
Hear me, dread king! whose unresist'd sway
Controls the sun, and rules the course of day;
Great patron of the bow! this shaft impell;
And hecatombs my gratitude shall tell;
Soon as to Salamis our martial pow'rs
Return victorious, from the Theban tow'rs.
He said, and bid the winged arrow fly
It pierc'd the winds, and swept a length of sky;

In compass, like the coloured arch, which shines
Exalted as the setting sun declines;
From north to south it marks th' ethereal space,
And woods and mountains fill its wide embrace:
Beyond the Cretan shaft, it reach'd the plain;
As far before, as now a shepherd swain,
Hurl'd from a sling, the sounding flint can throw,
From his young charge, to drive the deadly crow.

Oilean Ajax next the weapon claim'd,
For skill above the rest, and practice fam'd;
But Phoebus, chief and patron of the art,
Retarded in its flight the winged dart:
For, nor by prayers, nor holy vows, he strove,
Of grateful sacrifice, the god to move.
Downwards he turn'd it, where a cedar fair
Had shot its spiring top aloft in air;
Caught in a bough the quiv'ring weapon stood,
Nor forc'd a passage through the closing wood.
Ajax the next appear'd upon the plain;
With strength untaught, and emulous in vain;
Near and more near approach the doubling ends:
The arrow sprung: but erring took its way,
Far to the left, where oozy marshes lay,
And groves of reeds; where slow Iphonus strays,
And winds, through thickets green, his wat'ry maze.

Abasth'd the youth, with painful steps, retires;
And now Ulysses to the prize aspires.
In silence thus the prudent warrior pray'd,
And, in his heart, address'd the martial maid:
Great queen of arts! on thee my hopes depend:
With favour to thy suppliant's suit, attend!
By thee my infant arms were taught to throw
The dart with certain aim, and bend the bow:
Oft on my little hands, immortal maid!
To guide the shaft, thy mighty hands were laid:
Now, goddess, aid me, while I strive for fame;
Wing the swift weapon, and assist my claim.
He pray'd: the goddess, at his suit, descends;
And present from th' Olympian courts attends.
With force divine his manly limbs she strung,
The bow he strain'd: the starting arrow sung;
As when the fire of gods, with wrathful hand,
Drives the swift lightning and the forked brand,
To waste the labours of the careful swains,
Consume the mountain flocks, or scorch the plains;
With sudden glare appears the fiery ray;
No thought can trace it through th' ethereal
way:

So swift thy winged shaft, Ulysses! flew,
Nor could the following eye its speed pursue.
The sight of Teucer's arrow far surpass'd,
Upon a rural heath it pitch'd at last,
To Ceres built; where twain, in early spring,
With joy were wont their annual gifts to bring;
When first to view, above the furrow'd plain,
With pleasing verdure, rose the springin' grain.
Through all the host applauding shouts resound;
The hills repeat them, and the woods around.
The bended bow bold Merion next assumes,
A shaft selects, and smooths its purple plumes:
He plac'd it on the string, and bending low,
With all his force collected, strain'd the bow.
Up the light air the starting arrow sprung;
The tough bow crack'd; the twanging cordage sung.

Beyond the reach of fight the weapon drove,
 And tow'r'd amid th' ethereal space above :
 But as it rose, a heron cross'd before,
 From inland marshes steering to the shore ;
 Under the wing it reach'd her with a wound ;
 Screaming, she wheel'd, then tumbled to the ground.

And thus the youth : Illustrious chiefs ! I claim,
 If not the prize, at least superior fame :
 Ungovern'd strength alone the arrow sends :
 To hit the mark, the shooter's art commends.
 In mirthful mood the hero thus address'd ;
 And all their favour and applause express'd.

Ulysses ! take the bow, Atrides cries,
 The silver bowl, brave Teucer ! be thy prize.
 In ev'ry art, my friends ! you all excel ;
 And each deserves a prize for shooting well :
 For though the first rewards the victor's claim,
 Glory ye merit all, and lasting fame.
 He said ; and pond'ring in his grateful mind,
 Distinguish'd honours for the dead design'd.
 Warriors of Greece, and valiant aids from far,
 Our firm associates in the works of war !
 Here from a rock the Theban stream descends,
 And to a lake its silver current sends ;
 Whose surface smooth, unruffled by the breeze,
 The hills inverted shows and downward trees :
 Ye daring youths ! whose manly limbs divide
 The mountain surge, and brave the rushing tide ;
 All ye, whom hopes of victory inspire,
 Stand forth distinguish'd ; let the crowd retire.
 This costly armour shall the youth obtain,
 Who comes victorious from the wat'ry plain ;
 That island compass'd, where the poplar grows,
 And in the lake its wav'ring image shows,
 Who measuring back the liquid space, before
 His rivals, shall regain the flow'ry shore.
 This golden bowl is fix'd the second prize,
 Fitcem'd alike for fashion and for size.

The hero thus : with thirst of glory fir'd,
 Crete's valiant monarch to the prize aspir'd ;
 With Sparta's younger chief ; Ulysses came ;
 And brave Clearchus emulous of fame,
 A wealthy warrior from the Samian shore,
 In cattle rich, and heaps of precious ore :
 Distinguish'd in the midst the heroes stood,
 Eager to plunge into the shining flood.

His brother's ardour purpos'd to restrain,
 Atrides strove, and counsell'd thus in vain :
 Desist, my brother ! shun th' unequal strife ;
 For late you stood upon the verge of life :
 No mortal man his vigour can retain,
 When flowing wounds have empty'd ev'ry vein.
 If now you perish in the wat'ry way,
 Grief upon grief shall cloud this mournful day :
 Desist, respect my counsel, and be wise ;
 Some other Spartan in your place will rise.
 To change his brother's purpose, thus he try'd ;
 But nothing mov'd : the gen'rous youth reply'd :
 Brother ! in vain you urge me to forbear,
 From love and fond affection prompt to fear ;
 For firm, as e'er before, my limbs remain,
 To dash the fluid waves, or scour the plain.

He said, and went before. The heroes move
 To the dark covert of a neighb'ring grove ;
 Which to the bank its shady walk extends,
 Where mixing with the lake a riv'let ends.

Prompt to contend, their purple robes they looser
 Their figur'd vests and gold embroider'd shoes ;
 And through the grove descending to the strand,
 Along the flow'ry bank in order stand.
 As when, in some fair temple's sacred shrine,
 A statue stands, express'd by skill divine,
 Apollo's or the herald pow'r's, who brings
 Jove's mighty mandates on his airy wings ;
 The form majestic awes the bending crowd :
 In port and stature such, the heroes stood.

Starting at once, with equal strokes, they sweep
 The smooth expanse, and shoot into the deep ;
 The Cretan chief, exerting all his force,
 His rivals far surpass'd, and led the course ;
 Behind Atrides, emulous of fame ;
 Clearchus next, and last Ulysses came.
 And now they measur'd back the wat'ry space,
 And faw from far the limits of the race.
 Ulysses then with thirst of glory fir'd,
 The Samian left, and to the prize aspir'd ;
 Who, emulous, and dreading to be last,
 With equal speed the Spartan hero pass'd.
 Alarm'd, the Cretan monarch strove, with pain,
 His doubtful hopes of conquest to maintain ;
 Exerting ev'ry nerve, his limbs he ply'd,
 And wishing, from afar the shore descri'd :
 For near and nearer still Ulysses press'd ;
 The waves he felt rebounding from his breast.
 With equal zeal for victory they strove ;
 When, gliding sudden from the roofs of Jove,
 Pallas approach'd ; behind a cloud conceal'd,
 Ulysses only saw her form reveal'd.
 Majestic by the hero's side she stood ;
 Her shining sandals press'd the trembling flood.
 She whisper'd soft, as when the western breeze
 Stirs the thick reeds, or shakes the rustling trees :
 Still shall thy soul, with endless thirst of fame,
 Aspire to victory, in ev'ry game.

The honours, which from bones and sinews rise,
 Are lightly valu'd by the good and wise :
 To envy still they rouse the human kind ;
 And oft, than courted, better far declin'd.
 To brave Idomeneus yield the race ;
 Contented to obtain the second place.
 The goddess thus : while stretching to the land,
 With joy the Cretan chief approach'd the strand ;
 Ulysses next arriv'd ; and, spent with toil,
 The weary Samian grasp'd the welcome foil.

But far behind the Spartan warrior lay,
 Fatigu'd, and fainting, in the wat'ry way.
 Thrice struggling, from the lake, his head he rear'd ;

And thrice, imploring aid, his voice was heard.
 The Cretan monarch hastes the youth to save,
 And Ithacus again divides the wave ;
 With force renew'd their manly limbs they ply ;
 And from their breasts the whit'ning billows fly.
 Full in the midst a rocky isle divides
 The liquid space, and parts the silver tides ;
 Once cultivated, now with thickets green
 O'erspread, two hillocks, and a vale between.
 Here dwelt an aged swain ; his cottage stood
 Under the cliffs, encompass'd by a wood.
 From poverty secure, he heard afar,
 In peace profound, the tumults of the war.
 Mending a net before his rural gate,
 From other toils repos'd the peasant fat ;

When first the voice of Menelaus came,
By ev'ning breezes wafted from the stream.
Hast'ning, his skiff he loos'd, and spread the sail;
Some present god supply'd a prosp'rous gale:
For as the Spartan chief, with toil subdu'd,
Hopeless of life, was sinking in the flood;
The swain approach'd, and in his barge receiv'd
Him safe from danger imminent retriev'd.

Upon a willow's trunk Theristes fat,
Contempt and laughter fated to create,
Where, bending from a hollow bank it hung,
And rooted to the mould'ring surface clung;
He saw Atrides safe; and thus aloud,
With leer malign, address'd the list'ning crowd.
Here on the slow'ry turf a hearth shall stand;
A hecatomb the fav'ring gods demand,
Who sav'd Atrides in this dire debate,
And snatch'd the hero from the jaws of fate:
Without his aid we all might quit the field;
Ulysses, Ajax, and Tydides, yield:
His mighty arm alone the host defends,
But dire disaster still the chief attends:
Last sun beheld him vanquish'd on the plain;
Then warriors sav'd him, now a shepherd swain.
Defend him still from persecuting fate!
Protect the hero who protects the state;
In martial conflicts watch with prudent fear,
And, when he swims, let help be always near!
He said; and, scorn and laughter to excite,
His features foul he writh'd, with envious spite,
Smiling contempt; and pleas'd his ranc'rous
heart

With aiming thus oblique a venom'd dart.
But joy'd not long; for soon the faithless wood,
Strain'd from the root, resign'd him to the flood.
Plunging and sput'ring as his arms he spread,
A load of soil came thund'ring on his head,
Slit from the bank: along the winding shore,
With laughter loud he heard the echoes roar,
When from the lake his crooked form he rear'd,
With horror pale, with blotting clay besmear'd;
Then clamb'ring by the trunk, in sad dismay,
Which half immers'd with all its branches lay,
Confounded, to the tents he skulk'd along,
Amid the shouts and insults of the throng.

Now cloth'd in public view the heroes stand,
With sceptres grac'd the ensigns of command.
The Cretan monarch, as his prize, assumes
The polish'd helmet, crown'd with waving plumes,
The silver mail, the buckler's weighty round,
Th' embroider'd belt, with golden buckles bound.
The second prize Laertes' son receiv'd,
With less applause from multitudes deceiv'd;
The first he could have purchas'd; but declin'd,
And yielded, to the martial maid resign'd.

Thus they. The Thebans, near the eastern gate,
Around their pyres in silent sorrow wait:
Hopeless and sad they mourn'd their heroes slain,
The best and bravest on their native plain.
The king himself, in deeper sorrow, mourn'd;
With rage and mingled grief his bosom burn'd.
Like the grim lion, when his offspring slain
He sees, and round him drawn the hunter's train;
Couch'd in the shade with fell intent he lies,
And glares upon the foes with burning eyes:
Such Creon seem'd: his hot indignation drain'd
Grief's wat'ry sources, and their slow restrain'd.

Upon a turret o'er the gate he stood,
And saw the Argives, like a shady wood,
Extended wide; and dreading fraud design'd,
Still to the plain his watchful eyes confin'd,
Suspicious from his hatred, and the pow'r
Of restless passions, which his heart devour:
And when at ev'n's approach the host retir'd,
And from the labours of the day respir'd,
Within the walls he drew his martial pow'rs,
And kept with strictest watch the gates and towers.

Soon as the night possess'd th' ethereal plain,
And o'er the nations stretch'd her silent reign,
The guards were plac'd, and to the gentle way
Of sleep subdu'd, the weary warriors lay.
Tydides only wak'd, by anxious care
Distracted, still he mourn'd his absent fair,
Deeming her lost; his slighted counsel mov'd
Lasting resentment, and the truce approv'd;
Contending passions shook his mighty frame;
As warring winds impel the ocean's stream,
When south and east with mingled rage contend,

And in a tempest on the deep descend:
Now, stretch'd upon the couch, supine he lay;
Then, rising anxious, wish'd the morning ray.
Impatient thus, at last, his turbid mind,
By various counsels variously inclin'd,
The chief address'd: Or shall I now recal
Th' Ætolian warriors from the Theban wall;
Obey the warning by a goddess giv'n,
Nor slight her counsel dictated from heav'n?
Or shall I try, by one deciding blow,
The war at once to end, and crush the foe?
This pleases most; nor shall the voice of fame
The daring deed, in after ages, blame.
No truce I swore, but shunn'd it, and remov'd,
Alone dissenting while the rest approv'd.
Soon as the morn, with early light reveal'd,
Has call'd the Theban warriors to the field;
Against the town I'll lead my martial pow'rs,
And fire with flaming brands her hated towers:
The bane of Greece, whence dire debate arose
To bid the peaceful nations first be foes;
Where Tydeus fell, and many heroes more,
Banish'd untimely to the Stygian shore.
The public voice of Greece for vengeance calls;
And shall applaud the stroke by which she falls.
He purpos'd: but the gods, who honour right,
Deny'd to treason what is due to might.

When from the east appear'd the morning fair,
The Theban warriors to the woods repair,
Fearless, unarm'd; with many a harness'd wain,
The woody heights were crowded and the plain.
Tydides saw; and, issuing from his tent,
In arms complete, to call his warriors, went.
Their leader's martial voice the soldiers heard
Each in his tent, and at the call appear'd
In shining arms. Deiphobus began,
For virtue fam'd, a venerable man.
Him Tydeus lov'd; and in his faithful hand
Had plac'd the sceptre of supreme command,
To rule the state; when, from his native towers,
To Thebes the hero led his martial pow'rs;
His son, an infant, to his care resign'd,
With sage advice to form his tender mind.
The hero thus: Illustrious chief! declare
What you intend, and whither point the war.

The truce commence'd, you cannot, and be just,
The Thebans now assault, who freely trust
To public faith engag'd: unarm'd they go
Far through the woods and plains, nor fear a foe.

His leader's purpose thus the warrior try'd;

And, inly vex'd, Tydides thus reply'd:

Father! thy words from ignorance proceed;
The truce I swore not, nor approv'd the deed.

The rest are bound, and therefore must remain
Ling'ring inactive on this hostile plain:

The works of war abandon'd, let them fled

Their unavailing sorrows o'er the dead:

Or aim the dart, or hurl the disk in air;

Some paltry presents shall the victor share.

Warriors we came, in nobler strifes to dare;

To fight and conquer in the lists of war;

To conquer Thebes: and Jove himself ordains,

With wreaths of triumph, to reward our pains.

Wide to receive us stand the Theban gates;

A spacious entry, open'd by the fates,

To take destruction in; their turrets stand

Defenceless, and expect the flaming brand.

Now let us snatch th' occasion while we may,

Years waste in vain, and perish by delay,

That Thebes o'erthrown, our tedious toils may cease,

And we behold our native walls in peace.

Tydides thus: the ancient warrior burns:

With indignation just, and thus returns:

O foul! unworthy of th' illustrious line

From which you spring: your fire's reproach and mine!

Did I e'er teach you justice to disclaim;

And steal, by treachery, dishonest fame?

The truce subsists with all the rest; are we

Alone excepted, unengag'd and free?

Why, warriors! do not then these hostile tow'rs,

Against us send at once their martial pow'rs?

And are we safe but that the treaty stands,

And from unequal force protects our bands?

In this our foes confide; the dead they burn,

And mix with tears their ashes in the urn.

Their tow'rs defenceless, and their gates un-

barr'd,

Shall we with wrongs their confidence reward?

No; though each warrior of this num'rous band

Should yield to execute what you command;

Yet would not I, obedient to thy will,

Blot my long labours with a deed so ill.

Whatever hard or dang'rous you propose,

Though old and weak, I shun not, nor oppose:

But what the gods command us to forbear,

The prudent will avoid, the bravest fear.

He said; and to the ground his buckler flung;

On the hard soil the brazen orbit rung:

The rest approving, dropt upon the field

His pond'rous jav'lin, each, and shining shield.

The warlike son of Tydeus straight resign'd,

To dire disorder, all his mighty mind,

And sudden wrath; as when the troubled air,

From kindled lightning shines with fiery glare:

With fury so inflam'd, the hero burn'd,

And frowning to Deiphobus return'd:

I know thee, wretch! and mark thy constant

aim,

To teach the host their leader thus to blame.

Long have I borne your pride, your reverend age,

A guardian's name, suppress'd my kindling rage:

But to protect your insolence, no more
Shall these avail, and screen it as before.

He said; and more his fury to provoke,

Replying thus, the aged warrior spoke:

Vain youth! unmov'd thy angry threats I hear;

When tyrants threaten, slaves alone should fear:

To me is ev'ry servile part unknown,

To glory in a smile, or fear a frown.

Your mighty fire I knew by counsel rul'd;

His fiercest transports sober reason cool'd.

But wild and lawless, like the stormy wind,

The sport of passion, impotent and blind,

The desperate paths of folly you pursue,

And scorn instruction with a lofty brow:

Yet know, proud prince! my purpose I retain,

And see thy threaten'ng eye-balls roll in vain:

Never, obsequious to thy mad command,

Against the foe I lift a hostile hand;

Till, righteously fulfill'd, the trade expires

Which heav'n has witness'd and the sacred fires.

He said; and, by his sharp reproaches stung,

With sudden hand, his lance the hero flung:

Too free the aim; his faithful friend it found,

And open'd in his side a deadly wound:

Stagg'ring he fell; and, on the verge of death,

In words like these resign'd his parting breath:

O Diomed, my son! for thee I fear:

Sure heav'n is angry, and its vengeance near:

For whom the gods distinguish by their hate,

Themselves are made the ministers of fate;

For from their side, the destin'd victims drive

Their friends intent to succour and retrieve.

Ere yet their vengeance falls, the pow'rs invoke,

While uninflicted hangs the fatal stroke;

And rule the transports of your wrath, lest fear

Make found advice a stranger to your ear.

Speaking lie dy'd; his gen'rous spirit fled

To mix with heroes in th' Elysian shade.

Amaz'd, at first, th' Ætolian warriors stood;

No voice, no action, through the wond'ring crowd;

Silent they stood, like rows of forest trees,

When Jove's dread thunder quells the summer

breeze:

But soon on ev'ry side a tumult rose,

Loud as the ocean when a tempest blows:

Disorder wild the mingling ranks confounds,

The voice of sorrow mix'd with angry sounds.

On ev'ry side against the chief appears

A brazen bulwark, rais'd of shields and spears,

Fast closing round. But from his thigh he drew

His shining blade, and on the phalanx slew;

With gesture fierce the threaten'ng steel he wav'd;

But check'd its fury, and the people sav'd:

As the good shepherd spares his tender flock,

And lightens, when he strikes, the falling crook.

The crowd dividing, shunn'd the hero's ire;

As from a lion's rage the swains retire,

When dreadful o'er the mangled prey he stands,

By brandish'd darts unaw'd and flaming brands.

And now the flame of sudden rage suppress'd,

Remorse and sorrow stung the hero's breast.

Distraught through the scattering crowd he went,

And sought the dark recesses of his tent;

He enter'd: but the menial servants, bred

To wait his coming, straight with horror fled.

Against the ground he dash'd his bloody dart;

And utter'd thus the swellings of his heart:

Why fly my warriors? why the menial train,
Who joy'd before to meet me from the plain,
Why shun they now their lord's approach, nor bring,

To wash my bloody hands, the cleansing spring?
Too well, alas! my fatal rage they know,
To them more dreadful now than to the foe;
No enemy, alas! this spear has stain'd,
With hostile gore in glorious battle drain'd:
My guardian's blood it shows, whose hoary hairs
Still watch'd my welfare with a father's cares.
Thou Pow'r supreme! whose unresisted sway
The fates of men and mortal things obey!
If wise and good, why did thy hand impart
So fierce an impulse to this bounding heart?
By fury rul'd, and impotent of mind,
No awe restrains me, and no tie can bind:
Hence, by the madness of my rage o'erthrown,
My father's friend lies murder'd, and my own.
He said; and, yielding to his fierce despair,
With both his hands he rent his rooted hair;
And, where his locks in shining ringlets grew,
A load of ashes from the hearth he threw,
Rolling in dust: but now around the slain
His warriors stood, assembled on the plain;
For total insurrection ripe they stood;
Their angry murmurs rose to tumult loud.

Ulysses soon the dire disorder heard,
And present to explore the cause appear'd:
The hero came, and, 'midst the warriors, found
Deiphobus extended on the ground.
A flood of sorrow started to his eyes,
But soon he check'd each symptom of surprise
With prudent care, while pressing round the chief
Each strove to speak the universal grief:

Their mingled spears in wild disorder shook,
Like the sharp reeds along some winding brook,
When through the leafless woods the north wind
blows,

Parent of ice and thick descending snows:
Now fell revenge had bath'd in streams of blood,
And pow'r in vain her desp'rate course withstood:

But Ithacus, well skill'd in ev'ry art
To fix or change each purpose of the heart,
Their stern decrees by soft persuasion broke,
And answ'ring, thus with prudent purpose spoke:
Warriors! your gen'rous rage approve I must;
Dire was the deed, the purpos'd vengeance just:
But, when the kings in full assembly sit,
To them the crime and punishment commit:
For rash procedure wrongs the fairest cause,
And private justice still insults the laws.
Now to your tents your shields and lances bear:
Theseus expects us, and the hour is near:
The altars flame, the priests in order stand,
With sacrifice, to hallow ev'ry band:
But to the covert of a tent convey,
Sav'd from the scorching winds and solar ray,
These dear remains; till Theseus has decreed
Distinguish'd obsequies to grace the dead.
The hero thus; and from his shoulders threw
The regal cloak of gold, and shining blue,
Which o'er the slain with prudent care he spread,
His ghastly features from the crowd to shade.
Thrice to his eyes a flood of sorrow came;
Thrice on the brink he check'd the gushing stream

In act to flow; his rising sighs suppress;
Patient of grief, he lock'd it in his breast.

BOOK VI.

To sad despair th' Ætolian chief resign'd,
And dire remorse, which stung his tortur'd mind,
From early dawn in dust extended lay,
By all abandon'd till the setting ray.
'Twas then Cassandra came; and, at the door,
Thrice call'd her lord: he started from the floor:
In fullen majesty his chair of state,
Full in the midst oppos'd to the gate,
The hero press'd: the anxious maid drew near,
By love excited, and restrain'd by fear:
Trembling before the chief she stood, and held
A bowl of wine with temp'ring mixtures quell'd;
The fragrant juice which fam'd Thesprotia yields,
The vintage of her cliffs and sunny fields.
And thus: Dread lord! reject not with disdain
A present offer'd by a humble swain.
This bowl receive, of gentle force to charm
Distress, and of its rigour grief disarm.
How vain to grieve for ever for the past!
No hour recalls the actions of the last:
Nor groans, nor sighs, nor streams of sorrow shed,
From their long slumber can awake the dead.
When death's stern pow'r his iron sceptre lays
On the cold lips, the vital spirit strays

To worlds unknown: nor can the dead perceive
The tears of friends or lovers when they grieve.

To sooth his passion, thus the virgin try'd;
With wonder thus th' Ætolian chief reply'd:
Say who you are, who thus approach my seat,
Unaw'd by good Deiphobus's fate?
When all avoid my presence, nor appear,
By indignation banish'd, or by fear.
What is thy name? what deed of mine could bind
To friendship so unchang'd thy constant mind;
Still to survive the horror of a crime,
Whose colour blots the registers of time?

The hero thus: Cassandra thus replies:
Iphicles is my name; my country lies
Where Antirrhium's rocky shores divide,
Extended in the deep th' Ionian tide.
There dwells my sire, possess'd of ample store,
In flocks and herds, and gold's resplendent ore.
Oeneus his name: his vessels on the main,
From rich Hesperia waft him yearly gain,
And that fam'd land, whose promontories run
Far to the west, beneath the setting sun;
Where ev'ry cliff with veins of silver gleams,
And sands of gold lie glitt'ring in the streams.

In Hymen's sacred ties two sons he bred,
 Me, and my valiant brother Lycomed.
 The youngest I, was charg'd his flocks to keep:
 My brother rul'd his galleys on the deep.
 Once as he left Iberia's wealthy shore,
 With Bœtic fleeces fraught and precious ore;
 Phœnician pirates waited on the strand,
 Where high Pachynus stretches from the land;
 In that fam'd isle where Ætna lifts his spires,
 With smoke obscure, and blows his sulph'rous fires.

Behind the cliffs conceal'd, the treach'rous band
 Waited the Greeks, descending on the strand:
 My brother there with twenty youths they slew;
 Their sudden arrows from an ambush flew.
 Dire was the deed: and still my sorrows stream,
 Whene'er that argument of woe I name,
 And grief prevails; but in your presence most;
 You still recal the brother whom I lost:
 For such he was in lineaments of face,
 In martial stature, and majestic grace;
 Though less in all; in form inferior far;
 And still, though valiant, less in works of war.
 Hence, deeply rooted in my constant heart,
 You challenge, as your own, a brother's part:
 And I alone, of all the host, remain
 To share your grief and suffer in your pain.

Thus by an artful tale, the virgin strove
 To shun discov'ry, and conceal her love.
 Yet still her looks, her gestures, all express'd
 The maid; her love in blushes stood confess'd.
 Tydides saw; and quickly, to his thought,
 Each circumstance the fair Cassandra brought.
 Silent he sat; and fix'd in deep surprize,
 Her flushing features mark'd and downcast eyes.
 He thus reply'd: The native truth reveal,
 And, what I ask you, hope not to conceal.
 Or shall I credit what you now have said,
 Oeneus your sire, your brother Lycomed?
 Or art thou she, whose beauty first did move,
 Within my peaceful breast, the rage of love?

With look and voice severe the hero spoke.
 Aw'd and abash'd, the conscious virgin shook;
 She dropt the silver goblet on the ground;
 The fragrant liquor drench'd the pavement round.
 And thus Tydides with a frown address'd:
 Thy art is useless, and the truth confess'd;
 Nor can that fair disguise of martial arms,
 And male attire, conceal thy fatal charms.
 Those eyes I see, whose soft enchantment stole
 My peace, and stir'd a tempest in my soul:
 By their mild sight, in innocence array'd,
 To guilty madness was my heart betray'd.
 Deiphobus is dead; his mournful ghost,
 Lamenting, wanders on the Stygian coast,
 And blames my wrath. Oh! that the sun which gave

Light to thy birth, had set upon thy grave;
 And he had liv'd! now lifeless on the plain
 A corse he lies, and number'd with the slain.

The hero ended thus; with melting eye,
 The virgin turn'd, unable to reply.
 In sorrow graceful, as the queen of love
 Who mourn'd Adonis in the Syrian grove,
 Confounded and abash'd, she left the tent,
 And through the host in silent anguish went,
 Far to the left; where, in a lonely wood,
 To Ceres built, a rural temple stood;

By swains frequented once, but now the place
 Unfightly shrubs o'erspread and weeds disgrace.
 Thither Cassandra went; and at the shrine,
 With suppliant voice address'd the pow'r divine:
 Hear me, dread genius of this sacred grove!
 Let my complaints thy sov'reign pity move;
 To seek the friendly shelter of thy dome,
 With heart unstain'd, and guiltless hands, I come:
 Love is my crime; and, in thy rural seat,
 From infamy I seek a safe retreat.

By blame unmerited, and cold neglect,
 Banish'd I come; receive me, and protect!
 She pray'd; and, ent'reng, gainst a pillar staid
 Her lance, and on the floor her armour laid.
 Then falling prostrate pour'd a flood of tears,
 With present ills oppress'd, and future fears.

'Twas then the herald of the queen of love,
 Zelotypé, descended in the grove,
 By Venus sent; but still her counsels fail'd;
 And Pallas with superior sway prevail'd:
 The phantom enter'd, and assum'd a form,
 Pale as the moon appearing through a storm;
 In Amyclea's shape disguis'd the came;
 The same her aspect, and her voice the same.
 Cassandra saw; a sudden horror froze
 Her veins; erect her parted locks arose,
 Stir'd from the root: impatient thus the maid,
 With trembling lips, in fault'ring accents, said:
 My lov'd, my honour'd parent! have my groans,
 From death's deep slumber, rous'd thy sacred
 bones:

I hop'd that nothing could your peace molest,
 Nor mortal cares disturb eternal rest;
 That, safe for ever on th' Elysian shore,
 You heard of human misery no more.

Cassandra thus: and thus the Paphian maid:
 Your gen'rous love, my child, is ill repaid;
 Your griefs I feel, and bear a parent's part,
 Though blood no more returns to warm my
 heart;

And that, which first your mortal being bred,
 To dust lies mould'ring, in its earthy bed.
 To Calydon, my child, with speed return;
 Your father grieves, your gay companions mourn;
 He deems you lost, and desp'rate of his state,
 By grief subdu'd, invokes his ling'ring fate:
 Incessant tears bedew his wrinkled face,
 And ashes foul his hoary locks disgrace.
 Return, return! nor let misjudging pride,
 With further errors, strive the past to hide.
 Return, once more to bless his aged eyes,
 Or, by your guilty stay a parent dies.

She ended thus. Her arms Cassandra spread
 To fold, in close embrace, the parting shade;
 In vain; for, starting from her grasp, it flew,
 And, gliding through the shady walks, withdrew.

The virgin now awaits the rising morn,
 With purpose fix'd impatient to return:
 And when, through broken clouds, a glimm'ring
 ray

Of early dawn foretold approaching day;
 The spear she grasp'd, and on her temples plac'd
 The golden calque, with various plumage grac'd;
 Tydides' gift; when in the ranks of fight
 The brave Clytander sunk beneath his might.
 The gods she call'd; and, bending to the ground,
 Their aid invoc'd with reverence profound.

Then left the dome ; and where Iſmenus ſtrays,
Winding through thickeſt woods his wat'ry maze,
Her way purſu'd ; a hoſtile band drew near ;
Their tread ſhe heard, and ſaw their armour clear,
Chief of the Theban youth; the herds they drove,
And ſlocks collected from the hills above.
For thus the Paphian goddeſs had betray'd,
To hands of cruel foes, the guiltleſs maid.

By ſudden terror check'd, at firſt the flood ;
Then turn'd, and ſought the covert of the wood ;
Nor ſo eſcap'd : her glitt'ring armour ſhone,
The ſtarry helmet, and the lofty cone,
Full to the glowing eaſt ; its golden rays
Her winding flight betray'd through all its maze.
The Thebans ſaw ; and, ruſhing 'miſt the ſhade
With ſhouts of triumph, ſeiz'd the trembling maid.

Amaz'd and pale, before the hoſtile band,
She ſtood ; and dropp'd the jav'lin from her hand :
O ſpare my life ! ſhe cry'd, nor wealth, nor fame
To purchaſe in the works of war, I came.

No hate to you I bear, or Creon's ſway,
Whoſe ſov'reign will the ſons of Thebes obey :
Me, hapleſs friendſhip hither led, to ſhare,
With Diomed, the dangers of the war.

I now return and quit the martial ſtrife,
My ſire to ſuccour on the verge of life ;
Who cruſh'd beneath a load of ſorrow bends,
And to the grave, with painful ſteps, deſcends.

But if the plea of pity you rejeſt,
The ſtronger ties of equity reſpect :
A truce we ſwore ; Jove witneſſes the deed ;
On him who breaks it, vengeance will ſucceed.

Thus as the virgin ſpoke, Phericles ey'd
The arms ſhe wore ; and ſternly thus reply'd :
Ill-fated wretch ! that panoply to reap :
The ſame my brother once in fight did bear ;
Whom fierce Tydides, with ſuperior might,
O'erthrew and vanquiſh'd in the ranks of fight.

If with his foe my brother's ſpoils you ſhar'd,
A mark of love, or merited reward ;
Prepare to yield them and reſign thy breath ;
To vengeance due : Clytander claims thy death.

Frowning he ſpoke, and drew his ſhining blade ;

Beneath the liſted ſteel, th' unhappy maid
Confounded ſloop'd : Menetius caught the ſtroke
On his broad ſhield ; and, interpoſing, ſpoke :

Brave youth ! reſpect my counſel, and ſuſpend
The ſudden vengeance which you now intend.
The chiefs of Thebes, the rulers of the ſtate,
In full aſſembly, at the Cadmean gate,
A monument for great Leophron rear ;
His name, achievements, and deſcent to bear.

Thither let this devoted youth be led,
An off'ring grateful to the hero's ſhade :
Nor ſhall Clytander leſs the deed approve ;
Or friendly zeal applaud, and feel our love ;
When fame ſhall tell, in Pluto's gloomy reign,
How ſtern Tydides mourns this warrior ſlain.

Thus ignorantly they ; nor knew the peace
Of happy patriots, when their labours ceaſe ;
That fell revenge and life conſuming hate
Find no admittance to moleſt their ſtate.

And now they led the captive croſs the plain ;
Scarce could her trembling knees their load ſuſ-
tain ;

Thrice had her fault'ring tongue her ſex reveal'd,
But conſcious ſhame oppos'd it and conceal'd.
Their monarch at the Cadmean gate they found,
In mournful ſtate, with all his peers around.

Oblations to Leophron's mighty ſhade,
In honey, milk, and fragrant wines they paid.
And thus Lycaon's ſon addreſs'd the king :
A grateful off'ring to your rites we bring.

This youth, the friend of Diomed, we found
Clad in the armour which Clytander own'd ;
My brother's ſpoils, by Diomed poſſeſs'd,
When his keen jav'lin pierc'd the hero's breaſt.

Soon had my rage the hoſtile deed repaid,
With vengeance grateful to his kindred ſhade ;
But public griefs the firſt atonements claim,
And heroes of a more diſtinguiſh'd name.

Leophron, once his country's pride and boaſt ;
Andremon too, the bulwark of the hoſt,
His blood demands ; for when their ſouls ſhall know

The ſweet revenge, in Pluto's ſhades below,
Pleas'd with our zeal, will each illuſtrious gholt,
With lighter footſteps, preſs th' Elyſian coaſt.

He ſpoke ; the princes all at once incline ;
The reſt, with ſhouts, applaud the dire deſign.
An altar ſoon of flow'ry turf they raiſe :
On ev'ry ſide the ſacred torches blaze :

The bowls, in ſhining order, plac'd around ;
The fatal knife was whetted for the wound.
Decreed to periſh, ſtood the helpleſs fair ;
Like ſome ſoft fawn, when, in the hunter's ſnare
Involv'd, the fees him from his feat ariſe,
His brandiſh'd truncheon dreads, and hears his cries ;

Silent ſhe ſtands, to barb'rous force reſign'd,
In anguiſh ſoft, diſſolv'd her tender mind.
The prieſts in order ev'ry rite prepar'd ;
Her neck and boſom, for the blow, they bar'd ;
The helmet looſ'd, the buckled mail unbound,
Whoſe ſhining circles ſenc'd her neck around.

Down ſunk the fair diſguis'd ; and full to fight
The virgin ſtood, with charms divinely bright.
The comely ringlets of her flowing hair,
Such as the wood-nymphs wear, and naiads
fair,

Hung looſe ; her middle by a zone embrac'd,
Which fix'd the floating garment round her waſt,
Venus herſelf divine effulgence ſhod
O'er all her ſtature, and her lovely head ;
Such as in ſpring the colour'd bloſſoms ſhow,
When on their op'ning leaves the zephyrs blow :

Amazement ſeiz'd the chiefs ; and all around,
With murmurs mix'd the wond'ring crowds re-
found.

Moſt vote to ſpare : the angry monarch cries :
Ye miniſters, proceed ! the captive dies.
Shall any here, by weak compaſſion mov'd,
A captive ſpare by ſtern Tydides lov'd ?
The ſcourge of Thebes, whoſe wide-deſtroying
hand

Has thinn'd our armies in their native land,
And ſlain my ſon : by all the gods I ſwear,
Whoſe names, to cite in vain, the nations fear,
That none he loves, ſhall ever ſcape my rage :

The vulgar plea I ſcorn, of ſex, or age.
Ev'n ſhe, who now appears with ev'ry grace
Adorn'd, each charm of ſtature and of face ;

Ev'n though from Venus she could claim the prize,
Her life to vengeance forfeited, she dies.

Sternly the monarch ended. All were still,
With mute submission to the sov'reign will:
Lycaon's valiant son except; alone
His gen'rous ardour thus oppos'd the throne:
Dread sov'reign! listen with a patient ear,
And what I now shall offer, deign to hear.
When first by force we seiz'd this captive maid,
The truce was violat'd, our faith betray'd;
And justice, which, in war and peace, prevails
Alike, and weighs their deeds with equal scales,
Her freedom claims, with presents to atone
For what our rage perfidiously has done:
Let us not, now, to further wrongs proceed;
But fear the curse for perjury decreed.

Phericles thus: and, with a stern regard,
His indignation thus the king declar'd:
Vain giddy youth! forbear, with factious breath,
To rouse my justice to pronounce thy death:
In opposition, first of all you move,
While others hear in silence, and approve.
Your bold presumption check, and learn to dread
My vengeance thunder'd on your wretched head.

Frowning he ended thus: his threats defy'd,
With gen'rous heat Phericles thus reply'd:
Princes! attend, and trust my words sincere;
The king I honour, and his will revere,
When truth gives sanction to his just commands,
Nor common right in opposition stands:
Yet gen'rous minds a principle retain,
Which promises and threats attempt in vain,
Which claims dominion, by the gods imprest,
The love of justice in the human breast:
By this inspir'd, against superior might,
I rise undaunted in the cause of right.
And now, by all th' avenging gods I swear,
Whose names, to cite in vain, the nations fear;
'That no bold warrior of the Theban bands,
'This maid shall violate with hostile hands;
While these my arms have force the lance to wield,

And lift in her defence this pond'rous shield,
Not ev'n the king himself, whose sov'reign sway
'The martial sons of sacred Thebes obey.

He said: and, by his bold example fir'd,
Twelve warriors rose, with equal zeal inspir'd.
With shining steel the altar they surround,
The fire now flaming, and the victim crown'd.
On ev'ry side in wild disorder move
The thick compacted crowds; as when a grove,
Rock'd by a sudden whirlwind, bends and strains,
From right to left, along the woodland plains:
Fell discord soon had rag'd, in civil blood,
With wide destruction not to be withstood;
For from his seat the angry monarch sprung,
And lifted, for the blow, the sceptre hung:
But 'midst the tumult, Clytophon appear'd,
Approv'd for wisdom, and with rev'rence heard.
Straight, by the robe, the furious chief he seiz'd,
And thus, with sage advice, his wrath appeas'd:
Hear, mighty prince! respect the words of age,
And calm the wasteful tempest of thy rage;
The public welfare to revenge prefer,
For nations suffer when their sov'reigns err.
It ill becomes us now, when hostile pow'rs
With strictest siege invest our straiten'd tow'rs;

It ill becomes us thus, thus with civil arms,
To wound the state, and aggravate our harms.
Hear, all ye princes! what to me appears
A prudent counsel, worthy of your ears:
Let us inquire, if in our hands we hold
A life esteem'd by Dioned the bold:
If, in his charms, those tender passions reign,
Which charms like these must kindle and maintain;

Our mandates freely to his tent we send,
For to our will his haughty soul must bend:
Nor dares he, while the Theban walls enclose
A pledge so dear, invade us or oppose;
But must submit, whenever we require,
Or with his pow'rs to aid us, or retire.

He said; the monarch painfully suppress'd
His burning rage, and lock'd it in his breast.
He thus reply'd: Thy prudent words inspire
Pacific counsels, and subdue mine ire:
But if in peace I rul'd the Theban state,
Nor hostile armies thunder'd at my gate;
They had not dar'd, with insolence and spite,
My purpose to oppose and scorn my might.
He said, and to his feat again retir'd;
While sudden transport ev'ry breast inspir'd;
As swains rejoice, when, from the troubled skies,
By breezes swept, a gather'd tempest flies;
With wish'd return the sun exerts his beams,
To cheer the woods and gild the shining streams.

Meanwhile, the son of Tydeus, through the
plain,
With wishing eyes, Cassandra fought in vain;
At ev'ry leader of the bands inquir'd;
Then, sad and hopeless, to his tent retir'd.
'Twas then his grief the bounds of silence broke,
And thus in secret to himself he spoke:
Me sure, of all mens sons, the gods have curs'd
With their chief plagues, the greatest and the worst;

Doom'd to disasters, from my earliest hour;
Not wise to shun, nor patient to endure.
From me the source, unnumber'd ills proceed
To all my friends; Dēiphobus is dead!
His soul excluded, seeks the nether skies,
And wrong'd Cassandra from my presence flies.
Me surely, at my birth, the gods design'd
Their rod of wrath, to scourge the human kind;
For slaughter form'd, with brutal fury brave,
Prompt to destroy, but impotent to save.
How could my madness blame thee, gen'rous
maid!

And, with my crime, thy innocence upbraid!
Dēiphobus is fall'n! but not by thee;
Thy only fault, alas! was love to me:
For this, in plated steel thy limbs were dress'd,
A weighty shield thy tender arm oppress'd:
For this thou didst to hostile fields repair,
And court such objects as distract the fair;
Patient above thy sex! an ill reward,
Blame and unjust reproach, was all you shar'd.
By my unkindness banish'd, now you roam,
And seek, through paths unknown, your distant
home:

To mountain wolves expos'd, a helpless prey,
And men unjust, more terrible than they.
Save her, ye gods! and let me stand the aim
Of Jove's all-dreaded bolt, and scorching flame.

hus plain'd the hero till the setting ray
 W'hdrew, and ev'ning shades expell'd the day;
 Th'n in his tent, before his lofty feat,
 Appear'd a herald from the Theban state;
 The hero's knees, with trembling hands, he

press'd,
 And with his message thus the chief address'd:
 Hear, mighty prince! the tidings which I bring,
 From Thebes assembled, and the Theban king.

An armed warrior of your native train,
 At early dawn, was seiz'd upon the plain.
 What others did, forgive, if I relate;

Creon commands me and the Theban state.
 A fairer youth, in martial arms, ne'er came
 To court bright honour in the fields of fame.

A casque of polish'd steel his temples press'd;
 The golden cone with various plumage dress'd;
 A silver mail embrac'd his body round,
 And greaves of brass his slender ancles bound:

To Thebes well known the panoply he wore,
 The same, which once, renown'd Clytander bore.
 Our warriors dragg'd him to the Cadmean gate,

Where Creon, with the rulers of the state,
 Assembled sat; the trembling captive stood,
 With arms surrounded, and th' insulting crowd.

O spare my life! he cry'd, nor wealth nor fame
 To purchase in the works of war, I came.

No hate to you, I bear, or Creon's sway,
 Whose fov'reign will the sons of Thebes obey.
 Me luckless friendship hither led, to share,
 With Diomed, the dangers of the war.

I now return, and quit the martial strife,
 My sire to succour on the verge of life,
 Whose feeble age the present aid demands,
 And kind assistance of my filial hands.

His words inclin'd the wisest and the best,
 And some their gen'rous sympathy express'd:
 But others, nothing mov'd, his guiltless head
 With threats demanded, to avenge the dead:

And thus the king: My countrymen, attend!
 In this, let all your loud contention end:
 If Diomed, to save this valu'd life,
 The field abandons and the martial strife;

The captive safe, with presents, I'll restore,
 Of brass, and steel, and gold's refugent ore:
 But if these terms the haughty chief shall slight,
 And for the Argives still exert his might;

Before our heroes' tombs, this youth shall bleed,
 To please the living, and avenge the dead.
 His sentence all approv'd; and to your ear,
 As public herald, I the message bear;

And must your answer crave, without delay;
 Creon and Thebes already blame my stay.

Thus as he spoke, contending passions strove,
 With force oppos'd, the hero's soul to move;
 As shifting winds impel the ocean's tide,
 And sway the reeling waves from side to side:

Rage dictated revenge; but tender fear,
 From love and pity, warn'd him to forbear:
 Till, like a lion, fiercer from his pain,
 These words broke forth in wrath and high disdain:

Go, tell your tyrant, that he tempts a soul,
 Which presents cannot win, nor threats controul:
 Not form'd, like his, to mock at ev'ry tie;
 With perjury to sport, and heav'n defy.

A common league the Argive warriors swore,
 And seal'd the sacred tie with wine and gore:

My faith was plighted then, and ne'er shall fail,
 Nor Creon's arts, to change me, aught avail.
 But tell him loud, that all the host may hear,
 And Thebes through all her warriors learn to fear;
 If any, from himself, or by command,
 The captive violates with hostile hand;
 That all shall quickly rue the guilty deed,
 When, to requite it, multitudes shall bleed.

Sternly the hero ended, and resign'd,
 To fierce disorder, all his mighty mind.
 Already in his thoughts, with vengeful hands,
 He dealt destruction 'midst the Theban bands;
 In fancy saw the tottering turrets fall,
 And led his warriors o'er the levell'd wall.
 Rous'd with the thought, from his high feat he sprung:

 And grasp'd the sword, which on a column hung;
 The shining blade he balanc'd thrice in air;
 His lances next he view'd and armour fair.

When, hanging 'midst the costly panoply,
 A scarf embroider'd met the hero's eye,
 Which fair Cassandra's skilful hands had wrought;

A present for her lord, in secret brought,
 That day, when first he led his martial train
 In arms to combat on the Theban plain.

As some strong charm, which magic founts compose,
 Suspends a downward torrent as it flows;

Checks in the precipice its headlong course,
 And calls it trembling upwards to its source:
 Such seem'd the robe, which, to the hero's eyes,
 Made the fair artiff in her charms to rise.

His rage, suspended in its full career,
 To love resigns, to grief and tender fear.
 Glad would he now his former words revoke,
 And change the purpose which in wrath he spoke;

 From hostile hands his captive fair to gain,
 From fate to save her, or the servile chain:

But pride, and shame, the fond design suppress;
 Silent he stood, and lock'd it in his breast.
 Yet had the wary Theban well divin'd,
 By symptoms sure, each motion of his mind:

With joy he saw the heat of rage suppress'd;
 And thus again his artful words address'd:
 Illustrious prince! with patience bend thine ear,
 And what I now shall offer, deign to hear.

Of all the griefs, distressful mortals prove,
 The woes of friendship most my pity move.
 You much I pity, and the youth regret,
 Whom you too rigidly resign to fate;

Expos'd, alone, no hope of comfort near,
 The scorn and cruelty of foes to bear.
 O that my timely counsel might avail,
 For love, and sympathy, to turn the scale!

That Thebes releas'd from thy devouring sword,
 The captive honour'd, and with gifts restor'd,
 We yet might hope for peace, and you again
 Enjoy the blessings of your native reign.

Infatuating thus, the herald try'd
 His aim to compass, and the chief reply'd:
 In vain you strive to sway my constant mind;

I'll not depart while Theseus stays behind:
 Me nothing e'er, to change my faith, shall move,
 By men attested, and the gods above:

But since your lawless tyrant has detain'd
 A valu'd hostage, treacherously gain'd;

And dire injustice only will restore
 When force compels, or proffer'd gifts implore :
 A truce I grant, till the revolving sun,
 Twice ten full circuits of his journey run,
 From the red ocean, points the morning ray,
 And on the steps of darkness pours the day :
 Till then, from fight and council I abstain,
 Nor lead my pow'rs to combat on the plain :
 For this, your monarch to my tent shall send
 The captive, and from injuries defend.
 This proffer is my last ; in vain will prove
 All your attempts my fixed mind to move :
 If Thebes accepts it, let a sign declare,
 A flaming torch, display'd aloft in air,
 From that high tow'r, whose airy top is known
 By travellers from afar, and marks the town ;
 The fane of Jove : but if they shall reject
 The terms I send, nor equity respect,
 They soon shall feel the fury of mine ire,
 In wasteful havoc, and the rage of fire.

The hero thus ; and round his shoulders flung
 A shaggy cloak, with vulgar trappings hung ;
 And on his head a leathern helmet plac'd,
 A boar's rough front with grisly terrors grac'd ;
 A spear he next assum'd, and pond'rous shield,
 And led the Theban, issuing to the field.
 Amid surrounding guards they pass'd unseen.
 For night had stretch'd her friendly shade between ;
 Till nearer, through the gloom, the gate they Knew ;
 The herald enter'd, and the chief withdrew :
 But turning oft to Thebes his eager eyes,
 The signal on the tow'r at last he spies ;
 A flaming torch upon the top expos'd,
 Its ray at once his troubled mind compos'd ;
 Such joy he felt, as when a watch-tow'r's light,
 Seen through the gloom of some tempestuous
 Night,
 Glads the wet mariner, a star to guide
 His lab'ring vessel, through the stormy tide.

BOOK VII.

Now silent night the middle space possess
 Of heaven, or journey'd downwards to the west :
 But Creon, still with thirst of vengeance fir'd,
 Repose declin'd, nor from his toils respir'd ;
 But held his peers in council to debate
 Plans for revenge suggested by his hate.
 Before the king Diences appear'd ;
 To speak his tidings sad the hero fear'd ;
 Return'd from Oeta, thither sent to call
 Alcides to protect his native wall.

And Creon thus : Diences ! explain
 Your sorrow ; are our hopes of aid in vain ?
 Does Hercules neglect his native soil ;
 While strangers reap the harvest of his toil ?
 We from your silence cannot hope success ;
 But further ills your falling tears confess ;
 Cleon my son is dead ; his fate you mourn ;
 I must not hope to see his fate return.
 Sure if he liv'd he had not come the last ;
 But found his father with a filial haite.
 His fate, at once, declare, you need not fear,
 With any tale of grief to wound mine ear,
 Proof to misfortune : for the man who knows
 The whole variety of human woes
 Can stand unmov'd though loads of sorrow press ;
 Practis'd to bear, familiar with distress.

The monarch question'd thus ; and thus the youth :

Too well thy boding fear has found the truth.
 Cleon is dead ; the hero's ashes lie
 Where Pelion's lofty head ascends the sky,
 For as, on Oeta's top, he vainly strove
 To win the arrows of the son of Jove ;
 Compelling Philoctetes, to resign,
 The friend of Hercules, his arms divine ;
 The insult to repel, an arrow flew,
 And from his heart the vital current drew :
 Prostrate he sunk ; and welling from the wound,
 A flood of gore impurpled all the ground.

Thus spoke Diences. The king suppress
 His big distress, and lock'd it in his breast :
 Sighing he thus reply'd : The cause declare,
 Which holds the great Alcides from the war ;
 And why another now, the bow commands
 And arrows sacred, from his mighty hands.
 Nor fear my valiant son's untimely fate,
 With all its weight of sorrow, to relate :
 All I can bear. Against my naked head,
 I see the vengeance of the gods decreed ;
 With hostile arms beset my tottering reign ;
 The people wasted, and my children slain.
 Attempts prove fruitless ; ev'ry hope deceives ;
 Success in prospect disappointment gives ;
 With swift approach, I see destruction come ;
 But with a mind unmov'd, I'll meet my doom ;
 Nor stain this war-worn visage with a tear,
 Since all that Heav'n has purpos'd, I can bear.
 The monarch thus his rising grief suppress'd ;
 And thus the peers Diences address'd :

Princes of Thebes ! and thou, whose sov'reign
 hand
 Sways the dread sceptre of supreme command :
 To what I offer, lend an equal ear ;
 The truth I'll speak, and judge me when you hear.
 If Cleon, by my fault, no more returns,
 For whom, her second hope, his country mourns ;
 No doom I deprecate, no torture fly,
 Which justice can denounce, or rage supply :
 But if my innocence appears, I claim
 Your censure to escape, and public blame.

From Marathon by night our course we steer'd,
 And pass'd Gerasus when the day appear'd ;
 Andros we saw, with promontories steep,
 Ascend ; and Delos level with the deep.
 A circuit wide ; for where Euripus roars
 Between Eubœa and the Theban shores,
 The Argives had dispos'd their naval train ;
 And prudence taught to slun the hostile plain,

Four days we sail'd; the fifth our voyage ends,
 Where Oeta, sloping to the sea, descends.
 The vales I search'd, and woody heights above,
 Guided by fame, to find the son of Jove,
 With Cleon only; for we charg'd the band
 To stay, and guard our vessel on the strand.
 In vain we search'd: but when the lamp of day
 Approach'd the ocean with its setting ray,
 A cave appear'd, which from a mountain steep,
 Through a low valley, look'd into the deep.
 Thither we turn'd our weary steps, and found
 The cavern hung with savage spoils around;
 The wolf's gray fur, the wild boar's shaggy hide,
 The lion's mane, the panther's speckled pride:
 These signs we mark'd; and knew the rocky feat,
 Some solitary hunter's wild retreat.
 Farther invited by a glimm'ring ray,
 Which through the darkness shed uncertain day,
 In the recesses of the cave we found
 The club of Hercules; and wrapt around,
 Which, seen before, we knew, the lion's spoils,
 The mantle which he wore in all his toils.
 Amaz'd we stood; in silence, each his mind
 To fear and hope alternately relin'd:
 With joy we hop'd to find the hero near;
 The club and mantle found, dispos'd to fear.
 His force invincible in fight we knew,
 Which nought of mortal kind could e'er subdue.
 But fear'd Apollo's might, or his who waves
 The solid earth, and rules the stormy waves.
 Pondering we stood, when on the roof above,
 The tread of feet descending through the grove
 Which crown'd the hollow cliff, amaz'd we heard;
 And straight before the cave a youth appear'd.
 A bleeding buck across his shoulders slung,
 Ty'd with a rope of twisted rushes hung.
 He dropt his burden in the gate, and plac'd
 Against the pillar'd cliff his bow unbrac'd.
 'Twas then our footsteps in the cave he heard,
 And through the gloom our shining arms appear'd.
 His bow he bent; and backwards from the rock
 Retir'd, and, of our purpose quest'ning, spoke:
 Say who you are, who seek this wild abode,
 Through desert paths, by mortals rarely trod?
 If just, and with a fair intent you come,
 Friendship expect, and safety in my dome:
 But if for violence, your danger learn,
 And trust my admonition when I warn:
 Certain as fate, where'er this arrow flies,
 The hapless wretch who meets its fury dies:
 No buckler to resist its point avails,
 The hammer'd cuirass yields, the breast-plate fails;
 And where it once has drawn the purple gore,
 No charm can cure, no medicine health restore.
 With threats he question'd thus; and Cleon said
 We come to call Alcides to our aid;
 By us the senators of Thebes entreat
 The hero to protect his native state:
 For hostile arms invest the Theban tow'rs;
 Famine within, without the sword devours.
 If you have learn'd where Hercules remains,
 In mountain caves, or hamlets on the plains,
 Our way direct; for, led by gen'ral fame,
 To find him in these desert wilds we came.
 He spoke: and Philoctetes thus again:
 May Jove for Thebes some other aid ordain;
 For Hercules no more exerts his might
 Against oppressive force, for injur'd right:

Retir'd, among the gods, he sits serene,
 And views, beneath him far, this mortal scene:
 But enter now this grotto, and partake
 What I can offer for the hero's sake:
 With you from sacred Thebes he claim'd his birth,
 For godlike virtue fam'd through all the earth;
 Thebes therefore and her people still shall be
 Like fair Trachines and her sons to me.
 Enter, for now the doubtful twilight fails,
 And o'er the silent earth the night prevails:
 From the moist valleys noxious fogs arise,
 To wrap the rocky heights, and shade the skies.
 The cave we enter'd, and his bounty shar'd;
 A rural banquet by himself prepar'd.
 But soon the rage of thirst and hunger staid,
 My mind still doubtful, to the youth I said:
 Must hapless Thebes, despairing and undone,
 Want the assistance of her bravest son?
 The hero's fate explain, nor grudge mine ear
 The sad assurance of our loss to hear.
 I question'd thus. The youth with horror pale
 Attempted to recite an awful tale;
 Above the fabled woes which bards rehearse,
 When sad Melpomene inspires the verse.
 The wife of Jove (Pæonides reply'd)
 All arts in vain to crush the hero try'd;
 For brighter from her hate his virtue burn'd;
 And disappointed still, the goddess mourn'd.
 His ruin to effect at last the stroke
 By jealousy, the rage of injur'd love.
 The bane to Deianira's breast convey'd,
 Who, as a rival, fear'd th' Oechalian maid.
 The goddess knew, that jealous of her lord,
 A robe she kept with latent poisons stor'd;
 The Centaur's gift, bequeath'd her, to reclaim
 The hero's love, and light his dying flame;
 If e'er, devoted to a stranger's charms,
 He stray'd inconsistent from her widow'd arms;
 But giv'n with treacherous intent to prove
 The death of nature, not the life of love.
 Mad from her jealousy, the charm she try'd;
 His love to change, the deadly robe apply'd:
 And guiltless of the present which he bore,
 Lychas convey'd it to Ceneus's shore:
 Where to the pow'rs immortal for their aid,
 A grateful hecatomb the hero paid:
 When favour'd from above, his arm o'erthrew
 The proud Eurytus, and his warriors flew.
 The venom'd robe the hero took, nor fear'd
 A gift by conjugal respects to endear'd:
 And straight relin'd the lion's shaggy spoils,
 The mantle which he wore in all his toils.
 No sign of harm the fatal present show'd,
 Till rous'd by heat its secret venom glow'd;
 Straight on the flesh it seiz'd like stiffeft glue,
 And scorching deep to ev'ry member grew.
 Then tearing with his hands th' infernal snare,
 His skin he rent, and laid the muscles bare,
 While streams of blood descending from the wound,
 Mix'd with the gore of victims on the ground.
 The guiltless Lychas, in his furious mood,
 He seiz'd, as trembling by his side he stood:
 Him by the slender ancle snatch'd, he swung,
 And 'gainst a rocky promontory flung:
 Which, from the dire event, his name retains;
 Through his white locks impurpl'd rush the brains;
 Aw'd by the deed, his desperate rage to stun,
 Our bold companions from his presence run.

I too, conceal'd behind a rock, remain'd;
 My love and sympathy by fear restrain'd:
 For furious 'midst the sacred fires he flew;
 The victims scatter'd, and the hearths o'erthrew.
 Then sinking prostrate, where a tide of gore
 From oxen slain had blacken'd all the shore,
 His form divine he roll'd in dust and blood;
 His groans the hills re-echo'd and the flood.
 Then rising furious, to the ocean's streams
 He rush'd, in hope to quench his raging flames;
 But burning still the unextinguish'd pain,
 The shore he left, and stretch'd into the main.
 A galley anchor'd near the beach we found;
 Her curled canvass to the breeze unbound;
 And trac'd his desolate course, till far before
 We saw him land on Oeta's desert shore.
 Towards the skies his furious hands he rear'd,
 And thus, across the deep his voice we heard:
 Sov'reign of heav'n and earth! whose boundless sway

The fates of men and mortal things obey!
 If e'er delighted from the courts above,
 In human form, you sought Alcmena's love;
 If fame's unchanging voice to all the earth,
 With truth, proclaims you author of my birth;
 Whence from a course of spotless glory run,
 Successful toils and wreaths of triumph won,
 Am I thus wretched? better, that before
 Some monster fierce had drunk my streaming
 gore;

Or crush'd by Cacus, foe to gods and men,
 My batter'd brains had strew'd his rocky den:
 Than from my glorious toils and triumphs past,
 To fall subdu'd by female arts at last.
 O cool my boiling blood, ye winds, that blow
 From mountains loaded with eternal snow,
 And crack the icy cliffs; in vain! in vain!
 Your rigour cannot quench my aching pain!
 For round this heart the furies wave their brands,
 And wring my entrails with their burning hands.
 Now bending from the skies, O wife of Jove!
 Enjoy the vengeance of thy injur'd love:
 For fate, by me, the thund'rer's guilt atones;
 And, punish'd in her son, Alcmena groans:
 The object of your hate shall soon expire;
 Fix'd on my shoulders preys a net of fire:
 Whom nor the toils nor dangers could subdue,
 By false Eurystheus dictated from you;
 Nor tyrants lawless, nor the monstrous brood,
 Which haunts the desert or infests the flood,
 Nor Greece, nor all the barb'rous climes that lie
 Where Phœbus ever points his golden eye;
 A woman hath o'erthrown! ye gods! I yield
 To female arts, unconquer'd in the field.
 My arms—alas! are these the same that bow'd
 Anteus, and his giant force subdu'd?
 That dragg'd Nemca's monster from his den;
 And slew the dragon in his native fen?
 Alas, alas! their mighty muscles fail,
 While pains infernal ev'ry nerve assail:
 Alas, alas! I feel in streams of woe
 These eyes dissolv'd, before untaught to flow.
 Awake my virtue, oft in dangers try'd,
 Patient in toils, in deaths unterrify'd,
 Rouse to my aid; nor let my labours pass,
 With fame achiev'd, be blotted by the last;
 Firm and unmov'd, the present shock endure;
 Once triumph, and for ever rest secure.

The hero thus; and grasp'd a pointed rock
 With both his arms, which straight in pieces broke,
 Crush'd in his agony; then on his breast
 Descending prostrate, further plaint suppress.
 And now the clouds, in dusky volumes spread,
 Had darken'd all the mountains with their shade:
 The winds withhold their breath; the billows rest;
 The sky's dark image on the deep imprest.
 A bay for shelter opening in the strand,
 We saw, and steer'd our vessel to the land.
 Then mounting on the rocky beach above,
 Through the thick gloom descri'd the son of Jove.
 His head, declin'd between his hands, he lean'd;
 His elbows on his bended knees sustain'd.
 Above him still a hov'ring vapour flew,
 Which, from his boiling veins, the garment drew.
 Through the thick woof we saw the fumes aspire;
 Like smoke of victims from the sacred fire.
 Compassion's keenest touch my bosom thrill'd;
 My eyes, a flood of melting sorrow fill'd:
 Doubtful I stood: and, pond'ring in my mind,
 By fear and pity variously inclin'd,
 Whether to shun the hero, or essay,
 With friendly words, his torment to allay:
 When bursting from above with hideous glare,
 A flood of lightning kindled all the air.
 From Oeta's top it rush'd in sudden streams;
 The ocean redder'd at its fiery beams.
 Then, bellowing deep, the thunder's awful sound,
 Shook the firm mountains and the shores around.
 Far to the east it roll'd, a length of sky;
 We heard Eubœa's rattling cliffs reply,
 As at his master's voice a swain appears,
 When wak'd from sleep his early call he hears,
 The hero rose; and to the mountain turn'd,
 Whose cloud-involved top with lightning burn'd.
 And thus his fire address'd: With patient mind,
 Thy call I hear, obedient and resign'd;
 Faithful and true the oracle! which spoke,
 In high Dodona, from the sacred oak;
 "That twenty years of painful labours past,
 "On Oeta's top I should repose at last:"
 Before, involv'd, the meaning lay conceal'd;
 But now I find it in my fate reveal'd.
 Thy sov'reign will I blame not, which denies,
 With length of days to crown my victories:
 Though still with danger and distress engag'd,
 For injur'd right eternal war I wag'd;
 A life of pain, in barb'rous climates led,
 The heav'n's my canopy, a rock my bed:
 More joy I've felt than delicacy knows,
 Or all the pride of regal pomp bestows.
 Dread fire! thy will I honour and revere,
 And own thy love with gratitude sincere, [boast
 Which watch'd me in my toils, that none could
 To raise a trophy from my glory lost:
 And though at last, by female arts, overcome,
 And unsuspected fraud, I find my doom;
 There to have fail'd, my honour ne'er can shake,
 Where vice is only strong and virtue weak.
 He said: and turning to the cloudy height,
 The feat of thunder, wrapt in sable night,
 Firm and undaunted trod the steep ascent;
 An earthquake rock'd the mountain as he went.
 Back from the shaking shores retir'd the flood;
 In horror lost, my bold companions stood,
 To speech or motion; but the present pow'r
 Of love inspir'd me, in that awful hour;

With trembling steps I trac'd the son of Jove;
 And saw him darkly on the steep above, [noise
 Through the thick gloom, the thunder's awful
 Ceas'd; and I call'd him thus with feeble voice;
 O son of mighty Jove! thy friend await;
 Who comes to comfort thee, or share thy fate:
 In ev'ry danger and distress before,
 His part your faithful Philoëtes bore.
 O let me still attend you, and receive
 The comfort which a present friend can give,
 Who come obsequious for your last commands,
 And tenders to your need his willing hands.

My voice he heard; and from the mountains
 Saw me ascending on the steep below. [brow
 To favour my approach his steps he stay'd;
 And pleas'd, amidst his anguish smiling, said:
 Approach, my Philoëtes! Oft I've known
 Your friendly zeal in former labours shown:
 The present, more than all, your love proclaims,
 Which braves the thunderer's bolts and volley'd flames;

With daring step the rocking earthquake treads,
 While the firm mountains shake their trembling heads.

As my last gift, these arrows with the bow,
 Accept the greatest which I can bestow;
 My glory, all my wealth; of pow'r to raise
 Your name to honour and immortal praise;
 If for wrong'd innocence your shafts shall fly,
 As Jove by signs directs them from the sky.

Straight from his mighty shoulders, as he spoke,
 He loos'd and lodg'd them in a cavern'd rock;
 To lie untouch'd, till future care had drain'd
 Their poison from the venom'd robe retain'd.
 And thus again: the only aid I need,
 For all my favours past, the only need,
 Is, that, with vengeful hand, you fix a dart
 In cruel Deianira's faithless heart:
 Her treach'rous messenger already dead,
 Let her, the author of his crime, succeed.
 This awful scene forsake without delay;
 In vain to mingle with my fate you stay:
 No kind assistance can my state retrieve,
 Nor any friend attend me, and survive.

The hero thus his tender care express'd,
 And spread his arms to clasp me to his breast;
 But soon withdrew them, least his tainted veins
 Infection had convey'd and mortal pains:
 Silent I stood in dreams of sorrow drown'd,
 Till from my heart these words a passage found:
 O bid me not forsake thee, nor impose
 What wretched Philoëtes must refuse.
 By him I swear, whose presence now proclaim
 The thunders awful voice and forked flame,
 Beneath whose steps the trembling desert quakes,
 And earth affrighted to her centre shakes;
 I never will forsake thee, but remain
 While struggling life these ruin'd limbs retain:
 No form of fate shall drive me from thy side,
 Nor death with all its terrors e'er divide;
 Tho' the same stroke our mortal lives should end,
 One flash consume us, and our ashes blend.

I spoke; and to the cloudy steep we turn'd;
 Along its brow the kindled forest burn'd.
 The savage brood, descending to the plains,
 The scatter'd flocks, and dread distracted swains,
 Rush'd from the shaking cliffs: we saw them come,
 In wild disorder mingled, through the gloom.

And now appear'd the desert's lofty head,
 A narrow rock with forests thinly spread.
 His mighty hands display'd aloft in air,
 To Jove the hero thus address'd a pray'r: [skies,
 Hear me, dread pow'r! whose nod controls the
 At whose command the winged lightning flies:
 Almighty fire; if yet you deign to own
 Alcmena's wretched offspring as your son;
 Some comfort in my agony impart,
 And bid thy forked thunder rend this heart:
 Round my devoted head it idly plays;
 And aids the fire, which wastes me with its rays:
 By heat inflam'd, this robe exerts its pow'r,
 My scorched limbs to shrivel and devour;
 Upon my shoulders, like a dragon, clings,
 And fixes in my flesh a thousand stings.
 Great fire! in pity to my suit attend,
 And with a sudden stroke my being end.

As thus the hero pray'd, the lightning ceas'd,
 And thicker darkness all the hill embrac'd.
 He saw his suit deny'd: in fierce despair,
 The rooted pines he tore, and cedars fair;
 And from the crannies of the rifted rocks,
 Twisted with force immense the flinty oaks.
 Of these upon the cliff a heap he laid,
 And thus address'd me, as I stood dismay'd:
 Behold, my friend! the ruler of the skies,
 In agony invok'd, my suit denies;
 But sure the oracle inspir'd from heaven,
 Which in Dodona's sacred grove was given,
 The truth declar'd; "that now my toils shall cease,
 " And all my painful labours end in peace:
 Peace, death can only bring: the raging smart,
 Wrapt with my vitals, mocks each healing art.
 Not all the plants that clothe the verdant field,
 Not all the health a thousand mountains yield,
 Which on their tops the sage physician finds,
 Or digging from the veins of flinty umbels,
 This fire can quench. And therefore, to obey
 My last commands, prepare without delay.
 When on this pile you see my limbs compos'd,
 Shrink not, but bear what must not be oppos'd;
 Approach, and, with an unrelenting hand,
 Fix in the boughs beneath, a flaming brand.
 I must not longer trust this madding pain,
 Lest some rash deed should all my glory stain.
 Lychas I slew upon the Cœnian shore,
 Who knew not, sure, the fatal gift he bore:
 His guilt had taught him else to fly, nor wait,
 Till from my rage he found a sudden fate.
 I will not Deianira's action blame;
 Let heav'n decide which only knows her aim:
 Whether from hate with treacherous intent,
 This fatal garment to her lord she sent;
 Or, by the cunning of a foe betray'd,
 His vengeance thus imprudently convey'd.
 If this, or that, I urge not my command,
 Nor claim her fate from thy avenging hand:
 To lodge my lifeless bones is all I crave,
 Safe and uninjur'd in the peaceful grave.
 This with a hollow voice and alter'd look,
 In agony extreme, the hero spoke.
 I pour'd a flood of sorrow, and withdrew,
 Amid the kindled groves, to pluck a bough;
 With which the structure at the base I fir'd:
 On ev'ry side the pointed flames aspir'd.
 But ere involving smoke the pile enclos'd,
 I saw the hero on the top repos'd;

Serene as one who, near the fountain laid,
 At noon enjoys the cool refreshing shade.
 The venom'd garment his'd; its touch the fires
 Avoiding, stop'd oblique their pointed spires:
 On ev'ry side the pointed flame withdrew,
 And level'd, round the burning structure flew.
 At last victorious to the top they rose;
 Firm and unmov'd the hero saw them close.
 His soul unfetter'd, fought the blest abodes,
 By virtue rais'd to mingle with the gods.
 His bones in earth, with pious hands, I laid;
 The place to publish nothing shall persuade;
 Left tyrants now unaw'd, and men unjust,
 With insults, should profane his sacred dust.
 E'er since, I haunt this solitary den,
 Retir'd from all the busy paths of men;
 For these wild mountains only suit my state,
 And sooth with kindred gloom my deep regret.

He ended thus: amazement long suppress'd
 My voice; but Cleon answer'd thus address'd:
 Brave youth! you offer to our wond'ring ears,
 Events more awful than tradition bears.
 Fix'd in my mind the hero's fate remains,
 I see his agonies, and feel his pains.
 Yet suffer, that for hapless Thebes I mourn,
 Whose fairest hopes the envious fates o'erturn.
 If great Alcides liv'd, her tow'rs should stand
 Safe and protect'd by his mighty hand;
 On you, brave youth! our second hopes depend;
 To you the arms of Hercules descend;
 He did not, sure, those glorious gifts bestow,
 The shafts invincible, the mighty bow;
 From which the innocent protection claim,
 To dye the hills with blood of savage game.
 Such toils as these your glory ne'er can raise,
 Nor crown your merit with immortal praise;
 And with the great Alcides place your name,
 To stand distinguish'd in the rolls of fame.

The hero thus: The son of Pœan said:
 Myself, my arms, I offer for your aid;
 If fav'ring from the skies, the signs of Jove
 Confirm what thus I purpose and approve.
 For when Alcides, with his last commands,
 His bow and shafts committed to my hands;
 In all attempts he charg'd me to proceed
 As Jove by signs and auguries should lead.
 But these the rising sun will best disclose;
 The season now invites to soft repose.

He said; and from the hearth a flaming bough,
 To light us through the shady cavern drew.
 Far in the deep recess, a rocky bed
 We found, with skins of mountain monsters spread.
 There we compos'd our weary limbs, and lay,
 Till darkness fled before the morning ray.
 Then rose and climb'd a promontory steep,
 Whose rocky brow, impending o'er the deep,
 Shoots high into the air, and lifts the eye,
 In boundless stretch; to take a length of sky.
 With hands extended to th' ethereal height,
 The pow'r we call'd who rules the realms of light;
 That symbols sure his purpose might explain,
 Whether the youth should aid us, or refrain:
 We pray'd; and on the left along the vales,
 With pinions broad display'd, an eagle sails.
 As near the ground his level flight he drew,
 He stoop'd, and brush'd the thickets as he flew,
 When starting from the centre of a brake,
 With horrid hiss appear'd a crested snake;

Her young to guard, her venom'd fangs she rear'd;
 Above the shrubs her wavy length appear'd;
 Against his swift approaches, as he flew,
 On ev'ry side her forked tongue she through,
 And armed jaws; but wheeling from the snare
 The swift assailant still escap'd in air;
 But slipping from his pitch, at last he tore
 Her purple crest, and drew a stream of gore.
 She wreat'h'd; and, in the fierceness of her pain,
 Shook the long thickets with her twisted train:
 Relax'd at last, its spires forgot to roll,
 And, in a hiss, she breath'd her fiery soul:
 In haste to gorge his prey, the bird of Jove
 Down to the bottom of the thicket drove;
 The young defenceless from the covert drew;
 Devou'd them straight, and to the mountains flew.
 This omen seen, another worse we hear;
 The subterraneous thunder greets our ear:
 The worst of all the signs which augurs know;
 A dire prognostic of impending woe.

Amaz'd we stood, till Philoctetes broke
 Our long dejected silence thus, and spoke:
 Warriors of Thebes! the auguries disguise
 My purpose, and withhold me from your aid;
 Though pity moves me, and ambition draws,
 To share your labours, and assert your cause;
 In fight the arms of Hercules to show,
 And from his native ramparts drive the foe.
 But vain it is against the gods to strive;
 Whose counsels ruin nations or retrieve;
 Without their favour, valour nought avails,
 And human prudence self-subvert'd fails;
 For irresistibly their pow'r prevails
 In all events, and good and ill divides.

Let Thebes assembled at the altars wait,
 And long processions crowd each sacred gate:
 With sacrifice pleas'd, and humble pray'r,
 Their omens frustrated, the gods may spare.
 To-day, my guests, repose; to-morrow sail,
 If heav'n propitious sends a prosp'rous gale:
 For, shifting to the south, the western breeze
 Forbids you now to trust the faithless seas.

The hero thus; in silence sad we mourn'd;
 And to the solitary cave return'd,
 Despairing of success; our grief he shar'd,
 And for relief a cheering bowl prepar'd;
 The vintage which the grape spontaneous yields,
 By art untutor'd, on the woodland fields,
 He sought with care, and mingled in the bowl,
 A plant, of pow'r to calm the troubled soul;
 Its name Népenthe; swains, on desert ground,
 Do often glean it, else but rarely found;
 This in the bowl he mix'd; and soon we found,
 In soft oblivion, all our sorrows drown'd:
 We felt no more the agonies of care,
 And hope, succeeding, dawn'd upon despair.
 From morn we feasted, till the setting ray
 Retir'd, and ev'ning shades expell'd the day;
 Then in the dark recesses of the cave,
 To slumber soft, our willing limbs we gave:
 But ere the morning, from the east, appear'd,
 And sooner than the early lark is heard,
 Cleon awak'd, my careles slumber broke,
 And bending to my ear, in whispers spoke:
 Dainties! while slumbering thus secure,
 We think not what our citizens endure. [pears
 The worst the signs have threaten'd, nought ap-
 With happier aspect to dispel our fears;

Alcides lives not, and his friend in vain
 To arms we call, while auguries restrain:
 Returning thus, we bring the Theban state
 But hopes deceiv'd, and omens of her fate:
 Better success our labours shall attend,
 Nor all our aims in disappointment end;
 If you approve my purpose, nor dissuade
 What now I counsel for your country's aid.
 Soon as the sun displays his early beam,
 The arms of great Alcides let us claim;
 Then for Bœotia's shores direct our sails;
 And force must second if persuasion fails:
 Against reproach necessity shall plead;
 Censure confute, and justify the deed.

The hero thus, and ceas'd: with pity mov'd,
 And zeal for Thebes, I rashly thus approv'd.
 You counsel well; but prudence would advise
 To work by cunning rather, and surprize,
 Than force declar'd; his venom'd shafts you know,
 Which fly resistless from th' Herculean bow;
 A safe occasion now the silent hour
 Of midnight yields; when, by the gentle pow'r
 Of careless slumber bound, the hero lies,
 Our necessary fraud will 'scape his eyes;
 Without the aid of force shall reach its aim,
 With danger less incur'd, and less of blame.

I counsel'd thus; and Cleon straight approv'd.
 In silence from the dark recess we mov'd;
 Towards the hearth, with wary steps, we came,
 The ashes stirr'd, and rous'd the slumbering flame.
 On every side in vain we turn'd our eyes,
 Nor, as our hopes had promis'd, found the prize:
 Till to the couch where Philoctetes lay,
 The quiver led us by its silver ray;
 For in a panther's fur together ty'd,
 His bow and shafts, the pillow's place supply'd;
 Thither I went with careful steps and slow;
 And by degrees obtain'd th' Herculean bow:
 The quiver next to disengage essay'd;
 It stuck entangled, but at last obey'd.
 The prize obtain'd, we hasten to the strand,
 And rouse the mariners and straight command
 The canvass to unfurl: a gentle gale
 Favour'd our course, and fill'd the swelling sail:
 The shores retir'd; and when the morning ray
 Ascended, from the deep, th' ethereal way;
 Upon the right Cœxum's beach appear'd,
 And Pelion on the left his summit rear'd.
 All day we sail'd; but when the setting light
 Approach'd the ocean, from th' Olympian height,
 The breeze was hush'd: and, stretch'd across the
 main,

Like mountains rising on the wat'ry plain,
 The clouds collected on the billows stood,
 And, with incumbent shade, obscur'd the flood.
 Thither a current bore us; soon we found
 A night of vapour closing fast around.
 Loose hung the empty sail: we ply'd our oars,
 And strove to reach Eubœa's friendly shores;
 But strove in vain: for erring from the course,
 In mazes wide, the rower spent his force.
 Seven days and nights we try'd some port to gain,
 Where Greek or barb'rous shores exclude the
 main;

But knew not, whether backwards or before,
 Or on the right or left to seek the shore:
 Till, rising on the eighth, a gentle breeze
 Drove the light fog, and brush'd the curling seas.

Our canvass to its gentle pow'r we spread,
 And fix'd our oars, and follow'd as it led.
 Before us soon, impending from above,
 Through parting clouds, we saw a lofty grove,
 Alarm'd, the sail we slacken, and explore
 The deeps and shallows of the unknown shore.
 Near on the right a winding creek appear'd,
 Thither, directed by the pole, we steer'd;
 And landed on the beach, by fate misled,
 Nor knew again the port from which we fled.
 The gods themselves deceiv'd us: to our eyes
 New caverns open, airy cliffs arise;
 That Philoctetes might again possess
 His arms, and heav'n our injury redress.

The unknown region purpos'd to explore,
 Cleon, with me alone, forsakes the shore;
 Back to the cave we left by angry fate
 Implicitely conducted, at the gate
 The injur'd youth we found; a thick disguise
 His native form conceal'd, and mock'd our eyes;
 For the black locks in waving ringlets spread,
 A wreath of hoary white involv'd his head,
 Beneath a load of years, he seem'd to bend,
 His breast to sink, his shoulders to ascend.
 He saw us straight, and, rising from his seat,
 Began with sharp reproaches to repeat
 Our crime; but could not thus suspicion give;
 So strong is error, when the gods deceive!
 We question'd of the country as we came,
 By whom inhabited, and what its name;
 How far from Thebes: that thither we were bound;

And thus the wary youth our error found.
 Smooth'd to deceive, his accent straight he turn'd,
 While in his breast the thirst of vengeance burn'd:
 And thinking now his bow and shafts regain'd,
 Reply'd with hospitable kindness feign'd:
 On Ida's sacred height, my guests! you stand;
 Here Priam rules, in peace, a happy land.
 Twelve cities own him, on the Phrygian plain,
 Their lord, and twelve fair islands on the main.
 From hence to Thebes in seven days space you'll sail,
 If Jove propitious sends a prosperous gale,
 But now accept a homely meal, and deign
 To share what heav'n affords a humble swain.
 He said; and brought a bowl with vintage
 fill'd,

From berries wild, and mountain grapes distill'd,
 Of largest size; and plac'd it on a rock,
 Under the covert of a spreading oak;
 Around it autumn's mellow stores he laid,
 Which the sun ripens in the woodland shade.
 Our thirst and hunger thus at once allay'd,
 To Cleon turning, Philoctetes said:
 The bow you wear, of such unusual size,
 With wonder still I view, and curious eyes;
 For length, for thickness, and the workman's art,
 Surpassing all I've seen in ev'ry part.

Dissembling, thus inquir'd the wary youth,
 And thus your valiant son declar'd the truth:
 Father! the weapon which you thus commend,
 The force of great Alcides once did bend; [du'd,
 These shafts the same which monsters fierce sub-
 And lawless men with vengeance just pursu'd.

The hero thus; and Pœan's son again:
 What now I ask, refuse not to explain:
 Whether the hero still exerts his might,
 For innocence oppress'd, and injur'd right?

Or yields to fate; and with the mighty dead,
 From toil reposes in the Elysian shade!
 Sure, if he liv'd, he would not thus forgo
 His shafts invincible and mighty bow,
 By which, he oft immortal honour gain'd
 For wrongs redress'd and lawless force restrain'd.
 The rage suppress'd which in his bosom burn'd,
 He question'd thus; and Cleon thus return'd:
 What we have heard of Hercules, I'll show
 What by report we learn'd, and what we know.
 From Thebes to Oeta's wilderness we went,
 With supplications, to the hero, sent
 From all our princes; that he would exert
 His matchless valour on his country's part,
 Against whose fate united foes conspire,
 And waste her wide domain with sword and fire.
 There on the cliffs which bound the neighb'ring
 main,

We found the mansion of a lonely swain;
 Much like to this, but that its rocky mouth
 The cooling north respects, as the the south;
 And, in a corner of the cave conceal'd,
 The club which great Alcides us'd to wield.
 Wrapt in his shaggy robe, the lion's spoils,
 The mantle which he wore in all his toils,
 At ev'n a hunter in the cave appear'd;
 From whom the fate of Hercules we heard.
 He told us that he saw the chief expire,
 That he himself did light his fun'ral fire;
 And boasted, that the hero had resign'd
 To him, this bow and quiver, as his friend:
 Oft seen before, these deadly shafts we know,
 And tip'd with stars of gold th' Herculean bow:
 But of the hero's fate, the tale he told,
 Whether 'tis true I cannot now unfold.

He spoke. The youth with indignation burn'd,
 Yet calm in outward semblance, thus return'd:
 I must admire the man who could resign
 To you these arms so precious and divine,
 Which, to the love of such a friend, he ow'd,
 Great was the gift if willingly bestow'd:
 By force they could not easily be gain'd,
 And fraud, I know, your generous souls disdain'd.

Severely smiling, thus the hero spoke;
 With conscious shame we heard, nor silence broke:
 And thus again: The only boon I claim,
 Which, to your host deny'd, would merit blame;
 Is, that my hands that weapon may embrace,
 And on the flaxen cord an arrow place;
 An honour which I covet; though we mourn'd,
 By great Alcides, once our state o'erturn'd:
 When proud Laomedon the hero brav'd,
 Nor paid the ransom for his daughter sav'd.

Dissembling thus, did Philoctetes strive
 His instruments of vengeance to retrieve:
 And, by the fates deceiv'd, in evil hour,
 The bow and shafts we yielded to his pow'r,
 In mirthful mood, provoking him to try
 Whether the weapon would his force obey;
 For weak he seem'd, like those whose nerves have lost, [boast.

Through age, the vigour which in youth they
 The belt around his shoulders first he slung,
 And glitt'ring by his side the quiver hung:
 Compress'd with all his force the stubborn yew
 He bent, and from the case an arrow drew:
 And yielding to his rage, in furious mood,
 With aim direct against us full he flood,

For vengeance arm'd; and now the thick disguise,
 Which veil'd his form before, and mock'd our eyes,
 Vanish'd in air; our error then appear'd;
 I saw the vengeance of the gods, and fear'd.
 Before him to the ground my knees I bow'd,
 And, with extended hands, for mercy f'ud.
 But Cleon, fierce and scornful to entreat,
 His weapon drew, and rush'd upon his fate:
 For as he came, the fatal arrow flew,
 And from his heart the vital current drew;
 Supine he fell; and, welling from the wound,
 A tide of gore impurpled all the ground.
 The son Pœan stooping drew the dart,
 Yet warm with slaughter, from the hero's heart;
 And turn'd it full on me: with humble pray'r
 But lifted hands, I mov'd him still to spare.
 At last he yielded, from his purpose sway'd,
 And answer'd thus in milder accents, said:
 No favour sure you merit; and the cause,
 Of right infring'd and hospitable laws,
 Would justify revenge; but as you claim,
 With Hercules, your native soil the same;
 I now shall pardon for the hero's sake,
 Nor, though the gods approve it, vengeance take.
 But straight avoid my presence; and unbind,
 With speed, your flying canvass to the wind:
 For if again to meet those eyes you come,
 No pray'rs shall change, or mitigate your doom.

With frowning aspect thus the hero said,
 His threats I fear'd, and willingly obey'd.
 Straight in his purple robe the dead I bound,
 Then to my shoulders rais'd him from the ground;
 And from the hills descending to the bay,
 Where anchor'd near the beach our galley lay,
 The rest conven'd, with sorrow to relate
 This anger of the gods and Cleon's fate:
 The hero's fate his bold companions mourn'd,
 And ev'ry breast with keen resentment burn'd.
 They in their heady transports straight decreed,
 His fall with vengeance to requite or bleed.
 I fear'd the angry gods; and gave command,
 With fail and oar, to fly the fatal strand;
 Enrag'd and sad, the mariners obey'd,
 Unfur'd the canvass, and the anchor weigh'd.
 Our course, behind, the western breezes sped,
 And from the coast with heavy hearts we fled.
 All day they favour'd, but with evening ceas'd;
 And straight a tempest, from the stormy east,
 In opposition full, began to blow,
 And rear in ridges high the deep below.
 Against its boist'rous sway in vain we strove;
 Oblively to the Thracian coast we drove:
 Where Pelion lifts his head aloft in air,
 With painted cliffs and precipices bare;
 Thither our course we steer'd, and on the strand
 Descending, fix'd our cable to the land.
 There twenty days we stay'd, and wish'd in vain
 A favourable breeze, to cross the main;
 For with unceasing rage the tempest rav'd,
 And o'er the rocky beach the ocean heav'd.
 At last with care the hero's limbs we burn'd,
 And, water'd with our tears, his bones inurn'd.
 There, where a promontory's height divides,
 Extended in the deep, the parted tides,
 His tomb is seen, which, from its airy fland,
 Marks to the mariner the distant land.

'This, princes! is the truth; and though the will
 Of heav'n, the sov'reign cause of good and ill.

Has dash'd our hopes, and, for the good in view,
With griefs afflicts us and disasters new:
Yet, innocent of all, I justly claim
To stand exempt from punishment or blame.
That zeal for Thebes 'gainst hospitable laws
Prevail'd, and ardour in my country's cause,
I freely have confess'd; but sure if wrong
Was e'er permitted to inducement strong,
This claims to be excus'd: our country's need,
With all who hear it will for favour plead.

He ended thus. Unable to subdue [drew:
His grief: the monarch from the throne with-
In silent wonder fix'd, the rest remain'd;
Till Clytophon the gen'ral sense explain'd;

Your just defence, we mean not to refuse:
Your prudence censure, or your zeal accuse:
To heav'n we owe the valiant Cleon's fate,
With each disaster which afflicts the state.
Soon as the sun forsakes the eastern main,
At ev'ry altar let a bull be slain;
And Thebes assembled, move the pow'rs to spare,
With vows of sacrifice and humble pray'r:
But now the night invites to soft repose,
The momentary cure of human woes;
The stars descend; and soon the morning ray
Shall rouse us to the labours of the day.
The hero thus. In silence all approv'd,
And rising, various, from th' assembly mov'd.

BOOK VIII.

BEHIND the palace, where a stream descends,
Its lonely walks a shady grove extends;
Once sacred, now for common use ordain'd,
By war's wide licence and the axe profan'd:
Thither the monarch from th' assembly went
Alone, his fury and despair to vent,
And thus to Heav'n: Dread pow'r! whose sovereign sway

The fates of men and mortal things obey!
From me expect not such applause to hear,
As fawning vot'ries to thine altars bear;
But truth severe. Although the forked brand,
Which for destruction arms thy mighty hand,
Were levell'd at my head; a mind I hold,
By present ills, or future, uncontroul'd.
Beneath thy sway the race of mortals groan;
Felicity sincere is felt by none:
Delusive hope th' unpractis'd mind assails,
And, by ten thousand treach'rous arts prevails:
Through all the earth the fair deceiver strays,
And wretched man to misery betrays.
Our crimes you punish, never teach to shun,
When, blind to folly, on our fate we run:
Hence sighs and groans thy tyrant reign confess,
With ev'ry rueful symptom of distress.
Here war unchain'd exerts his wasteful pow'r;
Here famine pines; diseases there devour,
And lead a train of all the ills that know
To shorten life, or lengthen it in woe.
All men are curs'd; but I, above the rest,
With tenfold vengeance for my crimes opprest'd:
With hostile pow'rs beset my tott'ring reign,
The people wasted, and my children slain;
In swift approach, I see destruction come,
But, with a mind unmov'd, I meet my doom;
For know, stern pow'r! whose vengeance has decreed

That Creon, after all his sons, should bleed;
As from the summit of some desert rock,
The sport of tempests, falls the leafless oak,
Of all his honours stript, thou ne'er shalt find,
Weakly submiss, or stupidly resign'd
This dauntless heart; but purpos'd to debate
Thy stern decrees, and burst the chains of fate.

He said; and turning where the heralds stand
All night by turns, and wait their lord's command;
Menestheus there and Hegesander found,
And Phæmius sage, for valour once renown'd,
He charg'd them thus: Beyond the eastern tow'rs,
Summon to meet in arms our martial pow'rs.
In silence let them move; let signs command,
And mute obedience reign through ev'ry band;
For when the east with early twilight glows,
We rush, from cover'd ambush, on our foes
Secure and unprepar'd: the truce we swore,
Our plighted faith, the seal of wine and gore,
No ties I hold; all piety disclaim:
Adverse to me the gods, and I to them.
The angry monarch thus his will declar'd;
His rage the heralds fear'd, and straight repair'd
To rouse the warriors. Now the morning light
Begins to mingle with the shades of night:
In ev'ry street a glitt'ring stream appears,
Of polish'd helmets mix'd with shining spears:
Towards the eastern gate they wine along,
Nations and tribes, an undistinguish'd throng?
Creon himself superior, in his car,
Receiv'd them coming, and dispos'd the war.

And now the Argives from their tents proceed,
With rites sepulchral to entomb the dead.
The king of men, amid the sun'ral fires,
The chiefs assemble, and the work inspires.
And thus the Pelian sage, in council wise:
Princes! I view, with wonder and surprise,
Yon field abandon'd, where the foe pursu'd
Their sun'ral rites before, with toil renew'd:
Nor half their dead interr'd, they now abstain,
And silence reigns through all the smoky plain,
Thence jealousy and fear possess my mind
Of faith infring'd, and treachery design'd:
Behind those woody heights, behind those tow'rs,
I dread, in ambush laid, the Theban pow'rs;
With purpose to assault us, when they know
That we, confiding, least expect a foe:
Let half the warriors arm, and stand prepar'd,
For sudden violence, the host to guard;
While, in the mournful rites, the rest proceed,
Due to the honour'd relics of the dead.

Thus as he spoke; approaching from afar,
The hostile pow'rs, embattled for the war,
Appear'd; and streaming from their polish'd
shields,

A blaze of splendour brighten'd all the fields.
And thus the king of men, with lifted eyes,
And both his hands extended to the skies:
Ye pow'rs supreme: whose unresist'd sway
The fate of men and mortal things obey!
Let all the plagues, which perjury attend,
At once, and sudden, on our foes descend:
Let not the sacred seal of wine and gore,
The hands we plighted, and the oaths we swore,
Be now in vain; but from your bright abodes,
Confound the bold despisers of the gods.

He pray'd; and nearer came the hostile train,
With swift approach advancing on the plain;
Embattled thick, as when, at fall of night,
A shepherd, from some promontory's height,
Approaching from the deep, a fog descries,
Which hov'ring lightly o'er the billows flies;
By breezes borne, the solid soon it gains,
Climbs the steep hills, and darkens all the plains!

Silent and swift the Theban pow'rs drew near;
The chariots led, a phalanx clos'd the rear.

Confusion straight through all the host arose,
Stirr'd like the ocean when a tempest blows.
Some arm for fight; the rest to terror yield,
Inactive stand, or trembling quit the field.
On ev'ry side, assaults the deafen'd ear
The discord loud of tumult, rage, and fear.
Superior in his car, with ardent eyes,
The king of men through all the army flies:
The rash restrains, the cold with courage fires,
And all with hope and confidence inspires;
As when the deep, in liquid mountains hurl'd,
Assaults the rocky limits of the world:
When tempests with unlicenc'd fury rave,
And sweep from shore to shore the flying wave:
If he, to whom each pow'r of ocean bends,
To quell such uproar, from the deep ascends,
Serene, amidst the wat'ry war, he rides,
And fixes, with his voice, the moving tides:
Such seem'd the monarch. From th' Olympian height,

The martial maid precipitates her flight;
To aid her fav'rite host the goddess came,
Mentor she seem'd, her radiant arms the same;
Who with Ulysses brought a chosen band
Of warriors from the Cephaleonian strand;
Already arm'd, the valiant youth she found,
And arming for the fight his warriors round.
And thus began: Brave prince! our foes appear
For battle order'd, and the fight is near.
Dauntless they come superior and elate,
While fear unmans us, and resigns to fate.
Would some immortal from th' Olympian height
Descend, and for a moment stop the fight;
From sad dejection rous'd, and cold despair,
We yet might arm us, and for war prepare;
But if on human aid we must depend,
Nor hope to see the fav'ring gods descend,
Great were the hero's praise, who now could boast
From ruin imminent to save the host!
The danger near some prompt expedient claims,
And prudence triumphs oft in worst extremes.

Thus, in a form assum'd, the martial maid;
The generous warrior, thus replying, said:
In youth, I cannot hope to win the praise,
With which experience crowns a length of days:

Weak are the hopes that on my counsels stand,
To combats, nor practis'd in command:
But as the gods, to save a sinking state,
Or snatch an army from the jaws of fate,
When prudence stands confounded, oft suggest
A prompt expedient to some vulgar breast;
To your discerning ear I shall expose
What now my mind excites me to disclose.
Sav'd from th' unfinished honours of the slain,
The mingled spoils of forests load the plain:
In heaps contiguous round the camp they lie,
A fence too weak to stop the enemy:
But if we mix them with the seeds of fire,
Which unextinguish'd glow in ev'ry pyre,
Against the foe a sudden wall shall rise,
Of flame and smoke ascending to the skies:
The steed dismay'd shall backward hurl the car;
Mix with the phalanx, and confound the war.

He said. The goddess, in her conscious breast,
A mother's triumph for a son possess'd,
Who emulates his fire in glorious deeds,
And, with his virtue, to his fame succeeds:
Graceful the goddess turn'd, and with a voice,
Bold, and superior to the vulgar noise,
O'er all the field commands the woods to fire;
Straight to obey a thousands hands conspire.
On ev'ry side the spreading flame extends,
And, roll'd in cloudy wreaths, the smoke ascends.

Creon beheld, enrag'd to be withstood:
Like some fierce lion when he meets a flood
Or trench defensive, which his rage restrains
For rocks unguarded, left by careless swains;
O'er all the field he sends his eyes afar,
To mark fit entrance for a pointed war:
Near on the right a narrow space he found,
Where sun'ral ashes smok'd upon the ground:
Thither the warriors of the Theban host,
Whose martial skill he priz'd and honour most,
The monarch sent, Chalcidamus the strong,
Who from fair Thespia led his martial throng,
Where Helicon erects his verdant head,
And crowns the champaign with a lofty shade:
Oechalia's chief was added to the band,
For valour fam'd and skilful in command;
Eriheus, with him, his brother came,
Of worth unequal, and unequal fame.
Rhefus, with these, the Thracian leader, went,
To merit fame, by high achievements, bent;
Of stature tall, he scorns the pointed spear,
And crushes with his mace the ranks of war:
With him twelve leaders of his native train,
In combats, taught the bounding steed to rein,
By none surpass'd who boast superior skill
To send the winged arrow swift to kill,
Mov'd to the fight. The rest of vulgar name,
Though brave in combat, were unknown to fame.

Their bold invasion dauntless to oppose,
Full in the midst the bulk of Ajax rose;
Unarm'd he stood; but, in his mighty hand,
Brandish'd, with gesture fierce, a burning brand,
Snatch'd from the ashes of a sun'ral fire;
An olive's trunk, five cubit lengths entire.

Arm'd for the fight, the Cretan monarch blood;
 And Merion, thirsting still with hostile blood;
 The prince of Ithaca, with him who led
 The youth, in Sicyon, and Pellene, bred.
 But ere they clos'd, the Thracian leader prefs'd,
 With eager courage, far before the rest;
 Him Ajax met, inflam'd with equal rage:
 Between the wond'ring hosts the chiefs engage:
 Their weighty weapons round their heads they throw,

And swift, and heavy falls each thund'ring blow;
 As when in Ætna's caves the giant brood,
 The one-ey'd servants of the Lemnian god,
 In order round the burning anvil stand,
 And forge, with weighty strokes, the forked brand:
 The shaking hills their fervid toil confess,
 And echoes rattling through each dark recess:
 So rag'd the fight; their mighty limbs they
 strain;

And oft their pond'rous maces fall in vain:
 For neither chief was destin'd yet to bleed;
 But fate at last the victory decreed.
 The Salaminian hero aim'd a stroke,
 Which thund'ring on the Thracian helmet broke:
 Stunn'd by the boist'rous shock, the warrior reel'd

With giddy poise, then sunk upon the field.
 Their leader to defend, his native train
 With speed advance, and guard him on the plain.
 Against his foe, their threat'ning lances rise,
 And aim'd at once, a storm of arrows flies;
 Around the chief on ev'ry side they sing;
 One in his shoulder fix'd its barbed sting.
 Amaz'd he stood, nor could the fight renew:
 But slow and fullen from the foe withdrew.
 Straight to the charge Idomeneus proceeds,
 With hardy Merion try'd in martial deeds,
 Laertes' valiant son, and he who led
 The youth in Sicyon, and Pellene, bred;
 With force united, these the foe sustain,
 And wasteful havoc loads the purple plain:
 In doubtful poise the scales of combat sway'd,
 And various fates alternately obey'd. [foe,

But now the flames, which barr'd th' invading
 Sunk to the wasteful wood, in ashes glow:
 Thebes rushes to the fight; their polish'd shields Gleam through the smoke, and brightens all the fields;

Thick fly the embers, where the coursers tread,
 And cloudy volumes all the welkin shade.
 The king of men, to meet the tempest, fire
 His wav'ring bands, and valour thus inspires.
 Gods! shall one fatal hour deface the praise
 Of all our sleepless nights, and bloody days?
 Shall no just meed for all our toils remain?
 Our labours, blood, and victories in vain?
 Shall Creon triumph, and his impious brow
 Claim the fair wreath, to truth and valour due?
 No, warriors! by the heav'nly pow'rs, is weigh'd
 Justice with wrong, in equal balance laid:
 From Jove's high roof depend th' eternal scales,
 Wrong mounts defeated still, and right prevails.
 Fear then no odds; on heav'n itself depend,
 Which falsehood will confound, and truth defend.

He said; and sudden in the shock they close,
 Their shields and helmets ring with mutual
 blows,

Disorder dire the mingling ranks confounds,
 And shouts of triumph mix with dying sounds;
 As fire, with wasteful conflagration spreads,
 And kindles, in its course, the woodland shades,
 When, shooting sudden from the clouds above,
 On some thick forest fall the flames of Jove;
 The lofty oaks, the pines and cedars burn,
 Their verdant honours all to ashes turn;
 Loud roars the tempest; and the trembling swains
 See the wide havoc of the wasteful plains:
 Such seem'd the conflict; such the dire alarms,
 From shouts of battle mix'd with din of arms.
 Pericles first, Lycaon's valiant son,
 The sage whose counsels propp'd the Theban
 throne,

Rose in the fight, superior to the rest,
 And brave Democleon's fall his might confess'd,
 The chief and leader of a valiant band,
 From fair Eione and th' Asinian strand.
 Next Asius, Iphitus, and Crates fell;
 Terynthian Podius trode the path of hell:
 And Schedius, from Mazeta's fruitful plain,
 Met there his fate, and perish'd with the slain.
 Aw'd by their fall, the Argive bands give way;
 As yields some rampart to the ocean's sway,
 When rout'd to rage, it scorns opposing mounds,
 And sweeps victorious through forbidden grounds.

But Pallas, anxious for her fav'rite host,
 Their best already wounded, many lost,
 Ulysses sought: she found him, in the rear,
 Wounded and faint, and leaning on his spear.
 And thus in Mentor's form: Brave prince! I dread
 Our hopes defeated, and our fall decreed:
 For conquer'ing on the right the foe prevails,
 And all defence against their fury fails;
 While here, in doubtful poise, the battle sways,
 And various fates alternately obeys;
 In great Tydides, who beholds from far
 Our danger imminent, yet shuns the war,
 Held by resentment, or some cause unknown,
 Regardless of our safety and his own,
 Would rise to aid us; yet we might respire,
 And Creon, frustrated, again retire.
 Great were his praise, who could the chief per suade,

In peril so extreme, the host to aid.
 The fittest you, who boast the happy skill,
 With pleasing words, to move the fixed will
 Though Nestor justly merits equal fame,
 A friend the soonest will a friend reclaim.

And thus Ulysses to the martial maid:
 I cannot hope the hero to persuade:
 The source unknown from which his rage pro ceeds,

Reason in vain from loose conjecture pleads;
 The fatal truce, with faithless Creon made,
 Provokes him not, nor holds him from our aid;
 He easily resign'd whate'er he mov'd,
 Till now approving as the rest approv'd,
 Some dire disaster, some disgrace unseen,
 Confounds his steady temper, else serene:
 But with my utmost search, I'll strive to find
 The secret griefs which wound his gen'rous mind;
 If drain'd of blood, and spent with toils of war,
 My weary limbs can bear their load so far.

He spoke; his words the martial maid admir'd;
 With energy divine his breast inspir'd;

4
Lightly the hero mov'd, and took his way
Where broad encamp'd th' Ætolian warriors lay:
Already arm'd he found the daring band,
Fierce and impatient of their lord's command;
Some, murm'ring, round the king's pavilion
stood,

While others, more remote, complain'd aloud:
With pleasing words he south'd them as he went,
And fought their valiant leader in his tent:
Him pond'ring deep in his distracted mind,
He found, and sitting sad, with head declin'd.
He thus address'd him: Will the news I bring,
Afflict, or gratify, th' Ætolian king?

"That wav'ring on the brink of foul defeat,
Without the hopes of success or retreat,
Our valiant bands th' unequal fight maintain;
Their best already wounded, many slain."
If treach'rous Thebes has brib'd you with her store, [swore;

And bought the venal faith which once you
Has promis'd precious ore, or lovely dames,
And pays to lust the price which treason claims:
Name but the proffers of the perjurd king,
And more, and better, from your friends I'll bring;

Vast sums of precious ore, and greater far
Than Thebes, in peace, had treasur'd for the war;
Or, though, to gratify thy boundless mind,
Her private wealth and public were combin'd.
If beauty's pow'r your am'rous heart inflames,
Uprival'd are Achaia's lovely dames;
Her fairest dames Adrastus shall bestow,
And purchase thus the aid you freely owe.
Gods! that our armies e'er should need to fear
Destruction, and the son of Tydeus near!

Ulysses thus; and Tydeus' son again:
Your false reproaches aggravate my pain
Too great already: in my heart I feel
Its venom'd sting, more sharp than pointed steel.
No bribe persuades, or promise from the foe,
My oath to violate, and the war forego:
In vain for this were all the precious store,
Which trading Zidon wafts from shore to shore;
With all that rich Iberia yet contains,
Safe and unris'd in her golden veins.

The source from which my miseries arise,
The cause, which to the host my aid denies,
With truth I shall relate; and hope to claim
Your friendly sympathy, for groundless blame.
In yonder walls a captive maid remains,
To me more dear than all the world contains;
Fairer she is than nymph was ever fair;
Pallas in stature, and majestic air;
As Venus soft, with Cynthia's sprightly grace,
When on Taigetus she leads the chase,
Or Erymanthus; while in fix'd amaze,
At awful distance heard, the satyr gaze.
With oaths divine our plighted faith we bound;
Hymen had soon our mutual wishes crown'd;
When, call'd to arms, against the Theban tow'rs,
From Calydon I led my martial pow'rs.
Her female form in martial arms conceal'd,
With me she brav'd the terrors of the field:
Unknown and unrewarded, from my side
No toil could drive her, and no shock divide.
But now proud Thebes injuriously detains
The lovely virgin, lock'd in hostile chains;

Doom'd, and reserv'd to perish, for my sake,
If of your counsels, I, or works, partake;
Till twenty mornings in the east shall rise,
And twenty ev'nings gild the western skies.
See then the cause which holds me, and confines
My arm, to aid you, though my heart inclines;
Love mix'd with pity, whose restraints I feel
Than adamant more strong, and links of steel.

The hero thus. Laertes' son reply'd:
Oft have I heard what now is verify'd;
That still when passion reigns without controul,
Its sway confounds and darkens all the soul.
If Thebes, by perjury, the gods provok'd,
The vengeance slighted, by themselves invok'd;
Assaulted us, secure, with hostile arms,
And mix'd our pious rites with dire alarms:
With better faith, by faithless Creon sway'd,
Will they at last restore the captive maid?
When from their battlements and lofty spires,
They see their champaign shine with hostile fires;
And, pitch'd around them, hosts of armed foes,
With strict embrace, their straiten'd walls enclose:
The gods they scorn as impotent and vain:
What will they do, when you alone remain?
Our princes fall'n, the vulgar warriors fled,
Shall to your tent the captive fair be led?
Or rather must you see her matchless charms
Reserv'd to bless some hapless rival's arms;
While rage and jealousy divide your breast,
No present friend to pity, or assist?
Now rather rise: and, ere it is too late,
Rescue our armies from impending fate.
The captive maid uninjur'd you'll regain;
Force oft obtains what justice asks in vain.
With success thus your wishes shall be crown'd,
Which trust in Thebes would frustrate and con-
found.

Ulysses thus: his weighty words inclin'd,
Long tortur'd with suspense, the hero's mind;
As settling winds the moving deep controul,
And teach the wav'ring billows how to roll:
Straight from his seat th' Ætolian warrior rose;
His mighty limbs the martial graves enclose;
His breast and thighs in polish'd steel he dress'd;
A plumed helmet next his temples prefs'd:
From the broad baldric, round his shoulders slung,
His shining sword and starry faulchion hung:
The spear he last assum'd, and pond'rous shield,
With martial grace, and issu'd to the field:
To mingle in the fight, with eager haste
He rush'd, nor call'd his warriors as he past.
Ulysses then conven'd; his prudent care
Their ranks dispos'd, and led them to the war.
Afar distinguish'd by his armour bright,
With shouts Tydides rous'd the ling'ring fight;
Through all the host his martial voice resounds,
And ev'ry heart with kindling ardour bounds;
As when the sun ascends, with gladfome ray,
To light the weary traveller on his way;
Or cheer the mariner by tempest toss'd
Amidst the dangers of some per'ous coast:
So to his wishing friends Tydides came;
Their danger such before, their joy the same.

Phericles saw; and, springing from the throng,
Call'd the bold Thebans, as he rush'd along:
Ye gen'rous youths! whom fair Bœotia breeds,
The nurse of valour and heroic deeds:

Let not, though oft renew'd, these tedious toils
Your martial ardour quench, and damp your souls.
Tydides comes; and leads, in armour bright,
His native bands, impatient for the fight:
Myself the first the hero's arm shall try,
And teach you how to conquer, or to die.
We strive not now, as when, in days of peace,
Some prince's hymeneal rites to grace,
In list'd fields bedew'd with fragrant oil,
In combat feign'd, the mimic warriors toil;
Alike the victors, and the vanquish'd fare,
And genial feasts, to both, conclude the war:
We now must conquer: or it stands decreed
That Thebes shall perish, and her people bleed.
No hopes of peace remain; nor can we find
New gods to witness, or new oaths to bind,
The first infrig'd: and therefore must prepare
To stand or perish by the lot of war:
Then let us all undaunted brave our fate:
To stop is doubtful, desprate to retreat.

The hero thus; and to the battle led:
Like Mars, he seem'd, in radiant armour clad,
Tow'ring sublime: behind his ample shield
He mov'd to meet Tydides on the field:
As when at noon, descending to the hills,
Two herds encounter, from the neighbouring hills:
Before the rest, the rival bulls prepare,
With awful prelude, for th' approaching war;
With desprate horns they plough the smoking
ground;

Their hideous roar the hollow caves resound;
Heav'd o'er their backs the streaming sand ascends;
Their stern encounter both the herds suspends:
So met the chiefs; and such amazement quell'd
The rest, and in suspense the combat held.
Tydides first his weighty weapon threw,
Wide of the mark with erring force it flew.
Phericles! thine succeeds with happier aim,
Full to the centre of the shield it came:
But slightly join'd, unequal to the stroke,
Short from the steel, the staff in splinters broke.
With grief Tydides saw his aim deceiv'd;
From off the field a pond'rous rock he heav'd;
With figures rude of antique sculpture grac'd,
It mark'd the reliques of a man deceas'd;
Push'd at his foe the weighty mass he flung;
Thund'ring it fell; the Theban helmet rung:
Deep with the brain the dinted steel it mix'd,
And lifeless, on the ground, the warrior fix'd.

Aw'd by his fall, the Theban bands retire;
As flocks defenceless shun a lion's ire;
At once they yield, unable to withstand
The wide destruction of Tydides' hand.
Disorder soon, the form of war confounds,
And shouts of triumph mix with dying sounds.
Creon perceiv'd, where ruling on the right
In equal poise he held the scales of fight,
Blaspheming heav'n, he impiously resign'd,
To stern despair, his unsubmitting mind:
Yet, vers'd in all the various turns of fate,
The brisk assault to rule, or safe retreat,

VOL. XI.

He drew his firm battalions from the foe,
In martial order, regularly flow.
The Argive leaders, thund'ring in the rear,
Still forwards on the yielding squadrons bear:
The strife with unabated fury burns,
They stop; they combat, and retreat by turns;
As the grim lion sourly leaves the plains,
By dogs compell'd, and bands of armed swains;
Indignant to his woody haunts he goes,
And with retorted glare restrains his foes.

Meanwhile Tydides, near the Cadmean gate,
Urg'd with incessant toil the work of fate;
Towards the walls, an undistinguish'd throng,
The victors and the vanquish'd, rush'd along.
Access to both the guarded wall denies;
From ev'ry tow'r, a storm of jav'lins flies;
Thick as the hail descends, when Boreas flings
The rattling tempest from his airy wings:
So thick the jav'lins fell, and pointed spears;
Behind them close, another host appears,
In order'd columns rang'd, by Creon led:
Ulysses saw; and thus to Diomed:
Bold as you are, avoid these guarded tow'rs:
From loose pursuit recal your scatter'd pow'rs:
See Creon comes; his thick embattled train,
In phalanx join'd, approaches from the plain.
Here if we stay th' unequal fight to prove,
The tow'rs and ramparts threaten from above
With darts and stones; while to th' invading foe,
In order loose, our scatter'd ranks we flow;
Nor by your matchless valour hope, in vain,
Such odds to conquer, and the fight maintaint;
Against an army single force must lose;
Immoderate courage still like folly shows.
See where into the field you turret calls,
Drawn to a point the long-extended walls:
There force your way, and speedily regain
The space, and safety of the open plain.

Ulysses thus; and by his prudence sway'd,
The martial son of Tydeus strait obey'd.
Thrice to the height the hero rais'd his voice,
Loud as the silver trumpet's martial noise,
The signal of retreat; his warriors heard,
And round their chief in order'd ranks appear'd,
Drawn from the mingled tumult of the plain;
As, sever'd on the floor, the golden grain
Swells to a heap; while, whirling through the skies,

The dusty chaff in thick disorder flies;
Tydides leads; between the guarded tow'rs
And hostile ranks, he draws his martial pow'rs
Towards the plain; as mariners, with oar
And sail, avoid some promontory's shore;
When caught between the ocean and the land,
A sudden tempest bears them on the strand;
The stem opposing to its boist'rous sway,
They shun the cape and stretch into the bay:
So escap'd Tydides. Cover'd by their tow'rs,
In safety stood retir'd the Theban pow'rs,
For from above an iron tempest rain'd,
And the incursions of the foe restrain'd.

D

BOOK IX.

AND now the king of men his army calls,
 Back from the danger of th' impending walls;
 They quit the combat, and in order long
 The field possess, a phalanx deep and strong.
 Rank following rank, the Theban squadrons move
 Still to the rampart, and the tow'rs above:
 Creon himself, unwilling, quits the field,
 Eurag'd, defeated, and constrain'd to yield,
 'Gains't all his foes his indignation burns,
 But first on Diomed his fury turns.
 He call'd a vulgar warrior from the crowd,
 A villain dark, and try'd in works of blood,
 Erembus nam'd, of huge gigantic size,
 With cloudy features mark'd, and downcast eyes;
 Cold and inactive still in combat found,
 Nor wont to kindle at the trumpet's sound;
 But bold in villany when pow'r commands;
 A weapon fitted for a tyrant's hands.
 And thus the wrathful monarch: take this sword,
 A sign, to all my servants, from their lord;
 And hither bring the fair Ætolian's head;
 I, who command you, will reward the deed:
 But let not pity or remorse prevail;
 Your own shall answer, if in aught you fail.

He said; the murd'rer, practis'd to obey,
 The royal sword receiv'd, and took his way
 Straight to the palace, where the captive fair,
 Of hope bereft, and yielding to despair,
 Lamenting sat. Their mutual griefs to blend,
 The queen and all the royal maids attend.
 And thus the queen: fair stranger! shall your grief

All hopes reject of comfort and relief?
 Your woes I've measur'd, all your sorrows known;
 And find them light when balanc'd with my own.
 In one sad day my valiant sire I mourn'd;
 My brothers slain; my native walls o'erturn'd;
 Myself a captive destin'd to fulfil,
 In servile drudgery, a master's will;
 Yet to a fall so low, the gods decreed
 This envy'd height of greatness to succeed.
 The pow'rs above, for purposes unknown,
 Oft raise the fall'n, and bring the lofty down;
 Elude the vigilance of all our care:
 Our surest hopes deceive, and mock despair.
 Let no desponding thoughts your mind possess,
 To banish hope, the medicine of distress:
 For nine short days your freedom will restore,
 And break the bondage which you thus deplore.
 But I, alas! unhappy still; must mourn,
 Yours once possess'd, which never can return;
 Four valiant sons, who perish'd on the plain
 In this dire strife, a fifth on Oeta slain:
 Thee shall return to bless my eyes no more;
 The grave's dark mansion knows not to restore,
 For time, which bids so oft the solar ray
 Repeat, with light renew'd, th' ethereal way,
 And from the soil, by heat and vernal winds,
 To second life the latent plant unbinds,

Again to flourish, nurs'd by wholesome dews,
 Never to mortal man his life repews.
 These griefs are sure; but others still I fear;
 A royal husband lost, and bondage near;
 Myself, my daughters, dragg'd by hostile hands;
 Our dignity exchang'd for servile bands:
 All this the gods may purpose and fulfil;
 And we with patience must endure their will.
 As thus Laodice her sorrow try'd
 With sympathy to sooth; the maid reply'd:
 Great queen! on whom the sov'reign pow'r bestow

A gen'rous heart to feel another's woe;
 Let still untouched through life your honours last,
 With happier days to come for sorrows past!
 Yet strive not thus a hopeless wretch to cheer,
 Whom sure conjecture leads the worst to fear.
 Shall Diomed a public cause forego,
 His faithful friends betray, and trust a foe?
 By treachery behold the host o'erthrown,
 Renounce the public interest and his own?
 Shall kings and armies, in the balance laid,
 Avail not to outweigh a single maid?
 One, whom his fury falsely did reprove
 For crimes unknown, whose only crime was love:
 No, sure ere this he triumphs in the field;
 Your armies to his matchless valour yield:
 And soon submitting to the fatal blow,
 This head must gratify a vanquish'd foe.
 If symbols e'er the secret fates explain,
 If visions do not always warn in vain,
 If dreams do ever true prognostics prove,
 And dreams, the sages say, descend from Jove,
 My fate approaches: late at dead of night:
 My veins yet freeze with horror and affright!
 I thought that, all forsaken and alone,
 Pensive I wander'd far through ways unknown,
 A gloomy twilight, neither night nor day
 Frown'd on my steps, and sadden'd all the way:
 Long dreary vales I saw on ev'ry side,
 And caverns sinking deep, with entrance wide;
 On ragged cliffs the blasted forests hung;
 Her baleful note the boding screech-owl sung.
 At last, with many a weary step, I found
 This melancholy country's utmost bound,
 An ocean vast: upon a cliff I stood,
 And saw, beneath me far, the sable flood;
 No islands rose the dull expanse to grace,
 And nought was seen through all the boundless space,
 But low-brow'd clouds, which on the billows
 frown'd,
 And, in a night of shade, the prospect drown'd.
 The winds, which seem'd around the cliffs to blow,
 With doleful cadence, utter'd sounds of woe,
 Wasting, from ev'ry cave and dreary den,
 The wail of infants mix'd with groans of men:
 Amaz'd, on ev'ry side my eyes I turn,
 And see depending from the craggy bound

Wretches unnumber'd; some the mould'ring soil,

Some grasp'd the slipp'ry rock, with fruitless toil;
Some hung suspended by the roots, which pass
Through crannies of the cliffs, or wither'd gras.
Still from the steep they plung'd into the main;
As from the eyes descends the trickling rain.
Amaz'd I turn'd, and strove in vain to fly;
Thickets oppos'd, and precipices high
To stop my flight: and, from the airy steep,
A tempest snatch'd, and hurl'd me to the deep.
The sudden violence my slumber broke;
The waves I seem'd to touch, and straight awoke.
With sleep the vision fled; but, in my mind
Imprinted deep, its image left behind.

For had the frightful scene which fancy drew,
And what I seem'd to suffer, all been true;
Had fate appear'd, in blackest colours dress'd,
No deeper had its horrors been impress'd.
When thus the gods by certain symbols warn,
And sure, from dreams, their purposes we learn,
No blame I merit, that to fear resign'd,
Fate's dread approach sits heavy on my mind.

Cassandra thus; Laodice again:
Futurity, in dreams, we seek in vain;
For oft, from thoughts disturb'd, such phantoms rise,

As fogs from marshes climb, to blot the skies:
With a dark veil, the cheerful face of day
They fadden, and eclipse the solar ray;
But soon in dews and soft-descending rains,
Fall to refresh the mountains and the plains.
For Diomed's offence you ne'er can bleed;
Favour, your sex and innocence will plead,
Ev'n, with the worst; nor will a gen'rous foe
His rage, in cruelty and baseness show.
Now to the tow'rs I haste, to view from far
The danger, or success of this day's war.
Let Clymene with me the walls ascend;
The rest at home domestic cares attend.

She ended thus; and from her seat arose;
The royal maid attends her, as she goes.
Towards the western gate; where full to view
Expos'd, the armies and the camp she knew.
And now appear'd within the lofty gate,
By Creon sent, the messenger of fate.
His shining blade, for execution bar'd,
And aspect dark, his purpose straight declar'd.
Alarm'd, at once the royal virgins rise,
And, scatt'ring, fill the dome with female cries:
But, bolder from despair, Cassandra staid,
And to th' assassin thus, undaunted, said:
Approach! divide this neck with deathful steel,
A tyrant's vassal no remorse should feel.
O Diomed! let this example prove;
In man, that stubborn honour conquers love:
With weight superior; great ambition draws
The scale for glory, and a public cause.
I blame thee not for this; nor will impeach
A great example, which I could not reach:
For had whole armies, in the balance laid,
And kings and mighty states with thee been weigh'd,

And I the judge appointed to decree,
They all had perished to ransom thee.
Cassandra thus; and for the blow prepar'd,
With both her hands her shining neck she bar'd,

And round her head a purple garment roll'd,
With leaves of silver mark'd, and flow'rs of gold.
Rais'd for the stroke, the glittering falchion hung,
And swift descending, bore the head along.
A tide of gore, diffus'd in purple streams,
Dash'd the wall, and o'er the pavement swims.
Proud to the ground the headless trunk reclines,
And life, in long convulsive throbs, resigns.

Now on the open plain before the walls,
The king of men the chiefs to council calls.
And Diomed, with secret griefs oppress'd,
Impatient, thus the public ear address'd:
Confed'rate kings! and thou, whose sov'reign hand
Sways the dread sceptre of supreme command!
What holds us, and restrains our martial pow'rs;
While haughty Thebes insults us from her tow'rs?

In vain we conquer thus, and bleed in vain,
If victory but yields the empty plain.
Behind his walls, perfidious Creon lies,
And safely meditates a new surprize:
When on the urn our pious tears we pour;
Or mirth disarms us, and the genial hour;
Nø; let us rather, now when fortune calls,
With bold assault, attempt to mount the walls;
Myself the first a chosen band shall lead,
Where you low rampart sink into the mead:
There will I gain the battlements, and lay,
For others to succeed, an open way,
If bars of steel have force their works to tear.

Or, from their hinges heav'd the gates, can bear:
Tydides thus. His counsel to oppose,
The leader of the Cretan warriors rose:
Confed'rate kings! and thou, whose sov'reign hand
Sways the dread sceptre of supreme command!
Let not Tydides now, with martial rage,
In measures hot and rash, the host engage;
To sober reason still let passion yield,
Nor here admit the ardour of the field:
If Thebes could thus with one assault be won,
Her armies vanquish'd, and her walls o'erthrown:
Could this one single day reward our toil,
So long endur'd, with victory and spoil:
No soldier in the ranks, no leader here,
Would shun the fight, or council to forbear.

But if for victory, a foul defeat,
With all the shame and danger of retreat,
Should be the issue, which the wife must dread,
To stop is better, sure, than to proceed.
On yonder walls, and lofty turrets stand,
Not sav'd from shameful flight, a heartless band,
Who, des'p'rate of their state, would soon forego
Their last defences, and admit a foe;
But who, from fight recall'd, without dismay,
A safe retreat maintain'd, in firm array.
Secure they combat from protecting walls;
Thrown from above each weapon heavier falls;
Against such odds, can we the fight maintain,
And with a foe sound equal on the plain?
Though we desist, no leader will oppose
That thus the fruits of victory we lose;
When, pent within their battlements and tow'rs,
In narrow space, we hold the Theban pow'rs:
For oftner, than by arms, are hosts o'erthrown
By dearth and sickness, in a straiten'd town.
He who can only wield the sword and spear,
Knows less than half the instruments of war.

Heart-gnawing hunger, enemy to life,
Wide-wasting pestilence, and civil strife,
By want inflam'd, to all our weapons claim
Superior force, and strike with surer aim:
With these, whoever arm'd to combat goes,
Instructed how to turn them on his foes,
Shall see them foon laid prostrate on the ground,
His aims accomplish'd, and his wishes crown'd.
Our warriors, therefore, let us straight recal,
Nor, by assault, attempt to force the wall;
But with a rampart, to the gates oppos'd,
Besiege, in narrow space, our foes enclos'd.

The hero thus; and, eager to reply,
Tydides rose: when on a turret high
Creon appear'd: Cassandra's head, display'd
Upon a lance's point, he held, and said:
Ye Argive warriors! view the sign; and know,
That Creon never fails to quit a foe.
This bloody trophy mark'd; and if it brings
Grief and despair to any of the kings,
Let him revenge it on the man who broke
His faith, and dar'd my fury to provoke.

He ended thus. Tydides, as he heard,
With rage distract'd, and despair, appear'd.
Long on the tow'r he fix'd his burning eyes;
The rest were mute with wonder and surprise;
But, to the council turning, thus at last:
If any favour claim my merits past;
If, by a present benefit, ye'd bind
To future services a grateful mind;
Let what I urge, in council, now prevail,
With hostile arms yon rampart to assail:
Else, with my native bands, alone I'll try
The combat, fix'd to conquer or to die.

The hero thus. Ulysses thus express'd
The prudent dictates of his generous breast:
Princes! shall dire contention still prelide
In all our councils, and the kings divide?
Sure, of the various ills that can distress
United armies, and prevent success,
Discord is chief: where'er the fury strays,
The parts she severs, and the whole betrays.
Now let Tydides lead his native pow'rs
To combat, and assault the Theban tow'rs;
The rest, on various parts their forces show,
By mock approaches to distract the foe.
If he prevails, to victory he leads;
And safe behind him all the host succeeds:
If Jove forbids and all-decreeing fate,
The field is open, and a safe retreat.

Ulysses thus. The princes all assent;
Straight from the council through the host they went,

Review'd its order, and in front dispos'd
The slingers, and the rear with bowmen clos'd;
Arming the rest with all that could avail,
The tow'rs and battlements to sap or scale.
Tydides first his martial squadrons leads;
Ulysses, with his native band, succeeds.

Upon them, as they came, the Thebans pour
A storm of jav'lines, shot from ev'ry tow'r;
As from the naked heights the feather'd kind,
By bitter show'rs compell'd, and wint'ry wind,
In clouds assembled, from some mountain's head,
To shelter crowd, and dive into the shade;
Such and so thick the winged weapons flew,
And many warriors wounded, many flew.

Now on their ranks, by forceful engines thrown,
Springs, from the twisted rope, the pond'rous stone,
With wide destruction through the host to roll,
To mix disorder and confound the whole.

Intrepid still th' Ætolian chief proceeds;
And still Ulysses follows as he leads.
They reach'd the wall. Tydides, with a bound,
Twice, strove in vain to mount it from the ground.

Twice fled the foe; as, to the boist'rous sway
Of some proud billow, mariners give way;
Which, rous'd by tempests, 'gainst a vessel bends
Its force, and, mounting o'er the deck, ascends:
Again he rose: the third attempt prevail'd;
But, crumbling in his grasp, the rampart fail'd:
For thunder there its fury had impress'd,
And los'd a shatter'd fragment from the rest.
Supine upon the earth the hero falls,
Mix'd with the smoke and ruin of the walls.
By disappointment chaff'd, and fierce from pain,
Unable, now the rampart to regain,
He turn'd, and saw his native bands afar,
By fear restrain'd, and ling'ring in the war.
From Creon straight and Thebes, his anger turns,
And 'gainst his friends, with equal fury, burns;
As when, from snows dissolv'd, or sudden rains,
A torrent swells and roars along the plains;
If, rising to oppose its angry tide,
In full career, it meets a mountain's side;
In foaming eddies, backwards to its source,
It wheels, and rages with inverted course;
So turn'd at once, the fury, in his breast,
Against Ulysses, thus itself express'd:
Author accurs'd, and source of all my woes!
Friend more pernicious than the worst of foes!
By thy suggestions from my purpose sway'd,
I slew Cassandra, and myself betray'd;
Hence, lodg'd within this tortur'd breast, remains
A fury, to inflict eternal pains.

I need not follow, with vindictive spear,
A traitor absent, while a worse is near;
Creon but acted what you well foreknew,
When me unwilling to the fight you drew.
To you the first my vengeance shall proceed,
And then on Creon and myself succeed:
Such sacrifice Cassandra's ghost demands,
And such I'll offer with determin'd hands.

Thus as he spoke, Ulysses pond'ring stood,
Whether by art to sooth his furious mood,
Or, with a sudden hand, his lance to throw,
Preventing, ere it fell, the threaten'd blow.
But, gliding from above, the martial maid
Between them stood, in majesty display'd;
Her radiant eyes with indignation burn'd,
On Diomed their piercing light she turn'd:
And frowning thus: Thy frantic rage restrain;
Else by dread Styx I swear, nor swear in vain,
That proof shall teach you whether mortal might
This arm invincible can match in fight.

Is't not enough that he, whose hoary hairs
Still watch'd your welfare with a father's cares,
Who dar'd, with zeal and courage, to withstand
Your fatal phrenzy, perish'd by your hand?
That, sighting ev'ry tie which princes know,
You leagu'd in secret with a public foe?
And, from your faith by fond affection sway'd,
The kings, the army, and yourself betray'd?

Yet, still unaw'd, from such atrocious deeds,
To more and worse your desp'rate rage proceeds,
And dooms to perish, by a mad decree,
The chief who sav'd alike the host and thee.
Had Thebes prevail'd, and one decisive hour
The victory had fix'd beyond thy pow'r;
These limbs, ere now, had captive fetters worn,
To infamy condemn'd, and hostile scorn;
While fair Cassandra, with her virgin charms,
A prize decreed, had blest some rival's arms.
Did not the worth of mighty Tydeus plead,
Approv'd when living, and rever'd when dead,
For favour to his guilty son, and stand
A rampart to oppose my vengeful hand;
You soon had found how mad it is to wage
War with the gods, and tempt immortal rage.
This Thebes shall know, ere to the ocean's streams

The sun again withdraws his setting beams;
For now the gods consent, in vengeance just,
For all her crimes, to mix her with the dust.
The goddesses thus; and turning to the field,
Her deity in Mentor's form conceal'd:
With courage new each warrior's heart inspires,
And wakes again, in all their martial fires.

Conscious of wrong, and speechless from fur-
prife,

Tydidus stood, nor dar'd to lift his eyes,
Of fate regardless; though from ev'ry tow'r,
Stones, darts, and arrows fell, a mingled show'r:
For awe divine subdu'd him, and the shame
Which virtue suffers from the touch of blame.
But to Ulysses turning, thus at last:
Prince! can thy generous love forget the past;
And all remembrance banish from thy mind,
Of what my fury and despair design'd?
If you forgive me, straight our pow'rs recal
Who shun the fight, while I attempt the wall.
Some present god inspires me; for I feel
My heart exulting knock the plated steel:
In brisker rounds the vital spirit flies,
And ev'ry limb with double force supplies.

Tydidus thus. Ulysses thus again
Shall heav'n forgive offences, man retain;
Though born to err, by jarring passions tof'd?
The best, in good, no steadiness can boast:
No malice, therefore, in my heart shall live;
To sin is human; human to forgive.
But do not now your single force oppose
To lofty ramparts and an host of foes;
Let me at least, attending at your side,
Partake the danger, and the toil divide:
For see our pow'rs advancing to the storm!
Pallas excites them in a mortal form.
Let us, to mount the rampart, straight proceed;
They of themselves will follow as we lead.

Ulysses thus; and, springing from the ground,
Both chiefs at once ascend the lofty mound.
Before him each his shining buckler bears
Gainst flying darts, and thick portended spears.
Now, on the bulwark's level top they stand,
And charge on ev'ry side the hostile band:
There many warriors in close fight they slew,
And many headlong from the rampart threw.
Pallas her fav'rite champions still inspires,
Their nerves confirms, and wakes their martial

With course divided, on the foe they fall,
And bare between them leave a length of wall;
As fire, when kindled on some mountain's head,
Where runs, in long extent, the woodland shade,
Consumes the middle forest, and extends
Its parted progress to the distant ends:
So fought the leaders, while their scatter'd
pow'rs,

In phalanx join'd, approach'd the Theban tow'rs;
With hands and heads against the rampart
lean'd,

The first, upon their shields, the rest sustain'd:
Rank above rank, the living structure grows,
As settling bees the pendent heap compose,
Which to some cavern's roof united clings,
Woven thick with complicated feet and wings:
Thus mutually sustain'd, the warriors bend;
While o'er their heads the order'd ranks ascend.

And now the martial goddesses with delight,
Plac'd on a turret's top, survey'd the fight.
Thrice to the height the rais'd her awful voice;
The tow'rs and bulwarks trembled at the noise:
Both warring hosts alike the signal hear;
To this the cause of hope, to that, of fear.

And Theseus thus address'd his martial train:
Here shall we wage a distant war in vain,
When now, Tydides, from the conquer'd tow'rs
Descending, on the town his warriors pours?
Your glory, if ye would assert, nor yield
At once the praise of many a well-fought field;
Ascend these lofty battlements, and claim
With those who conquer, now an equal fame.
The monarch thus; and to the combat leads;
With emulation fir'd, the host proceeds;
Under a show'r of falling darts they go,
Climb the steep ramparts, and assault the foe;
As winds outrageous, from the ocean wide,
Against some mole impel the stormy tide,
Whose rocky arms, opposed to the deep,
From tempests safe the anchoring vessel keep;
Wave heap'd on wave, the stormy deluge tow'rs,
And o'er it, with resistless fury, pours:
Such seem'd the fight, the Theban host o'er-thrown,

The wall deserts, and mingles with the town.
Creon in vain the desp'rate rout withstands,
With sharp reproaches and vindictive hands;
His rage they shun not, nor his threat'nings hear,
From stunning clamours deaf, and blind from fear.
And thus the monarch with uplifted eyes,
And both his hands extended to the skies:
Ye pow'rs supreme, whose unresisted sway
The fates of men and mortal things obey!
Against your counsels, vain it is to strive,
Which only ruin nations or retrieve.

Here in your fight, with patience, I resign
That envy'd royalty which once was mine;
Renounce the cares that wait upon a crown,
And make my last attention all my own.
Seven virgin daughters in my house remain,
Who must not live to swell a victor's train;
Nor shall my wretched queen, in triumph borne,
Be lifted to the eye of public scorn:
One common fate our miseries shall end,
And, with the dust of Thebes, our ashes blend.

His fix'd decree the monarch thus express'd
One half the fates confirm'd, deny'd the rest:

For now surrounded by the hostile crowd
 His captive queen an humble suppliant stood.
 Tydides found her as she left the walls;
 Before the hero to the ground she falls; [press'd,
 With trembling hands, his mighty knees she
 And, supplicating, thus with tears address'd:
 Illustrious chief! for sure your gallant mien
 No less proclaims you, spare a wretched queen;
 One whom the gods with endless hate pursue,
 To griefs already sumless adding new;
 O spare a helpless wretch, who humbly bends,
 And for protection on thy might depends!
 As supplicating thus her suit she press'd,
 Ulysses heard, and thus the chief address'd:
 See how th' immortals, by a just decree,
 Cassandra's fall avengè, and honour thee!
 See, at thy feet, the wife of Ceron laid,
 A victim offer'd for the injur'd maid,

Let her the first your just resentment feel;
 By heav'n presented to your vengeful steel.
 Ulysses thus. With sighs the hero said:
 Enough is offer'd to Cassandra's shade;
 With wide destruction, wasting sword and fire,
 To plague the authors of her fall, conspire.
 Yet all in vain. No sacrifice recalls
 The parted ghost from Pluto's gloomy walls.
 Too long, alas! has lawless fury rul'd,
 To reason deaf, by no reflection cool'd:
 While I unhappy, by its dictates sway'd,
 My guardian murder'd, and the host betray'd,
 No victim, therefore, to my rage I'll pay;
 Nor ever follow as it points the way.
 The son of Tydeus thus; and to his tent,
 From insults safe, the royal matron sent.
 Himself again the course of conquest led
 Till Thebes was overthrown, and Creon bled.

A D R E A M.

IN THE MANNER OF SPENSER.

I.

ONE ev'ning as by pleasant Forth I stray'd,
 In pensive mood, and meditated still
 On poets' learned toil, with scorn repaid
 By envy's bitter spite, and want of skill;
 A cave I found, which open'd in a hill.
 The floor was sand, with various shells blended,
 Through which, in slow meanders, crept a rill;
 The roof, by nature's cunning flight suspended:
 Thither my steps I turn'd, and there my journey ended.

II.

Upon the ground my listless limbs I laid,
 Lull'd by the murmur of the passing stream:
 Then sleep, soft stealing, did my eyes invade;
 And waking thought, soon ended in a dream.
 Transported to a region I did seem;
 Which with Theſſalian Tempe might compare;
 Of verdant shade compos'd, and wat'ry gleam:
 Not even Valdarna, thought so passing fair,
 Might match this pleasant land, in all perfections rare.

III.

One, like a hoary palmer, near a brook,
 Under an arbour, seated did appear;
 A shepherd swain, attending, held a book,
 And seem'd to read therein that he mote hear.
 From curiosity I stepped near;
 But ere I reach'd the place where they did sit,
 The whiff'ring breezes wasted to my ear
 The sound of rhymes which I myself had writ:
 Rhymes much, alas, too mean, for such a judge unfit.

IV.

For him he seem'd who sung Achilles' rage,
 In lofty numbers that shall never die;
 And wife Ulysses' tedious pilgrimage,
 So long the sport of sharp adversity:
 The praises of his merit, same on high,

With her shrill trump, for ever loud doth sound;
 With him no bard for excellence can vie,
 Of all that late or ancient e'er were found;
 So much he doth surpass ev'n bards the most re-nown'd.

V.

The shepherd swain invited me to come
 Up to the arbour where they seated were;
 For Homer call'd me: much I fear'd the doom
 Which such a judge seem'd ready to declare.
 As I approach'd, with mickle dread and care,
 He thus address'd me: Sir, the cause explain
 Why all your story here is told so bare?
 Few circumstances mix'd of various grain;
 Such, surely, much enrich and raise a poet's strain.

VI.

Certes, quoth I, the critics are the cause
 Of this, and many other mischiefs more;
 Who tie the Muses to such rigid laws,
 That all their songs are frivolous and poor.
 They cannot now, as oft they did before,
 Ere pow'ful prejudice had clipt their wings,
 Nature's domain with boundless flight explore,
 And traffic freely in her precious things:
 Each bard now fears the rod, and trembles while he sings.

VII.

Though Shakspeare, still disdain'g narrow rules,
 His bosom fill'd with Nature's sacred fire,
 Broke all the cobweb limits fix'd by fools,
 And left the world to blame him and admire.
 Yet his reward few mortals would desire;
 For, of his learned toil, the only meed
 That ever I could find he did acquire,
 Is that our dull, degenerate, age of lead,
 Says that he wrote by chance, and that he scarce
 could read.

VIII.

I ween, quoth he, that poets are to blame
 When they submit to critics' tyranny:
 For learned wights there is no greater shame,
 That blindly with their dictates to comply.
 Who ever taught the eagle how to fly,
 Whose wit did e'er his airy tract define,
 When with free wing he claims his native sky,
 Say, will he steer his course by rule and line?
 Certes, he'd scorn the bounds that would his flight confine.

IX.

Not that the Muses' art is void of rules:
 Many there are, I wot, and stricter far,
 Than those which peasants dictate from the schools,
 Who wage with wit and taste eternal war:
 For foggy ignorance their sight doth mar;
 Nor can their low conception ever reach
 To what dame Nature, crown'd with many a star,
 Explains to such as know her learned speech;
 But few can comprehend the lessons she doth teach.

X.

As many as the stars that gild the sky,
 As many as the flow'rs that paint the ground,
 In number like the insect tribes that fly,
 The various forms of beauty still are found;
 That with strict limits no man may them bound,
 And say that this, and this alone, is right:
 Experience soon such rashness would confound,
 And make its folly obvious to the light;
 For such presumption sure becomes not mortal
 wight.

XI.

Therefore each bard should freely entertain
 The hints which pleasing fancy gives at will;
 Nor curb her sallies with too strict a rein,
 Nature subjecting to her hand-maid skill:
 And you yourself in this have done but ill;
 With many more, who have not comprehended
 That genius, cramped, will rarely mount the hill,
 Whose forked summit with the clouds is blended:
 Therefore, when next you write, let this defect be mended.

XII.

But, like a friend, who candidly reproves
 For faults and errors which he doth espy,
 Each vice he freely marks; yet always loves
 To mingle favour with severity.
 Certes, quoth he, I cannot well deny,
 That you in many things may hope to please:
 You force a barbarous northern tongue to ply,
 And bend it to your purposes with ease;
 Though rough as Albion's rocks, and hoarser than her seas.

XIII.

Nor are your tales, I wot, so loosely yok'd,
 As those which Colin Clout * did tell before;
 Nor with description crowded so, and chok'd,
 Which, thinly spread, will always please the more.
 Colin, I wot, was rich in Nature's store;
 More rich than you, had more than he could use:
 But mad Orlando † taught him, had his lore;

* Spenser.

† Ariosto, so called from his hero.

Whose flights, at random, oft misled his muse:
 To follow such a guide, few prudent men would choose.

XIV.

Me you have follow'd: Nature was my guide;
 To this the merit of your verse is owing:
 And know for certain, let it check your pride,
 That all you boast of is of my bestowing.
 The flow'rs I see, through all your garden blowing,
 Are mine; most part, at least: I might demand,
 Might claim them, as a crop of my own sowing,
 And leave but few, thin scatter'd o'er the land:
 A claim so just, I wot, you could not well withstand.

XV.

Certes, quoth I, that justice were full hard,
 Which me alone would sentence to restore;
 When many a learned sage, and many a bard,
 Are equally your debtors, or much more.
 Let Tityrus * himself produce his store,
 Take what is thine, but little will remain:
 Little, I wot, and that indebted fore
 To Ascras' bard †, and Arethusa's swain ‡;
 And others too beside; who lent him many a strain.

XVI.

Nor could the modern bards afford to pay,
 Whose songs exalt the champions of the Cross;
 Take from each hoard thy sterling gold away,
 And little will remain but worthless dross.
 Not bards alone could ill support the loss;
 But sages too, whose theft suspicion shunn'd:
 Ev'n that fly Greek, §, who steals and hides so close,
 Were half a bankrupt, if he should refund,
 While these are all forborn, shall I alone be dunn'd.

XVII.

He smil'd; and from his wrath, which well could spare
 Such boon, the wreath with which his locks were clad,
 Pluck'd a few leaves to hide my temples bare;
 The present I receiv'd with heart full glad.
 Henceforth, quoth I, I never will be sad;
 For now I shall obtain my share of fame:
 Nor will licentious wit, or envy bad,
 With bitter taunts, my verses dare to blame:
 This garland shall protect them, and exalt my name.

XVIII.

But dreams are short; for as I thought to lay
 My limbs, at ease, upon the flow'ry ground,
 And drink, with greedy ear, what he might say,
 As murmur'ing waters sweet, or music's sound,
 My sleep departed; and I, waking, found
 Myself again by Forth's pleasant stream.
 Homewards I stepp'd, in meditation drown'd,
 Reflecting on the meaning of my dream;
 Which let each wight interpret as him best doth seem.

* Virgil. † Hesiod. ‡ Theocritus.

§ Plato, reckoned by Longinus one of the greatest imitators of Homer.

F A B L E S.

TO THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE.

MY LORD,

IT is undoubtedly an uneasy situation to lie under great obligations, without being able to make suitable returns: all that can be done in this case, is, to acknowledge the debt, which (though it does not entitle to an acquittance) is looked upon as a kind of compensation, being all that gratitude has in its power.

This is in a peculiar manner my situation with respect to your Lordship. What you have done for me with the most uncommon favour and condescension is what I shall never be able to repay; and, therefore, have used the freedom to recommend the following performance to your protection, that I might have an opportunity of acknowledging my obligations in the most public manner.

It is evident, that the world will hardly allow my gratitude upon this occasion to be disinterested. Your distinguished rank, the additional honours derived from the lustre of your ancestors, your own uncommon abilities, equally adapted to the service of your country in peace and in war, are circumstances sufficient to make any author ambitious of your Lordship's patronage. But I must do myself the justice to insist, it is upon the account of distinctions less splendid, though far more interesting (those, I mean, by which you are distinguished as the friend of human nature, the guide and patron of unexperienced youth, and the father of the poor), that I am zealous of subscribing myself,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's

Most humble, and

Most devoted Servant,

WILLIAM WILKIE.

F A B L E I.

THE YOUNG LADY AND THE LOOKING-GLASS.

YE deep philosophers who can
Explain that various creature, man,
Say, is there any point so nice,
As that of offering an advice?
To bid your friend his errors mend,
Is almost certain to offend:
Though you in softest terms advise,
Confess him good; admit him wise;
In vain you sweeten the discourse,
He thinks you call him fool, or worse;
You paint his character, and try
If he will own it, and apply.
Without a name reprove and warn:
Here none are hurt, and all may learn;
This, too, must fail, the picture shown,
No man will take it for his own.
In moral lectures treat the case,
Say this is honest, that is base;
In conversation none will bear it;
And for the pulpit, few come near it.
And is there then no other way
A moral lesson to convey?

Must all that shall attempt to teach,
Admonish, satirize, or preach?
Yes, there is one, an ancient art,
By fables found to reach the heart,
Ere science with distinctions nice,
Had fix'd what virtue is and vice,
Inventing all the various names
On which the moralist declaims:
They would by simple tales advise,
Which took the hearer by surprise;
Alarm'd his conscience, unprepared,
Ere pride had put it on its guard;
And made him from himself receive
The lessons which they meant to give.
That this device will oft prevail,
And gain its end when others fail,
If any shall pretend to doubt,
The tale which follows it makes out.
There was a little stubborn dame
Whom no authority could tame,
Refrive by long indulgence grown,
No will she minded but her own:

At trifles oft she'd scold and fret,
 Then in a corner take a seat,
 And sourly moping all the day
 Disdain alike to work or play.
 Papa all softer arts had try'd,
 And sharper remedies apply'd;
 But both were vain, for every course
 He took still made her worse and worse.
 'Tis strange to think how female wit,
 So oft should make a lucky hit,
 When man with all his high pretence
 To deeper judgment, sounder sense,
 Will err, and measures false pursue—
 'Tis very strange I own, but true—
 Mama observ'd the rising lads,
 By stealth retiring to the glafs,
 To practise little airs unseen,
 In the true genius of thirteen:
 On this a deep design she laid
 To tame the humour of the maid;
 Contriving like a prudent mother
 To make one folly cure another.
 Upon the wall against the seat
 Which Jessy us'd for her retreat,
 Whene'er by accident offended,
 A looking-glass was straight suspended,
 That it might show her how deform'd
 She look'd, and frightful when she storm'd;
 And warn her as the priz'd her beauty,
 To bend her humour to her duty,
 All this the looking-glass achiev'd,
 Its threats were munded and believ'd.
 The maid who spurn'd at all advice,
 Grew tame and gentle in a trice;
 So when all other means had fail'd
 The silent monitor prevail'd.
 Thus, fable to the human kind
 Presents an image of the mind,
 It is a mirror where we spy
 At large our own deformity,
 And learn of course those faults to mend
 Which but to mention would offend.

FABLE II.

THE KITE AND THE ROOKS.

You say 'tis vain in verse or prose
 To tell what ev'ry body knows,
 And stretch invention to express
 Plain truths which all men will confess:
 Go on the argument to mend,
 Prove that to know is to attend,
 And that we ever keep in sight
 What reason tells us once is right;
 Till this is done you must excuse
 The zeal and freedom of my muse
 In hinting to the human-kind,
 What few deny but fewer mind:
 There is a folly which we blame,
 'Tis strange that it should want a name,
 For sure no other finds a place
 So often in the human race,
 I mean the tendency to spy
 Our neighbour's faults with sharpen'd eye,
 And make his lightest failings known,
 Without attending to our own.

The prude in daily use to vex
 With groundless censure half the sex,
 Of rigid virtue honour nice,
 And much a foe to every vice,
 Tells lies without remorse and shame,
 Yet never thinks herself to blame.
 A scriv'ner, though afraid to kill,
 Yet scruples not to forge a will;
 Abhors the soldier's bloody seats,
 While he as freely damns all cheats:
 The reason's plain, 'tis not his way
 To lie, to cozen and betray.
 But tell me if to take by force,
 Is not as bad at least, or worse.
 The pimp who owns it as his trade
 To potch for lechers, and be paid,
 Thinks himself honest in his station,
 But rails at rogues that sell the nation
 Nor would he stoop in any case,
 And stain his honour for a place.
 To mark this error of mankind
 The tale which follows is design'd.

A flight of rooks one harvest morn
 Had stoop'd upon a field of corn,
 Just when a kite as authors say,
 Was passing on the wing that way:
 His honest heart was fill'd with pain,
 To see the farmer lose his grain,
 So lighting gently on a stock
 He thus the foragers bespoke:
 "Believe me, Sirs, your much to blame,
 'Tis strange that neither fear nor shame
 Can keep you from your usual way
 Of stealth, and pilf'ring every day.
 No sooner has the industrious swain
 His field turn'd up and sow'd the grain,
 But ye come flocking on the wing,
 Prepar'd to snatch it ere it spring:
 And after all his toil and care
 Leave every furrow spoil'd and bare:
 If ought escapes your greedy bills,
 Which nurs'd by fammer grows and fills,
 'Tis still your prey: and though ye know
 No rook did ever till or sow,
 Ye boldly reap, without regard
 To justice, industry's reward,
 And use it freely as your own,
 Though men and cattle shou'd get none.
 I never did in any case
 Descend to practices so base.
 Though stung with hunger's sharpest pain
 I still have scorn'd to touch a grain,
 Ev'n when I had it in my pow'r
 To do't with safety every hour:
 For, trust me, nought that can be gain'd
 Is worth a character unflain'd."

Thus with a face austere grave
 Harangu'd the hypocrite and knave;
 And answering from amidst the flock
 A rook with indignation spoke.
 "What has been said is strictly true,
 Yet comes not decently from you;
 For sure it indicates a mind
 From selfish passions more than blind,
 To misg your greater crimes, and quote
 Our lighter failings thus by rote.

I must confess we wrong the swain
 Too oft by pilf'ring of his grain:
 But is our guilt like yours, I pray,
 Who rob and murder every day?
 No harmless bird can mount the skies
 But you attack him as he flies;
 And when at eve he lights to rest,
 You stoop and snatch him from his nest.
 The husbandman who seems to share
 So large a portion from your care,
 Say, is he ever off his guard,
 While you are hov'ring o'er the yard?
 He knows too well your usual tricks
 Your ancient spite to tender chicks,
 And that you like a felon watch,
 For something to surprize and snatch."
 At this rebuke so just, the kite
 Surpris'd, abash'd, and silenc'd quite,
 And prov'd a villain to his face,
 Straight soar'd aloft and left the place.

FABLE III.

THE MUSE AND THE SHEPHERD.

LET every bard who seeks applause
 Be true to virtue and her cause,
 Nor ever try to raise his fame
 By praising that which merits blame;
 The vain attempt he needs must rue,
 For disappointment will ensue.
 Virtue with her superior charms
 Exalts the poet's soul and warms,
 His taste refines, his genius fires,
 Like Phœbus and the nine inspires;
 While vice though seemingly approv'd
 Is coldly flatter'd, never lov'd.

Palemon once a story told,
 Which by conjecture must be old:
 I have a kind of half conviction
 That at the best 'tis but a fiction;
 But taken right and understood,
 The moral certainly is good.

A shepherd swain was wont to sing
 The infant beauties of the spring,
 The bloom of summer, winter hoar,
 The autumn rich in various store;
 And prais'd in numbers strong and clear
 The Ruler of the changeful year.
 To human themes he'd next descend,
 The shepherd's harmless life commend,
 And prove him happier than the great
 With all their pageantry and state;
 Who oft for pleasure and for wealth,
 Exchange their innocence and health;
 The Muses listen'd to his lays;
 And crown'd him as he sung with bays.
 Euterpe, goddess of the lyre,
 A harp bestow'd with golden wire:
 And oft wou'd teach him how to sing,
 Or touch with art the trembling string.
 His fame o'er all the mountains flew,
 And to his cot the shepherds drew;
 They heard his music with delight,
 Whole summer days from morn to night:

Nor did they ever think him long,
 Such was the magic of his song:
 Some rural present each prepar'd,
 His skill to honour and reward;
 A flute, a sheep-hook or a lamb,
 Or kidding follow'd by its dam:
 For bards it seems in earlier days,
 Got something more than empty praise.
 All this continued for a while,
 But soon our songster chang'd his style,
 Infected with the common itch,
 His gains to double and grow rich:
 Or fondly seeking new applause,
 Or this or t'other was the cause;
 One thing is certain that his rhimes
 Grew more obsequious to the times,
 Less stiff and formal, alter'd quite
 To what a courtier calls polite.
 Whoe'er grew rich, by right or wrong,
 Became the hero of a song:
 No nymph or shepherdess could wed,
 But he must sing the nuptial bed,
 And still was ready to recite
 The secret transports of the night,
 In strains too luscious for the ear
 Of sober chastity to bear.
 Astonish'd at a change so great,
 No more the shepherds fought his seat,
 But in their place a horned crowd
 Of satyrs flock'd from every wood,
 Drawn by the magic of his lay,
 To dance, to frolic, sport, and play.
 The goddesses of the lyre disdain'd
 To see her sacred gift profan'd,
 And gliding swiftly to the place,
 With indignation in her face,
 The trembling shepherd thus address'd,
 In awful majesty confess'd.

"Thou wretched fool, that harp resign,
 For know it is no longer thine;
 It was not given you to inspire
 A herd like this with loose desire,
 Nor to assist that venal praise
 Which vice may purchase, if it pays:
 Such offices my lyre disgrace;
 Here take this bagpipe in its place.
 'Tis fitter far, believe it true,
 Both for these miscreants and you."

The swain dismay'd, without a word,
 Submitted, and the harp restor'd.

FABLE IV.

THE GRASSHOPPER AND THE GLOWWORM.

WHEN ignorance possess'd the schools,
 And reign'd by Aristotle's rules,
 Ere Verulam, like dawning light,
 Rose to dispel the Gothic night:
 A man was taught to shut his eyes,
 And grow abstracted to be wise.
 Nature's broad volume fairly spread,
 Where all true science might be read,
 The wisdom of th' Eternal Mind,
 Declar'd and publish'd to mankind.

Was quite neglected, for the whims
Of mortals and their airy dreams:
By narrow principles and few,
By hasty maxims, oft untrue,
By words and phrases ill-defin'd,
Evasive truth they hop'd to bind;
Which still escap'd them, and the elves
At last caught nothing but themselves.
Nor is this folly modern quite,
'Tis ancient too; the Stagyrice
Improv'd at first, and taught his school
By rules of art to play the fool.
Ev'n Plato, from example bad,
Would oft turn sophist, and run mad:
Makes Socrates himself discourse
Like Clarke and Leibnitz, oft-times worse;
'Bout quirks and subtilties contending,
Beyond all human comprehending,
From some strange bias men pursue
False knowledge still in place of true,
Build airy systems of their own,
This moment rais'd, the next pull'd down;
While few attempt to catch those rays
Of truth which nature still displays
Throughout the universal plan,
From moss and mushrooms up to man.
This sure were better, but we hate
To borrow when we can create;
And therefore stupidly prefer
Our own conceits, by which we err,
To all the wisdom to be gain'd
From nature and her laws explain'd.

One ev'ning, when the sun was set,
A grasshopper and glowworm met
Upon a hillock in a dale,
As Mab the fairy tells the tale.
Vain and conceited of his spark,
Which brighten'd as the night grew dark,
The shining reptile swell'd with pride
To see his rays on every side,
Mark'd by a circle on the ground
Of livid light, some inches round.

Quoth he, if glowworms never shone,
To light the earth when day is gone,
In spite of all the stars that burn,
Primeval darkness would return:
They're less and dimmer, one may see,
Besides much farther off than we;
And therefore through a long descent
Their light is scatter'd quite and spent:
While ours, compact and at hand,
Keeps night and darkness at a stand,
Diffus'd around in many a ray,
Whose brightness emulates the day.

This pass'd and more without dispute,
The patient grasshopper was mute:
But soon the east began to glow
With light appearing from below,
And level from the ocean's streams
The moon emerging shot her beams,
'To gild the mountains and the woods,
And shake and glitter on the floods.
The glowworm, when he found his light
Grow pale, and faint, and vanish quite,
Before the moon's prevailing ray,
Began his envy to display.

That globe, quoth he, which seems so fair,
Which brightens all the earth and air,
And sends its beams so far abroad,
Is nought, believe me, but a clod;
A thing, which, if the sun were gone,
Has no more light in't than a stone,
Subsisting merely by supplies
From Phœbus in the nether skies:
My light, indeed, I must confess,
On some occasions will be less;
But spite itself will hardly say
I'm debtor for a single ray;
'Tis all my own, and on the score
Of merit mounts to ten times more
Than any planet can demand
For light dispens'd at second hand.

To hear the paltry insect boast
The grasshopper all patience lost.

Quoth he, my friend, it may be so,
The moon with borrow'd light may glow;
That your faint glimm'ring is your own,
I think is question'd yet by none:
But sure the office to collect
The solar brightness and reflect,
To catch those rays that would be spent
Quite useless in the firmament,
And turn them downwards on the shade
Which absence of the sun has made,
Amounts to more, in point of merit,
Than all your tribe did e'er inherit:
Oft by that planet's friendly ray
The midnight traveller finds his way;
Safe by the favour of his beams
'Midst precipices, lakes, and streams;
While you mislead him, and your light,
Seen like a cottage lamp by night,
With hopes to find a safe retreat,
Allures and tempts him to his fate:
As this is so, I needs must call
The merit of your light but small:
You need not boast on't though your own;
'Tis light, indeed, but worse than none;
Unlike to what the moon supplies,
Which you call borrow'd, and despise.

FABLE V.

THE APE, THE PARROT, AND THE JACKDAW.

I HOLD it rash at any time
To deal with fools dispos'd to rhyme;
Disuasive arguments provoke
Their utmost rage as soon as spoke;
Encourage them, and for a day
Or two you're safe, by giving way:
But when they find themselves betray'd,
On you at last the blame is laid.
They hate and scorn you as a traitor,
The common lot of those who flatter:
But can a scribbler, Sir, be shunn'd?
What will you do when teaz'd and dunn'd?
When watch'd, and caught, and closely press'd,
When complimented and address'd:
When Bavius greets you with a bow,
"Sir, please to read a line or two."
If you approve, and say they're clever,
"You make me happy, Sir, for ever."

What can be done? the case is plain,
 No methods of escape remain:
 You're fairly noos'd, and must consent
 To bear, what nothing can prevent,
 A coxcomb's anger; and your fate
 Will be to suffer soon, or late.

An ape, that was the sole delight
 Of an old woman, day and night,
 Indulg'd at table and in bed,
 Attended like a child, and fed:
 Who knew each trick, and twenty more
 Than ever monkey play'd before,
 At last grew frantic, and would try,
 In spite of nature's laws, to fly.
 Oft from the window would he view
 The passing swallows as they flew,
 Observe them fluttering round the walls,
 Or gliding o'er the smooth canals:
 He too must fly, and cope with these;
 For this and nothing else would please:
 Oft thinking from the window's height,
 Three stories down to take his flight:
 He still was something loth to venture,
 As tending strongly to the centre:
 And knowing that the least mistake
 Might cost a limb, perhaps his neck:
 The case you'll own was something nice;
 He thought it best to ask advice;
 And to the parrot straight applying,
 Allow'd to be a judge of flying,
 He thus began: "You'll think me rude,
 Forgive me if I do intrude,
 For you alone my doubts can clear
 In something that concerns me near:
 Do you imagine, if I try,
 That I shall e'er attain to fly?
 The project's whimsical no doubt,
 But, ere you censure, hear me out:
 That liberty's our greatest blessing
 You'll grant me without farther pressing;
 To live confin'd, 'tis plain and clear
 Is something very hard to bear:
 This you must know, who for an age
 Have been kept pris'n'ner in a cage,
 Deny'd the privilege to soar
 With boundless freedom as before.
 I have, 'tis true, much greater scope
 Than you, my friend, can ever hope;
 I traverse all the house, and play
 My tricks and gambols every day:
 Oft with my mistresses in a chair
 I ride abroad to take the air:
 Make visits with her, walk at large,
 A maid or footman's constant charge.
 Yet this is nothing, for I find Myself still hamper'd and confin'd;
 A grov'ling thing: I fain would rise
 Above the earth, and mount the skies:
 The meanest birds, and insects too,
 This feat with greatest ease can do.
 To that gay creature turn about
 That's beating on the pane without!
 Ten days ago, perhaps but five,
 A worm, it scarcely seem'd alive:
 By threads suspended, tough and small,
 'Midst dusty cobwebs on a wall;

Now dress'd in all the diff'rent dyes
 That vary in the ev'ning skies,
 He soars at large, and on the wing
 Enjoys with freedom all the spring;
 Skims the fresh lakes, and rising sees
 Beneath him far the loftiest trees:
 And when he rests, he makes his bow'r
 The cup of some delicious flow'r.
 Shall creatures so obscurely bred,
 On mere corruption nurs'd and fed,
 A glorious privilege obtain,
 Which I can never hope to gain?
 Shall I, like man's imperial race
 In manners, customs, shape, and face,
 Expert in all ingenious tricks,
 To tumble, dance, and leap o'er sticks,
 Who know to footh and coax my betters,
 And match a beau, at least in letters;
 Shall I despair, and never try
 (What meanest insects can) to fly?
 Say, mayn't I without dread or care
 At once commit me to the air,
 And not fall down and break my bones
 Upon those hard and flinty stones?
 Say, if to stir my limbs before
 Will make me glide along or soar?
 All things they say are learn'd by trying:
 No doubt it is the same with flying.
 I wait your judgment with respect,
 And shall proceed as you direct,

Poor poll, with gen'rous pity mov'd,
 The ape's fond rafhness thus reprov'd:
 For, though instructed by mankind,
 Her tongue to candour still inclin'd.

My friend, the privilege to rise
 Above the earth, and mount the skies,
 Is glorious sure, and 'tis my fate
 To feel the want on't with regret;
 A pris'n'ner to a cage confin'd,
 Though wing'd and of the flying kind.
 With you the case is not the same,
 You're quite terrestrial by your frame,
 And should be perfectly content
 With your peculiar element:
 You have no wings, I pray reflect,
 To lift you and your course direct;
 Those arms of yours will never do,
 Not twenty in the place of two;
 They ne'er can lift you from the ground,
 For broad and long, they're thick and round,
 And therefore if you choose the way,
 To leap the window, as you say,
 'Tis certain that you'll be the jest
 Of every insect, bird, and beast;
 When you lie batter'd by your fall
 Just at the bottom of the wall.
 Be prudent then, improve the pow'r
 Which nature gives in place of ours.
 You'll find them readily conduce
 At once to pleasure and to use.
 But airy whims and crotchets lead
 To certain loss, and ne'er succeed;
 As folks, though inly vex'd and teaz'd,
 Will oft seem satisfi'd and pleas'd.
 The ape approv'd of every word
 At this time utter'd by the bird:

But nothing in opinion chang'd,
Thought only how to be reveng'd.
It happen'd when the day was fair,
That Poll was fet to take the air,
Just where the Monkey oft sat poring
About experiments in soaring:
Dissembling his contempt and rage,
He slept up softly to the cage,
And with a sly malicious grin,
Accosted thus the bird within.
You say, I am not form'd for flight;
In this you certainly are right:
'Tis very plain upon reflection,
But to yourself there's no objection,
Since flying is the very trade
For which the winged race is made;
And therefore for our mutual sport,
I'll make you fly, you can't be hurt.
With that he slyly slipt the string
Which held the cage up by the ring.
In vain the Parrot begg'd and pray'd,
No word was minded that the said:
Down went the cage, and on the ground
Bruis'd and half-dead poor Poll was found.
Pug who for some time had attended
To that alone which now was ended,
Again had leisure to pursue
The project he had first in view.

Quoth he, a person, if he's wife
Will only with his friends advise,
They know his temper and his parts,
And have his interest near their hearts.
In matters which he should forbear,
They'll hold him back with prudent care,
But never from an envious spirit
Forbid him to display his merit;
Or judging wrong from spleen and hate
His talents slight or underrate;
I acted sure with small reflection
In asking counsel and direction
From a sly minion whom I know
To be my rival and my foe:
One who will constantly endeavour
To hurt me in our lady's favour,
And watch and plot to keep me down,
From obvious interests of her own:
But on the top of that old tow'r
An honest Daw has made his bow'r;
A faithful friend whom one may trust,
My debtor too for many a crust;
Which in the window oft I lay,
For him to come and take away:
From gratitude no doubt he'll give
Such counsel as I may receive;
Well back'd with reasons strong and plain
To push me forward or restrain.

One morning when the Daw appear'd,
The project was propos'd and heard:
And though the bird was much surpris'd
To find friend Pug so ill advis'd,
He rather chose that he should try
At his own proper risk to fly,
Than hazard, in a case so nice,
To shock him by too free advice.

Quoth he, I'm certain that you'll find
The project answer to your mind;
Without suspicion, dread or care,
At once commit you to the air;

You'll soar aloft, or, if you please,
Proceed straight forwards at your ease:
The whole depends on resolution,
Which you possess from constitution;
And if you follow as I lead,
'Tis past a doubt you must succeed.

So saying, from the turret's height,
The Jackdaw shot with downward flight,
And on the edge of a canal,
Some fifty paces from the wall,
'Lighted, obsequious to attend
The Monkey when he should descend:
But he, although he had believ'd
The flatterer and was deceiv'd,
Felt some misgivings at his heart
In vent'ring on so new an art:
But yet at last 'tween hope and fear
Himself he trusted to the air,
And far'd like him whom poets mention
With Dedalus's old invention:
Directly downwards on his head
He fell, and lay an hour for dead.

The various creatures in the place
Had diff'rent thoughts upon the case,
From some his fate compassion drew,
But those I must confess were few:
The rest esteem'd him rightly serv'd,
And in the manner he deserv'd,
For playing tricks beyond his sphere,
Nor thought the punishment severe.
They gather'd round him as he lay,
And jeer'd him when he limp'd away.

Pug disappointed thus and hurt,
And grown besides the public sport,
Found all his different passions change
At once to fury and revenge:
The Daw 'twas useless to pursue,
His helpless brood as next in view,
With unrelenting paws he seiz'd,
One's neck he wrung, another squeeze'd,
Till of the number four or five,
No single bird was left alive.

Thus counsellors, in all regards
Though different, meet with like rewards:
The story shows the certain fate
Of every mortal soon or late,
Whose evil genius for his crimes
Connects with any fop that rhimes.

FABLE VI.

THE ROY AND THE RAINBOW.

DECLARE, ye sages, if ye find
'Mongst animals of ev'ry kind,
Of each condition sort and size,
From whales and elephants to flies,
A creature that mistakes his plan,
And errs so constantly as man.
Each kind pursues his proper good,
And seeks for pleasure, rest and food,
As nature points, and never errs
In what it chooses and prefers;
Man only blunders, though possess
Of talents far above the rest.

Descend to instances and try;
An ox will scarce attempt to fly,
Or leave his pasture in the wood
With fishes to explore the flood.

Man only acts of every creature,
 In opposition to his nature.
 The happiness of human-kind
 Consists in rectitude of mind,
 A will subdu'd to reason's sway,
 And passions practis'd to obey;
 An open and a gen'rous heart,
 Refin'd from selfishness and art;
 Patience which mocks at fortune's pow'r,
 And wisdom never sad nor sour:
 In these consist our proper blifs;
 Else Plato reasons much amifs:
 But foolish mortals still pursue
 False happiness in place of true;
 Ambition serves us for a guide,
 Or lust, or avarice, or pride;
 While reason no assent can gain,
 And revelation warns in vain.
 Hence through our lives in ev'ry stage,
 From infancy itself to age,
 A happiness we toil to find,
 Which still avoids us like the wind;
 Ev'n when we think the prize our own,
 At once 'tis vanish'd, lost and gone.
 You'll ask me why I thus rehearse,
 All Epictetus in my verse,
 And if I fondly hope to please
 With dry reflections, such as these,
 So trite, so hackny'd, and so stale?
 I'll take the hint and tell a tale.

One ev'ning as a simple swain
 His flock attended on the plain,
 The shining bow he chanc'd to spy,
 Which warns us when a show'r is nigh;
 With brightest rays it seem'd to glow,
 Its distance eighty yards or so.
 This bumpkin had it seems been told
 The story of the cup of gold,
 Which fame reports is to be found
 Just where the rainbow meets the ground;
 He therefore felt a sudden itch
 To seize the goblet and be rich;
 Hoping, yet hopes are oft but vain,
 No more to toil through wind and rain,
 But sit indulging by the fire,
 'Midst ease and plenty, like a 'squire:
 He mark'd the very spot of land
 On which the rainbow seem'd to stand,
 And stepping forwards at his leisure
 Expected to have found the treasure.
 But as he mov'd, the colour'd ray
 Still chang'd its place and slipt away,
 As seeming his approach to shun;
 From walking he began to run,
 But all in vain, it still withdrew
 As nimbly as he could pursue;
 At last through many a bog and lake,
 Rough craggy rock and thorny brake,
 It led the ealy fool, till night
 Approach'd, then vanish'd in his sight,
 And left him to compute his gains,
 With nought but labour for his pains.

FABLE VII.

CELIA AND HER MIRROR.

As there are various sorts of minds,
 So friendships are of different kinds

Some, constant when the object's near,
 Soon vanish if it disappear.
 Another sort, with equal flame,
 In absence will be still the same:
 Some folks a trifle will provoke,
 Their weak attachment soon is broke;
 Some great offences only move
 To change in friendship or in love.
 Affection when it has its source
 In things that shift and change of course,
 As these diminish and decay,
 Must likewise fade and melt away.
 But when 'tis of a nobler kind,
 Inspir'd by rectitude of mind,
 Whatever accident arrives,
 It lives, and death itself survives;
 Those different kinds reduc'd to two,
 False friendship may be call'd and true.

In Celia's drawing-room of late
 Some female friends were met to chat;
 Where after much discourse had past,
 A portrait grew the theme at last:
 'Twas Celia's you must understand,
 And by a celebrated hand.
 Says one, that picture sure must strike,
 In all respects it is so like:
 Your very features, shape and air
 Express'd, believe me, to a hair:
 The price I'm sure could not be small—
 Just fifty guineas frame and all—
 That Mirror there is wondrous fine
 I own the bauble cost me nine;
 I'm fairly cheated you may swear,
 For never was a thing so dear:
 Dear—quoth the Looking-glass—and spoke,
 Madam, it would a faint provoke:
 Must that same gaudy thing be own'd
 A pennyworth at fifty pound;
 While I at nine am reckon'd dear,
 'Tis what I never thought to hear.
 Let both our merits now be try'd,
 This fair assembly shall decide;
 And I will prove it to your face,
 That you are partial in the case.
 I give a likeness far more true
 Than any artist ever drew:
 And what is vastly more, express
 Your whole variety of dress:
 From morn to noon, from noon to night,
 I watch each change and paint it right;
 Besides I'm mistress of the art,
 Which conquers and secures a heart.
 I teach you how to use those arms,
 That vary and assist your charms,
 And in the triumphs of the fair,
 Claim half the merit for my share:
 So when the truth is fairly told,
 I'm worth at least my weight in gold:
 But that vain thing of which you speak
 Becomes quite useless in a week.
 For, though it had no other vice,
 'Tis out of fashion in a trice,
 The cap is chang'd, the cloak, the gown;
 It must no longer stay in town?
 But goes in course to hide a wall
 With others in our country-hall.

The Mirror thus:—the nymph reply'd,
 Your merit cannot be deny'd:

The portrait too, I must confess,
 In some respects has vastly less.
 But you yourself will freely grant
 That it has virtues which you want.
 'Tis certain that you can express
 My shape, my features, and my dress,
 Not just as well, but better too
 Than Kneller once or Ramsay now.
 But that same image in your heart
 Which thus excels the painter's art,
 The shortest absence can deface,
 And put a monkey's in its place ;
 That other which the canvass bears,
 Unchang'd and constant, lasts for years,
 Would keep its lustre and its bloom
 Though it were here and I at Rome.
 When age and sickness shall invade
 Those youthful charms and make them fade,
 You'll soon perceive it, and reveal
 What partial friendship should conceal :
 You'll tell me, in your usual way,
 Of furrow'd cheeks and locks grown gray ;
 Your gen'rous rival, not so cold,
 Will ne'er suggest that I am old ;
 Nor mark when time and slow disease
 Has stol'n the graces won't please ;
 But keep my image to be seen
 In the full blossom of sixteen :
 Bestowing freely all the praise
 I merited in better days.
 You will (when I am turn'd to dust,
 For beauties die, as all things must,
 And you remember but by seeing)
 Forget that e'er I had a being ;
 But in that picture I shall live,
 My charms shall death itself survive,
 And figur'd by the pencil there
 Tell that your mistress once was fair.
 Weigh each advantage and defect,
 The portrait merits most respect :
 Your qualities would recommend
 A servant rather than a friend ;
 But service sure in ev'ry case,
 To friendship yields the higher place.

FABLE VIII.

THE FISHERMEN.

Imitated from Theocritus.

By all the sages 'tis confess'd
 That hope when moderate is best :
 But when indulg'd beyond due measure
 It yields a vain deceitful pleasure,
 Which cheats the simple, and betrays
 To mischief in a thousand ways ;
 'Just hope assists in all our toils,
 The wheels of industry it oils ;
 In great attempts the bosom fires,
 And zeal and constancy inspires.
 False hope, like a deceitful dream,
 Rests on some visionary scheme,
 And keeps us idle to our loss,
 Enchanted with our hands across.

A tale an ancient bard has told
 Of two poor fishermen of old,
 Their names were (lest I should forget
 And put the reader in a pet,

Left critics too should make a pother)
 The one Asphelio, Gripus t' other.
 The men were very poor, their trade
 Could scarce afford them daily bread :
 Though ply'd with industry and care
 Through the whole season, soul and fair.
 Upon a rock their cottage stood,
 On all sides bounded by the flood :
 It was a miserable seat,
 Like cold and hunger's worst retreat :
 And yet it serv'd them both for life,
 As neither could maintain a wife ;
 Two walls were rock, and two were sand,
 Ramm'd up with stakes and made to stand.
 A roof hung threat'ning o'er their heads
 Of boards half-rotten, thatch'd with reeds.
 And as no thief e'er touch their store,
 A hurdle serv'd them for a door.
 Their beds were leaves ; against the wall
 A sail hung drying, yard and all.
 On one side lay an old patch'd wherry,
 Like Charon's on the Stygian ferry :
 On t' other, baskets and a net,
 With sea-weed foul and always wet.
 These sorry instruments of trade
 Were all the furniture they had :
 For they had neither spit nor pot,
 Unless my author has forgot.

Once some few hours ere break of day,
 As in their hut our fishers lay,
 The one awak'd, and wak'd his neighbour,
 That both might ply their daily labour ;
 For cold and hunger are confess'd
 No friends to indolence or rest.
 Friend, quoth the drowsy swain, and swore,
 What you have done has hurt me more
 Than all your service can repay
 For years to come by night and day ;
 You've broke—the thought on't makes me mad—
 The finest dream that e'er I had.

Quoth Gripus : friend your speech would prove
 You mad indeed, or else in love ;
 For dreams should weigh but light with those
 Who feel the want of food and clothes :
 I guess, though simple and untaught,
 You dream'd about a lucky draught,
 Or money found by chance : they say
 That " hungry foxes dream of prey."

You're wond'rous shrewd, upon my troth,
 Asphelio cry'd, and right in both :
 My dream had gold in't, as you said,
 And fishing too, our constant trade ;
 And since your guess has hit so near,
 In short, the whole on't you shall hear.

" Upon the shore I seem'd to stand,
 My rod and tackle in my hand ;
 The baited hook full oft I threw,
 But still in vain, I nothing drew :
 A fish at last appear'd to bite,
 The cork div'd quickly out of sight,
 And soon the dipping rod I found
 With something weighty bent half round :
 Quoth I, good luck has come at last,
 I've surely made a happy cast :
 This fish, when in the market sold,
 In place of brass will sell for gold :
 To bring it safe within my reach,
 I drew it softly to the beach :

But long ere it had come so near
 The water gleam'd with something clear;
 Each passing billow caught the blaze,
 And glitt'ring, shone with golden rays.
 Of hope and expectation full
 Impatient, yet afraid to pull,
 To shore I slowly brought my prize,
 A golden fish of largest size:
 'Twas metal all from head to tail,
 Quite stiff and glitt'ring ev'ry scale.
 Thought I, my fortune now is made;
 'Tis time to quit the fishing trade,
 And choose some other, where the gains
 Are sure, and come for half the pains.
 Like creatures of amphibious nature
 One hour on land, and three on water;
 We live 'midst danger, toil, and care,
 Yet never have a groat to spare;
 While others not expos'd to harm,
 Grow rich though always dry and warm;
 This treasure will suffice, and more,
 To place me handsomely on shore,
 In some snug manor; now a swain,
 My steers shall turn the furrow'd plain,
 While on a mountain's grassy side
 My flocks are past'ring far and wide:
 Beside all this, I'll have a seat
 Convenient, elegant, and neat,
 A house not over great nor small,
 Three rooms, a kitchen, and a hall.
 The offices contriv'd with care,
 And fitted to complete a square;
 A garden well laid out; a wife,
 To double all the joys of life;
 With children prattling at my knees,
 Such trifles as are sure to please.
 Those gay designs, and twenty more,
 I in my dream was running o'er,
 While you, as if you ow'd me spite,
 Broke in and put them all to flight,
 Blew the whole vision into air,
 And left me waking in despair.
 Of late we have been poorly fed,
 Last night went supperless to bed:
 Yet, if I had it in my pow'r
 My dream to lengthen for an hour,
 The pleasure mounts to such a sum,
 I'd fast for fifty yet to come.
 Therefore to bid me rise is vain,
 I'll wink and try to dream again.

If this, quoth Gripus, is the way
 You choose, I've nothing more to say;
 'Tis plain that dreams of wealth will serve
 A person who resolves to starve;
 But sure to hug a fancy'd case,
 That never did nor can take place,
 And for the pleasures it can give
 Neglect the trade by which we live,
 Is madness in its greatest height,
 Or I mistake the matter quite:
 Leave such vain fancies to the great,
 For folly suits a large estate:
 The rich may safely deal in dreams,
 Romantic hopes and airy schemes;
 But you and I, upon my word,
 Such pastime cannot well afford;
 And therefore if you would be wise,
 Take my advice, for once, and rise.

TABLE IX.

CUPID AND THE SHEPHERD.

Who sets his heart on things below
 But little happiness shall know;
 For every object he pursues
 Will vex, deceive him, and abuse:
 While he on hopes and wishes rife
 To endless bliss above the skies,
 A true felicity shall gain,
 With freedom from both care and pain.
 He seeks what yields him peace and rest,
 Both when in prospect and possess.
 A swain whose flock had gone astray,
 Was wand'ring far out of his way
 Through deserts wild, and chanc'd to see
 A stripling leaning on a tree,
 In all things like the human kind,
 But that upon his back behind
 Two wings were from his shoulders spread
 Of gold and azure, ting'd with red;
 Their colour like the ev'ning sky:
 A golden quiver grac'd his thigh:
 His bow unbended in his hand
 He held, and wrote with on the sand;
 As one whom anxious cares pursue,
 In musing oft is wont to do.
 He started still with sudden fear,
 As if some danger had been near,
 And turn'd on every side to view
 A flight of birds that round him flew,
 Whose presence seem'd to make him sad,
 For all were ominous and bad;
 The hawk was there, the type of spite,
 The jealous owl that shuns the light,
 The raven, whose prophetic bill
 Denounces woe and mischief still;
 The vulture hungry to devour,
 Though gorg'd and glutt'd ev'ry hour;
 With these confus'd an ugly crew
 Of harpies, bats, and dragons flew,
 With talons arm'd, and teeth, and stings,
 The air was darken'd with their wings,
 The swain, though frighten'd, yet drew near,
 Compassion rose in place of fear,
 He to the winged youth began,
 " Say, are you mortal and of man,
 Or something of celestial birth,
 From heaven descended to the earth?
 I am not of terrestrial kind,
 Quoth Cupid, nor to earth confin'd:
 Heav'n is my true and proper sphere,
 My rest and happiness are there:
 Through all the boundless realms of light
 The phoenix waits upon my flight,
 With other birds whose names are known
 In that delightful place alone.
 But when to earth my course I bend,
 At once they leave me and ascend;
 And for companions in their stead,
 Those winged monsters there succeed,
 Who hov'ring round me night and day,
 Expect and claim me as their prey.
 Sir, quoth the shepherd, if you'll try,
 Your arrows soon will wake them fly;
 Or if they brave them and resist,
 My sling is ready to assist.

Incapable of wounds and pain,
 Reply'd the winged youth again,
 These foes our weapons will defy;
 Immortal made, they never die;
 But live to haunt me every where,
 While I remain within their sphere.

Sir, quoth the swain, might I advise,
 You fraight should get above the skies:
 It seems indeed your only way,
 For nothing here is worth your stay;
 Beside, when foes like these molest,
 You'll find but little peace or rest.

FABLE X.

THE SWAN AND THE OTHER BIRDS.

EACH candidate for public fame
 Engag'd in a desprate game:
 His labour he will find but lost,
 Or less than half repaid at most:
 To prove this point I shall not choose
 The arguments which Stoics use;
 That human life is but a dream,
 And few things in it what they seem;
 That praise is vain and little worth,
 An empty bauble, and so forth.
 I'll offer one, but of a kind
 Not half so subtle and refin'd;
 Which, when the rest are out of sight,
 May sometimes chance to have its weight.
 The man who sets his merits high,
 To glitter in the public eye,
 Should have defects but very small,
 Or strictly speaking, none at all:
 For that success which spreads his fame,
 Provokes each envious tongue to blame,
 And makes his faults and failings known
 Where'er his better parts are shown.

Upon a time, as poets sing,
 The birds all waited on their king,
 His hymeneal rites to grace;
 A flow'ry meadow was the place;
 They all were frolicsome and gay
 Amidst the pleasures of the day,
 And ere the festival was clos'd,
 A match at singing was propos'd;
 The queen herself a wreath prepar'd,
 To be the conqueror's reward;
 With store of pinks and daisies in it,
 And many a songster try'd to win it;
 But all the judges soon confess'd
 The swan superior to the rest;
 He got the garland from the bride,
 With honour and applause beside:
 A tattling goose, with envy stung,
 Although herself the ne'er had sung,
 Took this occasion to reveal
 What swans seem studious to conceal,
 And, skill'd in satire's artful ways,
 Invective introduc'd with praise.

The swan, quoth she, upon my word,
 Deserves applause from ev'ry bird:
 By proof his charming voice you know,
 His feathers soft and white as snow;
 And if you saw him when he swims
 Majestic on the silver streams,
 He'd seem complete in all respects:
 But nothing is without defects;

Vol. XI.

For that is true, which few would think,
 His legs and feet are black as ink—

As black as ink—if this be true,
 To me 'tis wonderful and new,
 The sov'reign of the birds reply'd;
 But soon the truth on't shall be try'd.
 Sir, show your limbs, and for my sake,
 Confute at once this foul mistake,
 For I'll maintain, and I am right,
 That, like your feathers, they are white.

Sir, quoth the swan, it would be vain
 For me a falsehood to maintain;
 My legs are black, and proof will show
 Beyond dispute that they are so:
 But if I had not got a prize
 Which glitters much in some folk's eyes,
 Not half the birds had ever known
 What truth now forces me to own.

FABLE XI.

THE LOVER AND HIS FRIEND.

To the Poets.

'Tis not the point in works of art
 With care to furnish every part,
 That each to high perfection rais'd,
 May draw attention and be prais'd,
 An object by itself respected,
 Though all the others were neglected;
 Not masters only this can do,
 But many a vulgar artist too:
 We know distinguish'd merit most,
 When in the whole the parts are lost,
 When nothing rises up to shine,
 Or draw us from the chief design,
 When one united full effect
 Is felt, before we can reflect
 And mark the causes that conspire
 To charm and force us to admire.
 This is indeed a master's part,
 The very summit of his art;
 And, therefore, when ye shall rehearse
 To friends for trial of your verse,
 Mark their behaviour and their way,
 As much, at least, as what they say;
 If they seem'd pleas'd, and yet are mute,
 The poem's good beyond dispute;
 But when they babble all the while,
 Now praise the sense, and now the style,
 'Tis plain that something must be wrong,
 This too weak or that too strong.
 The art is wanting which conveys
 Impressions in mysterious ways,
 And makes us from a whole receive
 What no divided parts can give:
 Fine writing, therefore, seems of course,
 Less fit to please at first than worse.
 A language fitted to the sense
 Will hardly pass for eloquence.

One feels its force, before he sees
 The charm which gives it pow'r to please,
 And ere instructed to admire,
 Will read and read, and never tire.
 But when the style is of a kind
 Which soars and leaves the sense behind,
 'Tis something by itself, and draws
 From vulgar judges dull applause;

E

They'll yawn, and tell you as you read,
 "Those lines are mighty fine indeed;"
 But never will your works peruse
 At any time, if they can chuse.
 'Tis not the thing which men call wit,
 Nor characters, though truly hit,
 Nor flowing numbers soft or strong,
 That bears the raptur'd soul along;
 'Tis something of a diff'rent kind,
 'Tis all those skilfully combin'd,
 To make what critics call a whole,
 Which ravishes and charms the soul.
 Alexis by fair Celia's scorn
 To grief abandon'd and forlorn,
 Had fought in solitude to cover
 His anguish, like a hopeless lover;
 With his fond passion to debate,
 Gay Strephon fought his rural seat,
 And found him with the shepherds plac'd
 Far in a solitary waste.—

My friend, quoth he, you're much to blame;
 This foolish softness quit for shame;
 Nor fondly doat upon a woman,
 Whose charms are nothing more than common.
 That Celia's handsome I agree,
 But Clara's handsomer than she;
 Euanthe's wit, which all commend,
 Does Celia's certainly transcend:
 Nor can you find the least pretence
 With Phebe's to compare her sense;
 With better taste Belinda dresses,
 With truer step the floor she presses;
 And for behaviour soft and kind,
 Melissa leaves her far behind:
 What witchcraft then can fix the chain
 Which makes you suffer her disdain,
 And not attempt the manly part
 To set at liberty your heart?
 Make but one struggle, and you'll see
 That in a moment you'll be free.

This Strephon urg'd, and ten times more,
 From topics often touch'd before:
 In vain his eloquence he try'd;
 Alexis, sighing, thus reply'd:

If Clara's handsome and a toast,
 'Tis all the merit she can boast:
 Some fame Euanthe's wit has gain'd,
 Because by prudence not restrain'd,
 Phebe I own is wondrous wise,
 She never acts but in disguise:
 Belinda's merit all confess
 Who know the mystery of dress:
 But poor Melissa on the score
 Of mere good-nature pleases more:
 In those the reigning charm appears
 Alone, to draw our eyes and ears,
 No other rises by its side
 And shines, attention to divide;
 Thus seen alone it strikes the eye,
 As something exquisite and high:
 But in my Celia you will find
 Perfection of another kind;
 Each charm so artfully express'd
 As still to mingle with the rest:
 Averse and shunning to be known,
 An object by itself alone,
 But thus combin'd they make a spell
 Whose force no human tongue can tell;

A pow'ful magic which my breast
 Will ne'er be able to resist:
 For as she flights me or complies,
 Her constant lover lives or dies.

FABLE XII.

THE RAKE AND THE HERMIT.

A YOUTH, a pupil of the town,
 Philosopher and atheist grown,
 Benighted once upon the road,
 Found out a hermit's lone abode,
 Whose hospitality in need
 Reliev'd the traveller and his feed,
 For both sufficiently were tir'd,
 Well drench'd in ditches and bemir'd.
 Hunger the first attention claims;
 Upon the coals a rasher flames,
 Dry crusts, and liquor something stale,
 Were added to make up a meal;
 At which our traveller as he sat
 By intervals began to chat.—

'Tis odd, quoth he, to think what strains
 Of folly govern some folk's brains!
 What makes you chuse this wild abode?
 You'll say, 'tis to converse with God:
 Alas, I fear, 'tis all a whim:
 You never saw or spoke with him.
 They talk of Providence's pow'r,
 And say it rules us every hour;
 To me all nature seems confusion,
 And such weak fancies mere delusion.
 Say, if it rul'd and govern'd right,
 Could there be such a thing as night;
 Which, when the sun has left the skies,
 Puts all things in a deep disguise?
 If then a traveller chance to stray
 The least step from the public way,
 He's soon in endless mazes lost,
 As I have found it to my cost.
 Besides, the gloom which nature wears
 Assists imaginary fears
 Of ghosts and goblins from the waves
 Of sulph'rous lakes, and yawning graves;
 All sprung from superstitious feed,
 Like other maxims of the creed.
 For my part, I reject the tales
 Which faith suggests when reason fails:
 And reason nothing understands,
 Unwarranted by eyes and hands.
 These subtle essences, like wind,
 Which some have dreamt of, and call mind,
 It ne'er admits; nor joins the lie
 Which says men rot, but never die.
 It holds all future things in doubt,
 And therefore wisely leaves them out:
 Suggesting what is worth our care,
 To take things present as they are,
 Our wisest course: the rest is folly,
 The fruit of spleen and melancholy.—
 Sir, quoth the hermit, I agree
 That reason still our guide should be:
 And will admit her as the best,
 Of what is true, and what is best:
 But reason sure would blush for shame
 At what you mention in her name;
 Her dictates are sublime and holy;
 Impiety's the child of folly:

Reason with measur'd steps and slow,
 To things above from things below
 Ascends, and guides us through her sphere
 With caution, vigilance, and care.
 Faith in the utmost frontier stands,
 And reason puts her in her hands,
 But not till her commission giv'n
 Is found authentic, and from heav'n.
 'Tis strange that man, a reas'ning creature,
 Should mis a god in viewing nature :
 Whose high perfections are display'd
 In ev'ry thing his hands have made :
 Ev'n when we think their traces lost,
 When found again, we see them most ;
 The night itself which you would blame
 As something wrong in nature's frame,
 Is but a curtain to invest
 Her weary children, when at rest :
 Like that which mothers draw to keep
 The light off from a child asleep.
 Beside, the fears which darkness breeds
 At least arguments in vulgar heads,
 Are far from usefess, when the mind
 Is narrow, and to earth confin'd ;
 They make the worldling think with pain
 On frauds and oaths, and ill-got gain ;
 Force from the ruffian's hand the knife
 Just rais'd against his neighbour's life ;
 And in defence of virtue's cause
 Assist each sanction of the laws.
 But souls serene, where wisdom dwells,
 And superstitious dread expells,
 The silent majesty of night
 Excites to take a nobler flight :
 With saints and angels to explore
 The wonders of creating pow'r ;
 And lifts on contemplation's wings
 Above the sphere of mortal things :
 Walk forth and tread those dewy plains
 Where night in awful silence reigns ;
 The sky's serene, the air is still,
 The woods stand list'ning on each hill,
 To catch the sounds that sink and swell
 Wide-floating from the ev'ning bell,
 While foxes howl and beetles hum,
 Sounds which make silence still more dumb :
 And try if folly rash and rude
 Dares on the sacred hour intrude.
 Then turn your eyes to heav'n's broad frame,
 Attempt to quote those lights by name,
 Which shine so thick and spread so far ;
 Conceive a sun in every star,
 Round which unnumber'd planets roll,
 While comets shoot athwart the whole.
 From system still to system ranging,
 Their various benefits exchanging,
 And shaking from their flaming hair
 The things most needed every where.
 Explore this glorious scene, and say
 That night discovers less than day ;
 That 'tis quite usefess, and a sign
 That chance disposes, not design :
 Whoe'er maintains it, I'll pronounce
 Him either mad or else a dunce.
 For reason, though 'tis far from strong,
 Will soon find out that nothing's wrong,
 From signs and evidences clear,
 Of wise contrivance every where.

The hermit ended ; and the youth
 Became a convert to the truth ;
 At least he yielded, and confess'd
 That all was order'd for the best.

FABLE XIII.

PHOEBUS AND THE SHEPHERD.

I CANNOT think but more or less
 True merit always gains success ;
 That envy, prejudice, and spite,
 Will never sink a genius quite.
 Experience shows beyond a doubt,
 That worth, though clouded, will shine out.
 The second name for epic song,
 First classic of the English tongue,
 Great Milton, when he first appear'd,
 Was ill receiv'd and coldly heard :
 In vain did faction damn those lays,
 Which all posterity shall praise :
 Is Dryden or his works forgot,
 For all that Buckingham has wrote ?
 The peer's sharp satire, charg'd with sense,
 Give's pleasure at no one's expence :
 The bard and critic both inspir'd
 By Phœbus, shall be still admir'd :
 'Tis true that censure, right or wrong,
 May hurt at first the noblest song,
 And for a while defeat the claim
 Which any writer has to fame :
 A mere book-merchant with his tools
 Can sway with ease the herd of fools :
 Who on a moderate computation
 Are ten to one in every nation—
 Your style is stiff—your periods halt—
 In every line appears a fault—
 The plot and incidents ill-forted—
 No single character supported—
 Your similes will scarce apply ;
 The whole misshapen, dark, and dry.
 All this will pass, and gain its end
 On the best poem e'er was penn'd :
 But when the first assaults are o'er,
 When tops and wittings prate no more,
 And when your works are quite forgot
 By all who praise or blame by rote :
 Without self-interest, spleen, or hate,
 The men of sense decide your fate :
 Their judgment stands, and what they say
 Gains greater credit ev'ry day ;
 Till groundless prejudices pass,
 True merit has its due at last.
 The hackney scribblers of the town,
 Who were the first to write you down,
 Their malice chang'd to admiration,
 Promote your growing reputation,
 And to excess of praise proceed ;
 But this scarce happens till you're dead,
 When fame for genius, wit, and skill,
 Can do you neither good nor ill ;
 Yet, if you would not be forgot,
 They'll help to keep your name afloat.
 An aged swain that us'd to feed
 His flock upon a mountain's head,
 Drew crowds of shepherds from each hill,
 To hear and profit by his skill ;
 For ev'ry simple of the rock,
 That can offend or cure a flock,

He us'd to mark, and knew its pow'r
 In stem and foliage, root and flow'r.
 Beside all this, he could foretell
 Both rain and sunshine passing well;
 By deep sagacity he'd find,
 The future shiftings of the wind;
 And guess most shrewdly ev'ry year
 If nunton would be cheap or dear.
 To tell his skill in ev'ry art,
 Of which he understood a part,
 His sage advice was wrapt in tales,
 Which oft persuade when reason fails;
 To do him justice every where,
 Would take more time than I can spare,
 And therefore now shall only touch
 Upon a fact which authors vouch;
 That Phœbus oft would condescend,
 To treat this shepherd like a friend:
 Oft when the solar chariot pass,
 Provided he was not in haste,
 He'd leave his steeds to take fresh breath,
 And crop the herbage of the heath;
 While with the swain a turn or two
 He'd take, as landlords use to do,
 When sick of finer folks in town,
 They find amusement in a clown.
 One morning when the god alighted,
 His winged steeds look'd wild and frighted;
 The whip it seems had not been idle,
 One's traces broke, another's bridle:
 All four were switch'd in every part,
 Like common jades that draw a cart,
 Whose sides and haunches all along
 Show the just measure of the thong.

Why, what's the matter, quoth the swain,
 My lord, it gives your servant pain;
 Sure some offence is in the case,
 I read it plainly in your face.---

Offence, quoth Phœbus, vex'd and heated;
 'Tis one indeed, and oft repeated:
 Since first I drove through hea'ns high-way,
 That's before yesterday, you'll say,
 The envious clouds in league with night
 Conspire to intercept my light;
 Rank vapours breath'd from putrid lakes,
 The steams of common sew'rs and jakes,
 Which under ground should be confin'd,
 Nor suffer'd to pollute the wind;
 Escap'd in air by various ways,
 Extinguish or divert my rays.
 Oft in the morning, when my steeds
 Above the ocean lift their heads,
 And when I hope to see my beams
 Far glittering on the woods and streams;
 A ridge of lazy clouds that sleep
 Upon the surface of the deep,
 Receive at once, and wrap me round
 In fogs extinguish'd half and drown'd.
 But mark my purpose, and by Styx
 I'm not soon alter'd when I fix;
 If things are suffer'd at this pass,
 I'll fairly turn my nags to grass:
 No more this idle round I'll dance,
 But let all nature take its chance.

If, quoth the shepherd, it were fit
 To argue with the god of wit,
 I could a circumstance suggest
 That would alleviate things at least.

That clouds oppose your rising light
 Full oft, and lengthen out the night,
 Is plain; but soon they disappear,
 And leave the sky serene and clear;
 We ne'er expect a finer day,
 Than when the morning has been gray;
 Besides, those vapours which confine
 You issuing from your eastern shrine,
 By heat sublim'd, and thinly spread,
 Streak all the ev'ning sky with red:
 And when your radiant orb in vain
 Would glow beneath the western main,
 And not a ray could reach our eyes,
 Unless reflected from the skies,
 Those wat'ry mirrors send your light
 In streams amidst the shades of night:
 Thus length'n'ing out your reign much more
 Than they had shorten'd it before.
 As this is so, I must maintain
 You've little reason to complain:
 For when the matter's understood,
 The ill scenes balanc'd by the good;
 The only diff'rence in the case
 Is that the mischief first takes place,
 The compensation when you're gone
 Is rather somewhat late, I own:
 But since 'tis so, you'll own 'tis fit
 To make the best on't, and submit.

FABLE XIV.

THE BREEZE AND THE TEMPEST.

THAT nation boasts a happy fate,
 Whose prince is good, as well as great;
 Calm peace at home with plenty reigns,
 The law its proper course obtains;
 Abroad the public is respected,
 And all its int'rests are protected:
 But when his genius, weak or strong,
 Is by ambition pointed wrong,
 When private greatness has possess'd,
 In place of public good, his breast,
 'Tis certain, and I'll prove it true,
 That ev'ry mischief must ensue.
 On some pretence a war is made,
 The citizen must change his trade;
 His steeds the husbandman unyokes,
 The shepherd too must quit his flocks,
 His harmless life and honest gain,
 To rob, to murder, and be slain:
 The fields, once fruitful, yield no more
 Their yearly produce as before:
 Each useful plant neglected dies,
 While idle weeds licentious rise
 Unnumber'd, to usurp the land
 Where yellow harvests us'd to stand.
 Lean famine soon in course succeeds;
 Diseases follow as the leads.
 No infant bands at close of day
 In ev'ry village sport and play.
 The streets are throng'd with orphans dying
 For want of bread, and widows crying;
 Fierce rapine walks abroad uncham'd,
 By civil order not restrain'd:
 Without regard to right and wrong,
 The weak are injur'd by the strong.

The hungry mouth but rarely tastes
 The fatt'ning food which riot wastes;
 All ties of conscience lose their force,
 Ev'n sacred oaths grow words of course,
 By what strange cause are kings inclin'd
 To heap such mischief on mankind?
 What pow'rful arguments controul
 The native dictates of the soul?
 The love of glory and a name
 Loud-sounded by the trump of fame;
 Nor shall they miss their end, unless
 Their guilty projects want success.
 Let one possess'd of sov'reign sway
 Invade, and murder, and betray,
 Let war and rapine fierce be hurl'd
 Through half the nations of the world;
 And prove successful in a course
 Of bad designs, and actions worse,
 At once a demigod he grows,
 And incens'd both in verse and prose,
 Becomes the idol of mankind;
 Though to what's good he's weak and blind;
 Approv'd, applauded, and respected,
 While better rulers are neglected.

Where Shott's airy tops divide
 Fair Lothian from the vale of Clyde,
 A tempest from the east and north
 Fraught with the vapours of the Forth,
 In passing to the Irish seas,
 Once chanc'd to meet the western breeze.
 The tempest hail'd him with a roar,
 "Make haste and clear the way before;
 No paltry zephyr must pretend
 To stand before me, or contend:
 Begone, or in a whirlwind tost
 Your weak existence will be lost."

The tempest thus:—"The breeze reply'd
 "If both our merits should be try'd,
 Impartial justice would decree
 That you should yield the way to me."

At this the tempest rav'd and storm'd,
 Grew black and ten times more deform'd.
 What qualities, quoth he, of thine,
 Vain flatt'ring wind, can equal mine?
 Breath'd from some river, lake or bog,
 Your life at first is in a fog;
 And creeping slowly o'er the meads
 Scarce stir the willows or the reeds;
 While those that feel you hardly know
 The certain point from which you blow.
 From earth's deep womb, the child of fire,
 Fierce, active, vigorous, like my fire,
 I rush to light; the mountains quake
 With dread, and all their forests shake:
 The globe itself convuls'd and torn,
 Feels pangs unusual when I'm born:
 Now free in air with sov'reign sway,
 I rule, and all the clouds obey:
 From east to west my pow'r extends,
 Where day begins, and where it ends:
 And from Bootes downwards far,
 Athwart the track of ev'ry star.
 Through me the polar beam diffinds
 To sleep in winter's frosty chains;
 But rous'd to rage indignant heaves
 Huge rocks of ice upon its waves:

While dread-tornados lift on high
 The broad Atlantic to the sky.
 I rule the elemental roar,
 And strew with shipwrecks ev'ry shore;
 Nor less at land my pow'r is known
 From Zembla to the burning zone.
 I bring Tartarian frosts to kill
 The bloom of summer; when I will Wide desolation doth appear
 To mingle and confound the year:
 From cloudy Atlas wrapt in night,
 On Barka's sultry plains I light,
 And make at once the desert rise
 In dusty whirlwinds to the skies;
 In vain the traveller turns his steed,
 And shuns me with his utmost speed;
 I overtake him as he flies,
 O'erblown he struggles, pants, and dies.
 Where some proud city lifts in air
 Its spires, I make a desert bare;
 And when I choose, for pastimes sake,
 Can with a mountain shift a lake;
 The Nile himself, 'at my command,
 Oft hides his head beneath the sand,
 And 'midst dry deserts blown and tost,
 For many a sultry league is lost
 All this I do with perfect ease,
 And can repeat whene'er I please:
 What merit makes you then pretend
 With me to argue and contend,
 When all you boast of force or skill
 Is scarce enough to turn a mill,
 Or help the swain to clear his corn,
 The servile tasks for which you're born?

Sir, quoth the breeze, if force alone
 Must pass for merit, I have none;
 At least I'll readily confess
 That your's is greater, mine is less.
 But merit rightly understood
 Consists alone in doing good;
 And therefore you yourself must see
 That preference is due to me:
 I cannot boast to rule the skies
 Like you, and make the ocean rise,
 Nor e'er with shipwreck's strew the shore,
 For wives and orphans to deplore.
 Mine is the happier task; to please
 The mariner, and smooth the seas,
 And waft him safe from foreign harms
 To bless his consort's longing arms.
 With you I boast not to confound
 The seasons in their annual round,
 And mar that harmony in nature
 That comforts ev'ry living creature.
 But oft from warmer climes I bring
 Soft airs to introduce the spring;
 With genial heat unlock the soil,
 And urge the ploughman to his toil:
 I bid the opening-blooms unfold
 Their streaks of purple, blue, and gold,
 And waft their fragrance to impart
 That new delight to ev'ry heart,
 Which makes the shepherd all day long
 To carol sweet his vernal song:
 The summer's sultry heat to cool,
 From ev'ry river, lake and pool,

I skim fresh airs. The tawny swain,
 Who turns at noon the furrow'd plain,
 Refresh'd and trusting in my aid,
 His task pursues and scorns the shade:
 And ev'n on Afric's sultry coast,
 Where such immense exploits you boast,
 I blow to cool the panting flocks
 'Midst deserts brown and sun-burnt rocks,
 And health and vigour oft supply
 To such as languish, faint and die:
 'Those humbler offices you nam'd,
 To own I'll never be asham'd,
 With twenty others that conduce
 To public good or private use,
 'The meanest of them far outweighs
 The whole amount of all your praise;
 If to give happiness and joy,
 Excels the talent to destroy.

The tempest, that till now had lent
 Attention to the argument,
 Again began (his patience lost)
 'To rage, to threaten, huff and boast:
 Since reasons fail'd, resolv'd in course
 The question to decide by force,
 And his weak opposite to brave—
 The breeze retreated to a cave
 To shelter, till the raging blast
 Had spent its fury and was past.

FABLE XV.

THE CROW AND THE OTHER BIRDS.

Containing an useful hint to the Critics.

IN ancient times, tradition says,
 When birds like men would strive for praise;
 The bulfinch, nightingale, and thrush,
 With all that chant from tree or bush,
 Would often meet in song to vie;
 The kinds that sing not, sitting by.
 A knavish crow, it seems, had got
 The knack to criticise by rote:
 He understood each learned phrase,
 As well as critics now-a-days:
 Some say, he learn'd them from an owl,
 By list'ning where he taught a school.
 'Tis strange to tell, this subtle creature,
 Though nothing musical by nature,
 Had learn'd so well to play his part,
 With nonsense couch'd in terms of art,
 As to be own'd by all at last
 Director of the public taste.
 Then puff'd with insolence and pride,
 And sure of numbers on his side,
 Each song he freely criticis'd;
 What he approv'd not, was despis'd:
 But one false step in evil hour
 For ever stript him of his pow'r.
 Once when the birds assembled fat,
 All list'ning to his formal chat;
 By instinct nice he chanc'd to find
 A cloud approaching in the wind,
 And ravens hardly can refrain
 From croaking when they think of rain;
 His wonted song he sung: the blunder
 Amaz'd and fear'd them worse than thunder;

For no one thought so harsh a note
 Could ever sound from any throat:
 They all at first with mute surprize
 Each on his neighbour turn'd his eyes:
 But scorn succeeding soon took place,
 And might be read in ev'ry face.
 All this the raven saw with pain,
 And strove his credit to regain.

Quoth he, The solo which ye heard
 In public should not have appear'd:
 The trifle of an idle hour,
 To please my mistress once when four:
 My voice, that's somewhat rough and strong,
 Might chance the melody to wrong,
 But, try'd by rules, you'll find the grounds
 Most perfect and harmonious sounds.
 He reason'd thus; but to his trouble,
 At every word the laugh grew double:
 At last o'ercome with shame and spite,
 He flew away quite out of sight.

FABLE XVI.

THE HARE AND THE PARTAN (a).

THE chief design of this fable is to give a true specimen of the Scotch dialect, where it may be supposed to be most perfect, namely, in Mid-Lothian, the seat of the capital. The style is precisely that of the vulgar Scotch; and that the matter might be suitable to it, I chose for the subject a little story adapted to the ideas of peasants. It is a tale commonly told in Scotland among the country people; and may be looked upon as of the kind of those Aniles Fabellæ, in which Horace observes his country neighbours were accustomed to convey their rustic philosophy.

A CANNY man (b) will scarce provoke
 Ae (c) creature livin, for a joke;
 For be they weak or be they strang (d)
 A jibe (e) leaves after it a stang (f)
 To mak them think on't; and a laird (g)
 May find a beggar fac prepar'd,
 Wi pawks (h) and wiles, whar pith (i) is wantin,
 As soon will mak him rue his tauntin.
 Ye hae nicy moral, if an able
 All fit it nicely wi a fable.

(a) A crab.

(b) A canny man signifies nearly the same thing as a prudent man: but when the Scotch say that a person is not canny, they mean not that they are imprudent, but mischievous and dangerous. If the term not canny is applied to persons without being explained, it charges them with forgery and witchcraft.

(c) One.

(d) The Scotch always turn o in the syllable ong, into a. In place of long, they say lang; in place of tongs, tangs; as here strang, for strong.

(e) A satirical jest.

(f) Sting.

(g) A gentleman of an estate in land.

(h) Stratagems.

(i) Strength.

A hare, ae morning, chanc'd to see
 A partan creepin on a lee (k),
 A fishwife (l) wha was early out
 Had drapt (m) the creature thereabout.
 Mawkin (n) bumbas'd (o) and frighted fair (p)
 To see a thing but hide and hair (q),
 Which if it stur'd not might be ta'en (r)
 For naething ither than a stane (s),
 A squunt-wife (t) wambling (u), fair beset
 Wi gerse and rashes (v) like a net,
 First thought to rin (x) for't; for bi kind
 A hare's nae fetcher (y), ye main mind (z).
 But seeing that wi (a) aw its strength
 It scarce could creep a tether length (b),
 The hare grew baulder (c) and cam near,
 Turn'd playfome, and forgot her fear.
 Quoth Mawkin, Was there ere in nature
 Sae feckless (d) and sae poor a creature?
 It scarcely kens (e), or am mistaen
 The way to gang (f) or stand its lane (g).

- (k) A piece of ground let run into grass for pasture.
- (l) A woman that sells fish. It is to be observed, that the Scotch always use the word wife where the English would use the word woman.
- (m) Dropt.
- (n) A cant name for a Hare, like that of Reynard for a Fox, or Grimalkin for a Cat, &c.
- (o) Astonish'd.
- (p) Sore. I shall observe, once for all, that the Scotch avoid the vowels o and u; and have in innumerable instances supplied their places with a and e, or diphthongs in which these letters are predominant.
- (q) Without hide and hair.
- (r) Taken.
- (s) Nothing other than a stone.
- (t) Obliquely or asquat.
- (u) A feeble motion like that of a worm or serpent.
- (v) Grass; and rushes. The vowel e which comes in place of a, is by a metathesis put between the consonants g and r, to soften the sound.
- (x) Run.
- (y) Fighter.
- (z) You must remember.
- (a) With all.
- (b) The length of a rope used to confine cattle when they pasture, to a particular spot.
- (c) Bolder.
- (d) Feckless. Feckful and seekless signify strong and weak, I suppose from the verb to effect.
- (e) Knows, or I am in a mistake.
- (f) Go.
- (g) Alone, or without assistance.

See how it fleitters (b); all be bund (i)
 To rin a mile of up-hill grund
 Before it gets a rig-braid frae (k)
 The place its in, though doon the brae (l):
 Mawkin wi this began to frisk,
 And thinkin (m) there was little risk,
 Clapt baith her feet on Partan's back,
 And turn'd him awald (n) in a crack.
 To see the creature sprawl, her sport
 Grew twice as good, yet prov'd but short.
 For parting wi her fit (o), in play,
 Just whar the partan's nippers lay,
 He gript it fast, which made her squeel,
 And think she bounded (p) wi the deil.
 She strave to rin, and made a fittle:
 The tither catch'd a tough bur thistle (q);
 Which held them baith, till o'er a dyke
 A herd cam stending (r) wi his tyke (s),
 And fell'd poor mawkin, fairly ruin,
 Whan forc'd to drink of her ain brewin (t).

- (b) Walks in a weak stumbling way.
- (i) I will be bund.
- (k) The breadth of a ridge from. In Scotland about four fathoms.
- (l) An ascent or descent. It is worth observing, that the Scotch when they mention a rising ground with respect to the whole of it, they call it a knau, if small, and a hill, if great; but if they respect only one side of either, they call it a brae, which is probably a corruption of the English word brow, according to the analogy I mentioned before.
- (m) Thinking. When polysyllables terminate in ing, the Scotch almost always neglect the g, which softens the sound.
- (n) Topsy-turvy.
- (o) Foot.
- (p) To bound with any person is to attack him in the way of jest.
- (q) Thistle. The Scotch, though they commonly affect soft sounds, and throw out consonants and take in vowels, in order to obtain them, yet in some cases, of which this is an example, they do the very reverse; and bring in superfluous consonants to roughen the sound, when such sounds are more agreeable to the roughness of the thing represented.
- (r) Leaping.
- (s) Dog.
- (t) Brewing. "To drink of one's own brewing," is a proverbial expression, for suffering the effects of one's own misconduct. The English say, "As they bake, so let them brew."

A DIALOGUE.

THE AUTHOR AND A FRIEND.

HERE take your papers.—Have you look'd them
Yes, half a dozen times, I think, or more. [o'er?
And will they pass?—They'll serve but for a day;
Few books can now do more: You know the way;
A trifle's puff'd till one edition's fold,
In half a week at most a book grows old;
The penny turn'd's the only point in view;
So ev'ry thing will pass if 'tis but new.—

By what you say I easily can guess
You rank me with the drudges for the press;
Who from their garrets show'r Pindarics down,
Or plaintive elegies to lull the town.
You take me wrong: I only meant to say,
That ev'ry book that's new will have its day;
The best no more: for books are seldom read;
The world's grown dull, and publishing a trade.
Were this not so, could Ossian's deathless strains,
Of high heroic times the sole remains,
Strains which display perfections to our view,
Which polish'd Greece and Italy ne'er knew,
With modern epics share one common lot,
This day applauded, and the next forgot?
Enough of this; to put the question plain,
Will men of sense and taste approve my strain?
Will my old-fashion'd sense and comic ease
With better judges have a chance to please?
The question's plain, but hard to be resolv'd;
One little less important can be solv'd:
The men of sense and taste believe it true,
Will ne'er to living authors give their due.
They're candidates for fame in diff'rent ways;
One writes romances, and another plays,
A third prescribes you rules for writing well,
Yet bursts with envy if you should excel.
Through all fame's walks, the college and the court,

The field of combat and the field of sport;
The stage, the pulpit, senate-house and bar,
Merit with merit lives at constant war.
All who can judge, affect not public fame;
Of those that do the paths are not the same:
A grave historian hardly needs to fear
The rival glory of a sonneteer:
The deep philosopher who turns mankind
Quite inside outwards, and dissects the mind,
Would look but whimsical and strangely out,
To grudge some quack his treatise on the gout.—

Hold, hold, my friend, all this I know, and
more;
An ancient bard* has told us long before;
And by examples easily decided,
That folks of the same trades are most divided.
But folks of diff'rent trades that hunt for fame,
Are constant rivals, and their ends the same:

* Hesiod.

It needs no proof, you'll readily confess,
That merit envies merit more or less;
The passion rules alike in those who share
Of public reputation, or despair.
Varrus has knowledge, humour, taste and sense,
Could purchase laurels at a small expence;
But wise and learn'd, and eloquent in vain,
He sleeps at ease in pleasure's silken chain:
Will Varrus help you to the muse's crown,
Which, but for indolence, might be his own?
Timon with art and industry aspires
To fame; and the world applauds him, and admires:
Timon has sense, and will not blame a line
He knows is good; from envy or design:
Some general praise he'll carelessly express,
Which just amounts to none, and sometimes less:
But if his penetrating sense should spy
Such beauties as escape a vulgar eye,
So finely couch'd, their value to enhance,
That all are pleas'd, yet think they're pleas'd by chance;

Rather than blab such secrets to the throng,
He'd lose a finger, or bite off his tongue.
Narcissus is a beau, but not an ass,
He likes your works, but most his looking-glass;
Will he to serve you quit his favourite care,
Turn a book-pedant and offend the fair?
Celia to taste and judgment may pretend
She will not blame your verse, nor dares commend:

A modest virgin always shuns dispute;
Soft Strephon likes you not, and she is mute.
Stern Aristarchus, who expects renown
From ancient merit rais'd, and new knock'd down,
For faults in every syllable will pry,
Whate'er he finds is good he'll pass it by.

Hold, hold, enough! All act from private ends;
Authors and wits were ever slippery friends:

But say, will vulgar readers like my lays?
When such approve a work, they always praise.

To speak my sentiments, your talcs I fear
Are but ill suited to a vulgar ear.
Will city readers, us'd to better sport,
The politics and scandals of a court,
Well vouch'd from Grub-street, on your pages pore,
For what they ne'er can know, or knew before?
Many have thought, and I among the rest,
That fables are but useless things at best:
Plain words without a metaphor may serve
To tell us that the poor must work or starve.
We need no stories of a cock and bull
To prove that graceless scribblers must be dull.
That hope deceives; that never to excel,
'Gainst spite and envy is the only spell.—
All this, without an emblem, I suppose
Might pass for sterling truth in verse or prose.—

Sir, take a feat, my answer will be long;
Yet weigh the reasons and you'll find them strong.
At first * when savage men in quest of food,
Like lions, wolves and tigers, rang'd the wood,
They had but just what simple nature craves,
Their garments skins of beasts, their houses caves.
When prey abounded, from its bleeding dam
Pity would spare a kidling or a lamb,
Which, with their children nurs'd and fed at
home,

Soon grew domestic and forgot to roam:
From such beginnings flocks and herds were seen
To spread and thicken on the woodland green:
With property, injustice soon began,
And they that prey'd on beasts now prey'd on man.
Communities were fram'd, and laws to bind
In social intercourse the human kind.
These things were new, they had not got their names,

And right and wrong were yet uncommon themes:
The rustic senator, untaught to draw
Conclusion in morality or law,
Of every term of art and science bare,
Wanted plain words his sentence to declare;
Much more at length to manage a dispute,
To clear, enforce, illustrate, and confute;
Fable was then found out, 'tis worth your heeding,
And answer'd all the purposes of pleading.
It won the head with unsuspected art,
And touch'd the secret springs that move the
heart:

With this premis'd, I add, that men delight
To have their first condition still in sight.
Long since the fires of Brunwick's line forsook
The hunter's bow, and dropp'd the shepherd's crook:

Yet, 'midst the charms of royalty, their race
Still loves the forest, and frequents the chase.
The high-born maid, whose gay apartments shine
With the rich produce of each Indian mine,
Sighs for the open fields, the past'ral hook,
To sleep delightful near a warbling brook;
And loves to read the ancient tales that tell How queens themselves fetch'd water from the well.

If this is true, and all affect the ways
Of patriarchal life in former days,
Fable must please the stupid, the refin'd,
Wisdom's first dress to court the op'ning mind.

You reason well, could nature hold her course,
Where vice exerts her tyranny by force:
Are natural pleasures suited to a taste,
Where nature's laws are alter'd and defac'd?
The healthful swain who treads the dewy mead,
Enjoys the music warbl'd o'er his head:
Feels gladness at his heart while he inhales
The fragrance wafted in the balmy gales.
Not so Silenus with his night's debauch,
Fatigu'd and sick, he looks upon his watch
With rheumy eyes and forehead aching sore,
And staggers home to bed to belsh and snore;

* The author speaks of those only, who, upon the dispersion of mankind, fell into perfect barbarism, and emerged from it again in the way which he describes, and not of those who had laws and arts from the beginning by divine tradition.

For such a wretch in vain the morning glows,
For him in vain the vernal zephyr blows:
Gross pleasures are his taste, his life a chain
Of feverish joys, of lassitude and pain.
Trust not to nature in such times as these,
When all is off the hinge; can nature please?
Discard all useless scruples, be not nice;
Like some folks laugh at virtue, flatter vice,
Boldly attack the mitre or the crown;
Religion shakes already, push it down:
Do every thing to please?—You shake your head:

Why then 'tis certain that you'll ne'er succeed:
Dismiss your muse, and take your full repose;
What none will read 'tis useless to compose.—

A good advice! to follow it is hard.—
Quote one example, name me but a bard
Who ever hop'd Parnassus' heights to climb,
That dropp'd his muse, till she deserted him.
A cold is caught, this medicine can expel,
The dose is thrice repeated, and you're well.
In man's whole frame there is no crack or flaw
But yields to Bath, or to Bristol, or to Spa:
No drug poetic frenzy can restrain,
Ev'n hellebore itself is try'd in vain:
'Tis quite incurable by human skill;
And though it does but little good or ill,
Yet still it meets the edge of reformation,
Like the chief vice and nuisance of the nation.
The formal quack, who kills his man each day,
Passes unscen'd, and receives his pay.
Old Aulus, nodding 'midst the lawyers strife,
Wakes to decide on property and life.
Yet not a soul will blame him, and insist
That he should judge to purpose, or desist.
At this address how would the courtiers laugh!
My lord, you're always blundering: quit your staff:

You've lost some reputation, and 'tis best
To shift before you grow a public jest.
This none will think of, though 'tis more a crime

To mangle state-affairs, than murder rhyme.
The quack, you'll say, has reason for his killing,
He cannot eat unless he earns his shilling.
The worn-out lawyer clammers to the bench
That he may live at ease, and keep his weach;
The courtier-toils for something higher far,
And hopes for wealth, new titles and a star;
While moon-struck poets in a wild-goose chase
Pursue contempt, and beggary, and disgrace.

Be'to: I claim'd by precedent and rule
A free-born Briton's right, to play the fool:
My resolution's fix'd, my course I'll hold,
In spite of all your arguments when told:
Whether I'm well and up, or keep my bed,
Am warm and full, or neither cloth'd nor fed,
Whether my fortune's kind, or in a pet
Am banish'd by the laws, or fled for debt;
Whether in Newgate, Bedlam, or the Mint,
I'll write as long as publishers will print.

Unhappy lad, who will not spend your time
To better purpose than in useless rhyme:
Of but one remedy your case admits,
The king is gracious, and a friend to wits;
Pray write for him, nor think your labour lost,
Your verse may gain a pension or a post.

May Heav'n forbid that this auspicious reign
Should furnish matter for a poet's strain;
The praise of conduct steady, wise, and good,
In prose is best express'd and understood.
Nor are those sov'reigns blessings to their age Whose deeds are sung, whose actions grace the stage.

A peaceful river, whose soft current feeds
The constant verdure of a thousand meads,
Whose shaded banks afford a safe retreat
From winter's blasts and summer's sultry heat,
From whose pure wave the thirsty peasant drains
Those tides of health that flow within his veins,

Passes unnotic'd; while the torrent strong
Which bears the shepherds and their flocks along,
Arm'd with the vengeance of the angry skies,
Is view'd with admiration and surprize;
Employs the painter's hand, the poet's quill,
And rises to renown by doing ill.
Verse form'd for falsehood makes ambition shine,
Dubs it immortal, and almost divine;
But qualities which fiction ne'er can raise
It always lessens when it strives to praise.
Then take your way, 'tis folly to contend
With those who know their faults, but will not mend.

THE POETICAL WORKS
OF
ROBERT DODSLEY.

Containing

AGRICULTURE,
MELPOMENE,
ART OF PREACHING,

EPISTLES,
SONGS,
TALES,

U. U. U.

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

Of culture, and the various fruits of earth,
The Muse, disdain'g idle themes, attempts
To sing———
O native Sherwood! happy were thy bard,
Might these his rural notes, to future time
Boast of tall groves, that, nodding o'er thy plain,
Rose to their tuneful melody. But ah!
Beneath the feeble efforts of a muse,
Untutor'd by the lore of Greece or Rome,
A stranger to the fair Castalian springs,
Whence happier poets inspiration draw,
And the sweet magic of persuasive song,
The weak presumption, the fond hope expires.

AGRICULTURE, CANTO I. II.

EDINBURGH:

PRINTED BY MUNDELL AND SON, ROYAL BANK CLOSE.

Anno 1795.

THE POLITICAL WORKS
OF
ROBERT DOBSON.

EDITED BY
J. H. BURNHAM.

IN THREE VOLUMES.
LONDON:
LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., LTD.
1907.

THE AUTHOR'S INTENTION IN WRITING THESE WORKS WAS TO SET FORTH THE PRINCIPLES OF POLITICAL ECONOMY AS THEY APPLIED TO THE INTERESTS OF THE COMMUNITY AS A WHOLE. HE HAS DONE THIS BY A CAREFUL ANALYSIS OF THE ECONOMIC CONDITIONS OF THE TIME, AND BY A CLEAR AND CONCISE STATEMENT OF THE RESULTS OF HIS RESEARCHES. HIS WORKS ARE NOT ONLY OF GREAT INTEREST TO THE STUDENT OF POLITICAL ECONOMY, BUT ALSO OF GREAT VALUE TO THE MAN OF BUSINESS AND THE STATESMAN.

EDINBURGH:

PRINTED BY WOODHEAD AND SON, ROYAL BANK BUILDINGS.

1907.

THE LIFE OF DODSLEY.

ROBERT DODSLEY was born at Mansfield, in Nottinghamshire, in 1703. The humble situation and circumstances of his parents precluded him from the advantages of a liberal education; and his first setting out in life was in the station of a footman to the Honourable Mrs. Lowther, in which his good conduct and abilities soon brought him into notice.

In this humble sphere of life he wrote several poems, which excited so much attention, that he was encouraged to publish them under the title of The Muse in Livery. The collection is very little known; but it was printed in 12mo. had a very handsome list of subscribers prefixed to it, and was dedicated to Mrs. Lowther.

He was for some time footman to Dartineuf, the luxurious voluptuary, and intimate friend of Pope; and it is greatly to his honour, that he was not unwilling that his low station in the family of that epicure should be recollected, when he had raised himself to competency and affluence.

"When Lord Lyttleton's "Dialogues of the Dead" came out," says Dr. Johnson, as reported by Mr. Boswell, "one of which is between Apicius, an ancient epicure, and Dartineuf, a modern epicure, Doddsley said to me, "I knew Dartineuf well, for I was once his footman."

What contributed still more to his reputation, was his writing a dramatic piece, called The Toy-Shop, built on Randolph's celebrated comedy, called "The Muses Looking-Glass," 4to, 1638; which being shown in manuscript to Pope, he was so well pleased with the delicacy of its satire, and the simplicity of its design, that he took the author under his protection; and though he had no connection with the theatres, procured him such an interest as ensured its being immediately brought on the stage.

It was acted at Covent Garden theatre, in 1735, with very great success, and when printed, was received with much applause by the public. The hint of it is taken from Randolph's play; but he has so perfectly modernized it, that he has made it perfectly his own, and rendered it one of the justest, and at the same time the best natured rebukes that fashionable absurdity perhaps ever met with. It contains many lively, pointed, and satirical strokes on the vices and follies of the age; the characters are distinct and appropriate; and though it is better calculated for the closet than the stage, it is still received with no small applause.

Pope's warm and zealous patronage of Doddsley is noticed in a malignant epistle from Curll, to that celebrated poet, in 1737.

'Tis kind a Livery Muse to aid,
Who scribbles farces to augment his trade.
When you, and Spence, and Glover drive the nail,
The devil's in it, if the plot should fail.

The world has long been ruled by an opinion which is not yet entirely removed, that talents and prudence are incompatible qualities; that it is not easy for a man to be a wit without mortgaging his estate; and that a poet must necessarily be in debt, and live in a garret.

It was Doddsley's good fortune to prove, if any proof were wanting, that a man's cultivating his understanding is no impediment to improving his fortune, and that it is very possible for a man to be an author, without neglecting business.

The pecuniary advantages which Doddsley had derived from his first publication, and from the success of his Toy-Shop, were applied by him to a very wise and useful purpose. Instead of adopting the precarious situation of a town writer, he determined to engage in some profitable business; and the business he fixed upon was happily suited to his literary taste, and favourable to his connection with men of learning.

In 1735, he opened a bookfeller's shop in Pall-Mall; and such was the effect of Pope's recommendation and assistance, and of his own good character and behaviour, that he soon obtained not only the countenance of persons of the first abilities, but also of those of the first rank; and in a few years he rose to great eminence in his profession.

His shop became the fashionable resort of persons of literature and rank; and he reckoned Chesterfield, Lyttleton, Spence, Glover, Shenstone, Dr. Johnson, and other distinguished characters, in the number of his friends.

His employment as a bookseller did not prevent his pursuing the bent of his genius as an author. In 1737, he brought on the stage at Drury-Lane theatre, a farce called The King, and the Miller of Mansfield, which met with very great success. The plot of the piece is founded on a traditional story in the reign of Henry II.; of this story he has made a very pleasing use, and wrought it out into a truly dramatic conclusion. The dialogue is natural, yet elegant; the satire poignant, yet genteel; the sentiments are such as do honour to both his head and heart; and the catastrophe, though simple, yet affecting and perfectly just. The scene lies in and near the Miller's house in Sherwood Forest, near Nottingham; and he had probably an additional pleasure in the choice of his subject from the connection of it with his native place.

O native Sherwood! happy were thy bard,
Might these his rural notes to future times,
Boast of tall groves that nodding o'er thy plain,
Rose to their tuneful melody.—

The year following, his Sir John Cockle at Court, a farce, was acted at Drury-Lane. It is a sequel to the King and Miller of Mansfield, in which, the miller newly made a knight, comes up to London with his family, to pay his compliments to the king. It is not, however, equal in merit to the first part; for though the king's disguising himself, in order to put Sir John's integrity to the test, and the latter's resisting every temptation, not only of bribery, but of flattery, is ingenious, and gives an opportunity for many admirable strokes of satire, yet there is a simplicity and fitness for the drama in the turn of the former production, which it is scarcely possible to come up to in the circumstances that arise from the conduct of Sir John Cockle at Court.

The Miller of Mansfield, and its sequel, exhibit an interesting contrast between the unadorned solidity of country manners, and the splendid vices of a court; the blunt honesty of a miller, and the slender importance of a monarch without his attendants, in a sequestered spot, and in midnight darkness. It has several pleasing songs, which from some of them continuing still to be popular, must have merit.

His next dramatic performance was The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green, a ballad farce, which, according to Mr. Victor, was acted at Drury-Lane, in 1739-40, but Mr. Reed says in 1741, but without much success. It is on the same story with Day's comedy of "The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green," 4to, 1659.

In 1744, he published A Collection of Plays, by old Authors, in 12 vols. 12mo., which was a valuable acquisition to the literary world. It has been highly improved in the second edition, published by Mr. Reed, in 1780; in which, besides an excellent preface, and very useful notes, some plays before inserted are rejected, and others of greater merit are introduced in their room.

In 1745, he produced a dramatic piece, called Rex et Pontifex, 8vo., being an attempt to introduce upon the stage a new species of pantomime. It does not, however, appear to have been represented at any of our theatres.

In 1746, he published The Museum, or Literary and Historical Register, in 3 vols. 8vo, to which Dr. Johnson, and other men of genius, were contributors.

In 1748, he collected his several dramatic pieces, which had been separately printed, and published them in one volume 8vo., under the modest title of Trifles.

On the occasion of the signing the treaty of peace, at Aix-la-Chapelle, he wrote The Triumph of Peace, a masque, which was set to music by Dr. Arne, and performed at the theatre in Drury-Lane, in 1748-9.

In 1749, he published that eminently useful school-book, The Preceptor, in 2 vols. 8vo. The design of this work was framed by Doddsley, and the execution of it was accomplished by several of the distinguished writers of the age.

In 1750, he published a small work, which, for a short time had a very great celebrity, under the title of *The Economy of Human Life, translated from an Indian manuscript, written by an ancient Bramin; to which is prefixed, an account of the manner in which the said manuscript was discovered, in a Letter from an English Gentleman now residing in China, to the Earl of * * . Besides the apocryphal introduction of this work into the world, it derived a temporary popularity from its being universally ascribed to the Earl of Chesterfield. This supposition was strengthened by a letter that had been addressed to his Lordship, by Mrs. Teresa Constantia Philips, in which she had complimented him on being author of "The Whole Duty of Man." She had probably heard an account of the Earl's letters to his son. However this may have been, the power of literary fashion procured The Economy of Human Life a rapidity and extensiveness of sale, and a height of applause which it would not have obtained if it had been known to be the production of a bookfeller. The work, upon the whole, is not without a considerable share of merit. The subjects are well chosen, the advice is good, the style is succinct and frequently nervous; but it is deficient in that strength and energy, that vividness of imagination, and that luminousness of metaphor, which pervade those parts of scripture that were intended to be imitated, and which occur in the genuine oriental writings.

The popularity of Doddsley's performance produced a number of imitations: "The second part of the Economy of Human Life," "Appendix," "The Economy of a Winter Day," "The Economy of Female Life," "The Economy of the Sexes," "Complete Economy for the Female Sex," 1751, and "The Economy of the Mind," 1767.

In 1752, he obliged the lovers of poetry, by the publication of A Collection of Poems, by Eminent Hands. vol. 1st, 2d, and 3d, 12mo. Several of his own little pieces are inserted at the close of the 3d volume. The 4th volume of this elegant and valuable miscellany appeared in 1755; and the 5th and 6th volumes, which completed the collection, in 1758. The pieces of which it consists are not all equally valuable; but perhaps a more excellent miscellany is not to be found in any language. By this collection he performed a very acceptable service to the cause of genius and taste, as it has been the means of preserving several productions of merit, which might otherwise have sunk into oblivion. A judicious selection of pieces omitted by Doddsley, was given to the world by the editor of "A collection of the most esteemed pieces of poetry that have appeared for several years: with variety of originals, by the late Moses Mendez, Esq., and other contributors to Doddsley's collection. To which this is designed as a supplement," printed for Richardson and Urquhart, in 1 vol. 12mo, 1767, 1770. The world is indebted for a more extensive supplement to Doddsley, to the valuable "Collections" of Mr. Pearch, in 4 vols, 12mo. 1768, 1770; and of Mr. Nichols, with biographical and historical notes, in 8 vols, 1780, 1782. The collection printed for Urquhart and Richardson is commonly, but erroneously ascribed to Mendez, who died in 1758. His imitations of Spenser, and other poems, are highly deserving of republication, and were originally recommended by the present writer to be inserted in this collection of classical English poetry.

The subject of his next publication was Public Virtue, a didactic poem, which was intended to be comprised in three books, including 1st, Agriculture, 2d, Commerce, 3d, Arts; of this truly useful and valuable undertaking, the first book on Agriculture, was published in 1754, 4to., and was all that was accomplished by Doddsley. It is probable that the reception and sale of the poem did not encourage him to complete his design.

In 1758, he published Melpomene; or, the Regions of Terror and Pity, an Ode, 4to. This ode was eagerly read on its first appearance, and is justly regarded as one of the happiest efforts of his muse.

His next publication was The Annual Register, or a View of the History, Politics, and Literature of the year 1758; a very valuable work, which has been continued to the present time.

The same year his Cleone, a tragedy, was acted at the theatre in Covent Garden; and met with very great success. An imperfect hint towards the fable of this tragedy was taken from the "Legend of St. Genevieve," written originally in French, and translated into English in the last century, by Sir William Lower. The first sketch of it, consisting then of three acts only, was shown to Pope two or three years before his death, who informed Doddsley, that in his very early youth he had attempted a tragedy on the same subject, which he afterwards destroyed, and he advised him to extend his plan to five acts. It was first offered to Garrick, but he refused it; principally, as it should seem, because it contained no character in which he could have figured himself. To prevent its success, he appeared in a new part on the first night of its appearance. This scheme had no effect; for the play rose above all opposition, and had a long and crowded run; the character of Cleone received every possible advantage from the exquisite performance of Mrs. Bellamy, whose peculiar merit, in this part, contributed, in a great degree, to promote the run of the piece. The prologue was written by Mr. Melmoth, and the epilogue by Mr. Shenstone.

The intrinsic merit of Cleone, as a moral and interesting drama, is universally acknowledged. "When I heard you read it," said Dr. Johnson to Mr. Langton, as reported by Mr. Boswell, "I thought higher of its power of language. When I read it myself, I was more sensible of its pathetic effect. If Otway had written this play, no other of his pieces would have been remembered." Doddsley himself, upon this being repeated to him, said, "It was too much."

It will not, indeed, stand in competition with the tragedies of Otway or Southerne; but it is not, upon the whole, inferior to any that have been brought upon either stage for the last fifty years, except "Douglas." It is equally free from the bombast and rant of a "Barbarossa," and from the flowery whine and romantic softness of "Philoctetes;" but at the same time it wants the majesty of diction, and high reach of thought, essential to the dignity of a perfect tragedy. The plot is too thin; the scenes are too barren of incidents, at least of important ones; and the language, in general, too much, though not altogether destitute of poetry. It contains, however, some happy expressions and striking sentiments. The circumstance of Siffroy's giving his friend directions concerning his wife, has some degree of similarity to Posthumus's orders in "Cymbeline." In the two last acts, he appears to the greatest advantage: Cleone's madness, in particular, over her murdered infant, being highly pathetic.

This tragedy has lately been revived by Mrs. Siddons; but so strong were the feelings which her exquisite performance of Cleone excited on the first night of acting, that the house was thin on the second night, and the play was dropped.

In 1760, he published his last separate work, the Select Fables of Æsop, and other Fabulists, in three books, with the Life of Æsop, and an Essay on Fable, 8vo. This work added greatly to his reputation. It is indeed a classical performance, both in regard to the elegant simplicity of the style, and the propriety of the sentiments and characters. The first book contains ancient, the second modern, and the third original fables; the stories in the third book are wholly invented by Doddsley and his friends. The Life of Æsop, by M. Mezeriac, is the only Life of Æsop that is consistent with common sense; that of Planudes being a ridiculous medley of absurd traditions, or equally absurd inventions. The Essay considers the fable regularly; first, with relation to the moral; secondly, the actions and incidents; thirdly, the persons, character, and sentiments; and, lastly, the language. This is one of the first pieces of criticism, in which rules are delivered for this species of composition drawn from nature, and by which these small and pleasing kind of productions that were thought to have little other standard than the fancy, are brought under the jurisdiction of the judgment. Doddsley has been so eminently successful in his design, that the propriety of his remarks cannot be disputed, except only in a single instance; in which, alluding to the well-known fable of the "Fox and the Grapes," he says, "a fox should not be said to long for grapes;" because the appetite is not consistent with its known character. It is not so in the east. Dr. Hasselquist, in his "Travels," observes, that the fox is an animal common in Palestine; and that it destroys the vines, unless it is strictly watched. Solomon also says, in "Canticles" ii. 15. "Take us the foxes, the little foxes that spoil the vines, for our vines have tender grapes." Before he committed the Essay to the press, he subjected it to the revival of his literary friends, and especially of Shenstone.

In 1761, he published a collection of Fugitive Pieces, by Spence, Cooper, Lord Whitworth, Mr. Burke, Mr. Clubbe, Dr. Lancafter, Dr. Hill, and other elegant writers, in 2 vols, 8vo.

In 1763, he published the works of his amiable and ingenious friend Shenstone, in 2 vols, 12mo; to which he prefixed a short account of his life and writings, and added a description of the Leasowes.

His "Description of Persefeld," in a letter to Shenstone, is preserved in Hull's "Select Letter," between the Duchefs of Somerset, Lady Luxborough, Mr. Whitlet, Miss Dolman, Shenstone, Doddsley, &c. in 2 vols, 1778.

In the course of his profession, Doddsley acquired a very handsome fortune, which enabled him to retire from the active part of business, which devolved on his brother and partner, Mr. James Doddsley, the present respectable bookseller in Pall-Mall. During the latter years of his life he was much troubled with the gout, to which, at length, he fell a martyr, while he was upon a visit to his friend Spence, at Durham, Sept. 5. 1764, in the sixty-first year of his age. Spence paid the last kind office to his remains. He was buried in the Abbey church-yard of Durham, and the following inscription was engraved on his tomb-stone.

If you have any respect
For uncommon industry and merit,
Regard this place
In which are deposited, the remains of
MR. ROBERT DODSLEY;
Who, as an author, raised himself
Much above what could have been expected
From one in his rank of life,
And without a learned education;
And who, as a man, was scarce
Exceeded by any in integrity of heart,
And purity of manners and conversation.
He left this life for a better,
Sept. 25. 1764,
In the 61st year of his age.

A second volume of his Miscellanies was published in 8vo, 1772. The volume contains Cleone, Melpomene, Agriculture, and the Economy of Human Life. The editions of the Economy of Human Life are too numerous to be specified. His Agriculture, Melpomene, and other poems, are now, for the first time received into a collection of classical English poetry.

His character was very amiable and respectable. As a tradesman, he preserved the greatest integrity; as a writer, the most becoming humility. Mindful of the early encouragement which his own talents met with, he was ever ready to give the same opportunity of advancement to those of others; and on many occasions he was not only the publisher, but the patron of genius. There was no circumstance by which he was more distinguished, than by the grateful remembrance which he retained, and always expressed towards the memory of those to whom he owed the obligation of being first taken notice of in life. Modest, sensible, and humane; he retained the virtues which first brought him into notice, after he had obtained wealth sufficient to satisfy every wish which could arise from the possession of it. He was a generous friend, an encourager of men of genius, and acquired the esteem and respect of all who were acquainted with him. It was his happiness to pass the greatest part of his life in an intimacy with men of the brightest abilities, whose names will be revered by posterity; by most of whom he was loved as much for the virtues of his heart, as he was admired on account of his writings.

As an author, he is entitled to considerable praise. His works are recommended by an ease and elegance, which are sometimes more pleasing than a more laboured and ornamented manner of writing. His prose is familiar, and yet chaste. His Essay on Fable will be a durable monument of his ingenuity. In his dramas he has always kept in view the one great principle, delectando pariterque monendo, some general moral is constantly conveyed in each of his plans, and particular instructions are displayed in the particular strokes of satire. The dialogue, at the same time, is easy; the plots simple; and the catastrophe interesting and pathetic. In verse, his compositions sufficiently show what genius alone, unassisted by learning, is capable of executing. His subjects are well chosen and entertaining; the diction is chaste and elegant; the sentiments, if not sublime, are manly and pleasing; and the numbers, if not exquisitely polished, are easy and flowing.

Of his poetical productions, his Agriculture, a Georgic in three cantos, is the most considerable. The subject is such as must be grateful and entertaining to every Briton; and though, in the execution, there are imperfections impossible to be overlooked by a critical eye, yet there are a number of beauties in it deserving of applause; and those who may have reason to condemn the poet, will find ample cause to commend the patriot. Indeed, to write a truly excellent Georgic, is one of the greatest efforts of the human mind. Perfectly to succeed in this species of poetry, requires a Virgil's genius, judgment, exquisiteness of taste, and power of harmony. The general economy of this Georgic is judicious: it contains several exalted sentiments; and the descriptions are often delicate and well expressed. But, at the same time, the diction is frequently too prosaic, many of the epithets are inadequate, and in some places, sufficient attention is not paid to the powers of the versification.

In the first canto, after having generally proposed his intention, addressed it to the Prince of Wales, and invoked the Genius of Britain, he proceeds to consider husbandry as the source of wealth and plenty; and therefore recommends it to landlords not to oppress the farmer, and to the farmer that he should be frugal, temperate, and industrious. After giving an account of the instruments of husbandry, he describes a country statute, and introduces the episode of Patty, the fair milk-maid. The next objects offered to view are the farmer's poultry, kine, hogs, &c. with their enemies, the kite, the fox, the badger, and such other animals as prey upon the produce of the farm, or impede the industrious labours of the husbandman; and we are shown how the cultivation of the former, and the destruction of the latter contribute alternately to provide him with business or amusement: whence we are led to contemplate the happiness of a rural life; to which succeeds an address to the great to engage them in the study of agriculture. An allegorical explanation of nature's operations on the vegetable world, with a philosophical system, built on the experimental foundation laid by Dr. Hales, concludes the canto. The address to the Genius of Britain is pleasing, and the description of the Fair Milk-maid is exquisitely beautiful.

The second canto begins with instructions for meliorating soils, according to their diversity, whether they consist of sand, loam, or clay. Mr. Tull's principles and practice are particularly taken notice of, and those of the Middlesex gardeners. Directions are also given for various manures, and other methods are pointed out for the improvement and enclosure of lands; the respective uses of the several forest trees are distinguished; the advantages arising from plantations pointed out; and rules are presented for their successful cultivation. To these succeed some observations on gardening, wherein the taste for straight lines, regular platforms, and elipt trees, imported from Holland at the Revolution, is exploded. These are succeeded by a few compliments to some modern gardens, Chiswick, Richmond, Oatlands, Esther, Woburn, and Hagley; a description of those of Epicurus, and a celebration of his morals. The apostrophe to the Genius of Gardens is happily introduced; and the description of the Gardens of Epicurus is rich and luxuriant.

In the third canto are described hay-making, harvest, and the harvest-home; a method is prescribed for preventing the hay from being mow-burnt, or taking fire. Other vegetable, fossil, and mineral productions peculiar to England are praised. From the culture and produce of the earth, we have a transition to the breeding and management of sheep, cows, and horses; of the latter there are descriptions according to their respective uses; whether for draught, the road, the field, the race, or for war. The portraits of the two last, which are eminently beautiful, conclude the poem.

Of his other poems, his Melpomene may be considered as the greatest effort of his poetical genius. It cannot indeed vie in sublimity and enthusiasm with the lyric compositions of Dryden, Ker, and Collins, Gray, and Mason. It has a more moderate degree of elevation, and poetic fire. It is animated without being rhapsodical, and joins ardent sentiment and picturesque description, to correctness, harmony, and happy expression. His picture of Despair, in the Region of Terror, is finely drawn, and only inferior to that of Spenser. The portrait of Rage is equally happy in the designing, and the expression. In the Region of Pity, the image of a beautiful maid expiring on the corse of a brave lover, who has been killed in vindicating her honour, is affectingly picturesque. That of a too credulous and injured beauty, is equally striking and beautiful, and pregnant with a necessary moral caution.

Of his Art of Preaching, in imitation of Horace's "Art of Poetry," the rules are well adapted, and exemplified, and the versification is smooth and elegant. His Songs, in point of tenderness, delicacy, and simplicity, are not inferior to any composition of that kind in the English language.

Most of his smaller pieces may be read with pleasure. His just retort on Burnet, for calling Prior in his "History of his Own Times," one Prior, is probably remembered by most readers of poetry.

THE WORKS OF DODSLEY.

AGRICULTURE: A POEM.

PREFACE.

If the writer of the following piece could hope to produce any thing in poetry, worthy the public attention, it would give him particular pleasure to lay the foundation of his claim to such a distinction in the happy execution of this work. But he fears it will be thought, that the projected building is too great for the abilities of the architect; and that he is not furnished with a variety of materials sufficient for the proper finishing and embellishment of such a structure. And when it is farther confessed, that he hath entered on this design without the assistance of learning, and that his time for the execution of it was either snatched from the hours of business, or stolen from those of rest (the mind in either case not likely to be in the happiest disposition for poetry), his prospects of success will grow still more clouded, and the presumption against him must gather additional strength.

Under these, and many other disadvantages, which he feels and laments; conscious of all his deficiencies, and how unequal he is to the task of executing this plan, even up to his own ideas; what shall he plead in excuse for his temerity in persisting thus far to prosecute the attempt? All he can say is, that he hath taken some pains to furnish himself with materials for the work; that he hath consulted men as well as books, for the knowledge of his subjects, in which he hopes he hath not been guilty of many mistakes; that it hath not been an hasty performance; nor is it at last obtruded on the public, without the approbation of several persons, whose judgments, were it not probable they may have received a bias from the partiality of friendship, he could have no reason to doubt. But that he may know with certainty whether this is not the case, to the public he submits it; willing to receive from thence his determination to prosecute or suppress the remainder of his plan*. If he here receives a check, he will quietly acquiesce in the general opinion, and must submit to be included among those who have mistaken their talent. But as the difficulties he had to struggle with would, in case of success, have increased his reputation, he hopes, if he hath failed, they will soften his disgrace.

* The author's original design was to have written a poem, intituled, "Public Virtue," in three books; 1st, Agriculture; 2d, Commerce; 3d, Arts. The first book was all he ever executed.

CANTO I.

THE ARGUMENT.

The proposition. Address to the Prince of Wales. Invocation to the genius of Britain. Husbandry to be encouraged, as it is the source of wealth and plenty. Advice to landlords, not to oppress the farmer. The farmer's three great virtues. His instruments of husbandry. His servants. Description of a country statute. Episode of the fair milk-maid. The farm-yard described. The pleasures of a rural life. Address to the great, to study agriculture. An allegory, attempting to explain the theory of vegetation.

Of culture, and the various fruits of earth,
Of social commerce, of the nobler arts,
Which polish and adorn the life of man;
Objects demanding the supreme regard
Of that exalted monarch, who sustains
The sceptre of command o'er Britain's sons;
The muse, disdain'g idle themes, attempts
To sing. O thou, Britannia's rising hope!
The favourite of her wishes! Thou, O prince!
On whom her fondest expectations wait,
Accept the verse: and, to the humblest voice
That sings of public virtue, lend an ear.

Genius of Britain! pure intelligence!
Guardian, appointed by the One Supreme,
With influential energy benign
To guide the weal of this distinguish'd isle;
O! wake the breath of her aspiring son,
Inform his numbers, aid his bold design,
Who, in a daring flight, presumes to mark
The glorious track her monarchs should pursue.

From cultivation, from the useful toils
Of the laborious hind, the streams of wealth
And plenty flow. Deign then, illustrious youth!
To bring th' observing eye, the liberal hand,
And, with a spirit congenial to your birth,
Regard his various labours through the year:
So shall the labourer smile, and you improve
The happy country you are born to rule.

The year declining, now hath left the fields
Divested of their honours: the strong glebe
Exhausted, waits the culture of the plough,
To renovate her powers. 'Tis now, intent
On honest gain, the cautious husbandman
Surveys the country round, solicitous
To fix his habitation on a soil
Propitious to his hopes and to his cares.

O ye, whom fortune in her silken robe
Enwraps benign; whom plenty's bounteous hand

Hath favour'd with distinction ! O look down,
 With smiles indulgent, on his new designs !
 Assist his useful works, facilitate
 His honest aims ; nor in exactness's gripe [toils Enthral th' endeavouring swain. Think not his
 Were meant alone to foster you in ease
 And pamper'd indolence ; nor grudge the meed,
 Which Heaven in mercy gives to cheer the hand,
 The labouring hand of useful industry.
 Be yours the joy to propagate content ;
 With bounteous Heaven co-operate, and reward
 The poor man's toil, whence all your riches spring.
 As in a garden, the enlivening air
 Is fill'd with odours, drawn from those fair flowers
 Which by its influence rise ; so in his breast
 Benevolent, who gives the swains to thrive,
 Reflected live the joys his virtues lent.

But come, young farmer, though by fortune fix'd
 On fields luxuriant, where the fruitful soil
 Gives labour hope ; where sheltering shades arise,
 Thick fences guard, and bubbling fountains flow ;
 Where arable and pasture duly mix ;
 Yet, ere thy toils begin, attend the muse,
 And catch the moral lessons of her song.
 Be frugal and be blest ; frugality
 Will give thee competence ; thy gains are small,
 Too small to bear profusion's wasteful hand.
 Make temperance thy companion ; so shall health
 Sit on thy brow, invigorating thy frame
 To every useful work. And if to these Thou happily shalt join one virtue more,
 The love of industry, the glowing joy
 Felt from each new improvement ; then fair peace,
 With modest neatness in her decent garb,
 Shall walk around thy dwelling ; while the great,
 Tir'd with the vast fatigue of indolence,
 Fill'd with disease by luxury and sloth,
 Impatient curse the dilatory day,
 And look with envy on thy happier state.

Prepar'd with these plain virtues, now the swain
 With courage enters on his rural works.
 First he provides the needful implements.
 Of these, the honour'd plough claims chief regard.
 Hence bread to man, who heretofore on mast
 Fed with his fellow brute in woods and wilds,
 Himself uncultur'd as the soil he trod.
 The spiked harrow next, to break the clods,
 And spread the surface of the new-plough'd field :
 Nor is the roller's friendly aid unsought.
 Hoes he provides, with various arms prepar'd,
 To encounter all the numerous host of weeds,
 Which rise malignant, menacing his hopes.
 The sweeping scythe's keen edge he whets for grais,

And turns the crooked sickle for his corn.
 The fork to spread, the gathering rake to save,
 With providential care he treasures up.
 His strong capacious wain, the dull slow ox
 Drags on, deep loaden, grinding the rough ruts ;
 While with his lighter team, the sprightly horse
 Moves to the music of his tinkling bells.
 Nor will his foresight lack the whirling flail,
 Whose battering strokes force from the loosen'd sheaves

Their hidden stores profuse ; which now demand
 The quick rotation of the winnowing fan,
 With blasts successive, wafting far away
 The worthless chaff, to clear the golden grain.

And now compell'd to hire assistant strength,
 Away he hastens to some neighbouring town,
 Where willing servitude, for mutual wants
 Of hind and farmer, holds her annual feast.
 'Tis here the toiling hand of industry
 Employment seeks. The skilful ploughman, lord
 And leader of the rustic band ; who claims
 His boy attendant, conscious of his worth
 And dignity superior ; boasting skill
 To guide with steadiness the sliding share,
 To scatter with an equal hand the seed,
 And with a master scythe to head the train,
 When the ripe meadow asks the mower's hand.
 Here too, the thrasher, brandishing his flail,
 Beseeks a master, whose full barns demand
 A labouring arm, now ready to give up
 Their treasure, and exchange their hoarded grain
 For heaps of gold, the meed of honest toil.
 The sun-burnt shepherd too, his slouching hat
 Distinguish'd well with fleecy locks, expects Obedvance ; skill'd in wool, and lesson'd deep
 In all diseases of the bleating flock.
 Mix'd with the rustic throng, see ruddy maids,
 Some taught with dextrous hand to twirl the wheel,

Or stroak the swelling udder ; some expert
 To raise from leaven'd wheat the kneaded loaf ;
 To mash the melted barley, and extract
 Its flavour'd strength ; or, with a housewife's care
 To keep the decent habitation neat.
 But now let loose to revelry and sport,
 In clamorous mirth indelicate and rude, [voice
 The boisterous swains, and hoyden nymphs, pro-
 Outrageous merriment.—Yet not alike
 Is every swain, nor every sylvan maid ;
 As Verulam the pleasing tale records.
 When Patty, lovely Patty, grac'd the crowd,
 Pride of the neighbouring plains. Who hath not heard

Of Patty, the fair milk-maid ? Beautiful
 As an Arcadian nymph ; upon her brow
 Sat virgin modesty, while in her eyes
 Young sensibility began to play
 With innocence. Her waving locks fell down
 On either side her face in careless curls,
 Shading the tender blushes in her cheek.
 Her breath was sweeter than the morning gale,
 Stolen from the rose or violet's dewy leaves.
 Her ivory teeth appear'd in even rows,
 Through lips of living coral. When the spoke,
 Her features wore intelligence ; her words
 Were soft, with such a smile accompany'd,
 As lighted in her face resistless charms.
 Her polish'd neck rose rounding from her breast
 With pleasing elegance :—That lovely breast !—
 Ah ! fancy, dwell not there, lest gay desire,
 Who, smiling, hovers o'er th' enchanting place,
 Tempt thy wild thoughts to dangerous ecstacy.
 Her shape was moulded by the hand of ease,
 Exact proportion harmoniz'd her frame ;
 While grace, following her steps, with secret art
 Stole into all her motions. Thus she walk'd
 In sweet simplicity ; a snow-white pail

* This is called in the country a statute, and is held annually at most market-towns in England where servants of all kinds resort in quest of place and employment.

Hung on her arm, the symbol of her skill
In that fair province of the rural state,
The dairy; source of more delicious bowls
Than Bacchus from his choicest vintage boasts.

How great the power of beauty! The rude fawns

Grew civil at her sight; and gaping crowds,
Wrapt in astonishment, with transport gaze,
Whispering her praises in each other's ear,
As when a gentle breeze, borne through the grove,
With quick vibration shakes the trembling leaves,
And hushing murmurs run from tree to tree;
So ran a spreading whisper through the crowd.
Young Thyrsis hearing, turn'd aside his head,
And soon the pleasing wonder caught his eye.
Full in the prime of youth, the joyful heir
Of numerous acres, a large freehold farm,
Thyrsis as yet from beauty felt no pain,
Had seen no virgin he could wish to make
His wedded partner. Now his beating heart
Feels new emotion; now his fixed eye,
With fervent rapture dwelling on her charms,
Drinks in delicious draughts, of new-born love.
No rest the night, no peace the following day
Brought to his struggling heart: her beauteous form,

Her fair perfections playing on his mind,
With pleasing anguish torture him. In vain
He strives to tear her image from his breast;
Each little grace, each dear bewitching look,
Returns triumphant, breaking his resolves,
And binding all his soul a slave to love.

Ah! little did he know, alas! the while
Poor Patty's tender heart, in mutual pain,
Long, long for him had heav'd the secret sigh.
For him the dress, for him the pleasing arts
She study'd; and for him she wish'd to live.
But her low fortunes, nursing sad despair,
Check'd the young hope; nor durst her modest eyes
Indulge the smallest glances of her shame,
Lest curious malice, like a watchful spy,
Should catch the secret, and with taunts reveal.

Judge then the sweet surprize, when she at length

Beheld him, all irresolute, approach;
And gently taking her fair trembling hand,
Breathe these soft words into her listening ear.

"O Patty! dearest maid, whose beauteous form
 Dwells in my breast, and charms my soul to love,

"Accept my vows; accept a faithful heart,
 Which from this hour devotes itself to thee:

"Wealth has no relish, life can give no joy,
 If you forbid my hopes to call you mine."

Ah! who the sudden tumult can describe
Of struggling passions rising in her breast?

Hope, fear, confusion, modesty, and love,
Oppress her labouring soul:—She strove to speak,

But the faint accents dy'd upon her tongue:
Her fears prevented utterance.—At length

"Can Thyrsis mock my poverty? Can he
 Be so unkind? O no! yet I, alas,

"Too humble even to hope"—No more she said;
But gently, as if half unwilling, stole

Her hand from his; and, with sweet modesty,
Casting a look of diffidence and fear,

To hide her blushes, silently withdrew.
But Thyrsis read, with rapture in her eyes,
The language of her soul. He follow'd, woo'd,

And won her for his wife. His lowing herds
Soon call her mistress; soon their milky streams
Coagulated, rise in circling piles
Of harden'd curd; and all the dairies round,
To her sweet butter yield superior praise.

But turn, my muse, nor let th' alluring form
Of beauty lead too far thy devious steps.

See where the farmer, with a master's eye,
Surveys his little kingdom, and exults

In sov'reign independence. At a word,
His feathery subjects in obedience flock

Around his feeding hand, who in return
Yield a delicious tribute to his board,

And o'er his couch their downy plumage spread.
The peacock here expands his eye-ful plumes,

A glittering pageant to the mid-day sun:
In the stiff awkwardness of foolish pride,

The swelling turkey apes his stately step,
And calls the bristling feathers round his head.

There the loud herald of the morning flutters
Before his cackling dames, the passive slaves

Of his promiscuous pleasure. O'er the pond,
See the gray gander, with his female train,

Bending their lofty necks; and gabbling ducks,
Rejoicing on the surface clap their wings;

Whilst wheeling round, in airy wanton flights,
The glossy pigeons chase their sportive loves,

Or in soft cooings tell their amorous tale.
Here stacks of hay, there pyramids of corn,

Promise the future market large supplies:
While with an eye of triumph he surveys

His piles of wood, and laughs at winter's frown.
In silent rumination, see the kine,

Beneath the walnut's shade, patiently wait
To pour into his pails their milky stores.

While pent from mischief, far from sight remov'd,
The bristly herd, within their fatt'ning styes,

Remind him to prepare, in many a row,
The gaily blooming pea, the fragrant bean, [feast.

And broad-leav'd cabbage, for the ploughman's
 These his amusements, his employments these;

Which still arising in successive change,
Give to each vary'd hour a new delight.

Peace and contentment with their guardian wings
Enclose his nightly slumbers. Rofy health,

When the gay lark's sweet matin wakes the morn,
Treads in his dewy footsteps round the field;

And cheerfulness attends his closing day.
No racking jealousy, nor sullen hate,

Nor fear, nor envy, discompose his breast.
His only enemies the prowling fox,

Whose nightly murders thin the bleating fold;
The hardy badger; the rapacious kite,

With eye malignant on the little brood,
Sailing around portentous; the rank stote

Thirsting, ah, savage thirst! for harmless blood;
The corn devouring partridge; timorous hare;

Th' amphibious otter bold; the weasel fly,
Pilfering the yolk from its enclosing shell;

And moles, a dirty undermining race.
These all his foes, and these, alas, compar'd

With man to man, an inoffensive train.
'Gainst these, assisted by th' entangling net,

Th' explosive thunder of the level'd tube,
Or toils unwear'd of his social friend

The faithful dog, he wages rural war,
And health and pleasure in the sportive field

Obtaining, he forgives their venial crimes.

O happy he! happiest of mortal men!
Who far remov'd from slavery as from pride,
Fears no man's frown, nor cringing waits to catch

The gracious nothing of a great man's nod:
Where the lac'd beggar buxles for a bribe,
The purchase of his honour; where deceit,
And fraud, and circumvention, dress in smiles,
Hold shameful commerce; and beneath the mask
Of friendship and sincerity, betray.

Him, nor the stately mansion's gilded pride,
Rich with what'er the imitative arts,
Painting or sculpture, yield to charm the eye;
Nor shining heaps of massy plate enwrought
With curious, costly workmanship, allure.
Temp't nor with the pride nor pomp of power,
Nor pageants of ambition, nor the mines
Of grasping avarice, nor the poison'd sweets
Of pamper'd luxury, he plants his foot
With firmness on his old paternal fields,
And stands unshaken. There sweet prospects rise
Of meadows smiling in their flow'ry pride,
Green hills and dales, and cottages embower'd,
The scenes of innocence and calm delight.
There the wild melody of warbling birds,
And cool refreshing groves, and murmuring
springs,

Invite to sacred thought, and lift the mind
From low pursuits, to meditate the God!

Turn then at length, O turn, ye sons of wealth,
And ye who seek through life's bewildering
mazes,

To tread the paths of happiness, O turn!
And trace her footsteps in the rural walk;
In those fair scenes of wonder and delight,
Where, to the human eye, Omnipotence
Unfolds the map of nature, and displays
The matchless beauty of created things.
Turn to the arts, the useful pleasing arts
Of cultivation; and those fields improve
Your erring fathers have too long despis'd.
Leave not to ignorance, and low-bred hind,
That noblest science, which in ancient time
The mind of sages and of kings employ'd,
Solicitous to learn the ways of God,
And read his work in agriculture's school.

They hear the muse, now entering, hand in hand

With sweet philosophy, the secret bowers
Of deep mysterious nature; there t' explore
The causes of fecundity, and how
The various elements, earth, water, air,
And fire united; the enlivening ray
Diurnal, the prolific dew of night;
With all the rolling seasons of the year;
In vegetation's work their power combine.

Whither, O whither dost thou lead my steps,
Divine philosophy? What scenes are these,
Which strike my wondering senses? Lo! en-
thron'd

Upon a solid rock great nature sits;
Her eyes to heaven directed, as from thence Receiving inspiration. Round her head
A mingled wreath of fruits and flowers entwines.
Her robe, with every motion changing hue,
Flows down in plenteous foldings, and conceals
Her secret footsteps from the eyes of men.
Lift! lift! what harmony, what heavenly sounds

Enchant my ravish'd ear? 'tis ancient Pan,
Who on his seven-fold pipe, to the rapt soul
Conveys the fancy'd music of the spheres.
See by his strains the elements inspir'd,
Join in mysterious work; their motions led
By † active fire, in windings intricate,
But not perplex'd, nor vague. And who are they
What pair obeying in alternate rounds
The tuneful melody? majestic one,
And grave, lifting her awful forehead, moves
In shadowy silence, borne on raven wings,
Which, waving to the measur'd sounds, beat time.
A veil obscures her face; a sable stole,
Bedeck'd with sparkling gems, conceals her form.
As wreaths of bending poppy crown her brow.
The other, rais'd on swan-like spreading plumes,
Glides gaily on; a milk-white robe invests
His frame transparent; in his azure eyes
Dwells brightness; while around his radiant head
A shining glory paints his flying robe,
With all the colours of the wat'ry bow.

Proceeding now, in more majestic steps,
The varying seasons join the mystic train.
In all the blooming hues of florid youth,
Gay spring advances smiling: on her head
A flow'ry chaplet, mix'd with verdant buds,
Sheds aromatic fragrance through the air;
While little zephyrs, breathing wanton gales,
Before her flutter, turning back to gaze,
With looks enamour'd, on her lovely face.
Summer succeeds, crown'd with the bearded ears

Of ripening harvest; in her hand she bears
A shining sickle; on her glowing cheek
The fervent heat paints deep a rosy blush:
Her thin light garment, waving with the wind,
Flows loosely from her bosom, and reveals
To the pleas'd eye the beauties of her form.
Then follows Autumn, bearing in her lap
The blushing fruits, which Summer's sultry breath
Had mellow'd to her hand. A clustering wreath
Of purple grapes, half hid with spreading leaves
Adorns her brow. Her dew-besprinkled locks
Begin to fall, her bending shoulders sink,
And active vigour leaves her sober steps.
Winter creeps on, shrivell'd with chilling cold;
Bald his white crown, upon his silver beard
Shines the hoar-frost, and isicles depend.
Rigid and stern his melancholy face;
Shivering he walks, his joints benumb'd and stiff;

And wraps in northern furs his wither'd trunk.
And now, great nature pointing to the train
Her heaven-directed hand, they all combine,
In measur'd figures, and mysterious rounds,
To weave the mazy dance; while to the sound
Of Pan's immortal pipe, the goddesses join'd

* Mythologists have thought the universal nature things to be signified by this god; and that his pipe, composed of seven reeds, was the symbol of the seven plane which they say make the harmony of the spheres.

† According to Dr. Boerhaave, and the other modern philosophers, all the motion in nature arises from fire and taking that away, all things would become fix'd and immovable: fluids would become solid; a man would harden into a statue; and the very air would become into a firm and rigid mass.

Her voice harmonious; and the listening muse,
Admiring, caught the wonders of her * theme.

“ To God, supreme Creator! great and good!

“ All-wise, Almighty Parent of the world!

“ In choral symphonies of praise and love,

“ Let all the powers of nature raise the song!”

“ The wat’ry signs forsaking, see, the sun,

“ Great father of the vegetable tribes,

“ Darts from the Ram his all-enlivening ray.

“ When now the genial warmth earth’s yielding
“ breast

“ Unfolds. Her latent salts, sulphureous oils,

“ And air, and water mix’d; attract, repel,

“ And raise prolific ferment. Lo! at length

“ The vital principle begins to wake:

“ Th’ emulgent fibres, stretching round the root,

“ Seek their terrestrial nurture; which convey’d

“ In limpid currents through th’ ascending tubes,

“ And strain’d and filter’d in their secret cells;

“ To its own nature every different plant

“ Assimilating, changes. Awful Heaven!

“ How wondrous is thy work, to thee! to thee!

“ Mysterious power belongs! summer’s fierce heat

“ Increasing, rarifies the ductile juice.

“ See, from the root, and from the bark imbiv’d,

“ Th’ elastic air impells the rising sap.

“ Swift through the stem, through every branch-
“ ing arm,

“ And smaller foot, the vivid moisture flows,

“ Protruding from their buds the opening leaves:

“ Whence, as ordain’d th’ expiring air flows out

“ In copious exhalations; and from whence

“ Its noblest principles the plant inhales.

“ See! see! the shooting verdure spreads around!

“ Ye sons of men, with rapture view the scene!

“ On hill and dale, on meadow, field, and grove,

“ Cloth’d in soft mingling shades from light to “ dark,

“ The wandering eye delighted roves untir’d.

“ The hawthorn’s whitening bush, Pomona’s
“ blooms,

“ And Flora’s pencil o’er th’ enamell’d green,

“ The varying scenes enrich. Hence every gale

“ Breathes odours, every zephyr from his wings

“ Wafting new fragrance; borne from trees, from “ shrubs,

“ Borne from the yellow cowslip, violet blue,

“ From deep carnations, from the blushing rose,

“ From every flower and aromatic herb

“ In grateful mixtures. Hence ambrosial fruits

“ Yield their delicious flavours. The sweet grape.

“ The mulberry’s cooling juice, the luscious “ plumb,

“ The healthful apple, the dissolving peach,

“ And thy rich nectar many flavour’d pine.

“ These are the gracious gifts. O favour’d man!

“ These, these, to thee the gracious gifts of “ Heav’n,

“ A world of beauty, wonder, and delight.”

“ To God, supreme Creator! great and good!

“ All-wise, Almighty Parent of the world!

“ In choral symphonies of praise and love,

“ Let all the powers of nature close the strain.”

* The philosophy of this poem is built on that experimental foundation, laid by the learned and ingenious Dr. Hales, in his Vegetable Statics.

CANTO II.

THE ARGUMENT.

Of different soils, and their culture. Mr. Tull’s principles and practice. Of the principles and practice of the Middlesex gardeners. Of various manures, and other methods of improving lands. Of hedging and ditching. Of planting timber trees. Of draining wet, and flooding dry lands. Of gardening and the gardens of Epicurus.

DESCENDING now from these superior themes,

O muse, in notes familiar, teach the swain

The hidden properties of every glebe,

And what the different culture each requires.

The naturalist, to sand, or loam, or clay,

Reduces all the varying soils, which clothe

The bosom of this earth with beauty. Sand,

Hot, open, loose, admits the genial ray

With freedom, and with greediness imbibes

The falling moisture: hence the embryo seeds,

Lodg’d in its fiery womb, push into life

With early haste, and hurry’d to their prime,

(Their vital juices spent) too soon decay.

Correct this error of the ardent soil,

With cool manure: let stiff cohesive clay

Give the loose glebe consistence and firm strength,

So shall thy labouring steers, when harvest calls,

Bending their patient shoulders to the yoke,

Drag home in copious loads the yellow grain.

Has fortune fix’d thy lot to toil in clay?

Despair not, nor repine: the stubborn soil

Shall yield to cultivation, and reward

The hand of diligence. Here give the plough

No rest. Break, pound the clods, and with war-dungs

Relieve the sterile coldness of the ground,

Chill’d with obstructed water. Add to these

The sharpest sand, to open and unbind

The close-cohering mafs; so shall new pores

Admit the solar beam’s enlivening heat,

The nitrous particles of air receive,

And yield a passage to the soaking rain.

Hence fermentation, hence prolific power,

And hence the fibrous roots in quest of food,

Find unobstructed entrance, room to spread,

And richer juices feed the swelling shoots:

So the strong field shall to the reaper’s hand

Produce a plenteous crop of waving wheat.

But blest with ease, in plenty shall he live,

Whom Heav’n’s kind hand, indulgent to his wish,

Hath plac’d upon a loamy soil. He views

All products of the teeming earth arise

In plenteous crops, nor scarce the needful aid

Of culture deigns to ask. Him, nor the fears

Of scorching heat, nor deluges of rain

Alarm. His kindly fields sustain all change

Of seasons, and support a healthy seed,

In vigour through the perils of the year.

But new improvements curious wouldst thou learn,

Hear then the lore of fair Berkeria’s * son,

* The late Mr. Tull, of Shalborne in Berkshire, in his Horse-keeping Husbandry; or, an Essay on the Principles of Vegetation and Tillage.

Whose precepts drawn from sage experience,
claim

Regard. The pasture, and the food of plants,
First let the young Agricoltist be taught :
Then how to sow, and raise the embryo seeds
Of every different species, Nitre, fire,
Air, water, earth, their various powers combine
In vegetation; but the genuine food
Of every plant is earth: hence their increase,
Their strength and substance. Nitre first prepares
And separates the concreted parts; which then,
The wat'ry vehicle assumes, and through
Th' ascending tubes, impell'd by subtle air,
Which gives it motion, and that motion heat,
The fine terrestrial aliment conveys.

Is earth the food of plants? their pasture then
By ceaseless tillage, or the use of dung,
Must or ferment, or pulverize, to fit
For due reception of the fibrous roots:
But from the streams of ordure, from the stench
Of putrefaction, from stercoraceous fumes
Of rottenness and filth, can sweetness spring?
Or grateful, or salubrious food to man?
As well might virgin innocence preserve
Her purity from taint, amid the stews.
Defile not then the freshness of thy field
With dungs polluting touch; but let the plough,
The hoe, the harrow, and the roller lend
Their better powers, to fructify the soil;
Turn it to catch the sun's prolific ray,
Th' enlivening breath of air, the genial dew,
And every influence of indulgent Heaven.
These shall enrich and fertilize the glebe,
And toil's unceasing hand full well supply
The dunghill's sordid and extraneous aid.

Thus taught the Shalborne swain; who first with skill

Led through the fields the many-coulter'd plough;
Who first his seed committed to the ground,
Shed from the drill by slow revolving wheels,
In just proportion and in even rows;
Leaving 'twixt each a spacious interval,
To introduce with ease, while yet the grain
Expanding crown'd the intermediate ridge,
His * new machine, form'd to exterminate
The weedy race (intruders who devour,
But nothing pay), to pulverize the soil,
Enlarge and change the pasture of the roots,
And to its last perfection raise the crop.
He taught, alas! but practis'd ill the lore
Of his own precepts. Fell disease, or sloth
Relax'd the hand of industry: his farm,
His own philosophy disgracing, brought
Discredit on the doctrines he enforc'd.

Then banish from thy fields the loiterer sloth;
Nor listen to the voice of thoughtless ease.
Him sordidness and penury surround,
Beneath whose lazy hand the farm runs wild;
Whose heart nor feels the joy improvement gives,
Nor leaden eye the beauties that arise
From labour fees. Accumulated filth
Annoys his crowded steps; even at his door
A yellow mucus from the dunghill stands
In squalid pools; his buildings unrepair'd,

* The bar-plough.

To ruin rush precipitate; his fields
Disorder governs, and licentious weeds
Spring up unchecked: the nettle and the dock,
Wormwood and thistles, in their seasons rise,
And deadly nightshade spreads his poison round.
Ah! wretched he! if chance his wandering child,
By hunger prompted, pluck th' alluring fruit!
Benumbing stupor creeps upon his brain;
Wild grinning laughter soon to this succeeds;
Strange madness then, and death in hideous form.
Mysterious Providence! ah, why conceal'd
In such a tempting form, should poisons lurk;
Ah, why so near the path of innocents,
Should spring their bane? But thou alone art wise.

Thus bath the faithful muse his lore pursu'd,
Who, trusting to the culture of his plough,
Refus'd the dunghill's aid. Yet listen not
To doubtful precepts, with implicit faith;
Experience to experience oft oppos'd,
Leaves truth uncertain. See what various crops,
In quick succession, crown the garden'd fields
On Thames' prolific bank. On culture's hand Alone, do these Horticulturists rely?
Or do they owe to London's rich manure
Those products which its crowded markets fill?
Eoth lend their aid: and both with art improv'd,
Have spread the glory of their garden's wide,
A theme of wonder to the distant swain. [er'd
Hence the piazza'd * square, where erst, embow-
In solemn sloth, good Martin's lazy monks
Dron'd out their useless lives in pamper'd ease;
Now boasts, from industry's rough hand supply'd,
Each various esculent the teeming earth
In every changing season can produce.

Join then with culture the prolific strength
Of such manure as best inclines to aid
Thy sowing glebe. Let oily marl impart
Its unobnoxious moisture, or the crumbling † tan
Its glowing heat. Nor from the gazing herds,
Nor bristly swine's obscene, disdain to heap
Their cooling ordure. Nor the warmer dungs
Of fiery pigeons, of the stabled horse,
Or folded flock, neglect. From sprinkled foot,
From ashes strew'd around, let the damp soil
Their nit'rous salts imbibe. Scour the deep ditch
From its black sediment; and from the street
Its trampled mixtures rake. Green standing pools,
Large lakes, or meadows rank, in rotted heaps
Of ‡ unripe weeds, afford a cool manure.
From ocean's verge, if not too far remov'd,
Its shelly sands convey a warm compost,
From land and wave commixt, with richness fraught:

This the four glebe shall sweeten, and for years,
Through chilly clay, its vigorous heat shall glow.

* Covent-Garden, which is now a market for greens, roots, &c. was formerly a garden belonging to the monks of St. Martin's convent.

† The bark of oak, after it hath been used by the tanner. It is frequently made use of for bosteds, particularly for raising pine-apples; and is called by the gardeners, Tan.

‡ If seeds are suffered to stand till they are ripe before they are made this use of, their seeds will fill the ground, and it will be difficult to get them out again.

But if nor oily marl, nor crumbling tan,
Nor dung of cattle, nor the trampled street,
Nor weed, nor ocean's sand, can lend its aid;
Then, farmer, raise immediate from their seeds,
The juicy stalks of largely-spreading pulse,
Beans, buck-wheat, spurry, or the climbing vetch;
These early reapt, and bury'd in the soil,
Enrich the parent womb from whence they sprung.

Or sow the bulbous turnip; this shall yield
Sweet pasture to the flocks, or lowing herds,
And well prepare thy land for future crops.

Yet not alone to raise, but to secure
Thy products from invasion, and divide
For various use th' appropriated fields,
Disdain not thus to learn. For this, the sloe,
The furze, the holly, to thy hand present
Their branches, and their different merits boast.
But from the nurs'ry then with care select Quick hawthorn setts, well rooted, smooth, and strait:

Then low as sinks thy ditch on either side,
Let rise in height the sloping bank: there plant
Thy future fence, at intervals a foot
From each to each, in beds of richest mold.
Nor ends the labour here; but to detend
Thy infant shoots from depredation deep,
At proper distance drive stiff oaken stakes;
Which, interwove with boughs and flexile twigs,
Frustrate the nibbling flock, or browsing herd.
Thus, if from weeds, that rob them of their food,
Or choke, by covering from the vital air,
The hoe's neat culture keep thy thickening shoots,
Soon shall they rise, and to thy field afford
A beauteous, strong, impenetrable fence.
The linnet, goldfinch, nightingale, and thrush,
Here, by security invited, build
Their little nests, and all thy labours cheer
With melody: the hand of lovely May
Here strews her sweetest blossoms; and if mixt
With stocks of knotted crabs, ingrafted fruits,
When autumn crowns the year, shall smile around.

But from low shrubs, if thy ambition rise
To cultivate the larger tree, attend.

From seeds, or suckers, layers, or setts, arise
Their various tribes; for now exploded stands
The vulgar fable of spontaneous birth,
To plant or animal. He then, who, pleas'd,
In fancy's eye beholds his future race
Rejoicing in the shades their grandfire gave;
Or he whose patriot views extend to raise,
In distant ages, Britain's naval power;
Must first prepare, inclining to the south,
A shelter'd nursery; well from weeds, from shrubs,
Clear'd by the previous culture of the plough,
From cattle fence'd, and every peeling tooth.
Then from the summit of the fairest tree
His seed selected ripe, and sow'd in rills
On nature's fruitful lap: the harrow's care
Indulgent covers from keen frosts that pierce,
Or vermin who devour. The wint'ry months
In embryo close the future forest lies,
And waits for germination: but in spring,
When their green heads first rise above the earth,
And ask thy fostering hand; then to their roots
The light soil gently move, and strew around
Old leaves, or litter'd straw, to screen from heat

The tender infants. Leave not to vile weeds,
This friendly office; whose false kindness chokes,
Or starves the nurslings they pretend to shade.

When now four summers have beheld their youth

Attended in the nursery, then transplant,
The soil, prepar'd, to where thy future grove
Is destin'd to uprear its leafy head
Avoid the error of impatience. He
Who, eager to enjoy the cooling shade
His hands shall raise, removes at vast expence
Tall trees; with envy and regret shall see
His neighbour's infant plants soon, soon outstrip
The tardy loiterers of his dwindling copse.

But if thy emulation's generous pride
Would boast the largest timber strait and strong!
Thick let the seedling in their native beds
Stand unremov'd; so shall each lateral branch,
Obstructed, send its nourishment to raise
The towering stem: and they whose vigorous health

Exalts above the rest their lofty heads,
Aspiring still, shall spread their powerful arms,
While the weak puny race, obscur'd below,
Sicken, die off, and leave their victors room.

Nor small the praise the skillful planter claims
From his besetted country. Various arts
Borrow from him materials. The soft beech,
And close-grain'd box, employ the turner's wheel,
And with a thousand implements supply
Mechanic skill. Their beauteous veins the yew
And phyllerea lend, to surface o'er
The cabinet. Smooth linden best obeys
The carver's chissel; best his curious work
Displays in all its nicest touches. Birch—
Ah, why should birch supply the chair? since oft
Its cruel twigs compel the smarting youth
To tread the hateful seat. Tough-bending ash
Gives to the humble swain his useful plough,
And for the peer his prouder chariot builds.
To weave our baskets the soft ufer lends
His pliant twigs: Staves that nor shrink nor swell,
The cooper's close-wrought cask to chestnut owes.
The sweet-leav'd walnut's undulates grain,
Polish'd with care, adds to the workman's art
Its varying beauties. The tall towering elm,
Scoop'd into hollow tubes, in secret streams
Conveys for many a mile the limpid wave;
Or from its height when humbled to the ground,
Conveys the pride of mortal man to dust.

And last the oak, king of Britannia's woods,
And guardian of her isle! whose sons robust,
The best supporters of incumbent weight,
Their beams and pillars to the builder give,
Of strength immense: or in the bounding deep
The loose foundations lay of floating walls,
Impregnable secure. But sunk, but fallen
From all your ancient grandeur, O ye groves!
Beneath whose lofty venerable boughs
The druid erst his solemn rites perform'd,
And taught to distant realms his sacred lore,
Where are your beauties fled? where but to serve
Your thankless country, who unblushing sees
Her naked forests longing for your shade.

The task, the glorious task, for thee remains,
O prince below'd! for thee more nobly born
Than for thyself alone, the patriot work

Yet unattempted waits. O let not pass
 The fair occasion to remotest time
 Thy name with praise, with honour to transmit!
 So shall thy country's rising fleets, to thee
 Owe future triumphs; so her naval strength,
 Supported from within, shall fix thy claim
 To ocean's sovereignty; and to thy ports,
 In every climate of the peopled earth,
 Bear commerce; fearless, unresisted, safe.
 Let then the great ambition fire thy breast,
 For this, thy native land; replace the lost
 Inhabitants of her deserted plains.
 Let Thame once more on Windfor's lofty hills
 Survey young forests planted by thy hand.
 Let fair Sabrina's flood again behold
 The * Spaniard's terror rise renew'd. And Trent,
 From Sherwood's ample plains, with pride convey
 The bulwarks of her country to the main.

O native Sherwood! happy were thy bard,
 Might these his rural notes, to future time
 Boast of tall groves, that, nodding o'er thy plain,
 Rose to their tuneful melody. But, ah!
 Beneath the feeble efforts of a muse
 Untutor'd by the lore of Greece or Rome;
 A stranger to the fair Castalian springs,
 Whence happier poets inspiration draw,
 And the sweet magic of persuasive song,
 The weak presumption, the fond hope expires.
 Yet sure some sacred impulse stirs my breast!
 I feel, I feel, an heavenly guest within!
 And all-obedient to the ruling God,
 The pleasing talk which he inspires, pursue.
 And hence, disdainful low and trivial things;
 Why should I tell of him whose obvious art,
 To drain the low damp meadow, sloping sinks
 A hollow trench, which arch'd at half its depth,
 Cover'd with filtering brush-wood, furze or broom,
 And surfac'd o'er with earth; in secret streams
 Draws its collected moisture from the glebe?
 Or why of him, who o'er his sandy fields,
 Too dry to bear the sun's meridian beam,
 Calls from the neighbouring hills obsequious
 Springs,

Which led in winding currents through the mead,
 Cool the hot soil, refresh the thirsty plain,
 While wither'd plants reviving smile around?
 But sing, O muse! the swain, the happy swain,
 Whom taste and nature leading o'er his fields,
 Conduct to every rural beauty. See!
 Before his footsteps winds the waving walk,
 Here gently rising, there descending slow
 Through the tall grove, or near the water's brink,
 Where flowers besprinkled paint the shelving bank,
 And weeping willows bend, to kiss the stream.
 Now wandering o'er the lawn he roves, and now
 Beneath the hawthorn's secret shade reclines:
 Where purple violets hang their bashful heads,
 Where yellow cowslips, and the blushing pink,
 Their mingled sweets, and lovely hues combine.

Here, shelter'd from the north, his ripening fruits

* The officers on board the Spanish fleet, in 1588, called the Invincible Armada, had it in their orders, if they could not subdue the island, at least to destroy the forest of Dean, which is in the neighbourhood of the river Severn.

Display their sweet temptations from the wall,
 Or from the gay espalier: while below,
 His various eculents, from glowing beds,
 Give the fair promise of delicious feasts.

There from his forming hand new scenes arise.
 The fair creation of his fancy's eye.
 Lo! bosom'd in the solemn shady grove,
 Whose reverend branches wave on yonder hill,
 He views the moss-grown temple's ruin'd tower,
 Cover'd with creeping ivy's cluster'd leaves;
 The mansion seeming of some rural god,
 Whom nature's choristers, in untaught hymns
 Of wild yet sweetest harmony, adore.
 From the bold brow of that aspiring steep,
 Where hang the nibbling flocks, and view below
 Their downward shadows in the grassy wave,
 What pleasing landscapes spread before his eye!
 Of scatter'd villages, and winding streams,
 And meadows green, and woods, and distant spires,
 Seeming, above the blue horizon's bound,
 To prop the canopy of Heav'n. Now lost
 Amid't a glooming wilderness of shrubs,
 The golden orange, arbutue ever green,
 The early-blooming almond, feathery pine,
 Fair *-opulus, to spring, to autumn dear,
 And the sweet shades of varying verdure, caught
 From soft Acacia's gently-waving branch,
 Heedless he wanders: while the grateful scents
 Of sweet-briar, roses, honeysuckles wild,
 Regale the smell; and to th' enchanted eye
 Mezereon's purple, laurustinus' white,
 And pale laburnum's pendent flowers display
 Their different beauties. O'er the smooth-shorn grafs

His lingering footsteps leisurely proceed,
 In meditation deep:—When, hark! the sound
 Of distant water steals upon his ear;
 And sudden opens to his pausing eye
 The rapid rough cascade, from the rude rock
 Down dashing in a stream of lucid foam:
 Then glides away, meandering o'er the lawn,
 A liquid surface; shining seen afar,
 At intervals, beneath the shadowy trees;
 Till lost and bury'd in the distant grove.
 Wrapt into sacred musing, he reclines
 Beneath the covert of embowering shades;
 And, painting to his mind the bustling scenes
 Of pride and bold ambition, pities kings.
 Genius of gardens! nature's fairest child!
 Thou who, inspir'd by the directing mind
 Of Heaven, did't plan the scenes of Paradise!
 Thou at whose bidding rose th' Hesperian bowers
 Of ancient fame, the fair Anion mount,
 Castalian springs, and all th' enchanting groves
 Of Tempe's vale: O where hast thou been hid?
 For ages where have stray'd thy steps unknown?
 Welcome at length, thrice welcome to the shore
 Of Britain's beauteous isle; where verdant plains,
 Where hills and dales, and woods and waters join,
 To aid thy pencil, favour thy designs,
 And give thy varying landscapes every charm.
 Drive then † Batavia's monsters from our shades;

* The gelder rose.

† The taste for straight lines, regular platforms, and cleft trees, was imported from Holland at the Revolution.

Nor let unhallow'd shears profane the form,
Which Heaven's own hand, with symmetry divine,
Hath given to all the vegetable tribes.
Banish the regular deformity
Of plans by line and compass, rules abhorr'd
In nature's free plantations; and restore
Its pleasing wildness to the garden walk;
The calm serene recess of thoughtful man,
In meditation's silent sacred hour.

And lo! the progress of thy steps appears
In fair improvements scatter'd round the land,
Earliest in Chiswick's beauteous model seen:
There thy first favourite, in the happy shade
To nature introduc'd, the goddess woo'd,
And in sweet rapture there enjoy'd her charms.
In Richmond's venerable woods and wilds,
The calm retreat, where weary'd majesty,
Unbending from his cares for Britain's peace,
Steals a few moments to indulge his own.
On Otland's brow, where grandeur sits en-
thron'd,

Smiling on beauty. In the lovely vale
Of Esher, where the Mole glides lingering, loth
To leave such scenes of sweet simplicity.
In * Woburn's ornamented fields, where gay
Variety, where mingled lights and shades,
Where lawns and groves, and opening prospects
break,

With sweet surprise, upon the wandering eye.
On Hagley's hills, irregular and wild,
Where through romantic scenes of hanging woods,
And vallies green, and rocks, and hollow dales,
While echo talks, and nymphs and dryads play,
Thou ro'it enamour'd; leading by the hand
Its master, who, inspir'd with all thy art,
Adds beauties to what nature plann'd so fair.

Hail sweet retirement! Wisdom's peaceful seat!
Where lifted from the crowd, and calmly plac'd
Beyond the deafening roar of human strife,
Th' † Athenian sage his happy followers taught,
That pleasure sprang from virtue. Gracious Heaven!

How worthy thy divine beneficence,
This fair establish'd truth! ye blissful bowers,
Ye vocal groves whose echoes caught his lore,
O might I hear, through time's long tract con-
vey'd,

The moral lessons taught beneath your shades!
And lo, transported to the sacred scenes,
Such the 'divine enchantment of the muse,
I see the sage; I hear, I hear his voice.

"The end of life is happiness; the means
"That end to gain, fair virtue gives alone.
"From the vain phantoms or delusive fear,
"Or strong desire's intemperance, spring the woes
"Which human life embitter. Oh, my sons,
"From error's darkening clouds, from groundless
"fear

"Enfeebling all her powers, with early skill,
"Clear the bewild'ring mind. Let fortitude
"Establish in your breasts her steadfast throne;
"So shall the stings of evil fix no wound:
"Nor dread of poverty, nor pain, nor grief,

* Mr. Southcote's.

† Epicurus, who, on account of teaching in his garden, was called the Garden Philosopher; and his disciples the Philosophers of the Garden.

"Nor life's disasters, nor the fear of death,
"Shake the just purpose of your steady souls.
"The golden curb of temperance next prepare,
"To rein th' impetuous sallies of desire.
"He who the kindling sparks of anger checks,
"Shall ne'er with fruitless tears in vain lament
"Its flame's destructive rage. Who from the vale
"Ambition's dangerous pinnacle surveys;
"Safe from the blast which shakes the towering
"pile,
"Enjoys secure repose, nor dreads the storm
"When public clamours rise. Who cautious turns
"From lewd temptation smiling in the eye
"Of wantonness hath burst the golden bands
"Of future anguish; hath redeem'd his frame
"From early feebleness, and dire disease.
"Who let the gripping hand of avarice pinch
"To narrow selfishness the social heart;
"Excludes fair friendship, charity, and love,
"From their divine exertions in his breast.
"And see, my friends, this garden's little bound,
"So small the wants of nature, well supplies
"Our board with plenty; roots, or who'some
"pulse, [stream
"Or herbs, or flavour'd fruits: and from the
"The hand of moderation fills a cup,
"To thirst delicious. Hence nor fevers rise,
"Nor surfeits, nor the boiling blood, inflam'd
"With turbid violence, the veins distends.
"Hear then, and weigh the moment of my words.
"Who thus the sensual appetites restrain,
"Enjoy the † heavenly Venus of these shades,
"Celestial pleasure; tranquil and secure,
"From pain, disease, and anxious troubles free.

CANTO III.

THE ARGUMENT.

Of hay-making. A method of preserving hay from being mow-burnt, or taking fire. Of harvest, and the harvest-home. The praises of England with regard to its various products. Apples. Hops. Hemp. Flax. Coals. Fuller's-earth. Stone. Lead. Tin. Iron. Dyer's herbs. Efculeants. Medicinals. Transitions from the cultivation of the earth to the care of sheep, cattle, and horses. Of feeding sheep. Of their diseases. Sheep-shearing. Of improving the breed. Of the dairy and its products. Of horses. The draught-horse—road-horse—hunter—race-horse—and war-horse. Concluding with an address to the Prince to prefer the arts of peace to those of war.

WHILE thus at ease, beneath embellish'd shades,
We rove delighted; lo! the ripening mead
Calls forth the labouring hind In slanting rows,
With still-approaching step, and level'd stroke
The early mower, bending o'er his scythe,
Lays low the slender grass; emblem of man,
Falling beneath the ruthless hand of time.
Then follows blithe, equip with fork and rake,
In light array, the train of nymphs and swains.
Wide o'er the field, their labour seeming sport,

* He placed in his garden a statue of the Venus Celsitis, which probably he might intend should be symbolical of his doctrine.

They tofs the withering herbage. Light it flies,
Borne on the wings of zephyr; whose soft gale,
Now while th' ascending sun's bright beam exhales
The grateful sweetness of the new-mown hay,
Breathing refreshment, fans the toiling swain.
And soon, the jocund dale and echoing hill
Resound with merriment. The simple jest,
The village tale of scandal, and the taunts
Of rude unpolish'd wit, raise sudden bursts
Of laughter from beneath the spreading oak,
Where thrown at ease, and shelter'd from the sun,
The plain repast and wholesome bev'rage cheer
Their spirits. Light as air they spring, renew'd,
To social labour: soon the ponderous wain
Moves slowly onwards with its fragrant load,
And swells the barn capacious: or, to crown
Their toil, large tapering pyramids they build,
The magazines of plenty, to ensure
From winter's want the flocks, and lowing herds.

But do the threat'ning clouds precipitate
Thy work, and hurry to the field thy team,
Ere the sun's heat, or penetrating wind,
Hath drawn its moisture from the fading grass?
Or hath the bursting shower thy labours drench'd
With sudden inundation? Ah, with care
Accumulate thy load, or in the mow,
Or on the rising rick. The smother'd damps,
Fermenting, glow within; and latent sparks
At length engender'd, kindle by degrees,
Till, wide and wider spreading, they admit
The fatal blast, which instantly consumes,
In flames resistless, thy collected store.
This dire disaster to avoid, prepare
A hollow basket, or the concave round
Of some capacious vessel; to its sides
Affix a triple cord; then let the swains,
Full in the centre of thy purpos'd heap,
Place the obtrusive barrier; raising still
As they advance, by its united bands,
The wide machine. Thus leaving in the midst
An empty space the cooling air draws in,
And from the flame, or from offensive taints
Pernicious to thy cattle, saves their food.

And now the ruler of the golden day,
From the fierce Lion glows with heat intense;
While Ceres in the ripening field looks down
In smiles benign. Now with enraptur'd eye,
The end of all his toil, and its reward,
The farmer views. Ah, gracious Heaven! attend

His fervent prayer: restrain the tempest's rage,
The dreadful blight disarm; nor in one blast
The products of the labouring year destroy!
Yet vain is Heaven's indulgence; for when now
In ready ranks th' impatient reapers stand,
Arm'd with the scythe or sickle;—echoes shrill
Of winding horns, the shouts and hollowings loud
Of huntsmen, and the cry of opening hounds,
Float in the gale melodious, but invade
His frighted sense with dread. Near and more near
Th' unwelcome sounds approach; and sudden o'er
His fence the tall stag bounds: in close pursuit
The hunter train, on many a noble steed,
Undaunted follow; while the eager pack
Burst unresist'd through the yielding hedge.
In vain, unheard, the wretched hind exclaims:
The ruin of his crop in vain laments:
Deaf to his cries, they traverse the-ripe field

In cruel exultation; trampling down
Beneath their feet, in one short moment's sport,
The peace, the comfort of his future year.
Unfeeling wealth! ah, when wilt thou forbear
Thy insults, thy injustice to the poor?
When taste the bliss of nursing in thy breast
The sweet sensations of humanity?

Yet all are not destroyers: some unspoil'd
By fortune, still preserve a feeling heart.
And see the yellow fields, with labourers spread,
Reign their treasures to the reaper's hand.
Here stands in comely order on the plain,
And cluster'd sheafs, the king of golden corn,
Unbearded wheat, support of human life:
There rises in round heaps the maltster's hope,
Grain which the reaper's care solicits best
By tempting promises of potent beer,
The joy, the meed of thirst-creating toil:
The poor man's clammy fare the fickle reaps;
The steed's light provender obeys the scythe.
Labour and mirth united, glow beneath
The mid-day sun; the laughing hinds rejoice:
Their master's heart is open'd, and his eye
Looks with indulgence on the gleaning poor,
At length, adorn'd with boughs and garlands

gay,
Nods the last load along the shouting field.
Now to the God of harvest in a song
The grateful farmer pays accepted thanks,
With joy unfeign'd: while to his ravish'd ear
The gratulations of assisting swains,
Are music. His exulting soul expands:
He presses every aiding hand; he bids
The plenteous feast, beneath some spreading tree,
Load the large board; and circulates the bowl,
The copious bowl, unmeasur'd, unrestrain'd,
A free libation: to th' immortal gods,
Who crown with plenty the prolific soil.

Hail, favour'd island! happy region, hail!
Whose temperate skies, mild air, and genial dews,
Enrich the fertile glebe; blessing thy sons
With various products, to the life of man
Indulgent. Thine Pomona's choicest gift,
The tasteful apple, rich with racy juice,
Theme of thy envy'd song, Silurian bard;
Affording to the swains, in sparkling cups,
Delicious bev'rage. Thine, on Cantium's hills,
The flow'ry hop, whose tendrils climbing round
The tall aspiring pole, bear their light heads
Aloft, in pendant clusters; which in malt's
Fermenting tuns infus'd, to mellow age
Preserves the potent draught. Thine to the plant,
To whose tough stringy stalks thy num'rous steets
Owe their strong cordage: with her sister stem,
Her fairer sister, whence Minerva's† tribe,
T' enfold in softness beauty's lovely limbs,
Present their woven texture: and from whence,
A second birth, grows the papyrus‡ leaf,
A tablet firm, on which the painter bard

* Rye, of which is made a coarse clammy kind of bread, used by the poorer people in many parts of England, on account of its cheapness.

† Minerva is said to have invented the art of weaving.

‡ The leaf of the Egyptian plant, papyrus, was anciently used for writing upon; from whence is derived the present name of our material called Paper.

Delineates thought, and to the wondering eye
Embodies vocal air, and groups the found.

With various blessings teems thy fruitful womb.
Lo! from the depth of many a yawning mine,
Thy fossil treasures rise. Thy blazing hearths,
From deep sulphureous pits, consumelefs stores
Of fuel boast. The oil-imbibing * earth,
The fuller's mill assisting, safe defies
All foreign rivals in the clothier's art.
The builder's stone thy numerous quarries hide;
With lime, its close concomitant. The hills,
The barren hills of Derby's wildest peak,
In lead abound; soft, fusile, malleable;
Whose ample fleets thy venerable domes,
From rough inclement storms of wind and rain,
In safety clothe. Devona's ancient mines,
Whose treasures tempted first Phœnicia's sons
To court thy commerce, still exhaustless, yield
The valued ore, from whence, Britannia, thou
Thine honour'd † name deriv'ft. Nor want'ft thou
Of that all-useful metal, the support [store
Of ev'ry art mechanic. Hence arise
In Dean's large forest numerous glowing kilns,
The rough rude ore calcining; whence convey'd
To the fierce furnace, its intenser heat
Melts the hard mass; which flows an iron stream,
On sandy beds below: and stiffening there,
A ponderous lump, but to the hammer tam'd,
Takes from the forge, in bars, its final form.

But the glad muse, from subterranean caves
Emerging, views with wonder and delight,
What numerous products still remain unsung.
With fish abound thy streams; thy sheltering woods
To fowl give friendly covert; and thy plains
The cloven-footed race, in various herds,
Range undisturb'd. Fair Flora's sweetest buds
Blow on thy beauteous bosom; and her fruits
Pomona pours in plenty on thy lap.

Thou to the dyer's tinging cauldron giv'ft
The yellow-staining weed, † luteola;
The † glaucum brown, with which thy naked sons
In ancient time their hardy limbs distain'd;
Nor the rich § rubia does thine hand withhold.

* Fuller's earth is found in no other country; and as it is of so great a use in the manufacturing of cloth, the exportation of it is prohibited. Dr. Woodward says this fossil is of more value to England than the mines of Peru would be.

† The learned antiquary, Bochart, is of opinion, that the Phœnicians, coming to buy tin in the island of Albion, gave it the name of Barat-Anac, that is,
the Land or country of Tin; which being softened by the Greeks into Britannia, was adopted by the Romans. This etymology seems to be confirmed by the Grecians calling the isles of Sicily, Cassiterides, which signifies in Greek, the same as Barat-Anac
in Phœnician. RAPIN.

‡ Weld, commonly called Dyer's Wood.

§ Wood.

¶ Madder, which is used by the dyers for making the most solid and richest red; and as Mortimer observes, was thought so valuable in King Charles the First's time, that it was made a patent commodity.
But the cultivation of it hath since been so strangely neglected, that we now purchase from the Dutch the greatest part of what we use, to the amount

Grateful and salutary spring the plants
Which crown thy numerous gardens, and invite
To health and temperance, in the simple meal,
Unstain'd with murder, undefil'd with blood,
Unpoison'd with rich sauces, to provoke
Th' unwilling appetite to gluttony.
For this, the bulbous esculents their roots
With sweetness fill; for this, with cooling juice
The green herb spreads its leaves; and opening buds,

And flowers and seeds, with various flavours tempt
Th' ensanguin'd palate from its savage feast.

Nor hath the god of physic and of day
Forgot to shed kind influence on thy plants
Medicinal. Lo! from his beaming rays
Their various energies to every herb
Imparted flow. He the salubrious leaf
Of cordial sage, the purple-flowering head
Of fragrant lavender, enlivening mint,
Valerian's fetid smell, endows benign
With their cephalic virtues. He the root
Of broad angelica, and tusted flower
Of creeping chamomile, impregnates deep
With powers carminative. In every brake
Wormwood and centaury, their bitter juice,
To aid digestion's sickly powers, refine.
The smooth * althæa its balsamic wave
Indulgent pours. Eryngo's strengthening root
Surrounds thy sea-girt isle, restorative,
Fair queen of love, to thy enfeebled sons.
† Hypericum, beneath each sheltering bush,
Its healing virtue modestly conceals.

Thy friendly soil to liquorice imparts
Its dulcet moisture, whence the labouring lungs
Of panting asthma find a sure relief.
The scarlet poppy, on thy painted fields,
Bows his somniferous head, inviting flow
To peaceful slumber the disorder'd mind.

Lo, from the baum's exhilarating leaf,
The moping fiend, black melancholy, flies;
And burning febris, with its lenient floc
Cools her hot entrails; or embathes her limbs
In sudorific streams, that cleansing flow [boast
From sassafras's friendly spring. Thou too can'ft
The † bleffed thistle, whose rejective power
Relieves the loaded viscera; and to thee
The rose, the violet their emolient leaves
On every bush, on every bank, display.

These are thy products, fair Britannia, these
The copious blessings, which thy envy'd sons
Divided and distinguish'd from the world,
Secure and free, beneath just laws, enjoy.
Nor dread the ravage of destructive war;
Nor black contagion's pestilential breath;
Nor rending earth's convulsions,—fields, flocks,
towns,
Swallow'd abrupt, in ruin's frightful jaws;
Nor worse, far worse than all, the iron hand
Of lawless power, stretch'd o'er precarious wealth, as Mr. Millar, in his Gardener's Dictionary, says, he hath been informed, of near thirty thousand pounds a-year.

* Marsh-mallows.

† St. John's-wort.

‡ Carduus, called by physical writers, Carduus Benedictus.

Lands, liberty, and life, the wanton prey
Of its enormous, unresisted gripe.

But further now in vegetation's paths, [crops,
Through cultur'd fields, and woods, and waving
The weary'd muse forbears to wind her walk.
To flocks and herds her future strains aspire,
And let the listening hinds instructed hear
The closing precepts of her labour'd song.

Lo! on the other side yon slanting hill,
Beneath a spreading oak's broad foliage, sits
The shepherd swain, and patient by his side
His watchful dog; while round the nibbling flocks
Spread their white fleeces o'er the verdant slope,
A landscape pleasing to the painter's eye.
Mark his maternal care. The tender race,
Of heat impatient, as of pinching cold
Afraid, he shelters from the rising sun,
Beneath the mountain's western side; and when
The evening beam shoots eastward, turning seeks Th' alternate umbrage. Now to the sweetest food

Of fallow fields he leads, and nightly folds,
T' enrich th' exhausted soil: defending safe [fox,
From mur'drous thieves, and from the prowling
Their helpless innocence. His skilful eye
Studious explores the latent ills which prey
Upon the bleating nation. The foul mange
Infectious, their impatient foot, by oft
Repeated scratchings, will betray. This calls
For his immediate aid, the spreading taint
To stop. Tobacco, in the briny wave
Infus'd, affords a wash of sovereign use
To heal the dire disease. The wriggling tail
Sure indication gives, that, bred beneath,
Devouring vermin lurk: these, or with dust
Or deaden'd lime besprinkled thick, fall off
In smothered crowds. Diseases numerous Assault the harmless race: but the chief fiend
Which taints with rotteness their inward frame,
And sweeps them from the plain in putrid heaps,
A nuisance to the smell. This, this demands
His watchful care. If he perceives the fleece
In patches lost; if the dejected eye
Looks pale and languid; if the rosy gums
Change to a yellow foulness; and the breath,
Panting and short, emits a sickly stench;
Warn'd by the fatal symptoms, he removes
To rising grounds and dry, the tainted flock;
The best expedient to restore that health
Which the full pasture, or the low damp moor
Endanger'd. But if bare and barren hills,
Or dry and sandy plains, too far remov'd,
Deny their aid: he speedily prepares
Rue's bitter juice, with brine and brimstone mix'd,
A powerful remedy; which from an horn
Injected, stops the dangerous malady.

Refulgent summer now his hot domain
Hath carried to the tropic, and begins
His backward journey. Now beneath the sun
Mellowing their fleeces for th' impending shears,
The woolly people in full clothing sweat:
When the smooth current of a limpid brook
The shepherd seeks, and plunging in its waves
The frightened innocents, their whitening robes
In the clear stream grow pure. Emerging hence,
On litter'd straw the bleating flocks recline

Till glowing heat shall dry, and breathing dew
Perspiring soft, again through all the fleece
Diffuse their oily fatness. Then the swain
Prepares th' elastic shears, and gently down
The patient creature lays; divesting soon
Its lighten'd limbs of their encumbering load.

O more than mines of gold, than diamonds far
More precious, more important is the fleece!
This, this the solid base on which the sons
Of commerce build, exalted to the sky, [power!
The structure of their grandeur, wealth, and
Hence in the earliest childhood of her state,
Ere yet her merchants spread the British sail,
To earth descending in a radiant cloud,
Britannia seiz'd th' invaluable spoil.
To ocean's verge exulting swift she flew;
There, on the bosom of the bounding wave,
Rais'd on her pearly car, fair commerce rode
Sublime, the goddess of the wat'ry world,
On every coast, and every clime ador'd.
High waving in her hand the woolly prize,
Britannia hail'd and beckon'd to her shore
The power benign. Invited by the fleece,
From whence her penetrating eyes foresaw
What mighty honours to her name should rise,
She beam'd a gracious smile. Th' obedient winds
Rein'd by her hand, conducted to the beach
Her sumptuous car. But more convenient place
The muse shall find, to sing the friendly league,
Which here commenc'd, to time's remotest age,
Shall bear the glory of the British sail.

Cautious and fearful, some in early spring
Recruit their flocks; as then the wint'ry storms
The tender frame hath prov'd. But he whose aim
Ambitious should aspire to mend the breed,
In fruitful autumn flocks the bleating field
With buxom ewes, that, to their soft desires
Indulgent, he may give the noblest rams.
Yet not too early in the genial sport
Invite the modest ewe; let Michael's feast
Commemorate the deed; lest the cold hand
Of winter pinch too hard the new-year'd lambs.

How nice, how delicate appears his choice,
When fixing on the fire to raise his flock!
His shape, his marks, how curious he surveys!
His body large and deep, his buttocks broad
Give indication of internal strength;
Be short his legs, yet active; small his head;
So shall Lucina's pains less pungent prove,
And less the hazard of the teeming ewe!
Long be his tail, and large his wool-grown ear;
Thick, shining, white, his fleece; his hazel eye
Large, bold, and cheerful; and his horns, if horns
You choose, not strait, but curving round and round

On either side his head. These the sole arms
His inoffensive mildness bears; not made
For shedding blood, nor hostile war: yet these,
When love, all-powerful, swells his breast, and pours

Into his heart new courage, these he aims,
With meditated fury at his foe.

In glowing colours, here the tempted muse
Might paint the rushing conflict, when provok'd,
The rival rams, opposing front to front,
Spring forth with desperate madness to the fight

But as deterr'd by the superior bard,
Whose steps, at awful distance, I reverse,
Nor dare to tread; so by the thundering strife
Of his majestic fathers of the herd,
My feebler combatants appall'd retreat.

At leisure now, O let me once again,
Once, ere I leave the cultivated fields,
My favourite Patty, in her dairy's pride,
Revisit; and the generous steeds which grace
The pastures of her swain, well-pleas'd, survey.
The lowing kine, see, at their 'custom'd hour,
Wait the returning pail. The rosy maid,
Crouching beneath their side, in copious streams
Exhaust the swelling udder. Vessels large
And broad, by the sweet hand of neatness clean'd.
Meanwhile, in decent order rang'd appear,
The milky treasure, strain'd through filtering
lawn,

Intended to receive. At early day,
Sweet slumber shaken from her opening lids,
My lovely Patty to her dairy hies:
There from the surface of expanded bowls
She skims the floating cream, and to her churn
Commits the rich consistence; nor disdains,
Though soft her hand, though delicate her frame,
To urge the rural toil; fond to obtain
The country-housewife's humble name and praise.
Continu'd agitation separates soon

The unctuous particles; with gentler strokes,
And artful, soon they coalesce: at length,
Cool water pouring from the limpid spring
Into a smooth-glaz'd vessel, deep and wide,
She gathers the loose fragments to an heap;
Which in the cleansing wave, well wrought, and press'd

To one consistent golden mass, receives
The sprinkled seasoning, and of parts, or pounds,
The fair impression, the neat shape assumes.

Is cheese her care? Warm from the teat she pours

The milky flood. An acid juice infus'd,
From the dry'd stomach drawn of suckling calf,
Coagulates the whole. Immediate now
Her spreading hands bear down the gathering curd,

Which hard and harder grows; till, clear and thin,

The green whey rises separate. Happy swains!
O how I envy ye the luscious draught,
The soft salubrious beverage! To a vat,
The size and fashion which her taste approves,
She bears the snow-white heaps, her future cheese;
And the strong press establishes its form.

But nicer cates, her dairy's boasted fare,
The jelly'd cream, or custard, daintiest food,
Or cheesecake, or the cooling syllabub,
For Thyrsis she prepares; who from the field
Returning, with the kifs of love sincere,
Salutes her rosy lip. A tender look,
Meantime, and cheerful smiles, his welcome speak:
Down to their frugal board contentment sits,
And calls it feasting. Prattling infants dear
Engage their fond regard, and closer tie
The band of nuptial love. They, happy, feel
Each other's bliss, and both in different spheres
Employ'd, nor seek nor wish that cheating charm,
Variety, which idlers to their aid
Call in, to make the length of lazy life

Drag on less heavily. Domestic cares,
Her children and her dairy, well divide
Th' appropriated hours, and duty makes Employment pleasure. He, delighted, gives
Each busy season of the rolling year,
To raise, to feed, t' improve the generous horse,
And fit for various use his strength of speed.

Dull, patient, heavy, of large limbs robust,
Whom neither beauty marks, nor spirits fire;
Him, to the servile toil of dragging slow
The burden'd carriage; or to drudge beneath
A ponderous load impos'd, his justice dooms.
Yet, straining in th' enormous cars which crowd
Thy bustling streets, Augusta, queen of trade,
What noble beasts are seen? sweating beneath
Their toil, and trembling at the driver's whip,
Urg'd with malicious fury on the parts
Where feeling lives most sensible of pain.
Fell tyrants, hold! forbear your hell-born rage!
See ye not every sinew, every nerve Stretch'd even to bursting? Villains!—but the muse

Quick from the savage ruffians turns her eye,
Frowning indignant. Steeds of hardier kind,
And cool though spritely, to the travell'd road
He declines; sure of foot, of steady pace,
Active, and persevering, uncompell'd,
The tedious length of many a beaten mile.

But not alone to these inferior tribes
Th' ambitious swain confines his generous breed.
Hark! in his fields, when now the distant sounds
Of winding horns, and dogs, and huntmen's shout,
Awake the sense, his kindling hunter neighs:
Quick start his ears erect, his beating heart
Exalts, his light limbs bound, he bears aloft,
Rais'd by tumultuous joy, his tossing head;
And all impatient for the well-known sport,
Leaps the tall fence, and listening to the cry,
Pursues with voluntary speed the chase.
See! o'er the plain he sweeps, nor hedge nor ditch
Obstructs his eager flight; nor straining hills,
Nor headlong steps deter the vigorous steed:
Till join'd at length, associate of the sport,
He mingles with the train, stops as they stop,
Pursues as they pursue, and all the wild
Enlivening raptures of the field enjoys.

Easy in motion, perfect in his form,
His boasted lineage drawn from steeds of blood,
He the fleet courser too, exulting shows,
And points with pride his beauties. Neatly set
His lively head, and glowing in his eye
True spirit lives. His nostril wide, inhales
With ease the ambient air. His body firm
And round, upright his joints, his horny hoofs
Small, shining, light; and large his ample reach.
His limbs, though slender, brac'd with sinewy strength,

Declare his winged speed. His temper mild,
Yet high his nettled heart. Hence in the race
All emulous, he hears the clashing whips;
He feels the animating shouts; exerts
With eagerness his utmost powers; and strains,
And springs, and flies, to reach the destin'd goal.
But, lo! the boast, the glory of his stalls,
His warrior steed appears. What comely pride,
What dignity, what grace, attend on all
His motions? See! exulting in his strength,
He paws the ground impatient. On his brow

Courage enthroned sits, and animates
 His fearless eye. He bends his arched crest,
 His mane loose-flowing, ruffles in the wind,
 Clothing his chest with fury. Proud, he snorts,
 Champs on the foaming bit, and prancing high,
 Disdainful seems to tread the fordid earth.
 Yet hears he and obeys his master's voice,
 All gentleness: and feels, with conscious pride,
 His dappled neck clapp'd with a cheering hand.
 But when the battle's martial sounds invade
 His ear, when drums and trumpets loud proclaim
 The rushing onset; when thick smoke, when fire
 Bursts thundering from the cannon's awful mouth;
 Then all inspir'd he kindles into flame!
 Intrepid, neighs aloud; and, panting, seems
 Impatient to express his swelling joys.
 Unutterable. On danger's brink he stands,
 And mocks at fear. Then springing with delight,
 Plunges into the wild confusion. Terror flies
 Before his dreadful front; and in his rear Destruction marks her bloody progress. Such,
 Such was the steed thou, Cumberland, bestrodd'st,
 When black rebellion fell beneath thy hand,
 Rome and her papal tyranny subdu'd,
 On great Culloden's memorable field.
 Such thine, unconquer'd Marlborough, when the throne

Of Lewis totter'd, and thy glittering steel
 On Blenheim's plain immortal trophies reap'd.
 And such, O prince! great patron of my theme,
 Should e'er insidious France again presume
 On Europe's freedom, such, though all averse
 To slaughtering war, thy country shall present.
 To bear her hero to the martial plain,
 Arm'd with the sword of justice. Other cause
 Ne'er shall ambition's sophistry persuade Thine honour to espouse. Britannia's peace;
 Her sacred rights; her just, her equal laws;
 These, these alone, to cherish or defend,
 Shall raise thy youthful arm, and wake to war,
 To dreadful war, the British lion's rage.
 But milder stars on thy illustrious birth
 Their kindest influence shed. Beneath the smile
 Of thy indulgence, the protected arts
 Lifting their graceful heads; her envy'd fail
 Fair commerce spreading to remotest climes;
 And plenty rising from th' encourag'd plough;
 Shall feed, enrich, adorn, the happy land.

MELPOMENE:

OR THE

REGIONS OF TERROR AND PITY.

AN ODE.

QUEEN of the human heart! at whose command
 The swelling tides of mighty passion rise;
 Melpomene, support my vent'rous hand,
 And aid thy suppliant in his bold enterprise;
 From the gay scenes of pride
 Do thou his footsteps guide
 To nature's awful courts, where nurse of yore, Young Shakspeare, fancy's child, was taught his various lore.

So may his favour'd eye explore the source,
 To few reveal'd, whence human sorrows charm:

So may his numbers, with pathetic force,
 Bid terror shake us, or compassion warm,
 As different strains controul
 The movements of the soul;
 Adjust its passions, harmonize its tone;
 To feel for others' woe, or nobly bear its own.

Deep in the covert of a shadowy grove,
 'Mid broken rocks where dashing currents
 play;
 Dear to the pensive pleasures, dear to love,
 And Damon's muse, that breathes her melting lay,
 This ardent prayer was made:
 When, lo! the secret shade,
 As conscious of some heavenly presence, shook--- Strength, firmness, reason, all---my astonish'd soul forsook.

Ah! whither goddess! whither am I borne?
 To what wild region's necromantic shore?
 These panics whence? and why my bosom torn
 With sudden terrors never felt before?
 Darkness enwraps me round,
 While from the vast profound
 Emerging spectres dreadful shapes assume,
 And gleaming on my sight, add horror to the gloom.

Ha! what is he whose fierce indignant eye,
 Denouncing vengeance, kindles into flame?
 Whose boisterous fury blows a storm so high,
 As with its thunder shakes his labouring frame.

What can such rage provoke?
 His words their passage choke:
 His eager steps nor time nor truce allow,
 And dreadful dangers wait the menace of his brow.

Protect me, goddess! whence that fearful shriek
 Of consternation? as grim death had laid
 His icy fingers on some guilty cheek,
 And all the powers of manhood shrunk dis-
 may'd:
 Ah see! besnear'd with gore
 Revenge stands threatening o'er
 A pale delinquent, whose retorted eyes
 In vain for pity call---the wretched victim dies.

Not long the space---abandon'd to despair,
 With eyes aghast, or hopeless fix'd on earth,
 This slave of passion rends his scatter'd hair,
 Beats his sad breast, and execrates his birth:
 While torn within he feels
 The pangs of whips and wheels;
 And sees, or fancies, all the fiends below
 Beckoning his frightened soul to realms of endless
 woe.

Before my wondering sense new phantoms dance, [brain---
 And stamp their horrid shapes upon my
 A wretch with jealous brow, and eyes afaunce,
 Feeds all in secret on his bosom pain.
 Fond love, fierce hate assail;
 Alternate they prevail:
 While conscious pride and shame with rage con-
 spire, [fire.
 And urge the latent spark to flames of torturing

The storm proceeds—his changeful visage trace:
From rage to madness every feature breaks.
A growing frenzy grins upon his face,
And in his frightful stare distraction speaks.
His straw-invested head
Proclaims all reason fled;
And not a tear bedews those vacant eyes—
But songs and shouts succeed, and laughter-mingled sighs.

Yet, yet again!—a murder's hand appears
Grasping a pointed dagger stain'd with blood!
His look malignant chills with boding fears,
That check the current of life's ebbing flood.
In midnight's darkest clouds
The dreary misereant shrouds
His felon step—as 'twere to darkness given
To dim the watchful eye of all-pervading heaven.

And hark! ah mercy! whence that hollow found? [hair?
Why with strange horror starts my bristling
Earth opens wide, and from unhallow'd ground
A pallid ghost slow-rising steals on air.
To where a mangled corse
Expos'd without remorse
Lies shroudless, unentomb'd, he points the way—

Points to the prowling wolf exultant o'er his prey.

“ Was it for this, he cries, with kindly shower
“ Of daily gifts the traitor I carest'd?
“ For this, array'd him in the robe of power,
“ And lodg'd my royal secrets in his breast?
“ O kindness ill repay'd!
“ To bare the murdering blade
“ Against my life!—may Heav'n his guilt ex“ plore, [restore.”
“ And to my suffering race their splendid rights

He said, and stalk'd away.—Ah goddess! cease
Thus with terrific forms to rack my brain;
These horrid phantoms shake the throne of peace,
And reason calls her boasted powers in vain:
Then change thy magic wand,
Thy dreadful troops disband,
And gentler shapes, and softer scenes disclose,
To melt the feeling heart, yet sooth its tenderest
woes.

The fervent prayer was heard.—With hideous
found,
Her ebon gates of darkness open flew;
A dawning twilight cheers the dread profound;
The train of terror vanishes from view.
More mild enchantments rise;
New scenes salute my eyes,
Groves, fountains, bowers, and temples grace
the plain, [plain.

And turtles coo around, and nightingales com-
And every myrtle bower and cypress grove,
And every solemn temple teems with life;
Here glows the scene with fond but hapless love,
There, with the deeper woes of human strife.
In groups around the lawn,
By fresh disasters drawn,
The sad spectators seem transfix'd in woe;
And pining sighs are heard, and heart-felt sorrows flow.

VOL. XI.

Behold that beautiful maid! her languid head
Bends like a drooping lily charg'd with rain:
With floods of tears she bathes a lover dead,
In brave assertion of her honour slain.
Her bosom heaves with sighs;
To Heaven she lifts her eyes,
With grief beyond the power of words oppress'd,
Sinks on the lifeless corse, and dies upon his breast.

How strong the bands of friendship? yet, alas!
Behind yon mouldering tower with ivy
crown'd,
Of two, the foremost in her sacred class,
One, from his friend, receives the fatal wound!
What could such fury move!
Ah what, but ill-star'd love?
The same fair object each fond heart enthalls,
And he, the favour'd youth, her hapless victim falls.

Can ought so deeply sway the generous mind
To mutual truth, as female trust in love?
Then, what relief shall yon fair mourner find,
Scorn'd by the man who should her plaints remove?
By fair, but false pretence,
She lost her innocence;

And that sweet babe, the fruit of treacherous art, Clasp'd in her arms expires, and breaks the parent's
heart.

Ah! who to pomp or grandeur would aspire?
Kings are not rais'd above misfortune's frown:
That form so graceful even in mean attire,
Sway'd once a sceptre, once sustain'd a crown,
From filial rage and strife,
To screen his closing life,
He quits his throne, a father's sorrow feels,
And in the lap of want his patient head conceals.

More yet remain'd—but lo! the pensive queen
Appears confess before my dazzled sight,
Grace in her steps, and softness in her mien,
The face of sorrow mingled with delight.
Not such her nobler frame,
When kindling into flame,
And bold in virtue's cause, her zeal aspires
To waken guilty pangs, or breathe heroic fires.

Aw'd into silence, my rapt soul attends --
The power, with eyes complacent, saw my fear;
And, as with grace ineffable she bends,
These accents vibrate on my listening ear.
“ Aspiring son of art,
“ Know, though thy feeling heart
“ Glow with these wonders to thy fancy shown;
“ Still may the Deian god thy powerless toils dis-
“ own.

“ A thousand tender scenes of soft distress
“ May swell thy breast with sympathetic
“ woes;
“ A thousand such dread forms on fancy press,
“ As from my dreary realms of darkness rose;
“ Whence Shakspeare's chilling fears,
“ Whence Otway's melting tears—
“ That awful gloom, this melancholy plain,
“ The types of every theme that suits the tragic
“ strain.

“ But dost thou worship nature night and morn,
 “ And all due honour to her precepts pay?
 “ Canst thou the lure of affectation scorn, “ Pleas'd in the simpler paths of truth to “ stray?
 “ Hast thou the graces fair
 “ Invok'd with ardent prayer?
 “ 'Tis they attire, as nature must impart,
 “ The 'sentiment' sublime, the language of the “ heart.
 “ Then, if creative genius pour his ray,
 “ Warm with inspiring influence on thy “ breast;
 “ Taste, judgment, fancy, if thou canst display,
 “ And the deep source of passion stand con“ fess'd:
 “ Then may the listening train,
 “ Affected, feel thy strain;
 “ Feel grief or terror, rage or pity move;
 “ Change with the varying scenes, and every “ scene approve.”

Humbled before her sight, and bending low,
 I kiss'd the borders of her crimson vest;
 Eager to speak, I felt my bosom glow,
 But fear upon my lip her seal impress'd.
 While awe-struck thus I stood,
 The bowers, the lawn, the wood,
 The form celestial, fading on my sight,
 Dissolv'd in liquid air, and fleeting gleams of light.

THE ART OF PREACHING.

IN IMITATION OF HORACE'S ART OF POETRY.

SHOULD some strange poet in his piece affect Pope's nervous style, with Cibber's jokes bedeck'd,
 Prink Milton's true sublime with Cowley's wit,
 And garnish Blackmore's Job with Swift's conceit, Would you not laugh? Trust me, that priest's as bad.

Who in a style now grave, now raving mad,
 Gives the wild whims of dreaming schoolmen vent,
 Whilft drowsy congregations nod assent.
 Painters and priests, 'tis true, great licence claim,
 And by bold strokes have often rose to fame: 10
 But whales in woods, or elephants in air,
 Serve only to make fools and children stare;
 And in religion's name, if priests dispense
 Flat contradictions to all common sense,
 Though gaping bigots wonder and believe,
 The wise 'tis not so easy to deceive. [sense;

Some take a text sublime, and fraught with
 But quickly fall into impertinence.

Ver. 1.

Humano capiti cervicem pictor equinam
 Jungere si velit, et varias inducere plumas
 Undique collatis membris, ut turpiter atrum
 Desinat in piscem mulier formosa superne;
 Spectatum admitti risum teneatis, amici?
 Credite, Pisones, isti tabulæ fore librum
 Persim lem—

Ver. 9.

Pictoribus atque poetis
 Quidlibet audendi semper fuit æqua potestas—
 Sed non ut placidis cocant immitia—

Ver. 17.

Inceptis gravibus plerumque et magna profectis—

On trifles eloquent, with great delight
 They flourish out on some strange mystic rite; 20
 Clear up the darkness of some useless text,
 Or make some crabbed passage more perplex'd:
 But to subdue the passions, or direct,
 And all life's moral duties they neglect.

Most preachers err (except the wiser few),
 Thinking establish'd doctrines therefore true:
 Others, too fond of novelty and schemes,
 Amuse the world with airy idle dreams:
 Thus too much faith, or too presuming wit,
 Are rocks where bigots, or freethinkers split. 30

The very meanest dabbler at Whitehall
 Can rail at Papists, or poor Quakers maul;
 But when of some great truth he aims to preach,
 Alas! he finds it far beyond his reach. [find Young deacons try your strength, and strive to
 A subject suited to your turn of mind;
 Method and words are easily your own,
 Or, should they fail you—steal from Tillotson.

Much of its beauty, usefulness, and force,
 Depends on rightly timing a discourse. 40
 Before the L---ds or C---mm---ns—far from nice,

Say boldly—Brib'ry is a dirty vice—
 But quickly check yourself—and with a sneer—
 Of which this honourable house is clear.

Great is the work, and worthy of the gown,
 To bring forth hidden truths, and make them
 known.

Yet in all new opinions have a care,
 Truth is too strong for some weak minds to bear:
 And are new doctrines taught, or old reviv'd?
 Let them from Scripture plainly be deriv'd. 50

Barclay or Baxter, wherefore do we blame
 For innovations, yet approve the same
 In Wickliffe and in Luther? Why are these Call'd wise reformers, those mad sectaries?

Ver. 25.

Maxima pars vatam—

Decipimur specie recti—

Ver. 27.

Qui variare cupit rem prodigaliter nam,
 Delphinum silvis appingit, fluctibus apum.

Ver. 29.

In vitium ducit culpeæ fuga, si caret arte.

Ver. 31.

Æmilium circa ludum faber imus et ungue
 Exprimet, et molles imitabitur ære capillos;
 Infelix operis summa, quia ponere totum
 Nesciet—

Ver. 35.

Sumite materiam vestris, qui scribitis, æquam
 Viribus—

Ver. 39.

Ordinis hæc virtus erit, et Venus, aut ego fallor,
 Ut jam nunc dicat, jam nunc debentia dici
 Fleraque differat; et præsens in tempus omittat—

Ver. 45.

In verbis etiam tenuis cautusque serendis—

Ver. 49.

Et nova fistaque nuper habebunt verba fidem, si
 Græco fonte cadant, parce detorta.

Ver. 51.

—Quid autem
 Cæcilio Plautoque dabit Romanus, ademptum
 Virgilio Varroque?—

'Tis most unjust : Men always had a right,
And ever will, to think, to speak, to write
Their various minds ; yet sacred ought to be
The public peace, as private liberty.

Opinions are like leaves, which every year
Now flourish green, now fall and disappear. 60
Once the Pope's bulls could terrify his foes,
And kneeling princes kiss'd his sacred toes ;
Now he may damn, or curse, or what he will,
There's not a prince in Christendom will kneel.
Reason now reigns, and by her aid we hope
Truth may revive, and sickening error droop :
She the sole judge, the rule, the gracious light,
Kind Heaven has lent to guide our minds aright.

States to embroil, and faction to display
In wild harangues, Sacheverel show'd the way. 70

The fun'ral sermon, when it first began,
Was us'd to weep the loss of some good man ;
Now any wretch, for one small piece of gold,
Shall have fine praises from the pulpit fold :
But whence this custom rose, who can decide ?
From priestly av'rice, or from human pride ?

Truth, moral virtue, piety, and peace,
Are noble subjects, and the pulpit grace :
But zeal for trifles arm'd imperious Laud,
His power and cruelty the nation aw'd. 80
Why was he honour'd with the name of priest,
And greatest made, unworthy to be least ?
Whose zeal was fury, whose devotion pride,
Power his great god, and interest his sole guide.

To touch the passions, let your style be plain ;
The praise of virtue asks a higher strain :
Yet sometimes the pathetic may receive
The utmost force that eloquence can give ;
As sometimes, in eulogiums, 'tis the art,
With plain simplicity to win the heart. 90

'Tis not enough that what you say is true,
To make us feel it, you must feel it too : [part
Show yourself warm'd, and that will warmth im-
To every hearer's sympathizing heart.

Ver. 55.

Licuit, sempetque licebit,
Signatum præsentè nota procedere nomen.

Ver. 59.

Ut sylvæ foliis pronos mutantur in annos—

Ver. 69.

Res gestæ regumque ducumque, et tristia bella,
Quo scribi possent numero, monstravit Homerus.

Ver. 71.

Verbis impariter junctis querimonia primum,
Post etiam inclusa est voti sententia compos.
Quis tamen exiguos elegos emiserit auctor,
Grammatici certant, et adhuc sub judice lis est.

Ver. 77.

Musa dedit fidibus diyos, puerosque deorum—
Archilocum proprio rabies armavit iambo.

Ver. 81.

Cur ego, si nequeo ignoroque, poëta salutor ?
Cur nescire—quam discere malo ?

Ver. 85.

Verbis exponi tragicis res comica non vult—
Interdum tamen et vocem comædia tollit ;
Et tragicus plerumque dolet sermone pedestri.

Ver. 91.

Non satis est pulchra esse poemata—
—male si mandata loqueris,
Aut dormitabo, aut ridebo.

Does generous Foster virtue's laws enforce ?

All give attention to the warm discourse :
But who a-cold, dull, lifeless, drawing keeps ;
One half his audience laughs, the other sleeps.

In censuring vice, be earnest and severe,
In stating dubious points, concise and clear ; 100
Anger requires stern looks and threatening style ;
But paint the charms of virtue with a smile.
These different changes common sense will teach,
And we expect them from you if you preach ;
For should your manner differ from your theme,
Or in quite different subjects be the same,
Despis'd and laugh'd at, you may travel down,
And hide such talents in some country town.

It much concerns a preacher first to learn
The genius of his audience, and their turn. 110
Amongst the citizens be grave and slow ;
Before the nobles let fine periods flow ;
The Temple Church asks Sherlock's sense and skill ;
Beyond the Tower—no matter—what you will.

In facts or notions drawn from sacred writ,
Be orthodox, nor caval to show wit :
Let Adam lose a rib to gain a wife ;
Let Noah's ark contain all things with life ;
Let Moses work strange wonders with his rod,
And let the sun stand still at Joshua's nod, 120
Let Solomon be wise, and Samson strong,
Give Saul a witch, and Balaam's ass a tongue.

But if your daring genius is so bold
To teach new doctrines, or to censure old,
With care proceed ; you tread a dangerous path ;
Error establish'd, grows establish'd faith.
'Tis easier much, and much the safer rule,
To teach in pulpit what you learn'd at school ;
With zeal defend whatever the church believes,
If you expect to thrive, or wear lawn sleeves. 130

Some loudly bluster, and consign to hell
All who dare doubt one word or syllable
Of what they call the faith ; and which extends
To whims and trifles without use or ends :
Sure 'tis much nobler, and more like divine,
T' enlarge the path to heaven, than to confine :
Insist alone on useful points, or plain ;
And know, God cannot hate a virtuous man.

If you expect or hope that we should stay 139
Your whole discourse, nor strive to sink away,

Ver. 99.

Tristitia mæstum
Vultu verba decent : iratanti, plena minarum ;
Ludentem, lasciva ; severum, seria dictu
Format enim naturâ prius nos iutus ad omnem
Fortunarum habitum :—

Ver. 109.

Intererit multum Davusine loquator an beica—

Ver. 115.

Famam sequere—

Ver. 123.

Si quid inexpertum scemæ committis, et audes
Perionam formare novam ;—

—tuque

Rectius Iliacum carmen deducis in actus—

Ver. 131.

Nec sic incipies, ut scriptor Cyclicus olim—

Ver. 135.

Quanto rectius hic—

Ver. 139.

Tu, quid ego et populis necum desideret, audi.

Some common faults there are you must avoid,
To every age and circumstance ally'd.

A pert young student just from college brought,
With many little pedantries is fraught:
Reasons with syllogism, persuades with wit,
Quotes scraps of Greek instead of sacred writ;
Or, deep immers'd in politic debate,
Reforms the church, and guides the tottering state.

These trifles with maturer age forgot, 149
Now some good benefice employs his thought;
He seeks a patron, and will soon incline
To all his notions, civil or divine;
Studies his principles both night and day, [pray.
And, as that Scripture guides, must preach and Av'rice and age creep on: his reverend mind
Begins to grow right reverently inclin'd.
Power and preferment still so sweetly call,
The voice of Heaven is never heard at all:
Set but a tempting bishoprick in view,
He's strictly orthodox, and loyal too; 160
With equal zeal defends the church and state,
And infidels and rebels share his hate.

Some things are plain, we can't misunderstand,
Some still obscure, though thousands have explain'd:
Those influence more which reason can conceive,
Than such as we through faith alone believe; }
In those we judge, in these you may deceive: }
But what too deep in mystery is thrown,
The wisest preachers choose to let alone.
How Adam's fault affects all human kind; 170
How Three is One, and One is Three combin'd;
How certain prescience checks not future will;
And why Almighty goodness suffers ill:
Such points as these lie far too deep for man,
Were never well explain'd, nor ever can.

* If pastors more than thrice five minutes preach,
Their sleepy flocks begin to yawn and stretch.

Never presume the name of God to bring
As sacred sanction to a trifling thing.
Before, or after sermon, hymns of praise 180
Exalt the soul; and true devotion raise.

Si plausoris æges aulæa manentis, et usque.
Suffuri donec cantor, vos plaudite, dicat;
Ætatis cujusque notandi sunt tibi mores——

Ver. 143.

Reddere qui voces jam scit puer——

Ver. 149.

Conversis studiis, ætas animusque virilis
Quærit opes et amicitias——

Ver. 155.

Multa senem circumveniunt——

Ver. 163.

Aut agitur res in scenis, aut acta refertur:
Segnius irritant animos demissa per aures,
Quam quæ sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus, et quæ
Ipse sibi tradit spectator. [em;
——in avem Progne vertatur, Cadmus in angu-
Quodcumque ostendis mihi sic, incredulus odi.

Ver. 176.

Næve minor, neu sit quinto productior actu Fabula.

Ver. 178.

Nec deus interfit, nisi dignus vindice nodus
Inciderit:

Ver. 180.

Actoris partes chorus, officiumque virile
Descendat.

In songs of wonder celebrate his name,
Who spread the skies, and built the starry frame:
Or thence descending view this globe below,
And praise the source of every bliss we know.

In ancient times, when Heaven was to be prais'd,
Our humble ancestors their voices rais'd,
And hymns of thanks from grateful bosoms flow'd,
For ills prevented, or for good bestow'd: 189
But as the church increas'd in power and pride,
The pomp of sound the want of sense supply'd;
Majestic organs then were taught to blow,
And plain religion grew a rareeflow:
Strange ceremonious whims, a numerous race,
Were introduc'd, in truth's and virtue's place.
Mysterious turnpikes block up heaven's highway,
And, for a ticket, we our reason pay.

These superstitious quickly introduce
Contempt, neglect, wild satire, and abuse;
Religion and its priests, by every fool 200
Were thought a jest, and turn'd to ridicule.
Some few indeed found where the medium lay,
And kept the * coat, but tore the fringe away.

Of preaching well if you expect the same,
Let truth and virtue be your first great aim.
Your sacred function often call to mind,
And think how great the trust, to teach mankind:
'Tis yours in useful sermons to explain,
Both what we owe to God, and what to man.
'Tis yours the charms of liberty to paint, 210
His country's love in every breast to plant;
Yours every social virtue to improve,
Justice, forbearance, charity, and love;
Yours too the private virtues to augment,
Of prudence, temperance, modesty, content:
When such the man, how amiable the priest;
Of all mankind the worthiest and the best.

Ticklish the point, I grant, and hard to find,
To please the various tempers of mankind. 219
Some love you should the crabbed points explain,

Where texts with texts a dreadful war maintain:
Some love a new, and some the beaten path,
Morals please some, and others points of faith;
But he's the man, he's the admir'd divine,
In whose discourses truth and virtue join:

Ver. 186.

Tibia non, ut nunc orichalco vincta, tubæque
Æmula; sed tenuis simplexque.——
Postquam cœpit agros extendere victor, et urbem.
Latior amplecti murus, vinoque diurno.
Placari genium festis impune diebus;
Accessit numerisque modisque licentia major.
Indoctus quid enim saperet, liberque laborum,
Rusticus urbano confusus, turpis honesto?

Ver. 198.

Mox etiam agrestes Satyros nadavit, et asper
Incolumi gravitate jocum tentavit——

Ver. 204.

Scribendi rectè, sapere est et principium et fons.
Qui didicit patriæ, quid debeat, et quid amicis.

Ver. 218.

Centuriæ seniorum agitant expertia frugis;
Celli prætereunt austeræ poemata Rhamnes.
Omne tulit punctum qui miscuit utile dulci,
Lectorem delectando, pariterque monendo.

* Vide Martin in the Tale of a Tub.

These are the sermons which will ever live,
By these our Tonsons and our Knaptons thrive ;
How such are read, and prais'd, and how they sell,
Let Barrow's Clarke's, and Butler's sermons tell.

Preachers should either make us good or wise,
Him that does neither, who but must despise ?
If all your rules are useful, short, and plain, 232
We soon shall learn them, and shall long retain ?
But if on trifles you harangue, away
We turn our heads, and laugh at all you say.

But priests are men, and men are prone to err,
On common failings none should be severe :
All are not masters of the same good sense,
Nor blest with equal powers of eloquence.
'Tis true: and errors with an honest mind, 240
Will meet with easy pardon from mankind ;
But who persists in wrong with stubborn pride,
Him all must censure, many will deride.

Yet few are judges of a fine discourse,
Can see its beauties, or can feel its force ;
With equal pleasure some attentive sit,
'To sober reasoning, and to shallow wit.
What then ? because your audience most are fools,
Will you neglect all method, and all rules ?
Or since the pulpit is a sacred place, 250
Where none dare contradict you to your face,
Will you presume to tell a thousand lies ?
If so, we may forgive, but must despise.

In jingling Bev'ridge if I chance to see
One word of sense, I prize the rarity :
But if in Hooker, Sprat, or Tillotson,
A thought unworthy of themselves is shown,
I grieve to see it ; but 'tis no surprize,
The greatest men are not at all times wise.

Sermons, like plays, some please us at the ear,
But never will a serious reading bear ; 261
Some in the closet edify enough,
That from the pulpit seem'd but sorry stuff.
'Tis thus: there are, who by ill-preaching spoil
Young's pointed sense, or Atterbury's style ;
Whilst others by the force of eloquence,
Make that seem fine, which scarce is common sense.

In every science, they that hope to rise,
Set great examples still before their eyes.
Young lawyers copy Murray where they can ;
Physicians Mead, and surgeons Cheselden ; 271
But all will preach, without the least pretence
To virtue, learning, art, or eloquence.

Ver. 230.

Ant prodesse volunt, aut delectare poeta—

Ver. 236.

Sunt delicta tamen, quibus ignovisse velimus—

Ver. 244.

Non quivis videt immodulata poemata judex.—

Ver. 254.

Sic mihi, qui multum cessat, sit Cœrilus ille,
Quem bis terve bonum, cum risu miror; et idem
Indignor, quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus.
Verum opere in longo fas est obrepere somnum.

Ver. 260.

Ut picture, pœsis erit: quæ, si propius stes,
Te capiet magis; et quædam, si longius abtes.

Ver. 268.

Ludere qui nescit, compestribus abstinet armis—
Qui nescit, versus tamen audet fingere. Quid ni ?

Why not ? you cry: they plainly see, no doubt,
A priest may grow right-reverend without.

Preachers and preaching were at first design'd
For common benefit to all mankind.
Public and private virtues they explain'd,
To goodness courted, and from vice restrain'd :
Love, peace, and union breath'd in each discourse,
And their examples gave their precepts force.
From these good men, the priests and all their line 282

Were honour'd with the title of divine.
But soon their proud successors left this path,
Forsook plain morals for dark points of faith :
Till creeds on creeds the warring world inflam'd,
And all mankind, by different priests, were damn'd.

Some ask which is th' essential of a priest,
Virtue or learning ? what they ask's a jest :
We daily see dull loads of reverend fat, 290
Without pretence to either this or that.
But who like Herring or like Hoadly shine,
Must with great learning real virtue join.

He who by preaching hopes to raise a name,
To no small excellence directs his aim.
On every noted preacher he must wait ;
The voice, the look, the action imitate :
And when complete in style, and eloquence,
Must then be crown'd all with learning and good
sense. 299

But some with lazy pride disgrace the gown,
And never preach one sermon of their own ;
'Tis easier to transcribe than to compose,
So all the week they eat, and drink, and doze.

As quacks with lying puffs the papers fill,
Or hand their own praise in a pocky bill,
Where empty boasts of much superior sense,
Draw from the cheated crowd their idle pence ;
So the great H—nley hires for half-a-crown,
A quack advertisement to tell the town
Of some strange point to be disputed on: 310
Where all who love the science of debate,
May hear themselves, or other coxcombs prate.

When dukes or noble lords a chaplain hire,
They first of his capacities inquire.

Ver. 276.

—Fuit hæc sapientia quondam,
Publica privatis læcernere, sacra profanis :
Concubitu prohibere vago, dare jura maritis ;
Oppida moliri ; leges incidere lignæ—

—Sic honor et nomen divinis vatibus atque
Carminibus venit—

—Post hos—

—Animos in tristia bella

Verbis exacuit.

Ver. 283.

Natura fieret laudabile carmen, an arte,
Quæsitum est.

Ver. 294.

Qui studet optatam cursu contingere metam,
Multa tulit facitque puer ; sudavit et alsit—

Ver. 304.

Ut præco, ad merces turbam qui cogit emendas—

Ver. 313.

Reges dicuntur multis urgere culullis,
Et torquere mero, quem perspezisse laborant,
An sit amicitia dignus.—

If stoutly qualify'd to drink and smoke,
If not too nice to hear an impious joke,
If tame enough to be the common jest,
This is a chaplain to his lordship's taste.

If bards to Pope indifferent verses show,
He is too honest not to tell them so. 320
This is obscure, he cries, and this too rough,
These trifling, or superfluous; strike them off.
How useful every word from such a friend!
But parsons are too proud, their works to mend, }
And every fault with arrogance defend;
Think them too sacred to be criticis'd,
And rather choose to let them be despis'd.

He that is wise will not presume to laugh
At priests, or church-affairs; it is not safe. 329
Think there exists, and let it check your sport,
That dreadful monster call'd a spiritual court.
Into whose cruel jaws if once you fall,
In vain, alas! in vain for aid you call;
Clerks, proctors, priests, voracious round you ply,
Like leeches sticking, till they've suck'd you dry.

AN EPISTLE TO MR. POPE.

OCCASIONED BY HIS ESSAY ON MAN.

GREAT bard! in whom united we admire,
The sage's wisdom, and the poet's fire:
In whom at once, the great and good commend
The fine companion, and the useful friend:---
'Twas thus the muse her eager flight began,
Ardent to sing the poet, and the man.
But truth in verse is clad too like a lie,
And you, at least, would think it flattery;
Hating the thought, I check my forward strain,
I change my style, and thus begin again.

As when some student first with curious eye,
Through nature's wond'rous frame attempts to pry;

His doubtful reason seeming faults surprise,
He asks if this be just? if that be wise?
Storms, tempests, earthquakes, virtue in distress,
And vice unpunish'd, with strange thoughts oppress:

Till thinking on, unclouded by degrees,
His mind is open'd, fair is all he sees;
Storms, tempests, earthquakes, virtue's ragged plight,

And vice's triumph, all are just and right:
Beauty is found, and order, and design,
And the whole scheme acknowledg'd all divine.

So when at first I view'd thy wond'rous plan,
Leading through all the winding maze of man;
Bewilder'd, weak, unable to pursue,
My pride would fain have laid the fault on you.

Ver. 319.

Vir bonus et prudens versus reprehendet inertes---
---ambitiosa recidet

Ornamenta; parum claris lucem dare coget.

Ver. 323.

Ut, mala quem scabies aut morbus regius urget,
Aut fanaticus error, et iracunda Diana,
Vesanium tetigisse timent fugiuntque poetam,
Qui sapiunt:---

Quem verò arripuit, tenet, occiditque legendo,
Non missura autem nisi plena cruoris hirudo.

This false, that ill-express'd, this thought not good
And all was wrong which I misunderstood.
But reading more attentive, soon I found,
The diction nervous, and the doctrine sound.
Saw man, a part of that stupendous whole,
" Whose body nature is, and God the soul,"
Saw in the scale of things his middle rate,
And all his pow'rs adapted just to that.
Saw reason, passion, weakness, how of use,
How all to good, to happiness conduce;
Saw my own weakness, thy superior power,
And still the more I read, admire the more.

This smile drawn out, I now began
To think of forming some design or plan,
To aid my muse, and guide her wand'ring lay,
When sudden to my mind came honest Gay,
For form or method I no more contend,
But strive to copy that ingenious friend*:
Like him to catch my thoughts just as they rose---
And thus I caught them, laughing at thy foes.

Where are ye now---ye critics, shall I say?
Or owls who sicken at this god of day?
What! mighty scribblers, will you let him go
Uncensur'd, unabus'd, unhonour'd so?
Step forth, some great distinguish'd daring dunce,
Write but one page, you silence him at once:
Write without fear; you will, you must succeed;
He cannot answer---for he will not read.
Here paus'd the muse---alas! the jade is bit,
She fain would copy Gay, but wants his wit.
She paus'd, indeed---broke off as he had done,
Wrote four unmeaning lines, and then went on.

Ye wits and fools; ye libertines and faints,
Come pour upon the foe your joint complaints.
First, you who oft, with wisdom too refin'd,
Can censure and direct th' Eternal Mind,
Ingenious wits, who modestly pretend
This bungling frame, the universe, to mend;
How can you bear, in your great reason's spite,
To hear him prove, " Whatever is, is right?"
Alas! how easy to confute the song!

If all is right, how came your heads so wrong?
And come, ye solemn fools, a numerous band,
Who read, and read, but never understand,
Pronounce it nonsense---Can't you prove it too?
Good faith, my friends, it may be so---to you.

Come too, ye libertines, who lust for power,
Or wealth, or fame, or greatness, or a whore;
All who true sensual happiness adhere to,
And laugh him out of this old-fashion'd virtue;
Virtue, where he has whimsically plac'd
Your only bliss---How odd is some mens taste!

And come, ye rigid faints, with looks demure,
Who boast yourselves right holy, just, and pure;
Come, and with pious zeal the lines decry,
Which give your proud hypocrisy the lie:
Which own the best have failings, not a few;
And prove the worst, sometimes, as good as you.

What! shall he taint such perfect souls with ill?
Shall fets not place their bliss in what they will?
Nor fools be fools? nor wits sublime descend
In charity to heaven its works to mend?
Laughs he at these?---'tis monstrous. To be plain,
I'd have ye write---he can but laugh again.

Here lifting up my head, surpris'd I see
Close at my elbow, flattering vanity,

* In his first epistle.

From her soft whispers soon I found it came,
That I suppos'd myself not one of them.
Alas! how easily ourselves we sooth!
I fear, in justice, he must laugh at both.

For vanity abash'd, up to my ear
Steps honest truth, and these sharp words I hear;
"Forbear, vain bard, like them forbear thy lays;
"Alike to Pope such censure and such praise,
"Nor that can sink, nor this exalt his name,
"Who owes to virtue and himself his fame."

ON GOOD AND ILL-NATURE.

TO MR. POPE.

In virtue's cause to draw a daring pen,
Defend the good, encounter wicked men;
Freely to praise the virtues of the few,
And boldly censure the degenerate crew.
To scorn, with equal justice, to deride
The poor man's worth, or sooth the great one's pride;

All this was once good-nature thought, not ill;
Nay, some there are so odd to think so still.
Old-fashion'd souls! your men of modern taste,
Are with new virtue, new politeness grac'd.
Good-nature now has chang'd her honest face,
For smiling flattery, compliment, grimace:
Fool grins at fool, each coxcomb owns his brother,
And thieves and sharpers compliment each other.
To such extent good-nature now is spread,
To be sincere is monstrously ill-bred:
An equal brow to all is now the vogue,
And complaisance goes round from rogue to rogue.
If this be good—'tis gloriously true,
The most ill-natur'd man alive is you.

THE CAVE OF POPE.

A PROPHECY.

WHEN dark oblivion, in her sable cloak
Shall wrap the names of heroes and of kings;
And their high deeds, submitting to the stroke
Of time, shall fall amongst forgotten things:

Then (for the muse that distant day can see)
On Thames's bank the stranger shall arrive,
With curious wish thy sacred grott to see,
Thy sacred grott shall with thy name survive.

Grateful posterity, from age to age,
With pious hand the ruin shall repair:
Some good old man, to each inquiring sage,
Pointing the place, shall cry, The bard liv'd there,

Whose song was music to the listening ear,
Yet taught audacious vice and folly shame;
Easy his manners, but his life severe;
His word alone gave infamy or fame.

Sequester'd from the fool and coxcomb wit,
Beneath this silent roof the muse he found;
'Twas here he slept inspir'd, or sat and writ,
Here with his friends the social glass went round.

With awful veneration shall they trace
The steps which thou so long before hast trod;
With reverend wonder view the solemn place,
From whence thy genius soar'd to nature's God.

Then, some small gem, or morsel, or shining ear,
Departing, each shall pilfer, in fond hope
To please their friends, on every distant shore,
Boasting a relic from the Cave of Pope.

ON THE DEATH OF MR. POPE.

COME, ye whose souls harmonious sounds inspire,
Friends to the muse, and judges of her song;
Who, catching from the bard his heavenly fire,
Soar as he soars, sublimely rapt along; [art
Mourn, mourn your loss: he's gone who had the art
With sounds to sooth the ear, with sense to warm
the heart.

Who now shall dare to lift the sacred rod, [law?
Truth's faithful guard, where vice escapes the
Who now, high soaring to the throne of God,
In nature's moral cause his pen shall draw?
Let none pretend; he's gone, who had the art
With sounds to sooth the ear, with sense to warm
the heart.

Vice now secure her blushless front shall raise,
And all her triumph be through Britain borne;
Whose worthless sons from guilt shall purchase
praise,
Nor dread the hand that pointed them to scorn;
No check remains; he's gone, who had the art
With sounds to sooth the ear, with sense to warm
the heart.

Ye tuneless bards now tire each venal quill,
And from the public gather idle pence;
Ye tasteless peers, now build and plant your fill,
Though splendour borrows not one ray from
sense;
Fear no rebuke; he's gone, who had the art
With sounds to sooth the ear, with sense to warm
the heart.

But come, ye chosen, ye selected few,
Ye next in genius, as in friendship, join'd,
The social virtues of his heart who knew,
And stated all the beauties of his mind;
Drop, drop a tear; he's gone, who had the art
With sounds to charm the ear, with sense to warn
the heart.

And, O great shade! permit thy humblest friend
His sigh to waft, his grateful tear to pay
Thy honour'd memory; and condescend [lay,
To hear, well-pleas'd, the weak, yet well-meant
Lamenting thus: he's gone, who had the art
With sounds to sooth the ear, with sense to warm
the heart.

MODERN REASONING.

AN EPISTLE.

WHENCE comes it, L——, that ev'ry fool,
In reason's spite, in spite of ridicule,
Fondly his own wild whims for truth maintains,
And all the blind deluded world disdains
Himself the only person blest with sight,
And his opinion the great rule of right?
'Tis strange from folly this conceit should rise,
That want of sense should make us think we're wise;

Yet so it is. The most egregious elf
Thinks none so wife or witty as himself.
Who nothing knows, will all things comprehend;
And who can least confute, will most contend.

I love the man, I love him from my soul,
Whom neither weakness blinds, nor whims con-
troul;

With learning blest, with solid reason fraught,
Who slowly thinks, and ponders every thought:
Yet conscious to himself how apt to err,
Suggests his notions with a modest fear;
Hears every reason, every passion hides,
Debates with calmness, and with care decides;
More pleas'd to learn, than eager to confute,
Not victory, but truth, his sole pursuit.

But these are very rare. How happy he
Who tastes such converse, L——, with thee!
Each social hour is spent in joys sublime,
Whilst hand in hand o'er learning's Alps you climb;
Through reason's paths in search of truth proceed,
And clear the flow'ry way from every weed;
'Till from her ancient cavern rais'd to light,
The bauteous stranger stands reveal'd to fight.

How far from this the furious noisy crew,
Who, what they once assert, with zeal pursue?
Their greater right infer from louder tongues;
And strength of argument from strength of lungs,
Instead of sense; who stun your ears with sound,
And think they conquer, when they but confound.
Taurus, a bellowing champion, storms and swears,
And drives his argument through both your ears;
And whether truth or falsehood, right or wrong,
'Tis still maintain'd, and prov'd by dint of—
tongue.

In all disputes he bravely wins the day,
No wonder—for he hears not what you say.

But though to tire the ear's sufficient curse,
To tire one's patience is a plague still worse.
Plato, a formal sage, debates with care,
A strong opponent, take him up who dare.
His words are grave, deliberate, and cool,
He looks so wise—'tis pity he's a fool.
If he asserts, though what no man can doubt,
He'll bring ten thousand proofs to make it out.
This, this, and this—is so, and so, and so; [know,
And therefore, therefore—that, and that, you
Circles no angles have; a square has four:
A square's no circle therefore—to be sure.
The sum of Plato's wond'rous wisdom is,
This is not that, and, therefore, that not this.

Oppos'd to him, but much the greater dance,
Is he who throws all knowledge off at once.
The first for every trifle will contend;
But this has no opinions to defend.
In fire no heat, no sweetnels in the rose;
The man's impos'd on by his very nose;
Nor light nor colour charms his doubting eye,
The world's a dream, and all his senses lie.
He thinks, yet doubts if he's possess'd of thought;
Nay, even doubts his very power to doubt.
Ask him if he's a man, or beast, or bird,
He cannot tell, upon his honest word.

'Tis strange so plain a point's so hard to prove;
I'll tell you what you are—a fool, by Jove.

Another class of disputants there are,
More num'rous than the doubting tribe by far.
These are your wanderers, who from the point
Run wild in loose harangues, all out of joint.

Vagarious, and confute him if you can,
Will hold debate with any mortal man.
He roves from Genesis to Revelations,
And quite confounds you with divine quotations,
Should you affirm that Adam knew his wife,
And by that knowledge lost the tree of life;
He contradicts you, and, in half an hour,
Most plainly proves—Pope Joan, the scarlet whore,
Nor head nor tail his argument affords,
A jumbling, incoherent mass of words;
Most of them true, but so together lost
Without connection, that their sense is lost.

But, leaving these to rove, and those to doubt,
Another clan alarms us; face about:
See, arm'd with grave authority they come,
And with great names and numbers strike us dumb.
With these an error ven'erable appears,
For having been believ'd three thousand years.
Reason, nay common sense, to names must fall,
And strength of argument's no strength at all.
But on, my muse, though multitudes oppose us,
Alas! truth is not prov'd by counting noses:
Nor fear, though ancient sages are subjunct'd;
A lie's a lie, though told by all mankind.
'Tis true, I love the ancients—but what then?
Plato and Aristotle were but men.

I grant 'em wise—the wisest disagree,
And therefore no sufficient guides for me.
An error, though by half the world espous'd,
Is still an error, and may be oppos'd;
And truth, though much from mortal eyes con-
ceal'd,

Is still the truth, and may be more reveal'd.
How foolish then will look your mighty wife,
Should half their ipse dixit's prove plain lies!

But on, my muse, another tribe demands
Thy censure yet: nor should they scape thy hands.
These are the passionate, who in dispute
Demand submission, monarchs absolute.
Sole judges, in their own conceit, of wit,
They damn all those for fools that won't submit,
Sir Testy (thwart Sir Testy if you dare)
Swears there's inhabitants in every star.
If you presume to say this mayn't be true,
You lie, Sir, you're a fool and blockhead too.
What he asserts, if any disbelieve,
How folks can be so dull he can't conceive.
He knows he's right; he knows his judgment's clear;

But men are so perverse they will not hear.
With him, Swift treads a dull trite beaten way;
In Young no wit, no humour smiles in Gay;
Nor truth, nor virtue, Pope, adorns thy page;
And Thomson's liberty corrupts the age.
'This to deny, if any dare presume,
Fool, coxcomb, sot, and puppy, fill the room.
Hillario, who full well this humour knows,
Resolv'd one day his folly to expose,
Kindly invites him with some friends to dine,
And entertains 'em with a roast firloin:
Of this he knew Sir Testy could not eat,
And purposely prepar'd it for his treat.
The rest begin—Sir Testy, pray fall to—
You love roast beef, Sir, come—I know you do,
“Excuse me, Sir, 'tis what I never eat.”
How, Sir! not love roast beef! the king of meat!
“'Tis true indeed.” Indeed it is not true;
I love it, Sir, and you must love it too.

"I can't, upon my word." Then you're a fool,
And don't roast what's good eating, by my foul.
Not love roast beef!—come, come, sirs, fill his plate,

I'll make him love it—Sir, G—d— ye, eat.
Sir Testy finding what it was they meant,
Rose in a passion, and away he went.

RELIGION.

A SIMILE.

I'M often drawn to make a stop,
And gaze upon a picture-shop.
There have I seen (as who that carries
Has not the same) ? a head that varies ;
And as in diff'rent views expos'd,
A diff'rent figure is disclos'd.
This way a fool's head is express'd,
Whose very count'nance is a jest ;
Such as were formerly at court,
Kept to make wiser people sport.
Turn it another way, you'll have
A face ridiculously grave,
Something betwixt the fool and knave.
Again, but alter the position,
You're frighted with the apparition :
A hideous threatening Gorgon head
Appears, enough to fright the dead.
But place it in its proper light,
A lovely face accosts the sight ;
Our eyes are charm'd with every feature,
We own the whole a beauteous creature.

Thus true religion fares. For when
By silly, or designing men,
In false or foolish lights 'tis plac'd,
'Tis made a bugbear, or a jest.
Here, by a set of men, 'tis thought
A scheme, by politicians wrought,
To strengthen and enforce the law,
And keep the vulgar more in awe :
And these, to show sublimer parts,
Cast all religion from their hearts ;
Brand all its vot'ries as the tools
Of priests, and politician's fools.

Some view it in another light,
Less wicked, but as foolish quite :
And these are such as blindly place it
In superstitions that disgrace it ;
And think the essence of it lies
In ceremonious fooleries ;
In points of faith and speculation,
Which tend to nothing but vexation.
With these it is a heinous crime
To cough or spit in sermon time :
'Tis worse to whistle on a Sunday,
Than cheat their neighbours on a Monday :
To dine without first saying grace, is Enough to lose in heaven their places ;
But goodness, honesty, and virtue,
Are what they've not the least regard to.
Others there are, and not a few,
Who place it in the bugbear view !
Think it consists in strange severities ;
In fastings, weepings, and austerities.
False notions their weak minds possess,
Of faith, and grace, and holiness :
And as the Lord's of purer eyes
Than to behold iniquities ;

They think, unless they're pure and spotless,
All their endeavours will be bootless ;
And dreadful furies in eternum,
In unconsuming fires will burn 'em.

But O, how happy are the few,
Who place it in its proper view !
To these it shines divinely bright,
No clouds obscure its native light ;
Truth stamps conviction in the mind,
All doubts and fears are left behind,
And peace and joy at once an entrance find.

PAIN AND PATIENCE :

AN ODE.

To scourge the riot and intemperate lust,
Or check the self-sufficient pride of man,
Offended Heaven sent forth, in vengeance just,
The dire inexorable fury, pain ;
Beneath whose griping hand, when she assails,
The firmest spirits sink, the strongest reasoning fails.

Near to the confines of th' infernal den,
Deep in a hollow cave's profound recess,
Her courts she holds ; and to the sons of men
Sends out the ministers of dire distress :
Repentance, shame, despair, each acts her part,
Whets the vindictive steel, and aggravates the smart.

He, whose luxurious palate daily rang'd
Earth, air, and ocean, to supply his board ;
And to high-relish'd poisons madly chang'd
The wholesome gifts of nature's bounteous lord ;
Shall find sick nauseous surfeit taint his blood ;
And his abus'd pall'd stomach lothe the daintiest
food.

The midnight reveller's intemperate bowl,
To rage and riot fires his furious brain ;
Remorse ensues, and agony of soul,
His future life condemn'd to ceaseless pain :
Gout, fever, stone, to madness heighten grief ;
And temperance, call'd too late, affords him no relief ;

He whose hot blood excites to dangerous joy,
And headlong drives to seek the lewd embrace,
Startled at length, shall in his face descry
The mark indelible of foul disgrace :
Ulcers obscene corrode his aching bones ;
And his high raptures change to deep-felt sighs and groans.

The wild extravagant, whose thoughtless hand,
With lavish tasteless pride, commits expence,
Ruin'd, perceives his waning age demand
Sad reparation for his youth's offence :
Upbraiding riot points to follies past,
Presenting hollow want, fit successor to waste.

He too, whose high presuming health defies
Th' almighty hand of Heaven to pull him down ;
Who flights the care and caution of the wise,
Nor fears hot summer's rage, nor winter's
frown :

Some trifling ail shall seize this mighty man;
Blast all his boasted strength, rack every nerve with pain.

Thus nature's God inflicts, by nature's law,
On every crime its proper punishment;
Creating pain to keep mankind in awe,
And moral ills by physical prevent:

In wrath still gracious; claiming still our praise,
Ev'n in those very groans our chastisements shall raise.

But lest the feeble heart of suffering man
Too low should sink beneath the keen distress;
Lest fell despair, in league with cruel pain,
Should drive him desperate in their wild excess;

Kind hope her daughter patience sent from high,
To ease the labouring breast, and wipe the trickling eye.

Hail, mild divinity! calm patience, hail!
Soft-handed, meek-ey'd maid, yet whose firm
breath,

And strong persuasive eloquence prevail
Against the rage of pain, the fear of death:
Come, lenient beauty, spread thy healing wing,
And smooth my restless couch, whilst I thy praises sing.

In all this toilsome round of weary life,
Where dullness teazes, or pert noise assails;
Where trifling follies end in serious strife,
And money purchases where merit fails;
What honest spirit would not rise in rage,
If patience lent not aid his passion to assuage?

No state of life but must to patience bow:
The tradesman must have patience for his bill;
He must have patience who to law will go;
And should he lose his right, more patience
Yea, to prevent or heal full many a strife, [still];
How oft, how long must man have patience with his wife?

But Heav'n grant patience to the wretched
wight,
Whom pills, and draughts, and bolusses assail!
Which he must swallow down with all his might; [trits fail].
Ev'n then, when health, and strength, and spi-
Dear doctors, find some gentler ways to kill;
Lighten this load of drugs, contract yon length of bill.

When the dull, prating loud, long-winded dame,
Her tedious, vague, unmeaning tale repeats;
Perplex'd and wand'ring round and round her
theme,
Till lost and puzzled, she all theme forgets;
Yet still talks on with unabating speed;
Good gods! who hears her out, must patience have indeed.

So when some grave, deep-learned, sound divine
Ascends the pulpit, and unfolds his text:
Dark and more dark grows what he would define,
And every sentence more and more perplex'd;
Yet still he blunders on the same blind course,
Teaching his weary'd hearers patience upon force.

Without firm patience who could ever bear
The great man's levee, watching for a smile?
Then, with a whisper'd promise in his ear,
Wait its accomplishment a long, long while;
Yet through the bounds of patience if he burst,
Daniel's long weeks of years may be accomplish'd first.

O patience! guardian of the temper'd breast,
Against the insulence of pride and power;
Against the wit's keen sneer, the fool's dull jest;
Against the boaster's lie, told o'er and o'er;
To thee this tributary lay I bring, [sing].
By whose firm aid empower'd, in raging pain I

KITTY.

A PASTORAL.

BENEATH a cool shade, by the side of a stream,
Thus breath'd a fond shepherd, his Kitty his
theme:

Thy beauties comparing, my dearest, said he,
There's nothing in nature so lovely as thee.

Though distance divides us, I view thy dear face
And wander in transport o'er every grace;
Now, now I behold thee, sweet-smiling and pretty,
O gods! you've made nothing so fair as my Kitty!

Come, lovely idea, come fill my fond arms,
And whilst in soft rapture I gaze on thy charms,
The beautiful objects which round me arise,
Shall yield to those beauties that live in thine
eyes.

Now Flora the meads and the groves does adorn,
With flowers and blossoms on every thorn;
But look on my Kitty!—there sweetly does blow,
A spring of more beauties than Flora can show.

See, see how that rose there adorns the gay bush,
And proud of its colour, would vie with her blush.

Vain boaster! thy beauties shall quickly decay,
She blushes—and see how it withers away.

Observe that fair lily, the pride of the vale,
In whiteness unrivall'd, now droop and look pale;
It sickens, and changes its beautiful hue,
And bows down its head in submission to you.

The zephyrs that fan me beneath the cool shade,
When panting with heat on the ground I am laid,
Are less grateful and sweet than the heavenly air
That breathes from her lips when she whispers—my dear.

I hear the gay lark, as she mounts in the skies,
How sweet are her notes! how delightful her voice!

Go dwell in the air, little warbler, go!
I have music enough while my Kitty's below.

With pleasure I watch the industrious bee,
Extracting her sweets from each flower and tree:
Ah fools! thus to labour to keep you alive;
Fly, fly to her lips, and at once fill your hive.

See there, on the top of that oak, how the doves

Sit brooding each other, and cooing their loves:
Our loves are thus tender, thus mutual our joy,
When folded on each other's bosom we lie.

It glads me to see how the pretty young lambs
Are fondled, and cherish'd, and lov'd by their dams:
The lambs are less pretty, my dearest, than thee;
Their dams are less fond, nor so tender as me.

As I gaze on the river that smoothly glides by,
Thus even and sweet is her temper, I cry;
Thus clear is her mind, thus calm and serene,
And virtues, like gems, at the bottom are seen.

Here various flowers still paint the gay scene,
And as some fade and die, others bud and look
green;

The charms of my Kitty are constant as they;
Her virtues will bloom as her beauties decay.

But in vain I compare her, here's nothing so bright;

And darkness approaches to hinder my sight:
To bed I will hasten, and there all her charms,
In softer ideas, I'll bring to my arms.

COLIN'S KISSES.

SONG I.

THE TUTOR.

COME, my fairest, learn of me,
Learn to give and take the bliss;
Come, my love, here's none but we,
I'll instruct thee how to kiss.
Why turn from me that dear face?
Why that blush and downcast eye?
Come, come, meet my fond embrace,
And the mutual rapture try.

Throw thy lovely twining arms
Round my neck, or round my waist;
And whilst I devour thy charms,
Let me closely be embrac'd:
Then when soft ideas rise,
And the gay desires grow strong;
Let them sparkle in thy eyes,
Let them murmur from thy tongue,

To my breast with rapture cling,
Look with transport on my face,
Kiss me, press me, every thing
To endear the fond embrace.
Every tender name of love,
In soft whispers let me hear;
And let speaking nature prove
Every ecstacy sincere.

SONG II.

THE IMAGINARY KISS.

WHEN Fanny I saw as the tip of the green,
Fair, blooming, soft, artless, and kind:
Fond love in her eyes, wit and sense in her mien,
And warmness with modesty join'd:
Transported with sudden amazement I stood,
Fast rivetted down to the place;
Her delicate shape, easy motion I view'd,
And wander'd o'er every grace.

Ye gods! what luxuriance of beauty, I cry,
What raptures must dwell in her arms!
On her lips I could feast, on her breast I could die,
O Fanny, how sweet are thy charms!

Whilst thus in idea my passion I fed,
Soft transport my senses invade, [fed,
Young Damon stepp'd up, with the substance he
And left me to kiss the dear shade.

SONG III.

THE FEAST.

POLLY, when your lips you join,
Lovely ruby lips to mine;
To the bee the flow'ry field
Such a banquet does not yield;
Not the dewy morning rose
So much sweetness does enclose;
Not the gods such nectar sip,
As Colin from thy balmy lip:
Kiss me then, with rapture kiss,
We'll surpass the gods in bliss.

SONG IV.

THE STOLEN KISS.

ON a mossy bank reclin'd,
Beauteous Chloe lay reposing,
O'er her breast each am'rous wind
Wanton play'd, its sweets disclosing;
Tempted with the swelling charms,
Colio, happy swain, drew nigh her,
Softly stole into her arms,
Laid his scrip and sheep-hook by her,

O'er her downy panting breast
His delighted fingers roving;
To her lips his lips he prest,
In the ecstacy of loving:
Chloe, waken'd with his kiss,
Pleas'd, yet frowning to conceal it,
Cry'd, true lovers share the bliss?
Why then, Colio, would you steal it?

SONG V.

THE MEETING KISS.

LET me fly into thy arms:
Let me taste again thy charms;
Kiss me, press me to thy breast,
In raptures not to be express.

Let me clasp thy lovely waist;
Throw thy arms around my neck;
Thus embracing and embrac'd,
Nothing shall our raptures check.

Hearts with mutual pleasure glowing;
Lips with lips together growing;
Eyes with tears of gladness flowing;
Eyes, and lips, and hearts shall show,
Th' excess of joy that meeting lovers know.

SONG VI.

THE PARTING KISS.

ONE kind kiss before we part,
Drop a tear and bid adieu:
Though we sever, my fond heart
Till we meet shall pant for you.

Yet, yet weep not so, my love,
Let me kiss that falling tear,

Though my body must remove,
All my soul will still be here.

All my soul, and all my heart,
And every wish shall pant for you;
One kind kiss then e'er we part,
Drop a tear and bid adieu.

SONG VII.

THE BORROWED KISS.

SEE I languish, see I faint,
I must borrow, beg, or steal;
Can you see a soul in want,
And no kind compassion feel?
Give, or lend, or let me take
One sweet kiss, I ask no more;
One sweet kiss, for pity's sake,
I'll repay it o'er and o'er.

Chloe heard, and with a smile,
Kind, compassionate, and sweet,
Colin, 'tis a sin to steal,
And for me to give's not meet:
But I'll lend a kiss or twain,
To poor Colin in distress;
Not that I'd be paid again,
Colin, I mean nothing less.

SONG VIII.

THE KISS REPAID.

CHLOE, by that borrow'd kiss,
I, alas! am quite undone;
'Twas so sweet, so fraught with bliss,
Thousands will not pay that one.
Left the debt should break your heart,
Roguish Chloe smiling cries,
Come, a hundred then in part,
For the present shall suffice.

SONG IX.

THE SECRET KISS.

AT the silent evening hour,
Two fond lovers in a bower
Sought their mutual bliss;
Though her heart was just relenting,
Though her eyes seem'd just consenting,
Yet she fear'd to kiss.
Since this secret shade, he cry'd,
Will those rosy blushes hide,
Why will you resist?
When no tell-tale spy is near us,
Eye not sees, nor ear can hear us,
Who would not be kiss'd?
Molly hearing what he said,
Blushing lifted up her head,
Her breast soft wishes fill;
Since, she cry'd no spy is near us,
Eye not sees, nor ear can hear us,
Kiss—or what you will.

SONG X.

THE RAPTURE.

WHILST on thy dear bosom lying,
Cælia, who can speak my bliss?

Who the raptures I'm enjoying,
When thy balmy lips I kiss?
Every look with love inspires me,
Every touch my bosom warms,
Every melting murmur fires me,
Every joy is in thy arms.

Those dear eyes, how soft they languish!
Feel my heart with rapture beat!
Pleasure turns almost to anguish,
When the transport is so sweet.
Look not so divinely on me,
Cælia, I shall die with bliss;
Yet, yet turn those eyes upon me,
Who'd not die a death like this?

SONG XI.

THE RECONCILING KISS.

WHY that sadness on thy brow?
Why that starting crystal tear?
Dearest Polly, let me know,
For thy grief I cannot bear.
Polly with a sigh reply'd,
What need I the cause impart?
Did you not this moment chide?
And you know it breaks my heart.
Colin, melting as he spoke,
Caught the fair one in his arms:
O my dear! that tender look,
Every passion quite disarms:
By this dear relenting kiss,
I'd no anger in my thought;
Come, my love, by this, and this,
Let our quarrel be forgot.
As when sudden stormy rain,
Every drooping flowret spoils;
When the sun shines out again,
All the face of nature smiles:
Polly, so reviv'd and cheer'd
By her Colin's kind embrace,
Her declining head uprear'd,
Sweetly smiling in his face.

SONG XII.

THE MUTUAL KISS.

CÆLIA, by those smiling graces,
Which my panting bosom warm;
By the heaven of thy embraces,
By thy wondrous power to charm;
By those soft bewitching glances,
Which my inmost bosom move;
By those lips, whose kiss entrances,
Thee, and thee alone I love.
By thy godlike art of loving,
Cælia, with a blush, replies;
By thy heavenly power of moving,
All my soul to sympathize!
By thy eager fond caresses,
By those arms around me thrown;
By that look, which truth expresses,
My found heart is all thy own.
Thus with glowing inclination,
They indulge the tender bliss;
And to bind the lasting passion,
Seal it with a mutual kiss.

Close, in fond embraces, lying,
They together seem to grow ;
Such supreme delight enjoying,
As true lovers only know.

THE WIFE: A FRAGMENT.

THE virtues that endear and sweeten life,
And form that soft companion, call'd a wife ;
Demand my song. Thou who didst first inspire
The tender theme, to thee I tune the lyre.

Hail, lovely woman! nature's blessing, hail!
Whose charms o'er all the powers of man prevail:
Thou healing balm of life, which bounteous hea-
To pour on all our woes, has kindly given! [ven,
What were mankind without thee? or what joy,
Like thy soft converse, can his hours employ?
The dry, dull, drowsy bachelor surveys,
Alternative, joyless nights and lonesome days:
No tender transports wake his fullen breast,
No soft endearments lull his cares to rest:
Stupidly free from nature's tenderest ties,
Lost in his own sad self he lives and dies.
Not so the man, to whom indulgent Heaven
That tender bosom-friend, a wife, has given:
Him, blest in her kind arms, no fears dismay,
No secret checks of guilt his mind allay:
No husband wrong'd, no virgin honour spoil'd,
No anxious parent weeps his ruin'd child!
No fell disease, no false embrace is here,
The joys are safe, the raptures are sincere.
Does fortune smile? How grateful must it prove
To tread life's pleasing round with one we love!
Or does she frown? The fair with softening art,
Will soothe our woes, or bear a willing part.
"But are all women of the soothing kind?"
"In choosing wives no hazard shall we find?"
"Will spleen, nor vapours, pride, nor prate mo-
"And is all fear of cuckoldom a jest?" [lest?
Grant some are bad: yet surely some remain,
Good without show, and lovely without stain;
Warm without lewdness; virtuous without pride;
Content to follow, yet with sense to guide.
Such is Fidelia, fairest, fondest wife;
Observe the picture, for I draw from life.

Near that fam'd hill, from whose enchanting brow

Such various scenes enrich the vales below;
While gentle Thames, meandering glides along,
Meads, flocks, and groves, and rising towers among,

Fidelia dwelt: fair as the fairest scene
Of smiling nature, when the sky's serene.
Full sixteen Summers had adorn'd her face,
Warm'd every sense, and waken'd every grace;
Her eye look'd sweetness, gently heav'd her breast,
Her shape, her motion, graceful ease express'd.
And to this fair, this finish'd form, were join'd
The softest passions, and the purest mind.

ROME'S PARDON: A TALE.

"If Rome can pardon sins, as Romans hold;
"And if those pardons may be bought and sold,
"It were no sin t'adore and worship gold."

ROCHESTER.

It happen'd on a certain time,
Two seigniors, who had spent the prime

Of youth in every wickedness,
Came to his Holiness to confess;
Of which, the one had riches store,
The other (wicked wretch)! was poor.
But both grown old, had now a mind
To die in peace with all mankind;
And go to heaven a nearer way
Than those who all their life-time pray:
Which may effected be they hope,
By buying pardon of the Pope.
So calling fresh to mind their sins,
The rich offender thus begins.

"Most holy father, I have been,
"I must confess, in many a sin.
"All laws divine I've thought a joke;
"All human laws for interest broke.
"And to increase my ill-got store,
"Thought it no crime t'oppress the poor;
"To cheat the rich, betray my friends,
"Or any thing to gain my ends.
"But now grown old, and near to die,
"I do repent me heartily
"Of all my vile offences past,
"And in particular the last,
"By which I wickedly beguill'd
"A dead friend's son, my guardian child,
"Of all his dear paternal store,
"Which was ten thousand pounds or more;
"Who since is starv'd to death by want,
"And now sincerely I repent:
"Which that your Holiness may see,
"One half the sum I've brought with me,
"And thus I cast it at your feet,
"Dispose of it as you think meet,
"To pious uses, or your own,
"I hope 'twill all my faults atone.
"Friend," quoth the Pope, "I'm glad to "see

"Such true repentance wrought in thee;
"But your sins are very great,
"You have but half repented yet:
"Nor can your pardon be obtain'd,
"Unless the whole which thus you've gain'd,
"To pious uses be ordain'd." }
"All!" cry'd the man, "I thought that half
"Had been a pretty price enough."
"Nay," quoth the Pope, "sir, if you hum
"And haw at parting with the sum,
"Go, keep it, do; and damn your soul;
"I tell you, I must have the whole.
"Tis not a little thing procures
"A pardon for such sins as yours."
Well--rather than be doom'd to go,
To dwell with everlasting woe,
One would give any thing, you know:
So th' other half was thrown down to't,
And then he soon obtain'd his suit;
A pardon for his sins was given,
And home he went assur'd of heaven.
And now the poor man bends his knee;
"Most holy father, pardon me,
"A poor and humble penitent
"Who all my substance vilely spent,
"In every wanton, youthful pleasure;
"But now I suffer out of measure;
"With dire diseases being fraught
"And eke so poor not worth a groat."

" Poor ! quoth the Pope, then cease your suit,
 " Indeed you may as well be mute ;
 " Forbear your now too late contrition,
 " You're in a reprobate condition.
 " What ! spend your wealth, and from the whole
 " Not save one soule to save your soul ?
 " O, you're a sinner, and a hard one,
 " I wonder you can ask a pardon :
 " Friend, they're not had, unless you buy 'em,
 " You're therefore damn'd, as sure as I am---
 " Vicegerent to the king of heaven :
 " No, no, such sins can't be forgiven.
 " I cannot save you if I would,
 " Nor would I do it if I could."

Home goes the man in deep despair,
 And died soon after he came there ;
 And went, 'tis said, to hell : but sure
 He was not damn'd for being poor !
 But long he had not been below,
 Before he saw his friend come too ;
 At this he was in great surprize,
 And scarcely could believe his eyes :
 " What, friend, said he, are you come too ?
 " I thought the Pope had pardon'd you. }
 " Yes, quoth the man, I thought so too ;
 " But I was by the Pope trepann'd--- }
 " The devil could not read his hand."

AN EPISTLE TO STEPHEN DUCK,

AT HIS FIRST COMING TO COURT.

FORGIVE me, Duck, that such a muse as mine,
 Brings her weak aid to the support of thine ;
 In lines, which if the world should chance to see,
 They'd find I pleaded for myself---in thee.

Yet some indulgence sure they ought to show
 An infant poet, and unlearn'd as you ;
 Unkill'd in art, unexercis'd to sing ;
 I've just but tasted the Pierian spring :
 But though my stock of learning yet is low ;
 Though yet my numbers don't harmonious flow, }
 I fain would hope it won't be always so.
 The morning sun emits a stronger ray,
 Still as he rises tow'rd's meridian day :
 Large hills at first obstruct the oblique beam,
 And dark'ning shadows shoot along the gleam ;
 Impending mists yet hover in the air,
 And distant objects undistinct appear.
 But as he rises in the eastern sky,
 The shadows shrink, the conquer'd vapours fly ;
 Objects their proper forms and colours gain ;
 In all her various beauties shines th' enlighten'd
 plain.

So when the dawn of thought peeps out in man,
 Mountains of ign'rance shade at first his brain ?
 A gleam of reason by degrees appears,
 Which brightens and increases with his years ;
 And as the rays of thought gain strength in youth,
 Dark mists of error melt and brighten into truth.

Thus asking ign'rance will to knowledge grow ;
 Conceited fools alone continue so.
 On then, my friend, nor doubt but that in time
 Our tender muses, learning how to climb,
 May reach perfection's top, and grow sublime. }
 The Iliad scarce was Homer's first essay ;
 Virgil wrote not his Æneid in a day ;
 Nor is't impossible a time might be,
 When Pope and Prior wrote like you and me.

'Tis true, more learning might their works adorn,
 They wrote not from a pantry nor a barn :
 Yet they, as well as we, by slow degrees
 Must reach perfection, and to write with ease.
 Have you not seen ? Yes, oft you must have seen
 When vernal suns adorn the woods with green,
 And genial warmth, enkindling wanton love,
 Fills with a various progeny the grove,
 The tim'rous young, just ventur'd from the nest,
 First in low bushes hop, and often rest ;
 From twig to twig, their tender wings they try,
 Yet only flutter when they seem to fly.
 But as their strength and feathers more increase,
 Short flights they take, and fly with greater ease :
 Experienc'd soon, they boldly venture higher,
 Forsake the hedge, to lofty trees aspire ;
 Transported thence, with strong and steady wing
 They mount the skies, and soar aloft, and sing.

So you and I, just naked from the shell,
 In chirping notes our future singing tell ;
 Unfeather'd yet, in judgment, thought, or skill,
 Hop round the basis of Parnassus' hill :
 Our flights are low, and want of art and strength,
 Forbids to carry us to the wish'd-for length,
 But fledg'd, and cherish'd with a kindly spring,
 We'll mount the summit, and melodious sing.

AN EPITAPH.

HERE lie the remains of Caroline,
 Queen consort of Great Britain,
 Whose virtues
 Her friends, when living, knew and enjoy'd ;
 Now dead, her foes confess and admire.
 Her ambition aspir'd to wisdom,
 And attain'd it ;
 To knowledge,
 And it fill'd her mind.
 Patroness of the wise,
 And a friend of the good,
 She look'd, and modest merit rais'd its head ;
 She smil'd, and weeping woe grew glad.
 Religion, plain and simple,
 Dignify'd her mind,
 Despising forms and useless pageantry.
 Morals, clear and refin'd,
 Dwelt in her heart,
 And guided all her actions.
 Virtue the lov'd, beneath her smile it flourish'd ;
 She frown'd on vice, and it was put to shame.
 In fine,
 Her life was a public blessing ;
 Her death is an universal loss.
 O reader ! if thou doubtest of these things,
 Ask the cries of the fatherless, they shall tell thee,
 And the tears of the widow shall confirm their truth :
 The sons of wisdom shall testify of her,
 And the daughters of virtue bear her witness ;
 The voice of the nation shall applaud her,
 And the heart of the king shall sigh her praise.

TO RICHES.

Humbly Inscribed to the Right Hon. ---
 To succour all whom grief or care oppress,
 To raise neglected merit from distress,

The dying arts t' encourage and revive,
And independent of mankind to live;
This, this is riches' grand prerogative.
These all the wise and good with joy pursue,
And thousands feel, and bless their power in you.

But stay, my muse, nor rashly urge thy theme,
Examine well thy candidates for fame;
Thy verse is praise. Consider—very few
Can justly say one single line's their due:
Scorn thou with generous freedom to record,
Without his just credentials, duke or lord:
An honest line prefer to a polite,
So shall thy praise no conscious blush excite.

But as to paint a lovely female face,
With every charm ador'd, and every grace;
Requires a finer hand, and greater care,
Than the rough features of a H—r;
So praise than satire asks a nicer touch;
But finish'd well, there's nothing charms so much.
A shining character when drawn with art,
Like beauty, whilst it pleases, wins the heart.

Mæcenas first the noble list shall grace,
Learning's great patron merits the first place.
O dear to every muse! to every art!

Virtue's chief friend! supporter of desert!
Is there a man, though poor, despis'd, oppress'd,
Yet whose superior genius shines confess'd;
Whether the useful arts his soul inspire,
Or the politer muse's sacred fire,
Learning and arts t' encourage and extend?
In thee he finds a patron and a friend.

Wealth thus bestow'd, returns in lasting fame,
A grateful tribute to the donor's name.

Next him from whom true virtue meets reward,
Is he who shows to want a kind regard.

Carus, though blest with plenty, ease, and health,
His every want supply'd from boundless wealth,
Yet feels humanity: his soul o'erflows
To see, or hear, or think on, others' woes.

Is there a wretch with pinching want oppress'd?
His pain, till eas'd, is felt in Carus' breast.

Does any languish under dire disease?
Carus prescribes, or pays the doctor's fees.

Has sad misfortune fatal ruin thrown,
And some expiring family undone?

Carus repairs, and makes the loss his own.
To hear the widow's or the orphan's cries,
His soul in pity melts into his eyes:
O manly tenderness! good-natur'd grief,
To feel, to sympathize, and give relief.

Sure gods are Carus' debtors: Gold thus given,
Lies out at interest in the bank of heaven.

But where's th' advantage then, will Corvus say,

If wealth is only lent to give away?
Corvus, were that the sole prerogative,

How great, how godlike is the power to give!
Thou canst not feel it: True, 'tis too divine

For such a selfish narrow soul as thine.
Comes is rich, below'd by all mankind,
To cheerful hospitality inclin'd;

His ponds with fish, with fowl his woods are stor'd,
Inviting plenty smiles upon his board:

Easy and free, his friends his fortune share,
Ev'n travelling strangers find a welcome there;

Neighbours, domestics, all enjoy their parts,
He in return possesses all their hearts.

Who, foolish Corvus, who but thee will say,
That Comes idly throws his wealth away?

Is then the noble privilege to give,
The sole advantage we from wealth receive!

Whilst others wants or merits we supply,
Have we ourselves no title to enjoy?

Doublets you have. A thousand different ways
Wealth may be self-enjoy'd, and all with praise.

Whom truth and reason guides, or genius fires,
Never need fear indulging his desires.

But shou'd pretending coxcombs, from this rule,
Plead equal privilege to play the fool?

The muse forbids. She only gives to sense
The dangerous province to contrive expense.

Marcus in sumptuous buildings takes delight,
His house, his gardens charm the ravish'd sight:

With beauty ure, with grandeur neatness joins,
And order with magnificence combines.

'Tis costly: True, but who can blame th' expense [sense?]

“Where splendour borrows all her rays from Sylvio retirement loves; smooth crystal floods,
Green meadows, hills and dales, and verdant woods

Delight his eye; the warbling birds to hear,
With rapture fills his soul, and charms his ear.

In stady walks, in groves, in secret bowers,
Plann'd by himself, he spends the peaceful hours:

Here serious thought pursues her thread serene,
No interrupting follies intervene;

Propitious silence aids th' attentive mind,
The God of nature in his works to find.

If this t' enjoy affords him most delight,
Who says that Sylvio is not in the right?

Publius in curious paintings wealth consumes,
The best, the finest hands adorn his rooms;

Various designs, from each enliven'd wall, [all
Meet the pleas'd eyes, and something charms in Here well-drawn landscapes to the mind convey

A smiling country, or a stormy sea;
Towns, houses, trees, diversify the plain,

And ships in danger fright us from the main.
There the past actions of illustrious men,
In strong description charm the world agen:

Love, anger, grief, in different scenes are wrought,
All its just passions animates the draught.

But see new charms break in a flood of day,
See loves and graces on the canvass play;

Beauty's imagin'd smiles our bosom warm,
And light and shade retains the power to charm.

Who censures Publius, or condemns his cost,
Must wish the noble art of painting lost.

Whilst Publius thus his taste in painting shows,
Critus admires her sister art, the muse.

Homer and Virgil, Horace and Boileau
Teach in his breast poetic warmth to glow.

From these instructed, and from these inspir'd,
Critus for taste and judgment is admir'd.

Poets before him lay the work of years,
And from his sentence draw their hopes and fears:

Hail, judge impartial! noble critic hail!
In this thy day, good writing must prevail:

Our bards from you will hence be what they shou'd,

Please and improve us, make us wise and good.
Thus blest'd with wealth, his genius each pur-
In building, planting, painting, or the muse. [sac,

O envy'd power!—But you'll object and say,
 How few employ it in this envy'd way?
 With all his heaps did Chremes e'er do good?
 No. But they give him power, if once he wou'd:
 'Tis not in riches to create the will,
 Misers, in spite of wealth, are misers still.
 It is for gold the lawless villain spoils!
 'Tis for the fame the honest lab'rer toils.
 Does wealth to sloth, to luxury pervert?
 Wealth too excites to industry, to art:
 Many, no doubt, through power of wealth oppress,
 But some, whom Heaven reward, delight to bless!
 Then blame not gold, that men are proud or vain,
 Slothful or covetous; but blame the man.
 When right affections rule a generous heart,
 Gold may refine, but seldom will pervert.

THE PETITION.

THE various suppliants which address
 Their pray'rs to Heaven on bended knees,
 All hope alike for happiness,

Yet each petition disagrees.
 Fancy, not judgment, constitutes their bliss;
 The wife, no doubt, will say the same of this.

Ye gods, if you remember right,
 Some eighteen years ago,
 A form was made divinely bright,
 And sent for us t' admire below
 I first distinguish'd her from all the rest,
 And hope you'll therefore think my title best.

I ask not heaps of shining gold,
 No, if the gods vouchsafe
 My longing arms may her infold,
 I'm rich, I'm rich enough!
 Riches at best can hardly give content;
 But having her, what is there I can want?

I ask not, with a pompous train
 Of honours, all th' world t' outbrave;
 The title I wou'd wish to gain,
 Is,—Her most fav'rite slave:
 To bow to her, a greater bliss wou'd be
 Than kings and princes bowing down to me.

To rule the world with power supreme,
 Let meaner souls aspire;
 To gain the sov'reignty from them
 I swoop not to desire:
 Give me to reign sole monarch in her breast,
 Let petty princes for the world contest.

Let libertines, who take delight
 In riot and excess,
 Thus waste the day, thus spend the night,
 Whilst I to joys sublimer press:
 Clasp'd in her snowy arms such bliss I'd prove,
 As never yet was found, or felt in love.

In short, I ask you not to live
 A tedious length of days;
 Old age can little pleasure give,
 When health and strength decays:
 Let but what time I have be spent with her's,
 Each moment will be worth a thousand years.

AN EPITHALAMIUM.

HENCE, hence all dull cares,
 All quarrels and jars,
 Ye factious disturbers of pleasure, avoid!
 Content, love, and joy,
 Shall their powers employ,
 To bless the glad bridegroom and beautiful bride:
 Anger shall ne'er presume
 To come within this room;
 No doubt nor anxious fear,
 Nor jealous thought shall enter here.
 Ill-nature, ill manners, contention, and pride,
 Shall never, shall never the union divide:
 O the pleasing, pleasing raptures,
 Read in Hymen's nuptial chapters!
 Love commencing,
 Joys dispensing;
 Beauty smiling,
 Wit beguiling;
 Kindness charming,
 Fancy warming;
 Kissing, toying,
 Melting, dying;
 O the pleasing, pleasing raptures!

THE ADVICE.

Do st thou, my friend, desire to rise
 To honour, wealth, and dignities?
 Virtue's paths, though trod by few,
 With constant steps do thou pursue.
 For as the coward-soul admires
 That courage which the brave inspires;
 And his own quarrels to defend,
 Gladly makes such a one his friend;
 So in a world which rogues infest,
 How is an honest man caref'd!
 The villains from each other fly,
 And on his virtue safe rely.

A LAMENTABLE CASE.

SUBMITTED TO THE BATH PHYSICIANS.

YE fam'd physicians of this place,
 Hear Strephon's and poor Chloe's case.
 Nor think that I am joking;
 When he wou'd, he cannot comply,
 When he wou'd drink, she's not a-dry;
 And is not this provoking?

At night, when Strephon comes to rest,
 Chloe receives him on her breast,
 With fondly-folding arms:
 Down, down he hangs his drooping head,
 Falls fast asleep, and lies as dead,
 Neglecting all her charms.

Reviving when the morn returns,
 With rising flames young Strephon burns,
 And fain, wou'd fain be doing:
 But Chloe now, asleep or sick,
 Has no great relish for the trick,
 And sadly haulks his wooing.

O cruel and disastrous case,
 When in the critical embrace

That only one is burning!
Dear Doctors, fet this matter right,
Give Strephon fpirits over night,
Or Chloe in the morning.

A LADY'S SALUTATION

TO HER GARDEN IN THE COUNTRY.

WELCOME, fair fcene; welcome, thou-lov'd retreat,

From the vain hurry of the bufhing great.
Here let me walk, or in this fragrant bower,
Wrap'd in calm thought improve each fleeting hour.

My foul while nature's beauties feaft mine eyes,
To nature's God contemplative fhall rife.

What are ye now, ye glittering, vain delights,
Which wafte our days, and rob us of our nights?
What your allurements? what your fancy'd joys?
Drefs, equipage, and fhew, and pomp, and noife!
Alas! how taftelefs thefe, how low, how mean,
To the calm pleafures of this rural fcene?

Come then ye fhades, beneath your bending arms

Enclufe the fond admirer of your charms;
Come then ye bowers receive your joyful gueft,
Glad to retire, and in retirement bleft;
Come, ye fair flowers, and open ev'ry fweet;
Come, little birds, your warbling fongs repeat,
And O defcend to fwecten all the reft,
Soft fmiling peace, in white-rob'd virtue drefs;
Content unenvious, eafe with freedom join'd,
And contemplation calm, with truth refin'd:
Deign but in this fair fcene with me to dwell,
All noife and nonenfence, pomp and fhew farewell.

And fee! O fee! the heav'n-born train appear!
Fix then, my heart; thy happinefs is here.

THE PROGRESS OF LOVE.

A SONG.

BENEATH the myrtle's fecret fhade,
When Delia bleft my eyes;
At firft I view'd the lovely maid
In filent foft furprife.
With trembling voice, and anxious mind,
I foftly whifper'd love;
She blufh'd a fmile fo fweetly kind,
Did all my fears remove.
Her lovely yielding form I preft,
Sweet maddening kifles flole;
And foon her fwimming eyes confeft
The wifhes of her foul:
In wild tumultuous blifs, I cry,
O Delia, now be kind!
She preft'd me clofe, and with a figh,
To melting joys refign'd.

S O N G.

MAN's a poor deluded bubble,
Wand'ring in a mift of lies;
Seeing falfe, or feeing double,
Who wou'd truft to fuch weak eyes?
Yet prefuming on his fenfes,
On he goes moft wond'rous wife:
Doubts of truth, believes pretences
Loft in error, lives and dies.

Vol. XI,

AN EPIGRAM.

Occafioned by the word "one Prior," in the fecond volume of Bifhop Burnet's Hiftory.

ONE Prior! and is this, this all the fame
The poet from th' hiftorian can claim!
No; Prior's yerfe pofterity fhall quote,
When 'tis forgot one Burnet ever wrote.

AN EPIGRAM.

CRIES Sylvia to a reverend dean,
What reafon can be given,
Since marriage is a holy thing,
That there are none in heaven?

There are no women, he reply'd:
She quick returns the jeft—
Women there are but I'm afraid
They cannot find a prieft.

THE KINGS OF EUROPE.

A JEST.

WHY pray, of late, do Europe's kings
No jefter in their courts admit?
They're grown fuch ftately folemn things,
To bear a joke they think not fit.

But though each court a jefter lacks,
To laugh at monarchs to their face;
All mankind do behind their backs
Supply the honeft jefter's place.

VERSES

On the Author's firft arrival at the Leafowes, 1754.

"How fhall I fix my wandering eye? Where find
"The fource of this enchantment? Dwells it in "The woods? or waves there not a magic wand
"O'er the tranflucant waters? Sure, unfeen,
"Some favouring power directs the happy lines
"That fketeh thefe beauties; fwells the rifing
"hills,
"And fcoopes the dales, to nature's fineft forms;
"Vague, undetermin'd, infinite; untaught
"By line or compafs, yet fupremely fair."
So fpake Philenor, as with raptur'd gaze
He travers'd Damon's farm: From diftant plains
He fough't his friend's abode; nor had the fame
Of that new-form'd Arcadia reach'd his ear.
And thus the fwain, as o'er each hill and dale,
Through lawn or thicket he purfu'd his way:
"What is it gilds the verdure of thefe meads
"With hues more bright than fancy paints the
"flowers
"Of Paradife? What Naiad's guiding hand
"Leads through the broider'd vale, thefe lucid
"rills,
"That, murmuring as they flow, bear melody
"Along their banks; and through the vocal
"fhades,
"Improve the mufic of the woodland choir?
"What penfive dryad rais'd you folemn grove,
"Where minds contemplative, at clofe of day
"Retiring, mufe, o'er nature's various works,

" Her wonders venerate, or her sweets enjoy—
 " What room for doubt? Some rural deity,
 " Presiding, scatters o'er th' unequal lawns,
 " In beauteous wildness, yon fair-spreading trees;
 " And mingling woods and waters, hills and dales,
 " And herds and bleating flocks, domestic fowl,
 " And those that swim the lake, sees rising round
 " More pleasing landscapes than in Tempe's vale
 " Peneus water'd. Yes, some Sylvan god
 " Spreads wide the varied prospect; waves the " woods, [lakes;
 " Lifts the proud hills, and clears the shining
 " While, from the congregated waters pour'd,
 " The bursting torrent tumbles down the steep
 " In foaming fury; fierce, irregular,
 " Wild interrupted, cross'd with rocks and roots,
 " And interwoven trees: till, soon absorb'd,
 " An opening cavern all its rage entombs.
 " So vanish human glories! such the pomp
 " Of swelling warriors, of ambitious kings,

" Who fret and strut their hour upon the stage
 " Of busy life, and then are heard no more!
 " Yes, 'tis enchantment all—And see, the spells,
 " The powerful incantations, magic verse,
 " Inscrib'd on every tree, alcove, or urn—
 " Spells!—Incantations! ah, my tuneful friend!
 " Thine are the numbers! thine the wond'rous
 " work!—
 " Yes, great magician! now I read thee right,
 " And lightly weigh all forcery, but thine.
 " No naiad's leading step conducts the rill;
 " Nor sylvan god presiding skirts the lawn
 " In beauteous wildness, with fair spreading trees:
 " Nor magic wand has circumscrib'd the scene,
 " 'Tis thine own taste, thy genius that presides,
 " Nor needs there other deity, nor needs
 " More potent spells than they."—No more the
 " swain,
 For lo, his Damon, o'er the tufted lawn
 Advancing, leads him to the social dome

THE POETICAL WORKS
OF CHRISTOPHER SMART.

Containing

ON THE DIVINE ATTRIBUTES,
NOP-GARDEN,
HILLIAD,
JUDGMENT OF MIDAS, ODES,

TABLES, SONGS,
EPIGRAMS,
IMITATIONS, TRANSLATIONS,

&c. &c. &c.

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

— I dare to raise the founding string,
The Poet of my God. —

ON THE IMMENSITY OF THE SUPREME BEING.

EDINBURGH:

PRINTED BY MUNDELL AND SON, ROYAL BANK CLOSE.

Anno 1795.

THE

POLITICAL WORKS

OF

CHRISTOPHER SMART.

By

W. G. ...
...
...
...
...

ON THE DIVINE ...
...
...
...
...

IN TWO VOLUMES.

To which is added,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

Printed by ...

...
...

...
...

EDINBURGH:

PRINTED BY ...

1777.

THE LIFE OF SMART.

CHRISTOPHER SMART was born at Shipbourne, in Kent, April 11. 1722. The family of which he was descended had been long established in the county of Durham. His grandfather married a Miss Gilpin, of the family of the celebrated Bernard Gilpin, Rector of Houghton-le-Spring, "the Apostle of the North." His father was steward of the estates in Kent; of Lord Barnard, afterwards Earl of Darlington, and was possessed of an estate of 300 l. a-year, in the neighbourhood of Shipbourne. Having been intended for holy orders, he had a better taste for literature than is commonly found in country gentlemen; a taste which he transmitted to his son.

In the beginning of his life he was of a very delicate constitution, having been born earlier than the natural period; and his body being too feeble to permit his indulging freely in childish amusements; his mind had leisure to exercise and expand its powers.

He discovered a very early taste for poetry; and proved when he was only four years old, by an extemporary effusion, that even then he had a relish for verse, and an ear for numbers.

He received the rudiments of his education at Maidstone school, from which he was removed when he was eleven years old; on the death of his father, which happened at that time, and sent by his mother to Durham, that he might have the advantages of a good school, change of air, to strengthen a weakly frame, and the notice and protection of his father's relations.

He did not continue without distinction at Durham school, the master of which, at that time, was the Rev. Mr. Dongworth, an Etonian, and a man of eminent learning and abilities. His addiction to metre was then such, that several of his school-fellows have confessed their obligations to him for their first successful essays in Latin versification.

The Ode to Ethelinda, was written at the age of thirteen; and the Latin translation of the ballad, when Fanny Blooming Fair, at sixteen.

As his father had been steward to Lord Barnard, he was very cordially received at Raby Castle, when absent, during the holidays, from school. In this noble family he was introduced to the acquaintance of the late Duchess of Cleveland, who discerned and patronized his talents. She allowed him forty pounds a-year, till her death. In the Ode to Lord Barnard, he alludes beautifully to his literary habits, and to the splendour of his connections at this early period of his life.

Can I forget fair Raby's towers,
How awful and how great!—
Where me, even me, an infant bard,
Cleveland and Hope indulgent heard, &c.

He was removed from Durham school to the university of Cambridge, when he was seventeen; being admitted of Pembroke Hall, Oct. 30. 1739.

Though the favourite studies of this seat of learning were not congenial with his mind, yet his classical attainments, and poetical powers were so eminent, as to attract the notice of persons, not very strongly prejudiced in favour of such accomplishments. Such was the fame of his genius, and such the vivacity of his disposition, that his company was very earnestly solicited; and to suppress or withhold our talents, when the display of them is repaid by admiration, is commonly too great an effort for human prudence.

While he was the pride of Cambridge, and the chief poetical ornament of that university, he ruined himself by returning the tavern-treats of strangers, who had invited him as a wit, and an extraordinary personage, in order to boast of his acquaintance.

This social spirit of retaliation quickly involved him in habits and expences, of which he felt the consequences during the rest of his life.

His allowance from home was scanty; for as his father had died suddenly, and in embarrassed circumstances, his mother had been compelled to sell the largest part of the family estate at considerable loss.

His chief dependence was the assistance he derived from his college, and from the Dukes of Cleveland's bounty. Many distinguished characters now living, were, notwithstanding of his intimate acquaintance; and it appears by the Latin invitation of his friend Mr. Saunders, of King's College, to supper, that he knew how to relish the "feast of reason."

At this early period of his life he was not more remarkable for his learning than his humour, of which many examples, like the following, are still remembered by his academical acquaintance. The three heads of the university being men of unusual bulk, he is said to have characterized them in this extemporary sponiad.

Pinguia tergeminarum abdomina bedellorum.

In 1740-1, he wrote his first Tripos Poem, Datur Mundorum Pluralitas, which was succeeded in the following years by Materies Gaudet et Inertia, and Musica Oscitationum Propagatio solvi potest Mechanice. These verses have more syletem and design than is generally found in the compositions of young academics; and it is some argument of their being well approved, that they were all thought worthy of a translation into English by Fawkes, the ingenious translator of "Theocritus," "Anacreon," "Bion," "Moschus," "Musæus," and "Apollonius Rhodius."

He was encouraged by the commendations of his friends to offer himself a candidate for an university scholarship. The yearly value of these appointments is barely 20 l.; but the election is open to the whole university, under the degree of Master of Arts; and as the electors are of approved learning, and fix their choice after the strictest scrutiny, the honour of obtaining a scholarship is considerable.

It has been said, that upon this occasion, he translated Pope's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day;" but the conjecture is rendered improbable by the length and labour of the composition. But that a scholar equal to such a work, in an impartial classical examination, should surpass his competitors, is no matter of surprise.

His extraordinary success in this ode, induced him to turn his mind to the translation of the "Essay on Man;" and he seems to have written to Pope for his approbation; who, in his answer, advises him to undertake the "Essay on Criticism."

"I would not," Pope writes him, "give you the trouble of translating the whole "Essay"; the two first epistles are already well done; and if you try, I could wish it were on the last, which is less abstracted, and more easily falls into poetry and common place. I believe the "Essay on Criticism" will, in general, be more agreeable, both to a young writer, and to the generality of readers. I ought to take this opportunity of acknowledging the Latin translation of my ode, which you sent me, and in which, I could see little or nothing to alter, it is so exact. Believe me equally desirous of doing you any service, and afraid of engaging you in an art so little profitable, though so well deserving, as good poetry."

It does not appear that he bestowed any farther notice on his translator, excepting that he received him once very civilly at his house at Twickenham; and Smart seems to have been induced by his suggestion, to undertake and finish the Latin Translation of the Essay on Criticism; with much praise from the learned, but without either profit or popularity.

In 1743, he was admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and was elected Fellow of Pembroke Hall, July 3. 1745; and took the degree of Master of Arts, 1747.

In 1747, he wrote a comedy, called A Trip to Cambridge; or, the Grateful Fair, which was acted by the students of the university, in Pembroke College Hall; the parlour of which made the green-room. Of this mock-play, no remains have yet been found, but a few of the songs, and the Soliloquy of the Princess Periwinkle, containing his well-known simile of the Collier, the Barber, and the Brickdust-man, preserved in the Old Woman's Magazine. The prologue is printed in the fourth volume of the "Poetical Calendar."

About this time, he wrote several Fables and Essays, for The Student, or, Oxford and Cambridge Miscellany, a periodical work of considerable reputation, in which many of the wits of both the universities displayed their talents. The papers were published in 2 vols, 8vo, 1748.

In 1750, he became candidate for Mr. Seaton's reward, arising from the rent of his Kildagbury estate, left by him to the University of Cambridge, to be annually adjudged by the Vice-Chancellor, the Master of Clare-Hall, and the Greek Professor for the time being, to the author, being a Master of Arts, of the best poem on "one or other of the attributes of the Supreme Being, till the subject is exhausted; and afterwards on death, judgment, heaven, hell, purity of heart, &c. or whatever else may be judged by them to be most conducive to the honour of the Supreme Being, and recommendation of virtue."

Mr. Seaton's will, dated Oct. 3. 1738, having been disputed by his relations, a law suit commenced between them and the university; which terminating in favour of the latter, the first subject given out was The Eternity of the Supreme Being, in which Smart had the preference; and for five years, four of which were in succession, the prize was disposed in his favour, for his poetical essays On the Eternity of the Supreme Being, 1750; On the Imminity of the Supreme Being, 1751; On the Omniscience of the Supreme Being, 1752; On the Power of the Supreme Being, 1753; On the Goodness of the Supreme Being, 1755. The value of the prize was then about 50l.

In these poems on the Divine Attributes, confessedly the most finished of his works, confidence in genius, and aversion to the labour of correction, sometimes prevailed over better considerations. The poem On the Divine Goodness, which was written in London, he so long delayed to undertake, that there was barely opportunity to write it upon paper, and to send it to Cambridge, by the most expeditious conveyance, within the time limited for receiving the compositions.

The decisions of the Cambridge judges were, almost in every instance, confirmed by the approbation of the periodical critics; they admired the vein of pious poetry, which ran through his prize poems; they were diffuse in the praise of his genius, though they freely censured his carelessness and inaccuracy; and they continued their approbation of his compositions, till fanaticism (always fatal to just thinking), distorted his ideas, and confined their applause to the talents of his better day.

While he was advancing his reputation as a poet, his extravagance involving him in debt with vintners, and college cooks, occasioned his fellowship to be sequestered, and obliged him to leave the university.

In 1757, he quitted college, and soon after relinquished his fellowship, on his marriage with Miss Anna Maria Carnan, the daughter by a former husband of Mary, the wife of the late Mr. John Newbery, "the philanthropic bookseller, in St. Paul's church-yard."

As he had relinquished his fellowship without engaging in any of the professions, he seems to have trusted for his future maintenance to his powers as an author. But he had either over-rated his own abilities and perseverance, or the favour of the public.

Though Mr. Newbery, to whom he was now allied, was himself a man of genius, and a liberal patron of genius in others, yet the difficulties that had perplexed him at Cambridge, pursued him to London; to which the expence of a family was superadded. Such was his thoughtlessness, that he has often invited company to dinner, where no means appeared of providing a meal for his family.

Subsisting in London as a writer for bread, his manner of life neither augmented his personal importance, nor that of his productions. Never nice in his person, in his taste, nor in his acquaintance; he lost his dignity, his time, and his peace of mind. The profits of the publications in which he engaged, were dissipated by a total neglect of economy. While the works of his more prudent contemporaries, Gray, and Mason, always polished at leisure, with critical care, and solicitude, were received as favours, and read with reverence; his compositions appeared good, bad, and indifferent, before the dread tribunal of the public, "with all their imperfections on their head."

He enjoyed, while thus engaged in the metropolis, the familiar acquaintance of Dr. Johnson, Dr. James, Dr. Hawkesworth, Goldsmith, and Garrick, and indeed of most who were then celebrated for genius, or for learning.

In 1754, he published a collection of Poems on Several Occasions, in one volume, 4to; which he dedicated to the Earl of Middlesex, "not as a writer, or a scholar," but as "a man of Kent." The Hop-Garden, and Judgment of Midas, first appeared in this collection.

Having received some provocation from Dr. Hill, afterwards Sir John Hill, in "The Inspector," and in a paper called "The Impertinent," he took a severe revenge in another "Dunciad," which he called after the name of his hero, The Hilliad. The First Book of this mock-epic, with notes variorum, was published in 1753, 4to; and was followed by an anonymous performance, called "The Smartiad, a satire occasioned by the Hilliad," folio, 1753.

In his quarrel with Dr. Hill, he could obtain no fame, though he greatly augmented the ridicule of that extraordinary personage; but time settles the disputes of authors and men of talents, in the most upright manner. Dr. Hill seems to have been insensible to the learning and genius of Smart; and Smart only saw Dr. Hill in the light of a quack, and a coxcomb: but posterity not only allows the originality, the invention, and the poetical talents of Smart, but also regards Dr. Hill as an able botanist; and though his nostrums and panaceas are now exploded, his voluminous works in natural history have advanced towards fame, with nearly as much rapidity as his empirical productions have descended towards oblivion.

To the Old Woman's Magazine, published about this time, Mr. Newbery and himself were the chief, if not the only contributors. He translated also for Mr. Newbery, The Works of Horace into English Prose, in 2 vols. 12mo. 1756; a task which he has very ably executed, but of that kind which will never be praised in proportion to the labour. By few and apposite terms, he has expressed the sentiments of Horace, in an idiom, not placed very near the Roman, in the table of grammatical affinities. Of an author not among the least difficult, he is at once an accurate, and an elegant translator. He shows the humblest attention to the language of the original, and an absolute command over his own.

In 1756, he entered into an engagement with Gardener the bookseller, to furnish papers monthly, in conjunction with Mr. Rolt, a town writer, for The Universal Visitor. Smart and his coadjutor were to divide one-third of the profits of the work; they, on their part, signing an agreement, "not to write for ninety-nine years to come in any other publication." Never, surely, did rapacious avarice dictate a more unreasonable bargain, or submissive poverty place itself in a more humiliating situation.

"I wrote for some months in The Visitor," says Dr. Johnson, as reported by Mr. Boswell, "for poor Smart, while he was mad; not then knowing the terms on which he was engaged to write, and thinking I was doing him good. I hoped his wits would soon return to him. Mine returned to me, and I wrote in The Visitor no longer."

All the essays in The Universal Visitor, marked with two asterisks, have been ascribed to Dr. Johnson; but Mr. Boswell is confident, from internal evidence, that of these, neither "The Life of Chaucer," "Reflections on the State of Portugal," nor an "Essay on Architecture," were written by him.

He was likewise engaged with Mr. Rolt, in a theatrical enterprise at the Hay-Market theatre, called Mother Midnight's Entertainment. This was first undertaken at the expence of Mr. Newbery, and was afterwards carried on with some degree of success.

In 1756, he published A Hymn to the Supreme Being, on Recovery from a dangerous Fit of Illness, which he dedicated to Dr. James. "If it be meritorious," says the dedication, "to have invented medicines for the cure of distempers, either overlooked or disregarded by all your predecessors, millions yet unborn will celebrate the man who wrote the "Medicinal Dictionary," and invented the "Fever Powder."

Though his fortune, as well as constitution, required the utmost care, he was equally negligent in the management of both; and his various and repeated embarrassments, acting upon an imagination uncommonly fervid, produced temporary alienations of mind; which at last were attended with paroxysms so violent and continued, as to render confinement necessary.

"My poor friend Smart," says Dr. Johnson, as reported by Mr. Boswell, "showed the disturbance of his mind, by falling upon his knees, and saying his prayers in the street, or in any other unusual place." Talking of his confinement to Dr. Burney, "it seems," he observed, "as if his mind had ceased to struggle with the disease; for he grows fat upon it." Upon Dr. Burney suggesting, "that, perhaps, it may be from want of exercise," he added, "he has partly as much exercise as he used to have; for he digs in the garden. Indeed, before his confinement, he used for exercise to walk to the ale-house; but he was carried back again. I did not think he ought to be shut up." His infirmities were not noxious to society. He insisted on people praying with him; and I'd as lief pray with Kit Smart as any one else. Another charge was, that he did not love clean linen; and I have no passion for it.

In this melancholy state, his family (for he had now two children), must have been much embarrassed in their circumstances, but for the kind friendship and assistance of Mr. Newbery.

Many other of his friends were likewise forward in their services; particularly Dr. Johnson and Sir John Huxley Delaval, Bart. the present Lord Delaval, to whom he was private tutor in college; and who showed him, upon various occasions, particular instances of his regard.

It was at the request of Sir John, that he wrote a Prologue and Epilogue to the Tragedy of Othello, acted at Drury-Lane, by several persons of quality, 1751; the parts of Iago and Othello being filled by Sir John, and his brother Sir Francis Blake-Delaval.

Mrs. Smart seems to have made an attempt at this period, to settle in Dublin, with a view to provide for her family, by engaging in business; probably without success. "I wish," Dr. Johnson writes her, "it was in my power to make Ireland please you better; and whatever is in my power, you may always command. I shall be glad to hear from you the history of your management, whether you have a house or a shop, and what companions you have found."

After an interval of little more than two years, he appeared to be pretty well restored; and was accordingly set at liberty; but his mind had received a shock, from which it never entirely recovered. He took a pleasant lodging in the neighbourhood of St. James's Park; conducting his affairs, for some time, with sufficient prudence. He was maintained partly by his literary compositions, and partly by the generosity of his friends, receiving, among other benefactions, fifty pounds a-year from the Treasury.

Of the state of his mind, and of his modes of life at this period, Dr. Hawkeſworth gives the following account, in a letter to Mrs. Hunter, one of his sisters.

"I have, since my being in town, called on my old friend, and seen him. He received me with an ardour of kindness natural to the sensibility of his temper; and all were soon seated together by his fire-side. I perceived upon his table a quarto book, in which he had been writing, a prayer-book, and a Horace. After the first compliments, I said I had been at Margate, had seen his mother and his sister, who expressed great kindness for him, and made me promise to come and see him. To this he made no reply; nor did he make any inquiry after those I mentioned. He did not even mention the place, nor ask me any question about it; or what carried me thither. After some pause, and some indifferent chat, I returned to the subject, and said, that Mr. Hunter and you would be very glad to see him in Kent." To this he replied very quick; "I cannot afford to be idle." I said he might employ his mind as well in the country as in town; at which he only shook his head; and I entirely changed the subject. Upon my asking him when we should see the Psalms, he said they were going to press immediately: as to his other undertakings, I found he had completed a translation of Pbedrus, in verse, for Dodſley, at a certain price; and that he is now busy in translating all Horace into verse; which he sometimes thinks of publishing on his own account, and sometimes of contracting for it with a bookseller. I advised him to the latter, and he then told me he was in treaty about it, and believed it would be a bargain. He told me, his principal motive for translating Horace into verse, was to supersede the prose translation, which he did for Newbery; which, he said, would hurt his memory. He intends, however, to review that translation, and print it at the foot of the page in his poetical version; which he proposes to print in quarto, with the Latin, both in verse and prose, on the opposite page. He told me he once had thoughts of publishing it by subscription; but as he had troubled his friends already, he was unwilling to do it again; and had been persuaded to publish it in numbers; which, though I rather dissuaded him, seemed at last to be the prevailing bent of his mind. He read me some of it: it is very clever; and his own poetical fire sparkles in it very frequently; yet, upon the whole, it will scarcely take place of Francis's;

and therefore, if it is not adopted as a school book, which, perhaps, may be the case, it will turn to little account. Upon mentioning his prose translation, I saw his countenance kindle; and, snatching up the book, "what," says he, "do you think I had for this?" I said I could not tell. "Why," says he with great indignation, "thirteen pounds." I expressed very great astonishment, which he seemed to think he should increase, by adding—"but I gave a receipt for a hundred." My astonishment was now over; and I found that he received only thirteen pounds, because the rest had been advanced for his family. This was a tender point; and I found means immediately to divert him from it. He is with very decent people, in a house most delightfully situated, with a terrace that overlooks St. James's Park, and a door into it. He was going to dine with an old friend of my own, Mr. Richard Dalton, who has an appointment in the King's Library; and if I had not been particularly engaged, I would have dined with him. He had lately received a very genteel letter from Dr. Lowth, and it is by no means considered in any light, that his company as a gentleman, a scholar, and a genius, is less desirable."

In 1759, Garrick made him an offer of a free benefit at Drury-Lane theatre, which his friends did not permit him to refuse. Upon this occasion, Garrick's farce of "The Guardian" was acted for the first time, in which he himself performed the principal character.

In 1763, he published A Song to David, written during his confinement; when he was denied the use of pen, ink, and paper, and was obliged to indent his lines with the end of a key upon the wainscot."

The same year he published two small quarto pamphlets, intitled, Poems, and Poems on Several Occasions; and, the year following, Hannab, an Oratorio, 4to; and an Ode to the Earl of Northumberland, on his being appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with some other pieces, 4to.

In 1765, he published A New version of the Psalms, 4to, and A Poetical Translation of the Fables of Phebus, 12mo, which were followed by The Parables, in familiar verse, 12mo. 1768.

In the course of a few years, his economy forsook him, and he was confined for debt in the King's-Bench prison; the rules of which he afterwards obtained, by the kindness of his brother-in-law, Mr. Thomas Carnan. He appears to have been in extreme distress, by a letter of his to the Rev. Mr. Jackson, not long before his death. "Being upon the recovery from a fit of illness, and having nothing to eat, I beg you to lend me two or three shillings, which (God willing) I will return, with many thanks, in two or three days."

At length, after suffering the accumulated miseries of poverty, disease, and insanity, he died of a disorder in his liver, May 21. 1771, in the 49th year of his age; leaving behind him two daughters, who, with his widow, are settled at Reading, in Berkshire; and by their prudent management of a business transferred to them by Mr. Newbery, are in good circumstances.

A select collection of his Poems, consisting of his Prize Poems, Odes, Sonnets, and Fables, Latin and English Translations, together with many original Compositions, not included in the Quarto Edition, to which is prefixed an Account of his Life, &c. was printed at Reading, by Smart and Cowslade, in 2 vols. 12mo, 1791. Besides the Poetical Translations, which he published in his life-time, and the Works of Horace in English Metre, which "he proposed to print in 4to.;" the pieces omitted in this edition of his works, are chiefly the Song to David, and some pieces in the two small 4to. pamphlets, which were written after his confinement, and bear, for the most part, melancholy proofs of the recent estrangement of his mind.

Among the pieces not included in the 4to. edition, or published separately, are, An Ode on a Young Lady's Birth-day; Imitation of Horace on taking a Bachelor's Degree; Ode on St. Cecilia's Day; Reason and Imagination, a Fable; New Version of the 148th Psalm; Ode to Lord Barnard; Ode to Lady Harriot; the Sweets of Evening; Ode to a Virginia Nightingale; Epigram from Martial; On a Lady throwing Snow Balls at her Lover, from Petronius Africanus; and Sixteen Fables, chiefly written for The Student, and the Old Woman's Magazine.

p. 119

It is not easy to account for the works of Smart not being included in the collection of the "Works of the English Poets," whose lives were written by Dr. Johnson, who had a friendship for him. Dr. Johnson, however, frequently declared, that the choice of poets, for whose works he had agreed to write biographical prefaces, was not his own; and yet, as he condescended to ask a place for Pomfret, Yalden, Blackmore, and Watts, poor Smart had an equal claim to his notice, from piety, and from genius; but, perhaps the copy-right of his scattered productions could not be easily settled. Even his best pieces, though admirable, have not often been honoured with a place in favourite Collections of Poets. He was too poor an author to bestow, and perhaps he had no ambition to share in the triumph of those who, for the most part, write pieces more for their own diversion, than for that of the public. His way of living, from hand to mouth, depending always on the product of his desultory pen, appropriated to no regular nor profitable purpose, and on the liberality of his friends, was not likely to procure for him that public respect from his contemporaries, which sweetens a man's life, however useless it may be to his works after his death.

The works of Smart, reprinted from the edition 1791, with some additions and corrections, are now received, for the first time, into a collection of classical English poetry. The Song to David is highly worthy of republication; and was recommended by the present writer to be inserted in this edition; but a copy could not be obtained for that purpose. The slight defects, and singularities of this neglected performance, are amply compensated, by a grandeur, a majesty of thought, and a happiness of expression, in several of the stanzas.

The character of this unfortunate poet, compounded like that of all human beings, of good qualities and of defects, may be easily collected from this account of his life. Of his domestic manners, and petty habits, a few peculiarities remain to be mentioned.

Though he was a very diligent student while he was at Cambridge, he was also extremely fond of exercise, and of walking in particular; at which times it was his custom to pursue his meditations. A fellow student remembers a path worn by his constant treading on the pavement, under the cloisters of his college. Like Milton and Gray, he had his moments propitious to invention; and has been frequently known to rise suddenly from his bed, that he might fix by writing those delightful ideas which floated before his fancy in the visions of the night.

His piety was exemplary, and fervent. In composing his religious poems, he was frequently so impressed with the sentiments of devotion, as to write particular passages on his knees.

He was friendly, affectionate, and liberal to excess; so as often to give that to others, of which he was in the utmost want himself. He was also particularly engaging in conversation, when his first shyness was worn away, which he had in common with literary men; but in a very remarkable degree. Having undertaken to introduce his wife to Lord Darlington, he had no sooner mentioned her name to his Lordship, than he retreated suddenly, as if stricken with a panic, from the room, and from the house, leaving her to follow overwhelmed with confusion.

During the far greater part of his life, he was wholly inattentive to economy; and by this negligence lost his fortune, and then his credit. The civilities shown him by persons greatly his superiors in rank and character, either induced him to expect mines of wealth from the exertion of his talents, or encouraged him to think himself exempted from attention to common obligations.

But his chief fault, from which most of his other faults proceeded, was his deviations from the rules of sobriety; of which the early use of cordials, in the infirm state of his childhood and his youth, might, perhaps, be one cause, and is the only extenuation.

As a poet, his genius has never been questioned by those who censured his carelessness, and commiserated the unhappy vacillation of his mind. He is sometimes not only greatly irregular, but irregularly great. His errors are those of a bold and daring spirit, which bravely hazards what a vulgar mind could never suggest. Shakespeare and Milton are sometimes wild and irregular; and it seems as if originality alone could try experiments. Accuracy is timid, and seeks for authority. Fowls of feeble wing seldom quit the ground, though at full liberty; while the eagle, unrestrained, soars into unknown regions.

He is a various, an original, but unequal writer. Every species of poetry, not even excepting the epic, has been attempted by him, and most of them with eminent success.

His sine poems on the Divine Attributes, are written with the sublimest energies of religion, and the true enthusiasm of poetry; and if he had written nothing else, these compositions alone would have given him a very distinguished rank among the writers of verse. Their faults, though numerous, are amply compensated by their beauties. Some of their defects may be fairly ascribed to redundancy of genius, and impatience of labour; others to fanaticism, generated, perhaps, by the grandeur of the subject; on which he strained his faculties, in trying to penetrate "beyond the reach of human ken," but he never could mount "to the height of his great argument." Dr. Johnson, in speaking of sacred poetry, in his life of Waller, has admirably said, that "whatever is great, desirable, or tremendous, is comprised in the name of the Supreme Being. Omnipotence cannot be exalted; infinity cannot be amplified; perfection cannot be improved." Upon the whole, however, his prize poems are more accurate than the generality of his performances; which may be attributed to the deference he might feel from those persons who were to adjudge the prizes which he obtained.

Of his Odes, it may be said, in general, that they are spirited and poetical. It will be difficult to find any other quality equally applicable to compositions very different from each other; and in many of which opposite characters occasionally predominate. He has followed the example of Horace, rather than that of the Grecian models; and of him he is, for the most part, a judicious imitator. Some of the shorter pieces are beautiful, and nearly perfect; but instances of an improper allusion of the grave and the ludicrous, sometimes occur; and he debases, by an impure admixture, what otherwise would have been gold of the standard value. The Ode to Idleness, possesses the elegance of Sappho; and that to Ethelinda, the sprightliness of Anacreon. The Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, inferior only to the great model by Dryden, is dignified throughout, and breathes the true spirit of poetry. The Hymn to the Supreme Being, on Recovery from Sickness, is pious, animated, and pathetic. The Ode on Good-Nature is full of elegance, and that on Ill-Nature full of force. The Morning Piece is uniformly beautiful; the description of Labour is eminently happy;

Strong Labour got up—with his pipe in his mouth,
He stoutly strode over the dale, &c.

The lines were misprinted in the 4to edition.

Strong Labour got up with his pipe in his mouth,
And stoutly, &c.

The correction was advertised immediately after the publication of the first edition; but the blunder has been retained in the edition 1791. The poet did not mean to insinuate, that Labour had slept with his pipe in his mouth, which must have been the case, if he got up with it in that situation. In the Night-Piece, the images of Night, and her attendants, Stillness and Silence, are highly painted. The Noon-Piece is beautifully descriptive. The imitation of Horace, On taking a Bachelor's Degree, is spirited and pleasant. The Ode on the Birth-Day of a Beautiful Young Lady, is highly poetical: its chief blemish is the too frequent and affected use of alliteration. It was written on Miss Harriot Pratt of Durham, in Norfolk, a lady for whom Smart had entertained a long and unsuccessful passion; who was the subject also of the crambo ballad, and other verses among his poems. Of the rest, the odes On an Eagle confined in a Cage; To Lord Bernard; To Lady Harriot; To the Earl of Northumberland; To a Virginia Nightingale; The Sweets of Evening; New-Version of the CXLVIIIth Psalm, deserve particular commendation.

On the Hop-Garden much commendation cannot justly be conferred; and the praise which is withheld from the poetry, will not be very cheerfully lavished on the instructions. But the roughness and the want of dignity in the blank verse, and the want of previous information on the art of which he treats, are to be ascribed, not to want of genius, but to want of diligence and care; for he never had patience nor application sufficient to bring a long work to any degree of perfection. There are, however, a great many truly poetical strokes in this Georgic, and whole pages that abound with beauty.

His mock heroic poem, the Hilliad, may afford entertainment to those who care little about the hero of the poem, or the subject of the quarrel. Compositions of this class, as they gratify malignity, are usually read with avidity on their first appearance; but, without uncommon merit, they quickly sink into oblivion. The spirit and loftiness of some of the lines, the happy imitations of the "Dunciad," and the wit and humour of the notes, deserve great praise; but the abuse is coarse, and the scurrility is a disgrace to the republic of letters.

His Judgment of Midas, a masque, or dramatic pastoral, is a classical and elegant performance. It is executed throughout in a masterly manner. It has none of those glaring inaccuracies which disgrace some of his other pieces. The description of Midas following Pan, is full of poetry, as well as spirit. The address of Timolus to the inanimate things about him, on the approach of the gods, has great dignity and propriety, as well as beauty. The first stanza of the song to Pan has great softness and great elegance. But dramatic pastorals, even if the generally interesting topic of love be superadded, will not greatly entertain without their proper embellishments, acting and music.

His Fables rank with the most agreeable metrical compositions of that kind in our language. His versification is less polished, and his apologies, in general, are perhaps less correct than those of Gay or Moore; but in originality, in wit, and in humour, the preference seems due to Smart. They unite the grace and ease of Prior with the humour of Swift; and to these is superadded a very considerable portion of poetical spirit. The introductory lines of almost all the fables are singularly ingenious and happy; and in the course of each, the second line of most couplets generally presents us with an independent new idea. The best and most serious of these playful compositions is, doubtless, Care and Generosity. It is one of the most beautiful allegories that has ever been imagined. The Bag-Wig and the Tobacco Pipe, Madam and the Magpie, Reason and Imagination, The Herald and the Husbandman, deserve particular commendation. The Citizen and the Red Lion of Brerlyford, may be thought to transcend the limits of mythological probability; but a dialogue between a man and a painted board, may be forgiven for its humour. The Brocaded Gown and Linen Rag, contains liberal praises of his poetical contemporaries, Akenfide, Collins, Gray, and Mason. The Pig is a very exact and beautiful translation of the same story in Phædrus. If in any instances the modern is surpassed by the most charming fabulist of antiquity, for which, perhaps, the Roman is not a little indebted to the superior force and conciseness of the language in which he wrote, in others the original is undoubtedly rivalled, if not excelled, and obtains at last a doubtful victory.

His Ballads, and Epigrams, &c. like his other productions, bear the stamp of originality, of wit, and of pleasantry. The Force of Innocence is more serious, and is an elegant application of the Integer Vita of Horace, to female virtue. Sweet William, The Lass with the Golden Locks, The Decision, Lovely Harriot, a crambo ballad, Jenny Gray, are generally known and admired. The epigrams of The Physician and the Monkey, Apollo and Daphne, are sprightly and elegant, and the imitations of Martial and Petronius Africanus have considerable merit. In the Horatian Canons of Friendship, the sentiments of Horace, Lib. I. Sat. 3. are successfully accommodated to recent facts and familiar images.

Though Smart, if placed like his friend Garrick in the picture, between Tragedy and Comedy, would more incline to the laughter-loving dame than the goddess of tears; some of his serious pieces, besides those on religious subjects, manifest and excite feeling in an eminent degree. The little poem On the Death of Mr. Newbery, after a lingering illness, must touch every reader of sensibility. In the Epitaph on the Rev. Mr. Reynolds, at St. Peter's, in the Isle of Thanet, the thoughts and the words in which they are clothed seem to breathe the true spirit of poetical pathos.

In the first rank of the elegant writers of Latin, among our English poets, Jonson, May, Crashaw, Cowley, Milton, Marvell, Addison, Gray, Warton, &c. Smart stands very high. His translation of Pope's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, is at once elegant and appropriate. He equals his original in the sublimest passages, except only the third stanza; and to the ballad and epigrammatic stanzas gives dignity and grace. The vulgar lines which describe the power of Styx over the enthralled Eurydice, and the superior power of music and of love, are translated with truth and beauty. It has been objected, and with some reason, to Smart's translation, that it exhibits a variety of metres unauthorised by any single example among the Latin poets. But had he, too timid to pursue the rapid flights and wild genius of his original, confined himself to the regular recurrence of the Roman stanza, his imitation would not have been exact, and probably would not have been interesting. The opinion of the public has fully justified the choice of Smart.

In his version of Pope's Essay on Criticism, he is a very diligent imitator of the epistolary style of Horace; and we shall find him carefully following the footsteps of his master, where we might otherwise have been disposed to suspect the purity of his language. To the labours of Smart those persons chiefly are indebted, who, being unacquainted with the English tongue, wish to see Pope's just rules of taste, embellished indeed with his powers of poetry, though appearing with less gloss and lustre through the medium of translation. In the famous lines intended as an echo to the sense, he has laboured through a very painful task, with considerable dexterity; and in the beautiful picture of the reign of Leo, of Vida, and of the Arts, no foreigner need regret that he is unacquainted with Pope.

His version of Milton's L. Allegro, exhibits the exquisite poetry and brilliant imagery of one of the first descriptive poems in the English language, in appropriate diction, and legitimate verse. The title of the poem, perhaps, might have been more happily expressed in Greek, than by Ὁ Παιγνιαδὸς.

His translation of Fanny Blooming Fair, is a professed imitation of the manner of Vincent Bourne, and is not without a considerable portion of the perspicuity of contexture, facility, fluency, delicacy, simplicity, and elegance, which characterise the compositions of that amiable and ingenious poet; but it is inferior to his admirable version of Mallet's "William and Margaret."

His Trifles-poems may be justly considered as legitimate classical compositions. They are the production of a mind deeply tinged with the excellencies of ancient literature, and attentive both to the substantial parts, and to the decorations of poetry. In boldness of invention, felicity of description, and strength and elegance of diction, they are not surpassed by the hexametric poetry of Milton and Gray. The Temple of Dulness, in particular, exhibits such beauties of personification, as only the richest and most vivid imagination could supply. His personifications of Stupid, Sophistic, Matheftis, Microphile, and Atteia, abound with the most poetical imagery, delivered in language that will abide the test of criticism.

THE WORKS OF SMART.

O D E S.

ODE I.

IDLENESS.

GODDESS of ease, leave Lethe's brink,
 Obsequious to the muse and me;
 For once endure the pain to think,
 Oh! sweet insensibility!

Sister of peace and indolence,
 Bring, muse, bring numbers soft and slow,
 Elaborately void of sense,
 And sweetly thoughtless let them flow.

Near some cowslip-painted mead,
 There let me doze out the dull hours,
 And under me let Flora spread,
 A sofa of her softest flow'rs.

Where, Philomel, your notes you breathe
 Forth from behind the neighbouring pine,
 And murmurs of the stream beneath
 Still flow in unison with thine.

For thee, O Idleness, the woes
 Of life we patiently endure,
 Thou art the source whence labour flows,
 We shun thee but to make thee sure.

For who'd sustain war's toil and waste,
 Or who th' hoarse thund'ring of the sea,
 But to be idle at the last,
 And find a pleasing end in thee.

ODE II.

TO ETHELINDA.

On her doing my Verses the honour of swearing them in her bosom—Written at thirteen.

HAPPY verses that were prest
 In fair Ethelinda's breast!
 Happy muse, that didst embrace
 The sweet, the heavenly-fragrant place,
 Tell me, is the omen true,
 Shall the bard arrive there too?

Oft through my eyes my soul has flown,
 And wanton'd on that iv'ry throne:
 There with ecstatic transport burn'd,
 And thought it was heav'n return'd,
 Tell me is the omen true,
 Shall the body follow too?

When first at nature's early birth,
 Heav'n sent a man upon the earth,
 Ev'n Eden was more fruitful found,
 When Adam came to till the ground:
 Shall then those breasts be fair in vain,
 And only rise to fall again?

No, no, fair nymph—for no such end
 Did Heav'n to thee its bounty lend;
 That breast was ne'er design'd by fate,
 For verse, or things inanimate,
 Then throw them from that downy bed,
 And take the poet in their stead.

ODE III.

On an Eagle confined in a College Courts

IMPERIAL bird, who want to soar
 High o'er the rolling cloud,
 Where Hyperborean mountains hoar
 Their heads in ether shroud;—
 Thou servant of almighty Jove,
 Who, free and swift as thought, could'st rove
 To the bleak north's extremest goal;—
 Thou, who magnanimous could'st bear
 The sovereign thund'rer's arms in air,
 And shake thy native pole!—

Oh cruel fate! what barbarous hand,
 What more than Gothic ire,
 At some fierce tyrant's dread command,
 To check thy daring fire
 Has plac'd thee in this servile cell,
 Where discipline and dulness dwell,
 Where genius ne'er was seen to roam;
 Where ev'ry selfish soul's at rest,
 Nor ever quits the carnal breast,
 But lurks and sneaks at home!

Though dim'd thine eye, and clipt thy wing
 So grov'ling! once so great!
 The grief-inspired muse shall sing
 In tend'rest lays thy fate.
 What time by thee scholastic pride
 Takes his precise pedantic stride,
 Nor on thy mis'ry eaks a care,
 The stream of love ne'er from his heart
 Flows out, to act fair pity's part;
 But sinks, and stagnates there.

Yet useful still, hold to the throng—
 Hold the reflecting glass,—
 That not untutor'd at thy wrong
 The passenger may pass!
 Thou type of wit and sense confin'd,
 Cramp'd by the oppressors of the mind,
 —Who study downward on the ground;
 Type of the fall of Greece and Rome;
 While more than mathematic gloom,
 Envelopes all around.

ODE IV.

On the sudden Death of a Clergyman.

If, like th' Orphean lyre, my song could charm,
 And light to life the ashes in the urn,
 Fate of his iron dart I would disarm,
 Sudden as thy decease should'st thou return,
 Recall'd with mandates of despotic sounds,
 And arbitrary grief that will not hear of bounds.
 But, ah! such wishes, artless muse, forbear;
 'Tis impotence of frantic love,
 Th' enthusiastic flight of wild despair,
 To hope the Thracian's magic power to prove.
 Alas! thy slender vein,
 Nor mighty is to move, nor forgetive to feign,
 Impatient of a rein,
 Thou canst not in due bounds the straggling measures keep,
 —But thou alas! canst weep—
 Thou canst—and o'er the melancholy bier
 Canst lend the sad solemnity a tear.
 Hail! to that wretched corpse; untenanted and cold,
 And hail the peaceful shade, loos'd from its irksome hold.

Now let me say thou'rt free,
 For sure thou paid'st an heavy tax for life,
 While combating for thee,
 Nature and mortality
 Maintain a daily strife.
 High on a slender thread thy vital lamp was plac'd,
 Upon the mountain's bleakest brow,
 To give a noble light superior was it rais'd,
 But more expos'd by eminence it blaz'd;
 For not a whistling wind that blew,
 Nor the drop descending dew,
 But half extinguish'd its fair flame—but now
 See—hear the storm's tempestuous sweep—
 Precipitate it falls—it falls—falls lifeless in the deep.
 Cease, cease, ye weeping youth,
 Sincerity's soft sighs, and all the tears of truth.
 And you, his kindred throng forbear
 Marble memorials to prepare,
 And sculptur'd in your breasts his busto wear.
 'Twas thus when Israel's legislator dy'd,
 No fragile mortal honours were supply'd,
 But even a grave denied.
 Better than what the pencil's daub can give,
 Better than all that Phidias ever wrought,
 Is this—that what he taught shall live,
 And what he liv'd for ever shall be taught.

ODE V.

GOOD-NATURE.

HAIL cherub of the highest heav'n,
 Of look divine, and temper ev'n,

Celestial sweetness, exquisite of mein,
 Of ev'ry virtue, ev'ry praise the queen!

Soft gratefulness, and blooming youth,
 Where, grafted on the stem of truth,
 That friendship reigns, no interest can divide,
 —And great humility looks down on pride.

Oh! curse on slander's vip'rous tongue,
 That daily dares thy merit wrong;
 Idiots usurp thy title, and thy frame,
 Without or virtue, talent, taste, or name.

Is apathy, is heart of steel,
 Nor ear to hear, nor sense to feel,
 Life idly inoffensive such a grace,
 That it should steal thy name and take thy place?

No—thou art active—spirit all—
 Swifter than lightning, at the call
 Of injur'd innocence, or griev'd desert,
 And large with liberality thy heart.

Thy appetites in easy tides
 (As reason's luminary guides)
 Soft flow—no wind can work them to a storm,
 Correctly quick, dispassionately warm.

Yet if a transport thou canst feel
 'Tis only for thy neighbours weal;
 Great, generous acts thy ductile passions move,
 And smilingly thou weep'st with joy and love.

Mild is thy mind to cover shame,
 Averse to envy, slow to blame,
 Burling to praise, yet still sincere and free
 From flattery's fawning tongue, and bending knee.

Extensive, as from west to east,
 Thy love descends from man to beast,
 Nought is excluded little, or infirm,
 Thou canst with greatness stoop to save a worm.

Come, goddess, come with all thy charms
 For oh! I love thee; to my arms—
 All, all my actions guide, my fancy feed,
 So shall existence then be life indeed.

ODE VI.

ON ILL-NATURE.

OFFSPRING of folly and of pride,
 To all that's odious, all that's base allied;
 Nurs'd up by vice, by pravity mistled,
 By pedant affectation taught and bred:
 Away, thou hideous hell-horn fright,
 Go, with thy looks of dark design,
 Sullen, sour, and saturnine;
 Fly to some gloomy shade, nor blot the goodly light.
 Thy planet was remote, when I was born;
 'Twas Mercury that rul'd my natal morn,
 What time the sun exerts his genial ray,
 And ripens for enjoyment every growing day,
 When to exist is but to love and sing,
 And sprightly Aries smiles upon the spring.

There in yon lonesome heath,
 Which Flora, or Sylvanus never knew,
 Where never vegetable drank the dew,
 Or beast, or fowl attempts to breathe;
 Where nature's pencil has no colours laid;
 But all is blank, and universal shade;
 Contrast to figure, motion, life and light,
 There may'st thou vent thy spite,
 For ever cursing, and for ever curs'd,
 Of all th' infernal crew the worst;
 The worst in genius, measure and degree;
 For envy, hatred, malice, are but parts of thee.

Or would'st thou change the scene, and quit the den,
 Where spleen, by vapours dense begot and bred,
 Hardness of heart, and heaviness of head,
 Have rais'd their darksome walls, and plac'd their thorny bed;
 There may'st thou all thy bitterness unload,
 There may'st thou croak in conceit with the toad,
 With thee the hollow howling winds shall join,
 Nor shall the bittern her base throat deny,
 The querulous frogs shall mix their dirge with thine,
 Th' ear-piercing horn, the plover screaming high,
 Millions of humming gnats fit æstrum shall supply.

Away—away—behold an hideous band
 An herd of all thy minions are at hand,
 Suspicion first with jealous caution stalks,
 And ever looks around her as she walks,
 With bibulous ear imperfect sounds to catch,
 And proud to listen at her neighbours latch.
 Next scandal's meagre shade,
 Foe to the virgins, and the poet's fame,
 A wither'd time-deflower'd old maid,
 That ne'er enjoy'd love's ever sacred flame;
 Hypocrisy succeeds with saint-like look,
 And elevates her hands and plods upon her book.

Next comes illiberal scrambling avarice,
 Then vanity and affectation nice—
 See, she salutes her shadow with a bow
 As in short Gallic trips she minces by,
 Starting antipathy is in her eye,
 And squeamishly she knits her scornful brow.
 To thee, ill-nature, all the numerous group
 With lowly reverence stoop—
 They wait thy call, and mourn thy long delay,
 Away—thou art infectious—haste away.

ODE VII.

TO THE REV. AND LEARNED DR. WEBSTER,
 Occasioned by his Dialogues on Anger and Forgiveness.

'Twas when th' omniscient creative pow'r
 Display'd his wonders by a mortal's hand,
 And, delegated at th' appointed hour,
 Great Moses led away his chosen band;
 When Israel's host, with all their stores,
 Past through the ruby tinctur'd crystal shores,
 The wilderness of waters and of land.
 Then persecution rag'd in heav'n's own cause,
 Strict justice for the breach of nature's law's,
 Vol. XI.

The legislator held the scythe of fate,
 Where'er his legions chanc'd to stray,
 Death and destruction mark'd their bloody way;
 Immoderate was their rage, for mortal was their hate.
 But when the King of Righteousness arose,
 And on the illumin'd east serenely smil'd,
 He shone with meekest mercy on his foes,
 Bright as the sun, but as the moon-beams mild;
 From anger, fell revenge, and discord free,
 He had war's hellish clangor cease,
 In pastoral simplicity and peace,
 And show'd to man that face, which Moses could not see.

Well hast thou Webster, pictur'd Christian love,
 And copied our great Master's fair design,
 But livid envy would the light remove,
 Or crowd thy portrait in a nook malign—
 The muse shall hold it up to popular view—
 Where the more candid and judicious few
 Shall think the bright original they see,
 The likeness nobly lost in the identity.

Oh hadst thou liv'd in better days than these
 E'er to excel by all was deem'd a shame!
 Alas! thou hast no modern arts to please,
 And to deserve is all thy empty claim.
 Else thou'dst been plac'd, by learning, and by wit,
 There, where thy dignify'd inferiors sit—
 Oh they are in their generations wise,
 Each path of interest they have sagely trod,—
 To live—to thrive—to rise—and still to rise—
 Better to bow to men, than kneel to God.

Behold where poor unmanly merit stands,
 All cold and cramp'd with pentury and pain;
 Speechless through want, she rears th' imploring hands,
 And begs a little bread, but begs in vain;
 While bribery and dullness, passing by,
 Bid her, in sounds barbarian, starve and die.
 " Away (they cry) we never saw thy name
 " Or in preferment's list, or that of fame;
 " Away—not here the fate thou earn'st bewail,
 " Who can'st not buy a vote, nor hast a soul for
 " sale."

Oh indignation, wherefore wert thou given,
 If drowsy patience deaden all thy rage?—
 Yet we must bear—such is the will of Heaven;
 And, Webster, so prescribes thy candid page.
 Then let us hear thee preach seraphic love,
 Guide our disgusted thoughts to things above;
 So our free souls, fed with divine repast,
 (Unmindful of low morals mean employ)
 Shall taste the present, recollect the past,
 And strongly hope for every future joy.

ODE VIII.

EPITHALMIUM.

DESCEND, descend, ye sweet Aonian maids,
 Leave the Parnassian shades,
 The joyful Hymeneal ring,
 And to a lovelier fair
 Than fiction can devise, or eloquence declare,
 Your vocal tributes bring.

And you, ye winged choristers, that fly
 In all the pensile gardens of the sky,
 Chant through the enamell'd grove,
 Stretch from the trembling leaves your little throats,
 With all the wild variety of artless notes,
 But let each note be love.
 Fragrant Flora, queen of May,
 All bedight with garlands gay,
 Where in the smooth-shaven green
 The spangled cowslips variegate the scene,
 And the rivulet between,
 Whispers, murmurs, sings,
 As it floops, or falls, or springs;
 There spread a sofa of thy softest flowers,
 There let the bridegroom stay,
 There let him hate the light and curse the day,
 And blame the tardy hours.

But see the bride she comes with silent pace,
 Full of majesty and love;
 Not with a nobler grace
 Look'd the imperial wife of Jove,
 When erst ineffably she shone
 In Venus' irresistible, enchanting zone.
 Phœbus, great god of verse, the nymph observe,

Observe her well;
 Then touch each sweetly trem'ulous nerve
 Of thy resounding shell:
 Her like huntress-Dian paint,
 Modest, but without restraint;
 From Pallas take her decent pace,
 With Venus sweeten all her face,
 From the zephyrs steal her sighs,
 From thyself her sun-bright eyes;
 Then baffled thou shalt see,
 That as did Daphne thee,
 Her charms description's force shall fly,
 And by no soft persuasive sounds be brib'd
 To come within invention's narrow eye;
 But all indignant shun its grasp, and scorn to be describ'd.

Now see the bridegroom rise,
 Oh, how impatient are his joys!
 Bring zephyrs to depaint his voice,
 Bring lightning for his eyes.
 He leaps, he springs, he flies into her arms,
 With joy intense
 Feeds ev'ry sense,
 And sultanates o'er all her charms.
 Oh! had I Virgil's comprehensive strain,
 Or sung like Pope, without a word in vain,
 Then should I hope my numbers might contain,
 Engaging nymph, thy boundless happiness,
 How arduous to express!
 Such may it last to all eternity:
 And may thy lord with thee,
 Like two coeval pines in Ida's grove,
 That interweave their verdant arms in love,
 Each mutual office cheerfully perform,
 And share alike the sunshine and the storm;
 And ever, as you flourish hand in hand,
 Both shade the shepherd and adorn the land,
 Together with each growing year arise,
 Indissolubly link'd, and climb at last the skies.

ODE IX.

The Author apologizes to a Lady, for his being a little Man.

"Natura nusquam magis, quam in minimis tota est." PLIN.

Ολιγον τε φιλον τε. HOM.

YES, contumelious fair, you scorn
 The amorous dwarf that courts you to his arms,
 But ere you leave him quite forlorn,
 And to some youth gigantic yield your charms,
 Hear him—oh hear him! if you will not try,
 And let your judgment check th' ambition of your eye.

Say, is it carnage makes the man?
 Is to be monstrous really to be great?
 Say, is it wise or just to scan
 Your lover's worth by quantity, or weight?
 Ask your mamma and nurse, if it be so;
 Nurse and mamma, I ween, shall jointly answer, no.

The lest the body to the view;
 The soul (like springs in closer durance pent)
 Is all exertion, ever new,
 Unceasing, unextinguish'd, and unspent;
 Still pouring forth executive desire,
 As bright, as brisk, and lasting, as the vestal fire.

Does thy young bosom pant for fame?
 Would'st thou be of posterity the toast?
 The poets shall ensure thy name,
 Who magnitude of mind not body boast.
 Laurels on bulky bards as rarely grow;
 As on the sturdy oak the virtuous mistletoe.

Look in the glass, survey that cheek—
 Where Flora has with all her roses blush'd;
 The shape so tender—looks so meek—
 The breasts made to be press'd, not to be crush'd;
 Then turn to me—turn with obliging eyes,
 Nor longer nature's works, in miniature, despise.

Young Ammon did the world subdue,
 Yet had not more external man than I;
 Ah, charmer! should I conquer you,
 With him in fame, as well as size, I'll vie.
 Then scornful nymph, come forth to yonder grove,
 Where I defy and challenge, all thy utmost love.

ODE X.

On the 26th of January, being the Birth-Day of a Young Lady.

ALL hail, and welcome joyous morn,
 Welcome to the infant year;
 Whether smooth calms thy face adorn,
 Or low'ring clouds appear;
 Though billows lash the sounding shore,
 And tempests through the forests roar,
 Sweet Nancy's voice shall sooth the sound;
 Though darkness should invest the skies;
 New day shall beam from Nancy's eyes,
 And bless all nature round.

Let but those lips their sweets disclose,
 And rich perfumes exhale,
 We shall not want the fragrant rose
 Nor miss the southern gale.
 Then loosely to the winds unfold
 Those radiant locks of burnish'd gold,

Or on thy bosom let them rove;
His treasure-house there Cupid keeps,
And hoards up, in two snowy heaps,
His stores of choicest love.

This day each warmest wish be paid
To thee the muse's pride;
I long to see the blooming maid
Chang'd to the blushing bride.
So shall thy pleasure and thy praise
Increase with the increasing days,
And present joys exceed the past;
To give and to receive delight,
Shall be thy task both day and night,
While day and night shall last.

ODE XI.

ON TAKING A BACHELOR'S DEGREE.

In Allusion to Horace. Book III. Ode 30.

Exegi monumentum æra perennius, &c.

'Tis done:—I tow'r to that degree,
And catch such heav'nly fire,
That Horace ne'er could rant like me,
Nor is (a) King's Chapel higher.
My name in sure recording page
(b) Shall time itself o'erpow'r,
If no rude mice with envious rage
The buttry books devour.
A * title too with added grace
My name shall now attend,
(c) Till to the church with silent pace
A nymph and priest ascend.
Ev'n in the schools I now rejoice,
Where late I shook with fear,
Nor heed the (d) moderator's voice
Loud thund'ring in my ear.
Then with (e) Æolian flute I blow
A soft Italian lay,
Or where (f) Cam's scanty waters flow,
Releas'd from lectures, stray.
Meanwhile, friend † Banks, my merits claim
Their just reward from you,
For Horace bids us (g) challenge fame,
When once that fame's our due.
Invest me with a graduate's gown,
'Midst shouts of all beholders,
(b) My head with ample square cap crown,
And deck with hood my shoulders.

Cambridge.

B. A.

(a) Regali situ pyramidum altius.—

(b) Quod non innumerabilis

Annorum series, &c.

(c) —Dum Capitolium

Scandet cum tacitè virgine pontifex!

(d) — Quà violens

Obstrepat Ausidus.—

(e) — Æolium carmen ad Italos

Deduxisse modos.

(f) — Qua pauper aquæ Daunus, &c.

(g) — Sume superbiam

Quæsitam meritis.—

(b) — Mihi Delphicâ

Lauro cinge volens.—comam.

* Bachelor.

† A celebrated Taylor.

ODE XII.

A MORNING PIECE;

OR, AN HYMN FOR THE HAY-MAKERS.

"Quintiam Gallum noctem explaudentibus alis
"Aurorum clarâ consuetum voce vocare."

LUCRET.

BRISK Chaunticleer his mattins had begun,
And broke the silence of the night,
And thrice he call'd aloud the tardy sun,
And thrice he hail'd the dawn's ambiguous
light;
Back to their graves the fear-begotten phantoms
Strong labour got up with his pipe in his mouth,
And stoutly strode over the dale;
He lent new perfumes to the breath of the south;
On his back hung his wallet and flail,
Behind him came health from her cottage of thatch,
Where never physician had lifted the latch.
First of the village Colin was awake,
And thus he sung reclining on his rake.
Now the rural graces three
Dance beneath yon maple tree;
First the vestal virtue, known
By her adamantinè zone;
Next to her in rosy pride,
Sweet society the bride;
Last honesty, full seemly drest
In her cleanly home-spun vest.
The abbey bells in wak'ning rounds
Thé warning peal have giv'n;
And pious gratitude resounds
Her morning hymn to Heav'n.
All nature wakes—the birds unlock their throats,
And mock the shepherd's rustic notes.
All alive o'er the lawn,
Full glad of the dawn,
The little lamkins play,
Sylvia and Sol arise—and all is day—
Come, my mates, let us work,
And all hands to the fork,
While the sun shines our hay-cocks to make;
So fine is the day,
And so fragrant the hay,
That the meadow's as blithe as the wake;
Our voices let's raise
In Phœbus's praise,
Inspir'd by so glorious a theme,
Our musical words
Shall be join'd by the birds,
And we'll dance to the tune of the stream.

ODE XIII.

A NOON-PIECE;

OR, THE MOWERS AT DINNER.

"Jam pastor umbras cum grege languido,

"Rivumque fessus quærit, et horridi

"Dumeta Sylvani, caretque

"Ripa vagis taciturna ventis."

HOR.

The sun is now radiant to behold,
And vehement he sheds his liquid rays of gold;
No cloud appears through all the wide expanse;
And short, but yet distinct and clear,

To the wanton whistling air
 The mimic shadows dance.
 Fat mirth and gallantry the gay,
 And romping ecstacy 'gin play.
 Now myriads of young Cupids rise,
 And open all their joy-bright eyes,
 Filling with infant prate the grove,
 And slip in sweetly fault'ring love.
 In the middle of the ring,
 Mad with May, and wild of wing,
 Fire-ey'd wantonnefs shall sing.
 By the rivulet on the rushes,
 Beneath a canopy of bushes,
 Where the ever-faithful Tray
 Guards the dumplings and the whey,
 Colin Clout and Yorkshire Will,
 From the leathern bottle swill.
 Their scythes upon the adverse bank
 Glitter 'mongst th' entangled trees,
 Where the hazles form a rank,
 And curtsy to the courting breeze.
 Ah Harriot! sovereign mistress of my heart,
 Could I thee to these meads decoy,
 New grace to each fair object should impart,
 And heighten ev'ry scene to perfect joy.
 On a bank of fragrant thyme,
 Beneath yon stately shadowy pine,
 We'll with the well-disguised hook
 Cheat the tenants of the brook;
 Or where my Daphne's thickest shade
 Drives amorous Phœbus from the glade,
 There read Sydney's high-wrought stories
 Of ladies charms and heroes glories;
 'Thence fir'd, the sweet narration act,
 And kiss the fiction into fact.

Or satiate with nature's random scenes,
 Let's to the garden's regulated greens,
 Where taste and elegance command
 Art to lend her dædal hand,
 Where Flora's flock, by nature wild,
 To discipline are reconcil'd,
 And laws and order cultivate,
 Quite civiliz'd into a state.
 From the sun and from the show'r,
 Haste we to yon boxen bow'r,
 Secluded from the teasing pry
 Of Argus' curiosity:
 There, while Phœbus' golden mean,
 The gay meridian is seen.
 Ere decays the lamp of light,
 And length'ning shades stretch out to night—
 Seize, seize the hint—each hour improve
 (This is morality in love)
 Lend, lend thine hand—O let me view
 Thy parting breaths, sweet avenue!
 'Then—then thy lips, the coral cell
 Where all th' ambrosial kisses dwell!
 'Thus we'll each sultry noon employ
 In day-dreams of ecstacy joy.

ODE XIV.

A NIGHT-PIECE;

OR, MODERN PHILOSOPHY.

"Dicitur meritâ nox quoque nœniâ." HOR.

'Twas when bright Cynthia with her silver car,
 Soft stealing from Endymion's bed,

Had call'd forth ev'ry glitt'ring star,
 And up th' ascent of heav'n her brilliant host had led,
 Night, with all her negro train,
 Took possession of the plain;
 In an herse she rode reclin'd,
 Drawn by screech-owls slow and blind:
 Close to her, with printless feet,
 Crept Stillness in a winding-sheet.
 Next to her deaf Silence was seen,
 Treading on tiptoes over the green;
 Softly, lightly, gently, she trips,
 Still holding her fingers seal'd to her lips.
 You could not see a sight,
 You could not hear a sound,
 But what confess'd the night,
 And horror deepen'd round.
 Beneath a myrtle's melancholy shade,
 Sophron the wife was laid:
 And to the answ'ring wood these sounds convey'd,
 While others toil within the town,
 And to fortune smile or frown,
 Fond of trifles, fond of toys,
 And married to that woman, Noise;
 Sacred wisdom be my care,
 And fairest virtue, wisdom's heir.
 His speculations thus the fage begun,
 When, lo! the neighbouring bell
 In solemn found struck one:—
 He starts, and recollects, he was engag'd to Nell.
 Then up he sprang, nimble and light,
 And rapp'd at fair Ele'nor's door,
 He laid aside virtue that night,
 And next morn por'd in Plato for more.

ODE XV.

ON MISS ****.

LONG, with undistinguish'd flame,
 I lov'd each fair, each witty dame.
 My heart the belle-assembly gain'd,
 And all an equal sway maintain'd.
 But when you came, you stood confess'd
 Sole sultana of my breast;
 For you eclips'd, supremely fair,
 All the whole seraglio there.
 In this her mien, in that her grace,
 In a third I lov'd a face;
 But you in ev'ry feature shine
 Universally divine.
 What can those tumid paps excel?
 Do they sink, or do they swell?
 While those lovely wanton eyes
 Sparkling meet them as they rise.
 Thus is silver Cynthia seen,
 Glistening o'er the glassy green,
 While attracted swell the waves,
 Emerging from their inmost caves.
 When to sweet sounds your steps you suit,
 And weave the minuet to the lute,
 Heav'n! how you glide!—her neck—her chest—
 Does she move, or does she rest?
 As those roguish eyes advance,
 Let me catch their side-long glance

Soon---or they'll elude my sight,
Quick as light'ning, and as bright.

Thus the basifal pleiad cheats
The gazer's eye, and still retreats;
Then peeps again---then skulks unseen,
Veil'd behind the azure screen.

Like the evening-toying dove,
Smile immensity of love;
Be Venus in each outward part,
And wear the vestal in your heart.

When I ask a kiss, or fo---
Grant it with a begging no,
And let each rose that decks your face
Blush assent to my embrace.

ODE XVI.

On the 5th of December, being the Birth-Day of a Beautiful Young Lady.

HAIL, eldest of the monthly train,
Sire of the winter drear,
December, in whose iron reign
Expires the chequer'd year.
Hush all the blust'ring blasts that blow,
And, proudly plum'd in silver snow,
Smile gladly on this blest of days.
The livery'd clouds shall on thee wait,
And Phœbus shine in all his state
With more than summer rays.
Though jocund June may justly boast
Long days and happy hours,
Though August be Pamona's host,
And May be crown'd with flow'rs;
Tell June, his fire and crimson dyes,
By Harriot's blush and Harriot's eyes,
Eclips'd and vanquish'd, fade away:
Tell August, thou canst let him see
A richer, riper fruit than he,
A sweeter flow'r than May.

ODE FOR MUSIC,

ON ST. CECILIA'S DAY.

" Hanc Vos, Pierides festis cantate calendis,
" Et testudincâ, Phœbe superbe, lyrâ
" Hoc solenne sacrum multos celebretur in annos,
" Dignior est vestro nulla puella choro."

TIBULLUS.

PREFACE.

THE author of the following piece has been told, that the writing an Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, after Mr. Dryden and Mr. Pope, would be great presumption; which is the reason he detains the reader in this place to make an apology, much against his will; he having all due contempt for the impertinence of prefaces. In the first place, then, it will be a little hard (he thinks) if he should be particularly marked out for censure, many others having written on the same subject without any such imputations; but they (it may be) did not live long enough to be laughed at; or, by some lucky means or other, escaped those shrewd remarks, which, it seems, are referred for him. In the second place, this subject was not his choice; but imposed upon him by a gentleman very eminent in the science of music, for whom he has a great friendship; and who is, by his good sense and humanity, as much elevated above the generality of mankind, as by his exquisite art he is above most of his profession. The request of a friend, undoubtedly, will be sneered at by some as a stale and antiquated apology: it is a very good one notwithstanding, which is manifest even from its triteness; for it can never be imagined, that so many excellent authors, as well as bad ones, would have made use of it, had they not been convinced of its cogency. As for the writer of this piece, he will rejoice in being derided, not only for obliging his friends, but any honest man whatsoever, so far as may be in the power of a person of his mean abilities. He does not pretend to equal the very worst parts of the two celebrated performers already extant on the subject; which acknowledgment alone will, with the good-natured and judicious, acquit him of presumption; because these pieces, however excellent upon the whole, are not without their blemishes. There is in them both an exact unity of design, which though in compositions of another nature a beauty, is an impropriety in the Pindaric; which should consist in the vehemence of sudden and unlooked-for transitions: hence chiefly it derives that enthusiastic fire and wildness, which greatly distinguish it from other species of poetry. In the first stanza of * Dryden, and in the fifth of † Pope, there is an air, which is so far from being adapted to the majesty of an ode, that it would make no considerable figure in a ballad. And, lastly, they both conclude with a turn which has something too epigrammatical in it. Bating these trifles, they are incomparably beautiful and great; neither is there to be found two moral finished pieces of lyric poetry in our language, L'Allegro, and Il Penseroso of Milton excepted, which are the finest in any. Dryden's is the more sublime and magnificent; but Pope's is the more elegant and correct; Dryden has the fire and spirit of Pindar, and Pope has the terseness and purity of Horace. Dryden's is certainly the more elevated performance of the two, but by no means so much so as people in general will have it. There are few that will allow any sort of comparison to be made between them. This is in some measure owing to that prevailing, but absurd custom, which has obtained from † Horace's

* Happy, happy, happy pair,
None but the brave,
None but the brave,
None but the brave deserve the fair.

† Thus song could prevail
O'er death and o'er hell,
A conquest how hard and how glorious!
Though fate had fast bound her
With Styx nine times round her,
Yet music and love were victorious.

† It seems to have been otherwise in Homer's time.

Τὴν γὰρ αἰδῶν μάλ'λοι ἐπικλεινοῦ ἀνθρώπων
Ἦτις ἀκροατοῖσι νῦν ταῦτα ἐμφιλίτται. Ἡσ. Οὐδ. α.

time even to this day, viz. of preferring authors to the bays by seniority. Had Mr. Pope written first, the mob, that judge by this rule, would have given him the preference; and the rather, because in this piece he does not deserve it.

It would not be right to conclude, without taking notice of a fine subject for an Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, which was suggested to the author by his friend the learned and ingenious Mr. Comber, late of Jesus' College in this university; that is, David's playing to King Saul when he was troubled with the evil spirit. He was much pleased with the hint at first, but at length was deterred from improving it by the greatness of the subject; and, he thinks, not without reason. The choosing too high subjects has been the ruin of many a tolerable genius. There is a good rule which Fresnoy prescribes to the painters; which is likewise applicable to the poets,

Supremam in tabulis lucem capture diei
Infanus labor artificum; cum attingere tantum
Non pigmenta queant: auream sed Vespere lu-cem;

Seu modicum mane albatem; sine ætheris actam
Post hyemen nimbis transfuso sole caducam; [tem.
Seu nebulis sultam accipiet, tonitruque rubeu-

ARGUMENT.

Stanza 1, 2. Invocation of men and angels to join in the praise of St. Cecilia. The divine origin of music. Stanza 3. Art of music, or its miraculous power over the brute and inanimate creation, exemplified in Waller; and stanza 4, 5. in Arion. Stanza 6. The nature of music, or its power over the passions. Instances of this in its exciting pity. Stanza 7. In promoting courage and military virtue. Stanza 8. Excellency of church-music. Air to the memory of Mr. Purcell.—Praise of the organ and its inventress St. Cecilia.

FROM your lyre-enchanted tow'rs,
Ye musically mystic pow'rs,
Ye, that inform the tuneful spheres,
Inaudible to mortal ears,
While each orb in ether swims,
Accordant to th' inspiring hymns;
Hither Paradise remove,
Spirits of harmony and love!
Thou too, divine Urania, deign t' appear,
And with thy sweetly-solemn lute
To the grand argument the numbers suit;
Such as sublime and clear,
Replete with heavenly love,
Charm th' enraptur'd souls above.
Disdainful of fantastic play,
Mix on your ambrosial tongue
Weight of sense with sound of song,
And be angelically gay.

CHORUS.

Disdainful, &c. &c.

And Pindar would have it otherwise in his.

αινει γι' Ηαλειον
Μην οινον, αυθις δ' υμνων
Νεωτερωι

Olymp. 9.

And you, ye sons of harmony below,
How little less than angels when ye sing!
With emulation's kindling warmth shall glow,
And from your mellow-modulating throats
The tribute of your grateful notes

In union of piety shall bring.
Shall echo from her vocal cave
Repay each note the shepherd gave,
And shall not we our mistress praise,
And give her back the borrow'd lays?

But farther still our praises we pursue;
For ev'n Cecilia, mighty maid,
Confess'd she had superior aid—

She did—and other rites to greater pow'rs are due.
Higher swell the found, and higher:

Let the winged numbers climb:

To the heav'n of heav'n's aspire,

Solemn, sacred, and sublime:

From heav'n music took its rise,

Return it to its native skies.

CHORUS.

Higher swell the found, &c. &c.

Music's a celestial art;

Cease to wonder at its pow'r,

Though lifeless rocks to motion start,

Though trees dance lightly from the bow'r,

Though rolling floods in sweet suspense

Are held, and listen into sense.

In Penhurst's plains when Waller, sick with love,

Has found some solitary grove,
Where the vague moon-beams pour a silver flood
Of trem'ulous light athwart th' unshaven wood,

Within an hoary moss-grown cell,

He lays his careless limbs without reserve,

And strikes, impetuous strikes each quer'ulous nerve
Of his resounding shell.

In all the woods, in all the plains

Around, a lively stillness reigns;

The deer approach the secret scene,

And weave their way through labyrinths
green;

While Philomela learns the lay,

And answers from the neighbouring bay.

But Medway, melancholy mute,

Gently on his urn reclines,

And all-attentive to the lute,

In uncomplaining anguish pines:

The crystal waters weep away,

And bear the tidings to the sea:

Neptune in the boisterous seas

Spreads the placid bed of peace,

While each blast

Or breathes its last,

Or just does sigh a symphony, and cease.

CHORUS.

Neptune, &c. &c.

Behold Arion—on the stern he stands,

Pall'd in theatrical attire,

To the mute strings he moves th' enlivening hands,

Great in distrefs, and wakes the golden lyre:

While in a tender Orthian strain

He thus accosts the mistress of the main:

By the bright beams of Cynthia's eyes,

Through which your waves attracted rise,

And actuate the hoary deep;
 By the secret coral cell,
 Where love, and joy, and Neptune dwell,
 And peaceful floods in silence sleep:
 By the sea-flowers that immerge
 Their heads around the grotto's verge,
 Dependant from the stooping stem;
 By each roof-suspended drop,
 That lightly lingers on the top,
 And hesitates into a gem;
 By thy kindred wat'ry gods,
 The lakes, the riv'lets, founts and floods,
 And all the pow'rs that live unseen
 Underneath the liquid green;
 Great Amphitrite (for thou canst bind
 The storm and regulate the wind)
 Hence waft me, fair goddess, oh waft me away,
 Secure from the men and the monsters of prey!

CHORUS.

Great Amphitrite, &c. &c.

He sung—The winds are charm'd to sleep,
 Soft stillness steals along the deep,
 The tritons and the nereids sigh
 In soul-reflecting sympathy,
 And all the audience of waters weep.
 But Amphitrite her dolphin sends—* the same,
 Which erst to Neptune brought the nobly perjur'd dame—

Pleas'd to obey, the beauteous monster flies,
 And on his scales as the gilt sun-beams
 play,

Ten thousand variegated dyes

In copious streams of lustre rise,

Rise o'er the level main and signify his way—

And now the joyous bard, in triumph bore,
 Rides the voluminous wave, and makes the wish'd-
 for shore.

Come, ye festive, social throng,
 Who sweep the Lyre, or pour the song,
 Your noblest melody employ,
 Such as becomes the mouth of joy,
 Bring the sky-aspiring thought,
 With bright expression richly wrought,

And hail the muse ascending on her throne,
 The main at length subdued, and all the world
 her own.

CHORUS.

Come, ye festive, &c. &c.

But o'er th' affections too she claims the sway,
 Pierces the human heart, and steals the soul away;
 And, as attractive sounds move high or low,
 Th' obedient ductile passions ebb and flow,
 Has any nymph her faithful lover lost,
 And in the visions of the night,
 And all the day dreams of the light,
 In sorrow's tempest turbulently tost—
 From her cheeks the roses die,
 The radiations vanish from her sun-bright eye,
 And her breast the throne of love,
 Can hardly, hardly, hardly move,
 To send th' ambrosial sigh.

* Fabulantur Græci hanc perpetuam Deis virginitatem vovisse: sed cum a Neptune sollicitaretur ad Atlantem conjugisse, ubi a Delphini persuasa Neptune assensit. Lillus Gyraldus.

But let the skilful bard appear,
 And pour the sounds medicinal in her ear;
 Sing some sad, some plaintive ditty,
 Steept in tears that endless flow,
 Melancholy notes of pity,
 Notes that mean a world of woe?
 She too shall sympathize, she too shall moan,
 And pitying others forrows sigh away her own.

CHORUS.

Sing some sad, some, &c. &c.

Wake, wake, the kettle-drum prolong
 The swelling trumpet's silver song,
 And let the kindred accents pass
 Through the horn's meandering brass.
 Arise—The patriot muse invites to war,
 And mounts Bellona's brazen car;
 While harmony, terrific maid!
 Appears in martial pomp array'd:
 The sword, the target, and the lance
 She weilds, and as the moves, exalts the Pyrrhic dance.

Trembles the earth, rebound the skies—
 Swift o'er the fleet, the camp she flies
 With thunder in her voice and lightning in her eyes.

The gallant warriors engage
 With inextinguishable rage,
 And hearts unchill'd with fear;
 Fame numbers all the chosen bands
 Full in the front fair vict'ry stands,
 And triumph crowns the rear.

CHORUS.

The gallant warriors, &c. &c.

But hark, the temple's hollow'd roof rebounds,
 And Purcell lives along the solemn sounds—
 Mellifluous, yet manly too,
 He pours his strains along,
 As from the lion Samson strew,
 Comes sweetness from the strong.
 Not like the soft Italian swains,
 He trills the weak enervate strains,
 Where sense and music are at strife;
 His vigorous notes with meaning teem,
 With fire, with force explain the theme,
 And sings the subject into life.
 Attend—he sings Cæcilia—matchless dame!
 'Tis she—'tis she—fond to extend her fame.

On the loud chords the notes conspire to stay,
 And sweetly swell into a long delay,

And dwell delighted on her name.

Blow on, ye sacred organs, blow,
 In tones magnificently slow;
 Such is the music, such the lays,
 Which suit your fair inventress' praise:
 While round religious silence reigns.
 And loitering winds expect the strains.
 Hail majestic mournful measure,
 Source of many a pensive pleasure!
 Blest pledge of love to mortals giv'n,
 As pattern of the rest of heav'n!
 And thou chief honour of the veil,
 Hail, harmonious virgin, hail!

When death shall blot out every name,
 And time shall break the trump of fame,

I iiiij

Angels may listen to thy lute:
Thy pow'r shall last, thy bays shall bloom,
When tongues shall cease, and worlds consume,
And all the tuneful spheres be mute.

GRAND CHORUS.

When death shall blot out every name, &c.

HYMN TO THE SUPREME BEING,

On Recovery from a Dangerous Fit of Illness.

TO DOCTOR JAMES.

DEAR SIR,

HAVING made an humble offering to him, without whose blessing your skill, admirable as it is, would have been to no purpose, I think myself bound by all the ties of gratitude, to render my next acknowledgments to you, who, under God, restored me to health from as violent and dangerous a disorder, as perhaps ever man survived. And my thanks become more particularly your just tribute, since this was the third time, that your judgment and medicines rescued me from the grave; permit me to say, in a manner almost miraculous.

If it be meritorious to have investigated medicines for the cure of distempers, either overlooked or disregarded by all your predecessors, millions yet unborn will celebrate the man, who wrote the Medicinal Dictionary, and invented the Fever Powder.

Let such considerations as these, arm you with constancy against the impotent attacks of those whose interests interfere with that of mankind; and let it not displease you to have those for your particular enemies, who are foes to the public in general.

It is no wonder, indeed, that some of the retailers of medicines should zealously oppose what ever might endanger their trade; but it is amazing that there should be any physicians mercenary and mean enough to pay their court to, and ingratiate themselves with, such persons, by the strongest efforts to prejudice the inventor of the Fever Powder, at the expence of honour, dignity, and conscience. Believe me, however and let this be a part of your consolation, that there are very few physicians in Britain, who were born gentlemen, and whose fortunes place them above such sordid dependencies, who do not think and speak of you as I do:

I am, dear Sir,

Your most obliged,

And most humble servant,

C. SMART.

WHEN * Israel's ruler on the royal bed

In anguish and in perturbation lay,

The down reliev'd not his anointed head,

And rest gave place to horrid and dismay.

Fast flow'd the tears, high heav'd each gasping sigh,

When God's own prophet thunder'd—Monarch,

[thou must die.

And must I go, th' illustrious mourner cry'd,
I who have serv'd thee still in faith and truth,
Whose snow-white conscience no foul crime has dy'd

From youth to manhood, infancy to youth,
Like David, who have still rever'd thy word
The sovereign of myself and servant of the Lord.

The Judge Almighty heard his suppliant's moan,
Repeal'd his sentence, and his health restor'd;
The beams of mercy on his temples shone,
Shot from that heaven to which his sighs had soar'd;

The * sun retreated at his Maker's nod,
And miracles confirm the genuine work of God.

But, O immortals! What had I to plead
When death stood o'er me with his threat'ning lance,

When reason left me in the time of need,
And sense was left in terror or in trance,
My sinking soul was with my blood inflam'd,
And the celestial image sunk, defac'd, and maim'd,

I sent back memory in heedful guise,
To search the records of preceding years;
Home, like the † raven to the ark, she flies,
Croaking bad tidings to my trembling ears.
O sun, again that thy retreat was made,
And threw my follies back into the friendly shade.

But who are they that bid affliction cease!—
Redemption and forgiveness, heavenly sounds!
Behold the dove that brings the branch of peace,
Behold the balm that heals the gaping wounds—
Vengeance divine's by penitence suppress'd—
She † struggles with the angel, conquers, and is blest.

Yet hold, presumption, nor too fondly climb,
And thou too hold, O horrible despair!
In man humility's alone sublime,
Who diffidently hopes he's Christ's own care—
O all-sufficient Lamb! in death's dread hour
Thy merits who shall slight, or who can doubt thy power?

But fool-rejoicing health again returns,
The blood meanders gentle in each vein,
The lamp of life renew'd with vigour burns,
And exil'd reason takes her seat again—
Brisk leaps the heart, the mind's at large once more,
To love, to praise, to biefs, to wonder and adore.

The virtuous partner of my nuptial bands,
Appear'd a widow to my frantic sight;
My little prattlers lifting up their hands,
Beckon me back to them, to life, and light;
I come, ye spores! sweets! I come again,
Nor have your tears been shed, nor have ye knelt
in vain.

All glory to th' Eternal, to the Immense,
All glory to th' Omniscient and Good,
Whose power's uncircumscrib'd, whose love's intense;

But yet whose justice ne'er could be withstood.

* Hewekiah vi. Ysaiah xxxviii.

* Ysaiah, chap. xxxviii. † Gen. viii. 7.
† Gen. xxxii. 24, 25, 26, 27, 28.

Except through him—through him, who stands
alone,
Of worth, of weight, allow'd for all mankind
t' atone!

He rais'd the lame, the lepers he made whole,
He fix'd the palsied nerves of weak decay,
He drove out Satan from the tortur'd soul,
And to the blind gave or restor'd the day,—
Nay more,—far more unequall'd pangs sustain'd,
'Till his lost fallen flock his taintless blood regain'd.

My feeble feet refus'd my body's weight,
Nor would my eyes admit the glorious light,
My nerves convuls'd, shook, fearful of their fate,
My mind lay open to the powers of night.
He, pitying, did a second birth bestow
A birth of joy—not like the first of tears and
woe.

Ye strengthen'd feet, forth to his altar move;
Quicken, ye new-strung nerves, th' enraptur'd lyre;
Ye heav'n-directed eyes, o'erflow with love;
Glow, glow, my soul, with pure seraphic fire;
Deeds, thoughts, and words, no more his mandates
break,
But to his endless glory work, conceive, and speak.

! penitence, to virtue near allied,
Thou canst new joys e'en to the blest impart;
The list'ning angels lay their harps aside
To hear the music of thy contrite heart;
And heav'n itself wears a more radiant face,
When charity presents thee to the throne of grace.

Chief of metallic forms is regal gold;
Of elements, the limpid fount that flows;
Give me, 'mongst gems the brilliant to behold;
O'er Flora's flock imperial is the rose:
Above all birds the sov'reign eagle soars;
And monarch of the field the lordly lion roars.

What can with great leviathan compare,
Who takes his pastime in the mighty main?
What, like the sun, shines through the realms of air,
And gilds and glorifies th' ethereal plain—
Yet what are these to man, who bears the sway;
For all was made for him—to serve and to obey.

Thus in high heaven charity is great,
Faith, hope, devotion, hold a lower place;
On her the cherubs and the seraphs wait,
Her, every virtue courts, and every grace;
See! on the right, close by th' Almighty's throne,
In him she shines confess'd, who came to make her
known.

Deep-rooted in my heart then let her grow,
That for the past the future may atone;
That I may act what thou hast giv'n to know,
That I may live for thee and thee alone,
And justify those sweetest words from heav'n,
That he shall love thee most † to whom thou'lt
“ most forgiven.

* Pind. Olymp. I.

† Luce vii. A1, 42, 43.

ON THE

ETERNITY OF THE SUPREME BEING,

A POETICAL ESSAY.

A CLAUSE OF MR. SEATON'S WILL,

Dated Oct. 8. 1738*.

I GIVE my Kissingbury estate to the University of Cambridge for ever: the rents of which shall be disposed of yearly by the vice-chancellor for the time being, as he the vice-chancellor, the master of Clare-Hall, and the Greek professor for the time being, or any two of them, shall agree. Which three persons aforesaid shall give out a subject, which subject shall for the first year be one or other of the perfections or attributes of the Supreme Being, and so the succeeding years, till the subject is exhausted; and afterwards the subject shall be either death, judgment, heaven, hell, purity of heart, &c. or whatever else may be judged by the vice-chancellor, master of Clare-Hall, and Greek professor, to be most conducive to the honour of the Supreme Being, and recommendation of virtue. And they shall yearly dispose of the rent of the above estate to that master of arts, whose poem on the subject given shall be best approved by them. Which poem I ordain to be always in English, and to be printed; the expence of which shall be deducted out of the product of the estate, and the residue given as a reward for the composer of the poem, or ode, or copy of verses.

We the underwritten, do assign Mr. Seaton's reward to C. Smart, M. A. for his poem on The Eternity of the Supreme Being, and directed the said poem to be printed, according to the tenor of the will.

EDM. KEENE, Vice-chancellor.

J. WILCOX, Master of Clare-hall.

March 25. 1750.

HAIL, wond'rous Being, who in pow'r supreme
Exists from everlasting, whose great name
Deep in the human heart, and every atom,
The air, the earth, or azure main contains,
In undecypher'd characters is wrote—
Incomprehensible!—O what can words,
The weak interpreters of mortal thoughts,
Or what can thoughts (though wild of wing they rove

Through the vast concave of th' ethereal round)
If to the heav'n of heavens they'd win their way
Advent'rous, like the birds of night they're lost,
And delug'd in the flood of dazzling day.

May then the youthful, uninspired bard
Presume to hymn th' Eternal; may he soar

* This clause of Mr. Seaton's Will is inserted at the beginning of each of the five following Poems, in the edition of Smart's Works; but is afterwards omitted in this collection, to avoid repetition.

Where seraph, and where cherubim on high
 Refound th' unceasing plaudits, and with them
 In the grand chorus mix his feeble voice?

He may, if thou, who from the wileless babe
 Ordainest honour, glory, strength, and praise,
 Uplift the unpinion'd muse, and deign t' assist,
 Great Poet of the universe, his song.

Before this earthly planet wound her course
 Round light's perennial fountain, before light
 Herself 'gan shine, and at th' inspiring word
 Shot to existence in a blaze of day,
 Before "the morning stars together sang"
 And hail'd thee architect of countless worlds,
 Thou art—all-glorious, all beneficent,
 All wisdom and omnipotence thou art.

But is the era of creation fix'd
 At when these worlds began? Could ought retard Goodness, that knows no bounds, from blessing ever,

Or keep th' immense Artificer in sloth?
 Avault the dust-directed crawling thought,
 That Puissance immeasurably vast,
 And Bounty inconceivable could rest
 Content, exhausted with one week of action—
 No—in th' exertion of thy righteous pow'r,
 Ten thousand times more active than the sun,
 Thou reign'd, and with a mighty hand compos'd
 Systems innumerable, matchless all,
 All stamp'd with thine unconquer'd seal.

But yet (if still to more stupendous heights
 The muse unblam'd her aching sense may strain)
 Perhaps wrapt up in contemplation deep,
 The best of beings on the noblest theme
 Might ruminate at leisure, scope immense
 Th' eternal Pow'r and Godhead to explore,
 And with itself th' omniscient mind replete.
 This were enough to fill the boundless All,
 This were a Sabbath worthy the Supreme!
 Perhaps enthron'd amidst a choicer few,
 Of spirits inferior, he might greatly plan
 The two prime pillars of the universe,
 Creation and redemption—and a while
 Pause—with the grand presentments of glory.

Perhaps—but all's conjecture here below,
 All ignorance, and self-plum'd vanity—
 O thou, whose ways to wonder at's distrust,
 Whom to describe's presumption (all we can,—
 And all we may—) be glorified, be prais'd.

A day shall come when all this earth shall perish,
 Nor leave behind ev'n Chaos; it shall come
 When all the armies of the elements
 Shall war against themselves, and mutual rage
 To make perdition triumph; it shall come,
 When the capacious atmosphere above
 Shall in sulphurous thunders groan and die,
 And vanish into void; the earth beneath
 Shall fever to the centre, and devour
 Th' enormous blaze of the destructive flames.—
 Ye rocks, that mock the raving of the floods,
 And proudly frown upon th' impatient deep,
 Where is your grandeur now? Ye foaming waves,
 That all along th' immense Atlantic roar,
 In vain ye swell; will a few drops suffice
 To quench the unextinguishable fire?
 Ye mountains, on whose cloud-crown'd tops the cedars

Are less'n'd into shrubs, magnific piles,
 That prop the painted chambers of the heav'n's
 And fix the earth continual; Athos, where:
 Where Tenerif's thy statelinc's to-day?
 What, Ætna, are thy flames to these:—No more
 Than the poor glow-worm to the golden sun.

Nor shall the verdant valleys then remain
 Safe in their meek submission; they the debt
 Of nature and of justice too must pay.
 Yet I must weep for you, ye rival fair,
 Arno and Andalusia; but for thee
 More largely and with filial tears must weep,
 O Albion, O my country; thou must join,
 In vain dis sever'd from the rest, must join
 The terrors of th' inevitable ruin.

Nor thou, illustrious monarch of the day;
 Nor thou, fair queen of night; nor you, ye stars,
 Though million leagues and million still remote,
 Shall yet survive that day: Ye must submit
 Sharers, not bright spectators of the scene.

But though the earth shall to the centre perish,
 Nor leave behind ev'n Chaos; though the air
 With all the elements must pass away,
 Vain as an idiot's dream; though the huge rocks,
 That brandish the tall cedars on their tops,
 With humbler vales must to perdition yield;
 Thou the gilt sun, and silver-tressed moon
 With all her bright retinue, must be lost;
 Yet thou, great Father of the world, surviv'st
 Eternal, as thou wert: Yet still survives
 The soul of man immortal, perfect now,
 And candidate for unexpiring joys.

He comes! he comes! the awful trump I hear;
 The flaming sword's intolerable blaze
 I see; he comes! th' archangel from above,
 "Arise ye tenants of the silent grave,
 "Awake incorruptible and arise;
 "From east to west, from the antarctic pole
 "To regions hyperborean, all ye sons,
 "Ye sons of Adam, and ye heirs of heav'n—
 "Arise, ye tenants of the silent grave,
 "Awake incorruptible and arise."

'Tis then, nor sooner, that the restless mind
 Shall find itself at home; and like the ark
 Fix'd on the mountain-top, shall look aloft
 O'er the vague passage of precarious life;
 And winds, and waves, and rocks, and tempests past,
 Enjoy the everlasting calm of heav'n:

'Tis then, nor sooner, that the deathless soul
 Shall justly know its nature and its rise:
 'Tis then the human tongue new-tun'd shall give
 Praises more worthy the eternal ear.
 Yet what we can, we ought—, and, therefore, thou,
 Purge thou my heart, Omnipotent and good!
 Purge thou my heart with hyssop, lest like Cain
 I offer fruitless sacrifice, with gifts
 Offend, and not propitiate the ador'd.
 Though gratitude were blest'd with all the pow'rs
 Her bursting heart could long for, though the swift,

The fiery-wing'd imagination soar'd
 Beyond ambition's wish—yet all were vain
 To speak him as he is, who is ineffable.
 Yet still let reason through the eye of faith
 View him with fearful love; let truth pronounce,
 And adoration on her bended knee
 With heav'n-directed hands confess his reign.

And let th' angelic, archangelic band,
With all the hosts of heav'n, cherubic forms,
And forms seraphic, with their silver trumps.
And golden lyres attend:—"For thou art holy,
"For thou art one, th' Eternal, who alone
"Exerts all goodness, and transcends all praise."

ON THE

IMMENSITY OF THE SUPREME BEING.

A POETICAL ESSAY.

ONCE more I dare to rouse the founding string,
The poet of my God—Awake my glory,
Awake my lute and harp—myself shall wake,
Soon as the stately night-exploding bird
In lively lay sings welcome to the dawn.

Lift ye! how nature with ten thousand tongues
Begins the grand thanksgiving, Hail, all hail,
Ye tenants of the forest and the field!
My fellow subjects of th' Eternal King,
I gladly join your mattins, and with you
Confess his presence, and report his praise.

O thou, who or the lambkin, or the dove,
When offer'd by the lowly, meek, and poor,
Prefer'st to pride's whole hecatomb, accept
This mean essay, nor from thy treasure-house
Of glory immense, the orphan's might exclude.

What though th' Almighty's regal throne be rais'd

High o'er yon azure heav'n's exalted dome,
By mortal eye unken'd—where east nor west,
Nor south, nor bluff ring north has breath to blow;
Albeit he there with angels and with faints
Holds conference, and to his radiant host
Ev'n face to face stand visibly confest:
Yet know that nor in presence or in pow'r
Shines he less perfect here; 'tis man's dim eye
That makes th' obscurity. He is the fame,
Alike in all his universe the same.

Whether the mind along the spangled sky
Measure her pathless walk, studious to view
Thy works of vaster fabric, where the planets
Weave their harmonious rounds, their march directing

Still faithful, still inconstant to the sun;
Or where the comet through space infinite (Though whirling worlds oppose, and globes of fire)

Darts, like a javelin, to his destin'd goal.
Or where in heav'n above the heav'n of heav'ns
Burn brighter suns, and goodlier planets roll
With satellites more glorious—Thou art there.

Or whether on the ocean's boist'rous back
Thou ride triumphant, and with outstretch'd arm
Curb the wild winds, and discipline the billows,
The suppliant sailer finds thee there, his chief,
His only help—When thou rebuk'st the storm—
It ceases—and the vessel gently glides
Along the glassy level of the calm.

Oh! could I search the bosom of the sea,
Down the great depth descending; there thy works
Would also speak thy residence; and there
Would I thy servant, like the still profound,
Astonish'd into silence muse thy praise!
Behold! behold! th' implanted garden round
Of vegetable coral, sea-flow'rs gay, [bottom
And shrubs, with amber, from the pearl-pav'd

Rife richly varied, where the finny race
In blithe security their gambols play:
While high above their heads leviathan,
The terror and the glory of the main,
His pastime takes with transport, proud to see
The ocean's vast dominion all his own.

Hence through the genial bowels of the earth
Easy may fancy pass; till at thy mines,
Gani, or Raolconda, she arrive,
And from the adamant's imperial blaze
For weak ideas of her Maker's glory.
Next to Pegu or Ceylon let me rove,
Where the rich ruby (deem'd by fables old
Of sovereign virtue) sparkles ev'n like Sirius,
And blushes into flames. Thence will I go
To undermine the treasure-fertile womb
Of the huge Pyrenean, to detect
The agate and the deep-entrenched gem
Of kindred jasper—Nature in them both Delights to play the mimic on herself;
And in their veins she oft pours trays the forms
Of leaping hills, of trees erect, and streams
Now stealing softly on, now thund'ring down
In desperate cascade, with flow'rs and beasts,
And all the living landscape of the vale.
In vain thy pencil, Claudio, or Pauffin,
Or thine, immortal Guido, would essay
Such skill to imitate—it is the hand
Of God himself—for God himself is there.

Hence with th' ascending springs let me advance,
Through beds of magnets, minerals, and spar,
Up to the mountain's summit, there t' indulge
Th' ambition of the comprehensive eye,
That dares to call th' horizon all her own.
Behold the forest, and th' expansive verdure
Of yonder level lawn, whose smooth thorn sod
No object interrupts unless the oak
His lordly head uprears, and branching arms
Extends—Behold in regal solitude,
And pastoral magnificence he stands,
So simple! and so great! the under-wood
Of meaner rank, an awful distance keep.
Yet thou art there, and God himself is there
Ev'n in the bush (though not as when to Moses)
He shone in burning majesty reveal'd
Nathless conspicuous in the linnet's throat
Is his unbounded goodness—Thee her Maker,
Thee her Preserver chaunts she in her song;
While all the emulative vocal tribe
The grateful lesson learn—no other voice
Is heard, no other sound—for in attention
Buried, ev'n babbling echo holds her peace.

Now from the plains, where th' unbounded prospect

Gives liberty her utmost scope to range,
Turn we to yon enclosures, where appears
Chequer'd variety in all her forms,
Which the vague mind attract and still suspend
With sweet perplexity. What are yon tow'rs,
The work of lab'ring man and clumsy art,
Seen with the ring-dove's nest—on that tall beech
Her penile house the feather'd artist builds—
The rocking winds molest her not; for see,
With such due poize the wond'rous fabric's hung,
That, like the compass in the bark, it keeps
True to itself, and stedfast ev'n in storms.
Thou idiot that assert'st there is no God,

View, and be dumb for ever—
 Go bid Vitruvius or Palladio yield
 The bee his mansion, or the ant her cave—
 To call Correggio, or let Titian come
 To paint the hawthorn's bloom, or teach the cherry
 To blush with just vermilion—hence away—
 Hence ye profane! for God himself is here.
 Vain were th' attempt, and impious to trace
 Through all his works th' Artificer divin—
 And though nor shining sun, nor twinkling star,
 Bedeck'd the crimson curtains of the sky;
 Though neither vegetable, beast, nor bird,
 Were extant on the surface of this ball,
 Nor lurking gem beneath; though the great sea
 Slept in profound stagnation, and the air
 Had left no thunder to pronounce its Maker;
 Yet man at home, within himself, might find
 The Deity immense, and in that frame
 So fearfully, so wonderfully made,
 See and adore his providence and pow'r—
 I see, and I adore—O God most bounteous!
 O Infinite of Goodness and of Glory!
 The knee that thou hast shap'd, shall bend to thee,
 The tongue which thou hast tun'd, shall chaunt
 thy praise,
 And thy own image, the immortal soul,
 Shall consecrate herself to thee for ever.

ON THE
 OMNISCIENCE OF THE SUPREME BEING,

A POETICAL ESSAY.

Addressed to the Most Reverend his Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.

ARISE, divine Urania, with new strains
 To hymn thy God, and thou, immortal fame,
 Arise, and blow thy everlasting trump.
 All glory, to th' Omniscient, and praise,
 And pow'r, and domination in the height!
 And thou, cherubic gratitude, whose voice
 To pious ears sounds slyly so sweet,
 Come with thy precious incense, bring thy gifts,
 And with thy choicest stores the altar crown.
 Thou too, my heart, when he, and he alone,
 Who' all things knows, can know, with love replete,

Regenerate, and pure, pour all thyself
 A living sacrifice before his throne:
 And may th' eternal, high mysterious tree,
 That in the centre of the arched heav'ns
 Bears the rich fruit of knowledge, with some branch

Stoop to my humble reach, and bless my toil!
 When in my mother's womb conceal'd I lay
 A senseless embryo, then my soul thou knew'st,
 Knew'st all her future workings, every thought,
 And every faint idea yet unform'd.
 When up the imperceptible ascent
 Of growing years, led by thy hand, I rose,
 Perception's gradual light, that ever dawns
 Insensibly to-day, thou didst vouchsafe,
 And teach me by that reason thou inspir'dst.
 That what of knowledge in my mind was low,
 Imperfect, incorrect—in thee is wond'rous,

Uncircumscrib'd, unsearchably profound,
 And estimable solely by itself.
 What is that secret pow'r, that guides the brutes,

Which ignorance calls instinct? 'Tis from thee,
 It is the operation of thine hands,
 Immediate instantaneous; 'tis thy wisdom,
 That glorious shines transparent through thy works.

Who taught the pie, or who forewarn'd the jay
 To shun the deadly nightshade? though the cherry
 Boasts not a glossier hue, nor does the plumb
 Lure with more seeming sweets the amorous eye,
 Yet will not the sagacious birds, decoy'd
 By fair appearance, touch the noxious fruit.
 They know to taste is fatal, whence alarm'd
 Swift on the winnowing winds they work their way.

Go to, proud reas'ner, philosophic man,
 Hast thou such prudence, thou such knowledge?
 —No.

Full many a race has fall'n into the share
 Of meretricious looks, of pleasing surface,
 And oft in desert isles the famish'd pilgrim
 By forms of fruit, and luscious taste beguill'd,
 Like his forefather Adam, eats and dies.
 For why? his wisdom on the leaden feet
 Of slow experience, dully tedious, creeps,
 And comes, like vengeance, after long delay.

The venerable sage, that nightly trims
 The learned lamp, t' investigate the pow'r
 Of plants medicinal, the earth, the air,
 And the dark regions of the fossil world,
 Grows old in following what he ne'er shall find;
 Studios in vain! till haply, at the last
 He spies a mist, then shapes it into mountains,
 And baseless fabric from conjecture builds.
 While the domestic animal, that guards
 At midnight hours his threshold, if oppress'd
 By sudden sickness, at his master's feet
 Begg not that aid his services might claim,
 But is his own physician, knows the case,
 And from th' emetic herbage works his cure.
 Hark from afar the * feather'd matron screams,
 And all her brood alarms, the docile crew
 Accept the signal one and all, expert
 In th' art of nature and unlearn'd deceit;
 Along the sod, in counterfeited death,
 Mute, motionless they lie; full well appriz'd
 That the rapacious adversary's near.
 But who inform'd her of th' approaching danger,
 Who taught the cautious mother, that the hawk
 Was hatch'd her foe, and liv'd by her destruction?
 Her own prophetic soul is active in her,
 And more than human providence her guard.

When Philomela, ere the cold domain
 Of crippled winter 'gins t' advance, prepares
 Her annual flight, and in some poplar shade
 Takes her melodious leave, who then's her pilot?
 Who points her passage through the pathless void
 To realms from us remote, to us unknown?
 Her science is the science of her God.
 Not the magnetic index to the north
 E'er ascertains her course, nor buoy, nor beacon;
 She, heav'n-taught voyager, that sails in air,

The Hen Turkey.

Courts nor coy west nor east, but instant knows
What * Newton, or not fought, or fought in vain.

Illustrious name, irrefragable proof
Of man's vast genius, and the soaring soul!
Yet what wert thou to him, who knew his works,
Before creation form'd them, long before
He measur'd in the hollow of his hand
Th' exulting ocean, and the highest heav'n's
He comprehended with a span, and weigh'd
The mighty mountains in his golden scales;
Who shone supreme; who was himself the light,
Ere yet refraction learn'd her skill to paint,
And bend athwart the clouds her beauteous bow.

When knowledge at her father's dread command

Resign'd to Israel's king her golden key,
Oh to have join'd the frequent auditors
In wonder and delight, that whilom heard
Great Solomon descending on the brutes!
Oh how sublimely glorious to apply
To God's own honour, and good will to man,
That wisdom he alone of men possess'd
In plenitude so rich, and scope so rare!
How did he rouse the pamper'd silken sons
Of bloated ease, by placing to their view
The sage industrious ant, the wisest insect,
And best economist of all the field!
Though she presumes not by the solar orb
To measure times and seasons, nor consults
Chaldean calculations, for a guide;
Yet conscious that December's on the march
Pointing with icy hand to want and woe,
She waits his dire approach, and undismay'd
Receives him as a welcome guest, prepar'd
Against the churlish winter's fiercest blow.
For when, as yet the favourable fun
Gives to the genial earth th' enlivening ray,
Not the poor suffering slave, that hourly toils
To rive the groaning earth for ill-fought gold,
Endures such trouble, such fatigue, as she;
While all her subterranean avenues,
And storm proof cells, with management most meet

And unexampled housewifery, she forms,
Then to the field she hies, and on her back,
Burden immense! she bears the cumbrous corn.
'Then many a weary step, and many a strain,
And many a grievous groan subdued, at length
Up the huge hill she hardly heaves it home.
Nor rests she here her providence, but nips
With subtle tooth the grain, lest from her garner
In mischievous fertility it steal,
And back to day-light fluggard its way,
Go to the ant, thou sluggard, learn to live,
And by her wary ways reform thine own.
But, if thy deaden'd sense, and listless thought
More glaring evidence demand; behold,
Where yon pellucid populous hive presents
A yet uncopied model to the world!
There Machiavel in the reflecting glass
May read himself a fool. The chemist there
May with astonishment invidious view
His toils outdone by each plebeian bee,
Who, at the royal mandate, on the wing
From various herbs and from discordant flow'rs
A perfect harmony of sweets compounds.

* The Longitude.

Avant conceit, ambition take thy flight
Back to the prince of vanity and air!
Oh 'tis a thought of energy most piercing,
Form'd to make pride grow humble; form'd to force

Its weight on the reluctant mind, and give her
A true but irksome image of herself.
Woful vicissitude! when man, fall'n man,
Who first from heav'n, from gracious God himself, Learn'd knowledge of the brutes, must know by brutes

Instructed and reproach'd, the scale of being;
By slow degrees from lowly steps ascends,
And trac'd Omniscience upwards to its spring!
Yet murmur not, but praise—for though we stand
Of many a godlike privilege amerc'd
By Adam's dire transgression, though no more
Is Paradise our home, but o'er the portal
Hangs in terrific pomp the burning blade;
Still with ten thousand beauties blooms the earth
With pleasures populous, and with riches crown'd
Still is their scope for wonder and for love
Ev'n to their last exertion—show'rs of blessings
Far more than human virtue can deserve,
Or hope expect, or gratitude return.
Then, O ye people, O ye sons of men,
Whatever be the colour of your lives,
Whatever portion of itself his wisdom
Shall deign t' allow, still patiently abide,
And praise him more and more; nor cease to chant

All glory to th' Omniscient, and praise,
And pow'r, and domination in the height!
And thou, cherubic gratitude, whose voice
To pious ears sounds silverly so sweet,
Come with thy precious incense, bring thy gifts,
And with the choicest stores the altar crown.

ON THE

POWER OF THE SUPREME BEING,

A POETICAL ESSAY.

"TREMBLE, thou earth! the anointed poet said,
"At God's bright presence, tremble, all ye mountains,

"And all ye hillocks on the surface bound."

Then once again, ye glorious thunders roll,
The muse with transport hears ye, once again
Consulte the solid continent, and shake,
Grand music of Omnipotence, the isles.
'Tis thy terrific voice; thou God of power,
'Tis thy terrific voice; all nature hears it
Awaken'd and alarm'd; she feels its force,
In every spring she feels it, every wheel,
And every movement of her vast machine.
Behold! quakes Appenine, behold! recoils
Athos, and all the hoary-headed Alps
Leap from their bases at the godlike sound.
But what is this, celestial though the note,
And proclamation of the reign supreme,
Compar'd with such as, for a mortal ear
Too great, amaze the incorporeal worlds?
Shou'd ocean to his congregated waves
Call in each river, cataract, and lake,
And with the wat'ry world down a huge rock
Fall headlong in one horrible cascade,
'Twere but the echo of the parting breeze,

When zephyr faints upon the lily's breast,
 'Twere but the ceasing of some instrument,
 When the last ling'ring undulation
 Dies on the doubting ear, if nam'd with sounds
 So mighty! so stupendous! so divine!

But not alone in the aerial vault
 Does he the dread theocracy maintain;
 For oft, enrag'd with his intestine thunders,
 He harrows up the bowels of the earth,
 And shocks the central magnet.—Cities then
 Tatter on their foundations, stately columns,
 Magnific walls, and heav'n-ascending spires.
 What though in haughty eminence erect
 Stands the strong citadel; and frowns defiance
 On adverse hosts, though many a bastion jut
 Forth from the ramparts elevated mound,
 Vain the poor providence of human heart,
 And mortal strength how vain! while underneath

 Triumphs his mining vengeance in th' uproar
 Of shatter'd towers, riven rocks, and mountains,
 With clamour inconceivable upturn,
 And hurl'd down th' abyss. Sulphureous pyrites

 Bursting abrupt from darkness into day,
 With din outrageous and destructive ire
 Augment the hideous tumult, while it wounds
 Th' afflicted ear, and terrifies the eye,
 And rends the heart in twain.—'Twice have we felt,

 Within Augusta's walls, twice have we felt
 Thy threaten'd indignation, but ev'n thou,
 Incens'd Omnipotent, are gracious ever:
 Thy goodness infinite but mildly warn'd us
 With mercy-blended wrath; O spare us still,
 Nor send more dire conviction: we confess
 That thou art he, th' Almighty: we believe,
 For at thy righteous power whole systems quake,
 For at thy nod tremble ten thousand worlds.

Hark! on the winged whirlwind's rapid rage,
 Which is and is not in a moment—hark!
 On th' hurricane's tempestuous sweep he rides
 Invincible, and oaks and pines and cedars
 And forests are no more. For conflict dreadful!
 The west encounters east, and Notus meets
 In his career the Hyperborean blast.
 The lordly lions shudd'ring seek their dens,
 And fly like tim'rous deer; the king of birds,
 Who dar'd the solar ray, is weak of wing,
 And faints and falls and dies;—while he supreme
 Stands stedfast in the centre of the storm.

Wherefore, ye objects terrible and great,
 Ye thunders earthquakes, and ye fire-fraught wombs

Of fell volcanos, whirlwinds, hurricanes,
 And boiling billows hail! in chorus join
 To celebrate and magnify your Maker,
 Who yet in works of a minuter mould
 Is not less manifest, is not less mighty.

Survey the magnet's sympathetic love,
 That woos the yielding needle; contemplate
 Th' attractive amber's power, invisible
 Ev'n to the mental eye; or when the blow
 Sent from th' electric sphere assaults thy frame,
 Show me the hand, that dealt it!—baffled here
 By his omnipotence, philosophy
 Slowly her thoughts inadequate revolves,

And stands, with all his circling wonders round
 her,

Like heavy Saturn in th' ethereal space
 Begirt with an inexplicable ring.

If such the operations of his power,
 Which at all seasons and in ev'ry place
 (Rul'd by establish'd laws and current nature)
 Arrest th' attention! who? O who shall tell
 His acts miraculous, when his own decrees
 Repeals he, or suspends, when by the hand
 Of Moses or of Joshua, or the mouths
 Of his prophetic seers, such deeds he wrought,
 Before th' astonish'd sun's all-seeing eye,
 That faith was scarce a virtue. Need I sing
 The fate of Pharaoh and his numerous band
 Lost in the reflux of the wat'ry walls,
 That melted to their fluid state again?
 Need I recount how Samson's warlike arm
 With more than mortal nerves was strung t' o'er-

throw
 Idolatrous Philistia? shall I tell
 How David triumph'd, and what Job sustain'd?
 ---But, O supreme, unutterable mercy!
 O love unequal'd, mystery immense,
 Which angels long t'unfold! 'tis man's redemption

 That crowns thy glory, and thy pow'r confirms,
 Confirms the great, th' uncontroverted claim.
 When from the virgin's unpolluted womb,
 Shone forth the Sun of Righteousness reveal'd
 And on benighted reason pour'd the day;
 Let there be peace (he said) and all was calm
 Amongst the warring world—calm as the sea,
 When peace: be still, ye boisterous winds, he cry'd,
 And not a breath was blown, nor murmur
 heard.

His was a life of miracles and might,
 And charity and love, ere yet he taste
 The bitter draught of death, ere yet he rise
 Victorious o'er the universal foe,
 And death, and sin, and hell in triumph lead.
 His by the right of conquest is mankind,
 And in sweet servitude and golden bonds
 Were ty'd to him for ever.—O how easy
 Is his ungalling yoke, and all his burdens
 'Tis ecstasy to bear! him blessed Shepherd
 His flocks shall follow through the maze of life,
 And shades that tend to day-spring from on high;

And as the radiant roses, ever fading,
 In fuller foliage and more fragrant breath
 Revive in smiling spring, so shall it fare
 With those that love him—for sweet is their favour,

 And all eternity shall be their spring:
 Then shall the gates and everlasting doors,
 At which the King of glory enters in,
 Be to the saints unbar'd: and there, where pleasure

Boasts an undying bloom, where dubious hope
 Is certainty, and grief-attended love
 Is freed from passion—there we'll celebrate
 With worthier numbers, him, who is, and was,
 And in immortal prowess King of kings
 Shall be the Monarch of all worlds for ever.

ON THE
GOODNESS OF THE SUPREME BEING.

A POETICAL ESSAY.

Addressed to the Right Honourable the Earl of Darlington.

ORPHEUS, for * to the Gentiles call'd thy name,
Israel's sweet Psalmist, who alone could wake
Th' inanimate to motion; who alone
The joyful hillocks, the applauding rocks,
And floods with musical persuasion drew:
Thou who to hail and snow gav'st voice and sound,
And mad'st the mute melodious!---greater yet
Was thy divinest skill, and rul'd o'er more
Than art or nature; for thy tuneful touch
Drove trembling Satan from the heart of Saul,
And quell'd the evil angel:---in this breast
Some portion of thy genuine spirit breathe,
And lift me from myself, each thought impure
Banish; each low idea raise, refine,
Enlarge, and sanctify;---so shall the muse
Above the stars aspire, and aim to praise
Her God on earth, as he is prais'd in heaven.

Immense Creator! whose all-powerful hand
Fram'd universal being, and whose eye
Saw like thyself, that all things form'd were good;
Where shall the tim'rous bard thy praise begin,
Where end the purest sacrifice of song,
And just thanksgiving?---The thought-kindling
light,

Thy prime production, darts upon my mind
Its vivifying beams, my heart illumines,
And fills my soul with gratitude and thee.
Hail to the cheerful rays of ruddy morn,
That paint the streaky east, and blithsome rouse
The birds, the cattle, and mankind from rest!
Hail to the freshness of the early breeze,
And Iris dancing on the new-fall'n dew!
Without the aid of yonder golden globe,
Lost were the garnet's lustre, lost the lily,
The tulip, and auricula's spotted pride;
Lost were the peacock's plumage, to the sight
So pleasing in its pomp and glossy glow.
O thrice illustrious! were it not for thee
Those pansies, that reclining from the bank,
View through th' immaculate, pellucid stream
Their portraiture in the inverted heaven,
Might as well change their triple boast, the white,
The purple, and the gold, that sat ontvie
The eastern monarch's garb, ev'n with the dock,
Ev'n with the baneful hemlock's irksome green.
Without thy aid, without thy gladsome beams
The tribes of woodland warblers would remain
Mute on the bending branches, nor recite
The praise of him, who, e'er he form'd their lord,
Their voices tun'd to transport, wing'd their flight,
And bade them call for nurture, and receive;
And lo! they call; the blackbird and the thrush,
The woodlark, and the redbreast jointly call;
Hé hears and feeds their feather'd families,
He feeds his sweet musicians,---nor neglects
Th' invoking ravens in the greenwood wide;
And through their throats coarce rattling hurt
the ear,

* See this conjecture strongly supported by Delany, in his Life of David.

They mean it all for music, thanks and praise
They mean, and leave ingratitude to man;---
But not to all,---for hark! the organs blow
Their swelling notes round the cathedral's dome,
And grace th' harmonious choir, celestial feast
To pious ears, and med'cine of the mind;
The thrilling trebles of the manly base
Join in accordance meet, and with one voice
All to the sacred subject suit their song:
While in each breast sweet melancholy reigns
Angelically pensive, till the joy
Improves and purifies;---the solemn scene
The sun through storied panes surveys with awe,
And bashfully withholds each bolder beam.
Here, as her home, from morn to eve frequents
The cherub gratitude;---behold her eyes!
With love and gladness weepingly they shed
Ecstatic smiles; the incense, that her hands
Uprear, is sweeter than the breath of May Caught from the nectarine's blossom, and her voice
Is more than voice can tell; to him she sings,
To him who feeds, who clothes, and who adorns,
Who made and who preserves, whatever dwells
In air, in stedfast earth, or fickle sea.
O he is good, he is immensely good!
Who all things form'd, and form'd them all for man;

Who mark'd the climates, varied every zone,
Dispensing all his blessings for the best,
In order and in beauty;---raise, attend,
Attest, and praise, ye quarters of the world!
Bow down, ye elephants, submissive bow
To him; who made the mite; though Asia's pride,
Ye carry armies on your tow'r-crown'd backs,
And grace the turban'd tyrants, bow to him
Who is as great, as perfect, and as good
In his less-striking wonders, till at length
The eye's at fault and seeks th' assisting glass.
Approach and bring from Araby the blest
The fragrant cassia, frankincense and myrrh,
And meekly kneeling at the altar's foot,
Lay all the tributary incense down.
Stoop, fable Africa, with rev'rence stoop,
And from thy brow take off the painted plume;
With golden ingots all thy camels load,
T' adorn his temples, hasten with thy spear
Reverted, and thy trusty bow unstrung,
While unpursu'd the lions roam and roar,
And ruin'd tow'rs, rude rocks and caverns wide,
Remurmur to the glorious, surly sound.
And thou, fair India, whose immense domain
To counterpoise the hemisphere extends,
Haste from the west, and with thy fruits and flow'rs,

Thy mines and med'cines, wealthy maid, attend.
More than the plenteousness so fam'd to flow
By fabled bards from Amalthea's horn,
Is thine; thine therefore be a portion due
Of thanks and praise: come with thy brilliant crown
And vest of fur; and from thy fragrant lap
Pomegranates and the rich ananas pour.
But chiefly thou, Europa, seat of grace
And Christian excellence, his goodness own,
Forth from ten thousand temples pour his praise;
Clad in the armour of the living God
Approach, unsheath the Spirit's flaming sword;
Faith's shield, salvation's glory,---compass'd helm

And murmurs louder ceas'd below,
Here let us rest a while, pleas'd to behold
Th' all-beautiful horizon's wide expanse,
Far as the eagle's ken. Here tow'ring spires
First catch the eye, and turn the thoughts to heav'n.
The lofty elms in humble majesty
Bend with the breeze to shade the solemn grove,
And spread an holy darkness; Ceres there
Shines in her golden vesture. Here the meads,
Enrich'd by Flora's dedal hand, with pride
Expose their spotted verdure. Now are you,
Pomona, absent; you, 'midst hoary leaves,
Swell the vermilion cherry; and on yon trees
Suspend the pippin's palatable gold.
There old Sylvanus, in that moss-grown grot,
Dwells with his wood-nymphs: they, with chap-
lets green,

And russet mantles oft bedight, aloft
From yon bent oaks, in Medway's bosom fair,
Wonder at silver bleak, and prickly pearch,
That swiftly through their floating forests glide.
Yet not even these—these ever-varied scenes
Of wealth and pleasure can engage my eyes
T' overlook the lowly hawthorn, if from thence
The thrush, sweet warbler, chants th' unstudied lays,

Which Phœbus self vaulting from yonder cloud
Refulgent, with enliv'ning rays inspires.
But neither tow'ring spires, nor lofty elms,
Nor golden Ceres, nor the meadows green,
Nor orchards, nor the russet-mantled nymphs,
Which to the murmurs of the Medway dance,
Nor sweetly warbling thrush, with half those charms

Attract my eyes—as yonder hop-land close;
Joint work of art and nature, which reminds
The muse, and to her theme the wand'rer calls.

Here, then, with pond'rous vehicles and teams
Thy rustics send, and from the caverns deep
Command them bring the chalk: thence to the kiln
Convey, and temper with Vulcanian fires.
Soon as 'tis form'd, thy lime with bounteous hand
O'er all thy lands disseminate; thy lands
Which first have felt the soft'ning spade, and drank
The strength'ning vapours from nutritious marl.

This done, select the choicest hop, t' infer,
Fresh in the opening glebe. Say then, my muse,
Its various kinds, and from th' effect and vile,
The eligible separate with care.

The noblest species is by Kentish wights
The master-hop yclep'd. Nature to him
Has giv'n a stouter stalk, patient of cold,
Or Phœbus ev'n in youth, his verdant blood
In brisk salutation circulates and flows
Indefinitely vigorous: the next

Is arid, fetid, infecund, and gross,
Significantly styl'd the Fryar: the last
Is call'd the Savage, who in ev'ry wood,
And ev'ry hedge, unintruduc'd, intrudes.
When such the merit of the candidates,
Easy is the election; but, my friend,
Wouldst thou ne'er fail, to Kent direct thy way,
Where no one shall be frustrated that seeks Ought that is great or good. * Hail, Cantium, hail!

* Salve magna parens frugum, Saturnia tellus
Magna virum; tibi res antique laudis et artis
Vol. XI.

Illustrious parent of the finest fruits!
Illustrious parent of the best of men!
For thee antiquity's thrice sacred springs
Placidly stagnant at their fountain-head,
I rashly dare to trouble (if from thence
I ought, for thy utility can drain,
And in thy towns adopt th' Aescraean muse.
Hail heroes! hail invaluable gems!
Fav'rites of Heav'n! to whom the general doom
Is all remitted, who alone possess
Of Adam's sons fair Eden—rest ye here.
Nor seek an earthly good above the hop;
A good, untasted by your ancient kings,
And to your very fires almost unknown.

In those blest days, when great Eliz'a reign'd
O'er the adoring nation when fair peace
O'erpread an unsain'd olive round the land,
Or laurel'd war did teach our winged fleets
To lord it o'er the world; when our brave fires
Drank valour from uncauponed beer;
The hop (before an interdicted plant,
Shun'd like fell aconite), began to hang
Its folded siffoles from the golden vine,
And bloom'd a shade to Cantium's sunny shores
Delightful, and in cheerful goblets laugh
Potent, what time Aquareius' urn impends
To kill the dulseful day—potent to quench
The Syrian ardour, and autumnal ills
To heal with mild potatoes; sweeter far
Than those which erst the subtle * Hengist mix'd
T' intral voluptuous Vortigeri. He, with love
Emasculate and wise, the toils of war
Neglected; and to dalliance vile and sloth
Enauncipated, saw th' encroaching Saxons
With unaffected eyes; his hand which ought
T' have shook the spear of justice, soft and smooth,
Play'd ravishing divisions on the lyre:
This Hengist nat'k'd, and (for curs'd insolence
Soon fattens on impunity, and rises
Briareus from a dwarf)! fair Thane't gain'd.
Nor stopt he here: but to immense attempts
Ambition, sky aspiring, led him on Advent'rous. He an only daughter rear'd,
Roxena, matchless maid! nor rear'd in vain.
Her eagle-ey'd callidity, deceit,
And fairy-fiction, rais'd above her sex,
And furnish'd with a thousand various wiles
Preposterous more than female; wondrous fair
She was, and docile, which her pious nurse
Observ'd, and early in each female fraud
Her 'gan initiate: well she knew to smile,
Whene'er vexation gall'd her—did she weep?
'Twas not sincere, the fountains of her eyes
Play'd artificial streams, yet so well forc'd,
They look'd like nature; for ev'n art to her
Was nat'ral, and contrarities
Seem'd in Roxena congruous and allied.
Such was she, when brisk Vortigeri beheld,
(Ill-fated prince)! and lov'd her. She perceiv'd,
Soon she perceiv'd her conquest; soon she told,
With hasty joy transported, her old sire.
The Saxon inly smil'd, and to his isle

Ingrédior, sanctos aunos recludere fontes,
Aescraemque cano Romana per oppida carmen.
Virg. Georg. 2.

* See the following story, told at large in Lambard's Perambulation of Kent.

The willing prince invited : but first bade
 The nymph prepare the potions ; such as fire
 The blood's meand'ring rivulets, and depresso
 To love the soul. Lo ! at the noon of night,
 Thrice Hecate invok'd the maid—and thrice
 The goddess stoop'd assent ; forth from a cloud
 She stoop'd, and gave the philters pow'r to charm.
 These in a splendid cup of burnish'd gold
 The lovely forcerefs mix'd, and to the prince
 Health, peace, and joy, propin'd, but to herself
 Mutter'd dire exorcisms and wish'd effect
 To the love-creating draught ; lowly the bow'd
 Fawning insinuation bland, that might Deceive Laertes' son ; her lucid orbs
 Shed copiously the oblique rays ; her face
 Like modest Luna's shone, but not so pale,
 And with no borrow'd lustre ; on her brow
 Smil'd fallacy, while summoning each grace, Kneeling she gave the cup. The prince (for who,
 Who could have spurn'd a suppliant so divine) ?
 Drank eager, and in ecstasy devour'd
 Th' ambrosial perturbation ; mad with love
 He clasp'd her, and in Hymeneal bands
 At once the nymph demand'd and obtain'd.
 Now Hengist, all his ample wish fulfill'd,
 Exulted ; aw'd from Kent th' uxorious prince
 Exterminated, and usurp'd his feat.
 Long did he reign ; but all-devouring time
 Has raz'd his palace walls—perchance on them
 Grows the green hop, and o'er his crumbled bust,
 In spiral twines, ascends the scantile pole.—
 But now to plant, to dig, to dung, to weed ;
 Tasks humble, but important, ask the muse.
 Come, fair magician, sportive fancy, come,
 With wildest imagery : thou child of thought,
 From thy aerial citadel descend,
 And (for thou canst) assist me. Bring with thee
 Thy all-creative talisman ; with thee
 The active spirits ideal, tow'ring flights,
 That hover o'er the muse-refounding groves,
 And all thy colourings, all thy shapes display.
 Thou, too, be here, experience, so shall I
 My rules, nor in low prose jejuneIy say,
 Nor in smooth numbers musically err :
 But vain is fancy, and experience vain,
 If thou, O Hesiod ! Virgil of our land,
 * Or hear'st thou rather, Milton, bard divine,
 Whose greatness who shalt imitate, save thee ?
 If thou, O † Phillips ! sav'ring dost not hear
 Me, inexpert of verse ; with gentle hand
 Uprear the unpinion'd muse, high on the top
 Of that immeasurable mount, that far
 Exceeds thine own Plinlimmon, where thou tun'st
 With Phœbus self thy lyre. Give me to turn
 Th' unwieldy subject with thy graceful ease,
 Extol its baseness with thy art ; but chief illumine, and invigorate with thy fire.

When Phœbus looks through Aries on the spring,
 And vernal flow'rs teem with the dulcet fruit,
 Autumnal pride ! delay not then thy sets
 In Tellus' facile bosom to depose
 Timely ; if thou art wife the bulkiest choose ;
 To every root three joints indulge, and form

* At ipse

Subtilis Veterum judex et callidus audis. HORAT.

† Mr. John Phillips, author of Cyder, a poem.

The quincunx with well-regulated hills.
 Soon from the dung-enriched earth, their heads
 Thy young plants will uplift their virgin arms,
 They'll stretch, and, marriageable, claim the pole.
 Nor frustrate thou their wishes, so thou may'st
 Expect an hopeful issue, jolly mirth,
 Sister of taleful Momus, tuneful song,
 And fat good-nature with her honest face.
 But yet in the novitiate of their love,
 And tenderness of youth suffice small shoots
 Cut from the widow'd willow, nor provide Poles insurmountable as yet. 'Tis then
 When twice bright Phœbus' vivifying ray,
 Twice the cold touch of winter's icy hand,
 They've felt ; 'tis then we fell sublimer props.
 'Tis then the sturdy woodman's ax from far Resounds, resounds, and hark ! with hollow groans

Down tumble the big trees, and rushing roll
 O'er the crush'd crackling brake, while in his cave
 Forlorn, dejected, 'midst the weeping Dryads
 Laments Sylvanus for his verdant care.
 The ash or willow for thy use select,
 Or storm enduring chestnut ; but the oak
 Unfit for this employ, for nobler ends
 Reserve untouched ; she when by time matur'd,
 Capacious of some British demigod,
 Vernon, or Warren, shall with rapid wing
 Infuriate, like Jove's armour-bearing bird,
 Fly on thy foes ; they, like the parted waves,
 Which to the brazen beak murmuring give way
 Amaz'd and roaring from the sight recede.—
 In that sweet month, when to the list'ning swains
 Fair Philomet sings love, and every cot
 With garlands blooms bedight, with bandage
 meet

The tendrils bind, and to the tall pole tie,
 Else soon, too soon their meretricious arms
 Round each ignoble clod they'll fold, and leave
 Averse the lordly prop. Thus, have I heard
 Where there's no mutual tie, no strong connection

Of love-conspiring hearts, off the young bride
 Has prostituted to her slaves her charms,
 While the infatuated lord admires
 * Fresh-butting sprouts, and issue not his own.
 Now turn the glebe : soon with correcting hand
 When smiling June in jocund dance leads on Long days and happy hours, from every vine
 Dock the redundant branches, and once more
 With the sharp spade thy numerous acres till.
 The shovel next must lend its aid, enlarge
 The little hillocks, and craze the weeds.
 This in that month its title which derives
 From great Augustus' ever sacred name !
 Sovereign of science ! master of the muse !
 Neglected genius' firm ally ! of worth
 Best judge, and best rewarder, whose applause
 To bards was fame and fortune ! O ! 'twas well,
 Well did you too in this, all glorious heroes !
 Ye Romans !—on time's wing you've stamp'd his praise,
 And time shall bear it to eternity.

Now are our labours crown'd with their reward,
 Now bloom the florid hops, and in the stream

* Miraturque novas frondes, et non sua poma.

VIRO.

Shine in their floating silver, while above
 T' embow'ring branches culminate; and form
 A walk impervious to the sun; the poles
 In comely order stand; and while you cleave
 With the small skiff the Medway's lucid wave,
 In comely order still their ranks preserve,
 And seem to march along th' extensive plain.
 In neat arrangement thus the men of Kent,
 With native oak at once adorn'd and arm'd,
 Intrepid march'd; for well they knew the cries
 Of dying freedom, and Afræa's voice,
 Who as she fled, to echoing woods complain'd
 Of tyranny, and William; like a god,
 Refulgent stood the conqueror, on his troops
 He sent his looks enliv'ning as the sun's,
 But on his foes frown'd agony, and death:
 On his left side in bright emblazonry
 His falchion burn'd; forth from his sevenfold
 shield

A basilisk shot adamant; his bow [crown'd
 Wore clouds of fury!--on that with plumage
 Of various hue sat a tremendous cone:
 Thus sits high-canopied above the clouds,
 Terrific beauty of nocturnal skies,
 * Northern Aurora; she through th' azure air
 Shoots, shoots her trem'ulous rays in painted streaks
 Continual, while waving to the wind
 O'er night's dark veil her lucid tresses flow.
 The traveller views th' unseasonable day
 Astound, the proud bend lowly to the earth,
 The pious matrons tremble for the world.
 But what can daunt th' insuperable souls
 Of Cantium's matchless sons! on they proceed,
 All innocent of fear; each face express'd
 Contemptuous admiration, while they view'd
 The well fed brigades of embroider'd slaves
 That drew the sword for gain. First of the van,
 With an enormous bough, a shepherd swain
 Whistled with rustic notes; but such as show'd
 A heart magnanimous: the men of Kent
 Follow the tuneful swain, while o'er their heads
 The green leaves whisper, and the big boughs bend. [lyre

'Twas thus the Thracian, whose all-quick'ning
 The floods inspir'd, and taught the rocks to feel,
 Enchanted dancing Hæmus, to the tune,
 The lute's soft tune! the flutt'ring branches wave,
 The rocks enjoy it, and the rivulets hear,
 The hillocks skip, emerge the humble vales,
 And all the mighty mountain nods applause.
 The conqueror view'd them, and as one that sees
 The vast abrupt of Scylla, or as one
 That from th' oblivious streams of Lethe's pool
 Has drank eternal apathy, he stood.
 His host an universal panic seiz'd
 Prodigious, inopine; their armour shook,
 And clatter'd to the trembling of their limbs;
 Some to the walking wilder'ness 'gan run
 Confus'd, and in th' inhospitable shade
 For shelter sought.--Wretches! they shelter find,
 Eternal shelter in the arms of death!
 Thus when Aquarius pours out all his urn
 Down on some lonesome heath, the traveller

* Aurora Borealis, or lights in the air; a phenomenon which of late years has been very frequent here, and in all the more northern countries.

That wanders o'er the wintry waste accepts
 The invitation of some spreading bæch
 Joyous; but soon the treach'rous gloom betrays
 Th' unwary visitor, while on his head
 Th' enlarging drops in double show'rs descend.

And now no longer in disguise the men
 Of Kent appear; down they all drop their boughs,
 And shine in brazen panoply divine.
 Enough--Great William (for full well he knew How vain would be the contest) to the sons
 Of glorious Cantium gave their lives, and laws,
 And liberties secure, and to the prowess
 Of Cantium's sons, like Cæsar, deign'd to yield:
 Cæsar and William! hail immortal worthies,
 Illustrious vanquish'd! Cantium, if to them,
 Posterity with all her chiefs unborn;
 Ought similar, ought second has to boast.
 Once more (so prophecies the muse) thy sons
 Shall triumph, emulous of their fires--till then
 With olive, and with hop-land garlands crown'd,
 O'er all thy land reign plenty, reign fair peace.

BOOK II.

" Omnia quæ multo ante memor provisa repones,
 " Si te digna manet divini gloria ruris."

VIRG. Geor. lib. 2.

At length the muse her destin'd task resumes
 With joy; agen o'er all her hop-land groves
 She seeks t' expatiate free of wing: Long while
 For a much-loving, much-lov'd youth she wept,
 Sorrowing in silence o'er th' untimely urn.
 Hush then, effeminate sobs; and thou, my heart,
 Rebel to grief no more--and yet a while,
 A little while, indulge the friendly tears.
 O'er the wild world, like Noah's dove, in vain
 I seek the olive peace, around me wide
 See! see! the wat'ry waste--in vain forlorn
 I call the Phœnix fair sincerity;
 Alas!--extinguish'd to the skies she fled,
 And left no heir behind her. Where is now
 Th' eternal smile of goodness? where is now
 That all-extensive charity of soul,
 So rich in sweetness, that the classic sounds
 In elegance Augustan cloth'd, the wit
 That flow'd perennial, hardly were observ'd,
 Or, if observ'd, set off that brighter gem.
 How oft, and yet how seldom did it seem!
 Have I enjoy'd his converse! when we met;
 The hours how swift they sweetly fled, and till Agen I saw him, how they loiter'd. Oh!
 † Theophilus, thou dear departed soul, [hail
 What flattering tales thou told'st me? how thou'dst
 My muse, and took't imaginary walks
 All in my hopland groves; stay yet, oh stay!
 Thou dear deluder, thou hast seen but half--
 He's gone! and ought that's equal to his praise
 Fame has not for me, though she prove most kind,
 Howe'er this verse be sacred to thy name,
 These tears, the last sad duty of a friend.
 Oft I'll indulge the pleasurable pain
 Of recollection; oft on Medway's banks
 I'll muse on thee full pensive; while her streams
 Regardful ever of my grief, shall flow

† Mr. Theophilus Wheeler, of Christ Church, Cambridge.

In fallen silence silverly along
 The weeping shores---or else accordant with
 My loud laments, shall ever and anon
 Make melancholy music to the shades,
 The hopland shades, that on her banks expose
 Serpentine vines and flowing locks of gold.
 Ye smiling nymphs, th' inseparable train
 Of saffron Ceres; ye, that gamefome dance,
 And sing to jolly Autumn, while he stands
 With his right hand poizing the scales of heav'n,
 And while his left grasps Amalthea's horn:
 Young chorus of fair bacchanals, descend,
 And leave awhile the sickle; yonder bill, [care.
 Where stand the loaded hop-poles, claims your
 There mighty Bacchus seated crosses the bin,
 Waits your attendance---there he glad reviews
 His paunch approaching to immensity
 Still nearer, and with pride of heart surveys
 Obedient mortals, and the world his own.
 See! from the great metropolis they rush,
 Th' industrious vulgar. They, like prudent bees,
 In Kent's wide garden roam, expert to crop
 The flow'ry hop, and provident to work,
 Er: winter numb their sunburnt hands, and winds
 Engoal them, murmuring in their gloomy cells.
 From these, such as appear the rest t' excel
 In strength and young agility, select.
 These shall support with vigour and address
 The bin-man's weighty office; now extract
 From the sequacious earth the pole, and now
 Unmerry from the closely clinging vine.
 O'er twice three pickers, and no more, extend
 To bin-man's sway; unless thy ears can bear
 The crack of poles continual, and thine eyes
 Behold unmov'd the hurrying peasant tear
 Thy wealth, and throw it on the thankless ground.
 But first the careful planter will consult
 His quantity of acres, and his crop,
 How many and how large his kilns; and then
 Proportion'd to his wants the hands provide.
 But yet of greater consequence and cost,
 One thing remains unsung, a man of faith
 And long experience, in whose thund'ring voice
 Lives hoarse authority, potent to quell
 The frequent frays of the tumultuous crew.
 He shall preside o'er all thy hop-land store,
 Severe dictator! his unerring hand,
 And eye inquisitive, in heedful guise,
 Shall to the brink the measure fill, and fair
 On the twin registers the work record.
 And yet I've known them own a female reign,
 And gentle *Marianne's soft Orphean voice
 Has hymn'd sweet lessons of humanity
 To the wild brutal crew. Oft her command
 Has sav'd the pillars of the hop-land state,
 The lofty poles from ruin, and sustain'd,
 Like Anna, or Eliza, her domain,
 With more than manly dignity. Oft I've seen,
 Ev'n at her frown the boist'rous uproar cease,
 And the mad pickers, tam'd to diligence,
 Call from the bin the sprawling sprigs, and leaves
 That stain the sample, and its worth debate.
 All things thus settled and prepar'd, what now
 Can stop the planters purposes? unless
 The heavens frown dissent, and ominous winds

* The author's youngest sister.

Howl through the concave of the troubled sky.
 And oft, alas! the long experienc'd wights
 (Oh! could they too prevent them) storms foresee.
 * For, as the storm rides on the rising clouds,
 Fly the fleet wild-geese far away, or else
 The heifer towards the zenith rears her head,
 And with expanded nostrils snuffs the air:
 The swallows too their airy circuits weave,
 And screaming skim the brook; and sen bred frogs
 Forth from their hoarse throats their old grudge
 Or from her earthly coverlets the ant [recite:
 Heaves her huge eggs along the narrow way:
 Or bends † Thaumantia's variegated bow
 Athwart the cope of heav'n: or sable crows
 Obstreperous of wing, in clouds combine:
 Besides, unnumber'd troops of birds marine,
 And Asia's feather'd flocks, that in the muds
 Of flow'ry edg'd Cayster wont to prey,
 Now in the shallows duck their speckled heads,
 And lust to lave in vain, their unctious plumes
 Repulsive baffle their efforts: hearken next
 How the curs'd raven, with her harmful voice,
 Invokes the rain, and croaking to herself,
 Struts on some spacious solitary shore.
 Nor want thy servants and thy wife at home
 Signs to preface the show'r; for in the hall
 Sheds Niobe her precious tears, and warns
 Beneath thy leaden tubes to fix the vase,
 And catch the falling dew-drops, which supply
 Soft water and salubrious, far the best
 To soak thy hops, and brew thy generous beer.
 But though bright Phœbus smile, and in the skies
 The purple-rob'd serenity appear;
 Though ev'ry cloud be fled, yet if the rage
 Of Boreas, or the blasting east prevail,
 The planter has enough to check his hopes,
 And in due bounds confine his joys; for see
 The ruffian winds in their abrupt career,
 Leave not a hope behind, or at the best
 Mangle the circling vine, and intercept
 The juice nutritious: fatal means, alas!
 Their colour and condition to destroy.
 Haste then, ye peasants; pull the poles, the hops:
 Where are the bins? run, run, ye nimble maids,
 Move ev'ry muscle, ev'ry nerve extend,
 To save our crop from ruin, and ourselves.

* Nuoquam imprudentibus imber
 Obsuit. Aut illum surgentem villibus imis
 Acriâ fugere grues! aut bucua cœlum
 Sulpicibus, patulis captavit naribus auras:
 Aut arguta lacus circumvolitavit hirundo:
 Et veterem in limo ranæ cœcinere querelam.
 Sæpius et testis penetrabilibus extulit ova
 Augustum formica terens iter, et bibit ingens
 Arcus, et e pastu decedens agmine magno
 Corvorum increpuit densis exercitus alis.
 Jam varias pelagi volucres, et quæ Asia circum
 Dulcibus in stagnis rimantur pratra Caystri,
 Certatim largos humeris insundero rores;
 Nunc caput objectare fretis, nunc currere in undas,
 Et studio incaustum videas gestire lavandi.
 Tum cornix plena pluvium vocat improba voce,
 Et sola in sicca secum spatiat ardua arena,
 Nec nocturna quidem carpentes pensa puellæ
 Nescivere hyemem.

VIRG. Georg. I.

† Iris.

Soon as bright Chanticleer explodes the night
With flutt'ring wings, and hymns the new-born
day,

The bugle-horn inspire, whose clam'rous bray
Shall rouse from sleep the rebel rout, and tune
To temper for the labours of the day.
Wisely the several stations of the bins
By lot determine. Justice this, and this Fair prudence does demand; for not without
A certain method couldst thou rule the mob
Irrational, nor every where alike
Fair hangs the hop to tempt the picker's hand.

Now see the crew mechanic might and main
Labour with lively diligence, inspir'd
By appetite of gain and lust of praise:
What mind so petty, servile, so debas'd,
As not to know ambition? her great sway
From Colin Clout to emperors she exerts.
To err is human, human to be vain.
'Tis vanity, and mock desire of fame,
That prompts the rustic, on the steeple top
Sublime, to mark the arch of his shoe,
And in the outline to engrave his name.
With pride of heart the churchwarden surveys,
High o'er the bellfry, girt with birds and flow'rs,
His story wrote in capitals: "'twas I
"That bought the font; and I repair'd the pews."
With pride like this the emulating mob
Strive for the mastery--who first may fill
The belling bin, and cleaneft cull the hops,
Nor ought retards, unless invited out
By Sol's declining, and the evening's calm,
Læander leads Lætitia to the scene
Of shade and fragrance--then th' exulting band
Of prickers male and female, seize the fair
Reluctant, and with boist'rous force and brute,
By cries unnov'd they bury her i' th' bin.
Nor does the youth escape--him too they seize,
And in such posture place as best may serve
To hide his charmer's blushes. Then with shouts
They rend the echoing air, and from them both
(So custom has ordain'd), a large claim.

Thus much be sung of picking--next succeeds
Th' important care of curing--quit the field,
And at the kiln th' instructive muse attend.
On your hair-cloth eight inches deep, nor more,
Let the green hops lie lightly; next expand
The smoothest surface with the toothy rake.
Thus far is just above; but more it boots
That charcoal flames burn equally below;
The charcoal flames, which from thy corded wood,
Or antiquated poles, with wond'rous skill,
The sable priests of Vulcan shall prepare.
Constant and moderate let the heat ascend;
Which to affect there are, who with success
Place in the kiln the ventilating fan.
Hail, learned, useful * man! whose head and heart
Conspire to make us happy, deign t' accept
One honest verse; and if thy industry
Has serv'd the hop-land cause, the muse forebodes
This sole invention, both in use and fame,
The † mystic fan of Bacchus shall exceed.

When the fourth hour expires, with careful hand
The half-bak'd hops turn over. Soon as time
Has well exhausted twice two glasses more,

They'll leap and crackle with their bursting seeds,
For use domestic, or for sale mature.

There are, who in the choice of cloth t' enfold
Their wealthy crop, the viler, coarser fort,
With prodigal economy prefer:
All that is good is cheap, all dear that's base.
Besides, the planter should a bait prepare,
T' entrap the chapman's notice, and divert
Shrewd observation from her busy pry.

When in the bag thy hops the rustic treads,
Let him wear heellefs sandal; nor presume
Their fragraney barefooted to defile:
Such filthy ways for slaves in Malaga
Leave we to practise--whence I've often seen,
When beautiful Dorinda's iv'ry hands
Has built the pastry-fabric (food divine
For Christmas gambols, and the hour of mirth),
As the dry'd foreign fruit, with piercing eye,
She culls suspicious--lo! she starts, she frowns
With indignation at a negro's nail.

Shouldst thou thy harvest for the mart design,
Be thine own factor; nor employ those drones
Who've stings, but make no honey, selfish slaves!
That thrive and fatten on the planter's toil.

What then remains unsung? unless the care
To stock thy poles oblique in comely cones,
Lest rot or rain destroy them--'tis a sight
Most seemly to behold, and gives, O winter!
A landskip not unpleasing even to thee.

And now, ye rivals of the hop-land state,
Madam and Dorovernia now rejoice,
How great amidst such rivals to excel!
Let * Grenovium boast (for boast she may)
The birth of great Eliza--Hail, my queen!
And yet I'll call thee by a dearer name;
My countrywoman, hail! thy worth alone
Gives fame to worlds, and makes whole ages glorious!

Let Sevenoaks vaunt the hospitable seat
Of † Knoll most ancient; awfully, my muse,
These social scenes of grandeur and delight,
Of love and veneration let me tread.

How oft beneath yon oak has amorous Prior Awaken'd echo with sweet Chloë's name!
While noble Sackville heard, hearing approv'd,
Approving, greatly recompens'd. But he,
Alas! is number'd with th' illustrious dead,
And orphan merit has no guardian now!

Next Shipbourne, though her precincts are confin'd

To narrow limits, yet can show a train
Of village beauties, pastorally sweet,
And rurally magnificent. ‡ Fairlawn
Opes her delightful prospect; dear Fairlawn
There, where at once at variance and agreed,
Nature and art hold dalliance. There, where rills Kiss the green drooping herbage; there, where trees,

The tall trees tremble at th' approach of heav'n,
And bow their salutation to the sun,
Who fosters all their foliage--these are thine;
Yes, little Shipbourne, boast that these are thine--
And if--but oh!--and if 'tis no disgrace,
The birth of him who now records thy praise.

* Greenwich, where Queen Elizabeth was born.

† The seat of the Duke of Dorset.

‡ The seat of Lord Vane.

* Dr. Hales.

† Mystica Vannus Iacchi. Virg. Cærg. I.

Nor shalt thou, Mereworth, remain unsung,
Where noble Westmoreland, his country's friend,
Bids British greatness love the silent shade,
Where piles superb, in classic elegance,
Arise, and all is Roman, like his heart.

Nor Chatham, though it is not thine to show
The lofty forest, or the verdant lawns,
Yet niggard silence shall not grudge thee praise:
The lofty forests, by thy sons prepar'd,
Becomes the warlike navy, braves the floods,
And gives Sylvanus empire in the main.
Oh that Britannia, in the day of war,
Would not alone Minerva's valour trust,
But also hear her wisdom! Then her oaks,
Shap'd by her own mechanics, would alone
Her island fortify, and fix her fame;
Nor would she weep, like Rachael, for her sons,
Whose glorious blood, in mad profusion,
In foreign lands is shed---and shed in vain.

THE HILLIAD:

AN EPIC POEM.

— Pallas te hoc vulnere, Pallas
Immolat, et pœnam scelerato ex sanguine sumit.

VIRG.

A LETTER

TO A FRIEND AT THE UNIVERSITY OF CAM-BRIDGE.

DEAR *****

I AM now to acknowledge several letters, which I lately received from you, without any return on my part. As I have been very much hurried of late with a multiplicity of affairs, I must beg you will not only be kind enough to overlook my past omission, but to indulge me for a little time longer. As soon as I am master of sufficient leisure, I will give you my sentiments without reserve, concerning the affair, about which you have thought proper to consult me; for the present, I desire you will consider this is a receipt for your many favours, or a promissory note to discharge any debt of friendship as soon as possible.

The design and colouring of a poem, such as you have planned, are not to be executed in a hurry, but with slow and careful touches; which will give that finishing to your piece, remarkable in every thing that comes from your hand, and which I could wish the precipitancy of my temper would permit me to aim at upon all occasions. I long to see you take a new flight to the regions of fame; not upon unequal wings, that sometimes rise to a degree of elevation, and then fall again, but with an uniform tenor, like the bird in Virgil:

Radit iter liquidum, celeres neque commovet alas.

I have been now for about three weeks in this scene of smoke and dust, and I think the republic of letters seems to be lamentably upon the decline in this metropolis. Attornies' clerks, and raw un-experienced boys, are the chief critics we have at present. With a supercilious look, and peremptory voice, which they have caught from a few of their oracles, as dark and ignorant as themselves, these striplings take upon them to decide upon fable, character, language, and sentiment.

Nefcis, heu nefcis dominæ fastidia Romæ;
Crede mihi, nimium Martia turba sapit.

With regard to writers, the town swarms with them; and the aim of them all is pretty much the same, viz. to elevate and surprise, as Mr. Bays says. At the head of these still continues the Inspector. As we frequently laughed together concerning this writer, when you were last in town, I need not here give you a description of his parts and genius. I remember you expressed great amazement at the reception his essays seemed to meet with in all our coffee-houses; but you must consider, that there are artifices to gain success, as well as merit to deserve it. The former of these his Inspectorship is eminently possessed of; and, sooner than fail, he will not hesitate, in order to make himself talked of at any rate, to become most glaringly ridiculous. This answers the purpose of the booksellers, as well, perhaps, as Attic wit; and hence it results, that they are willing to continue him in their pay.

In the packet which I have sent to you by the stage-coach, you will find a paper, called the Impertinent, written by himself. In this curious piece he has not stopped at abusing his own dear person; which is the only subject he has not handled with his usual malice; and the rest of it is made a vehicle for invective against Mr. Fielding and me. It was ushered into the world in a pompous manner, as if intended to be continued; but no second number was ever published: and, to show you a farther instance of his fallacy, he thence took occasion to triumph over a pretender to essay writing; which, he would fain insinuate, cannot be executed by any one but himself.

This unfair dealing, so unworthy a man, who aspires to be a member of the serene republic of letters, induced me to wave, for a time, the design you know I was engaged in, in order to bestow a few lines upon this scribbler, who, in my eyes, is a disgrace to literature. In the first heat of my poetic fury, I formed the idea of another Dunciad, which I intended to call after the name of my hero, The Hilliad. The first book of it you will receive, among other things, by the coach; and I shall be glad to be favoured with your opinion of it.

If it conduces to your entertainment, I shall have gained my end; for though I have received such provocation from this man, I believe I shall never carry it any further. I really find some involuntary sensations of compassion for him; and I cannot help thinking, that, if he could keep within the bounds of decency and good manners, he would be a rare instance of what may be done by a fluency of periods, without genius, sense, or meaning. Though I am persuaded he is quite incorrigible, I am still reluctant to publish that piece; for I would rather be commended to posterity by the elegant and amiable muses, than by the satiric sifter, politely called by an eminent author---the least engaging of the nine.

On this account I shall proceed no further till you have favoured me with your opinion, by which I will absolutely determine myself. I hope, therefore, you will peruse it as soon as you can with convenience, and return it to me by the stage. You may show it to Jack  and to Mr. *****.

I am, with great sincerity,

Dear *****

Your most obedient humble servant,
London, 15th December 1752. C. SMART.

DEAR SMART,

THE perusal of your poem has given me so much pleasure, that I cannot postpone thanking you for it, by the first opportunity that has offered. I have read it to the persons you desired I should; and they approve the design in the highest manner. I cannot conceive what should make you hesitate a moment about the publication; and, to be free with you, you must not by any means suppress it. When I say this, I must observe, that I should be glad to see you better employed, than in the dissection of an insect; but since the work should be done by somebody, and since you have made such a progress, I must take the liberty to insist, that you will not drop this undertaking.

To speak in plain terms; I look upon it to be indispensably incumbent on you to bring the miscreant to poetic justice: it is what you owe to the cause of learning in general, to your alma mater, this university, and, let me add, it is what you owe to yourself. The world will absolve you from any imputation of ill-nature, when it is considered that the pen is drawn in defence of your own character. Give me leave, upon this occasion, to quote a passage from the Spectator, which I think pertinent to the present subject: "Every honest man ought to look upon himself as in a natural state of war with the libeller and lampooner, and to annoy them, wherever they fall in his way. This is but retaliating upon them, and treating them as they treat others."

Thus thought the polite Mr. Addison, in a case where he was not immediately concerned: and can you doubt what to do, when personally attacked? As soon as the hissing of the snake is heard, some means should be devised to crush him. The advice of Virgil is—"Cape faxa manu, cape robora pastor."

I can tell you that your friends here expect this of you; and we are all unanimous in thinking, that a man who has the honour of belonging to this learned university, and to whom the prize, for displaying with a masterly hand the attributes of his Maker, has been adjudged for three years successively, should not, on any account, suffer himself to be trifled with by so frigid and empty a writer. I would have you reflect, that you launched into the world with many circumstances, that raised a general expectation of you, and the early approbation of such a genius as Mr. Pope, for your elegant version of his ode, made you considered as one, who might hereafter make a figure in the literary world; and let me recommend to you, not to let the laurel, yet green upon your brow, be torn off by the profane hands of an unhallowed hireling. This, I think, as is observed already, you owe to yourself; and to that university which has distinguished you with honour.

Besides the motives of retaliation, which I have urged for the publication of your poem, I cannot help considering this matter in a moral light, and I must avow, that in my eyes it appears an action of very great merit. If to pull off the mask from an impostor, and detect him in his native colours to the view of a long-deluded public, may be looked upon as a service to mankind (as it certainly is), a better opportunity never can offer itself.

In my opinion, the cause of literature is in imminent danger of a total degeneracy, should this writer's diurnal productions meet with further encouragement. Without straining hard for it, I can perceive a corruption of taste diffusing itself throughout the cities of London and Westminster. For a clear vein of thinking, easy natural expression, and an intelligible style, this pretender has substituted brisk question and answer, pert, unmeaning periods, ungrammatical construction, unnatural metaphors, with a profusion of epithets, inconsistent, for the most part, with the real or figurative meaning of his words; and, in short, all the masculine beauties of style, are likely to be banished from among us, by the continuation of his papers for almost two years together.

Now, Sir, I submit it to you, whether this may not lead on to a total depravity of sense and taste. Should the more sober at our coffee-houses be dazzled with false embellishments? Should boys admire this unnatural flourishing? I do not in the least question, but the rising generation will be totally infected with this strange motley style; and thus antithesis and point will be the prevailing turn of the nation.

It is to prevent a contagion of this sort, that Horace took the pen in hand; for this Quintilian favoured the world with his excellent work. The ingenious authors of France have always attended to this point. Truth, they insisted, is the very foundation of fine writing, and that no thought can be beautiful, which is not just, was their constant lesson. To enforce this and preserve a manly way of thinking, Boileau lashed the scribblers of his time, and in our own country the Spectators, Tatlers, and Guardians have laboured for this end. To this we owe the Bathos, in which we find exposed, with the most delicate traits of satire, all false figures in writing; and finally to this we owe the Dunciad of Mr. Pope.

These instances, dear Smart, are sufficient to justify your proceeding, and let me tell you, that a cultivation of taste is a point of more moment than perhaps may appear at first sight. In the course of my reading, I have observed that a corruption in morals has always attended a decline of letters. Of this Mr. Pope seems to be sensible, and, hence we find in the conclusion of his Dunciad, the general progress of dullness over the land is the final coup de grace to every thing decent, every thing laudable, elegant, and polite.

Religion blushing veils her sacred fires,
And unawares morality expires.
Nor public fame, nor private dares to shine,
Nor human spark is left, nor glimpse divine.
Lo! thy dread empire, chaos! is retor'd,
Light dies before thy uncreating word.
Thy hand, great Anarch, lets the curtain fall,
And universal darkness buries all.

I am aware that you may answer to what has been premised, that the man is not of consequence

Enough for all this, and you may observe to me, that at first setting out, I myself called him by the figurative and typical appellation of an insect. But if an insect gets into the sunshine, and there blazes, shines, and buzzes to the annoyance of those, who may be basking in the beams, it is time for the muses wing to brush the thing away. In plain English, the rapidity, with which this writer went on in his progress, was so astonishing, that I really looked upon him to be reserved for the great instrument of dullness in the completion of her work, which certainly must be accomplished, unless a speedy stop be put to that inundation of nonsense and immorality with which he has overwhelmed the nation.

I have mentioned immorality, nor will I retract the word. Has he not attacked, maliciously attacked the reputations of many gentlemen, to whom the world has been greatly obliged?—He did not brandish his goose-quill for any length of time, before he discharged a torrent of abuse upon the Reverend Mr. Francis, whose amiable character, and valuable translation of Horace, have endeared him both to those, who are, and those who are not acquainted with him. Even beauty and innocence were no safeguards against his calumny, and the soft-eyed virgin was by him cruelly obliged to shed the tender tear.

Upon the commencement of the Covent-Garden Journal, Mr. Fielding declared an humorous war against this writer, which was intended to be carried with an amicable pleasantry, in order to contribute to the entertainment of the town. It is recent in every body's memory, how the Inspector behaved upon that occasion. Conscious that there was not an atom of humour in his composition, he had recourse to his usual shifts, and instantly disclosed a private conversation; by which he reduced himself to the alternative mentioned by Mr. Pope; "and if he lies not, must at least betray." Through all Mr. Fielding's inimitable comic romances, we perceive no such thing as personal malice, no private character dragged into light; but every stroke is copied from the volume which nature has unfolded to him; every scene of life is by him represented in its natural colours, and every species of folly or humour is ridiculed with the most exquisite touches. A genius like this is perhaps more useful to mankind, than any class of writers; he serves to dispel all gloom from our minds, to work off our ill-humours by the gay sensations excited by a well-directed pleasantry, and in a vein of mirth he leads his readers into the knowledge of human nature; the most useful and pleasing science we can apply to. And yet so deserv'ing an author has been most grossly treated by this wild essayist, and, not to multiply instances, has he not attempted to raise tumults and divisions in our theatres, contrary to all decency and common sense; and contrary to the practice of all polite writers, whose chief aim has ever been to cherish harmony and good manners, and to diffuse through all ranks of people a just refinement of taste in all our public entertainments?

These considerations, dear Sir, prompt you to the blow; and will justify it when given. I believe, I may venture to add, never had poet so inviting a subject for satire; Pope himself had not so good an hero for his Dunciad. The first worthy who sat in that throne, viz. Lewis Theobald of dull memory, employed himself in matters of some utility, and, upon being dethroned, the person who succeeded, was one, who formerly had some scattered rays of light; and in most of his comedies, though whimsical and extravagant, there are many strokes of drollery; not to mention that the Careless Husband is a finished piece.

But in the hero of the Hilliad all the requisites seem to be united, without one single exception. You remember, no doubt, that in the dissertation prefixed to the Dunciad the efficient qualities of an hero for the little epic are mentioned to be vanity, impudence, and debauchery. These accomplishments, I apprehend, are glaring in the person you have fixed upon. As a single and notable instance of the two first, has he not upon all occasions joined himself to some celebrated name, such as the Right Honourable the Earl of Orrery, or some other such exalted character? I have frequently diverted myself by comparing this proceeding to the cruelty of a tyrant, who used to tie a living person to a dead carcase; and as to your hero's debauchery, there are, I am told, many pleasant instances of it.

Add to these several subordinate qualifications; such as foppery, a surprising alacrity to get into scrapes, with a notable facility of extricating himself, an amazing turn for politics, a wonderful knowledge of herbs, minerals, and plants, and to crown all, a comfortable share of gentle dullness. This gentle dullness is not that impenetrable stupidity, which is remarkable in some men, but it is known by that countenance, which Dr. Garth calls "demurely meek, insipidly serene." It is known by a brisk volubility of speech, a lively manner of saying nothing through an entire paper, and upon all occasions by a conscious simper, short insertions of witty remarks, the frequent exclamation of wonder, the self-applauding chit-chat, and the pleasant repartee.

Upon the whole, dear Smart, I cannot conceive what doubt can remain in your mind about the publication; it is conferring on him that ridicule, which his life, character, and actions deserve. I shall be in town in less than a fortnight, when I shall bring your poem with me, and if you will give me leave, I will help you to some notes; which I think will illustrate many passages.

—"Satyrum ego (ui pudet illas), Adjutor," &c. Juv.

I am, dear Smart,

Yours very sincerely,

Cambridge, Dec. 21. 1752. *** *****

BOOK I.

Thou god of jest, who o'er th' ambrosial bowl,
Giv'it joy to Jove, while laughter shakes the pole;
And thou, fair justice, of immortal line,
Hear, and assist the poet's grand design,
Who aims at triumph by no common ways,
But on the stem of dullness grafts the bays.

O thou whatever name delight thine ear,
Pimp? poet! puffer! pothecary! player!
Whose baseless fame by vanity is buoy'd,
Like the huge earth, self-center'd in the void, 10

Accept one partner thy own worth 't explore,
And in thy praise be singular no more.

Say, muse, what demon, foe to ease and truth,
First from the mortar dragg'd th' advent'rous
youth,

And made him, 'mongst the scribbling sons of men,
Change peace for war, the pestle for the pen?

'Twas on a day (O may that day appear
No more, but lose its station in the year,
In the new style be not its name enroll'd,
But share annihilation in the old)!

A tawny Sybil, whose alluring song
Decoy'd the 'prentices and maiden throng,
First from the counter young Hillario charm'd,
And first his unambitious soul alarm'd---

An old strip'd curtain crosfs her arms was flung,
And tatter'd cap'ry, o'er her shoulders hung;

Her loins with patch-work cincture were begirt,
That more than spoke diversity of dirt;

With age her back was double and awry,
Twain were her teeth, and single was her eye,

Cold palsy shook her head--she seem'd at most
A living corpse, or an untimely ghost,

With voice far-fetch'd from hollow throat pro-
found,

And more than mortal was th' infernal found.
" Sweet boy, who seem'st for glorious deeds
" design'd,

" O come and leave that clyster pipe behind;

" Crosfs this prophetic hand with silver coin,
" And all the wealth and fame I have is thine---

She said--he (for what stripling could withstand)?

Straight with his only sixpence grac'd her hand.
And now the precious fury all her breast

At once invaded, and at once possess'd;

Her eye was fix'd in an ecstasie stare,
And on her head uprose th' astonish'd hair:

No more her colour or her looks the same,
But moonshine madness quite convuls'd her frame,

While, big with fate, again she silence broke,
And in few words voluminously spoke.

" In these three lines athwart thy palm I see,
" Either a tripod, or a triple-tree,

" For, Oh! I ken by mysteries profound,
" Too light to sink, thou never canst be drown'd---

" Whate'er thy end, the fates are now at strife,
" Yet strange variety shall check thy life---

" Thou grand dictator of each public show,
" Wit, moralist, quack, harlequin, and beau,

" Survey man's vice, self-prais'd, and self-pre-
" ferr'd,

" And be th' inspector of th' infected herd;

" By any means aspire at any ends,
" Baseness exalts, and cowardice defends,

" The chequer'd world's before thee--go--fare-
" well,

" Beware of Irishmen---and learn to spell."

Here from her breast th' inspiring fury flew:
She ceas'd---and instant from his sight withdrew.

Fix'd with his fate, and conscious of his worth,
The beardless wight prepar'd to fall forth.

But first ('twas just, 'twas natural to grieve)
He sigh'd, and took a soft pathetic leave.

" Farewell, a long farewell to all my drugs,
" My labell'd vials, and my letter'd jugs;

" And you, ye bearers of no trivial charge,
" Where all my Latin stands inscrib'd at large:

" Ye jars, ye gallipots, and draw'rs addu,
" Be to my memory lost, as lost to view,

" And ye, whom I so oft have joy'd to wipe,
" Th' ear-sifting syringe, and back-piercing pipe,

" Farewell---my day of glory's on the dawn,
" And now---Hillario's occupation's gone."

Quick with the word his way the hero made,
Conducted by a glorious cavalcade;

Pert petulance the first attracts his eye,
And drowsy dullness slowly saunters by,

With malice old, and scandal ever knew,
And neutral nonsense, neither false nor true,

Infernal falsehood next approach'd the band,
With , and the Koran in her hand.

Her motley vesture with the leopard vies,
Stain'd with a foul variety of lies.

Next spiteful enmity, gangren'd at heart,
Presents a dagger, and conceals a dart.

On th' earth crawls flattery, with her bosom bare,
And vanity sails over him in air.

Such was the group---they bow'd, and they ador'd,

And hail'd Hillario for their sovereign lord.
Flush'd with success, and proud of his allies,

Th' exulting hero thus triumphant cries:
" Friends, brethren, ever present, ever dear,

" Home to my heart, nor quit your title there,
" While you approve, assist, instruct, inspire,

" Heat my young blood, and set my soul on fire;
" No foreign aid my daring pen shall choose,

" But boldly verify without a muse.
" I'll teach Mincerva, I'll inspire the nine,

" Great Phœbus shall in consultation join,
" And round my nobler brow his forfeit laurel

" twine."

He said---and clamour, of commotion born,
Rear'd to the skies her ear-afflicting horn,

While jargon grav'd her titles on a block,
And styl'd him M. D. Acad. Budig. Soc.

But now the harbingers of fate and fame,
Signs, omens, portents, and portents came.

Lo! (through mid-day) the grave Athenian fowl
Ey'd the bright sun, and hail'd him with a howl;

Moths, mites, and niaggots, fleas (a numerous crew)!

And gnats and grubworms crowded on his view,
Insects! without the microscopic aid,

Gigantic by the eye of dullness made!
And stranger still---and never heard before!

A wooden lion roar'd, or seem'd to roar.

But (what the most his youthful bosom warm'd, Heighten'd each hope, and every fear disarm'd),

On a high dome a damsel took her stand,
With a well-freighted jordan in her hand,

Where curious mixtures strove on every side,
And solids found with laxer fluids vied---

Lo! on his crown the lotion choice and large
She souf'd---and gave at once a full discharge.

Not Archimedes, when, with conscious pride,
I've found it out! I've found it out! he cried;

Not coisive hardlings, when a rhyme comes pat;
Not grave grimalkin, when she smells a rat;

Not the shrewd statesman, when he scents a plot;
Not coy Prudelia, when she knows what's what;

Not our own hero, when (O matchless luck!)
His keen discernment found another Duck;

With such ecstasie transports did abound,
As what he smelt and saw, and felt and found,

" Ye gods, I thank ye to profusion free,
 " Thus to adorn, and thus distinguish me;
 " And thou, fair Cloacina, whom I serve 140
 " (If a desire to please is to deserve),
 " To you I'll consecrate my future lays,
 " And on the smoothest paper print my soft ef-
 " fays."

No more he spoke, but slightly slid along,
 Escort'd by the miscellaneous throng.
 And now, thou goddess, whose fire-darting eyes
 Defy all distance, and transpierce the skies,
 To men the councils of the gods relate,
 And faithfully describe the grand debate.

The cloud-compelling thund'rer, at whose call
 The gods assembled in th' ethereal hall, 151
 From his bright throne the deities address:
 " What impious noise disturbs our awful rest,
 " With din profane assaults immortal ears,
 " And jars harsh discord to the tuneful spheres?
 " Nature, my handmaid, yet without a stain,
 " Has never once productive prov'd in vain,
 " Till now---luxuriant and regardless quite
 " Of her divine, eternal rule of right,
 " On mere privation she's bestow'd a frame, 160
 " And dignify'd a nothing with a name;
 " A wretch devoid of use, of sense and grace,
 " Th' insolvent tenant of encumber'd space.
 " Good is his cause, and just is his pretence."

Replies the god of theft and eloquence.
 " A hand mercurial, ready to convey,
 " Ev'n in the presence of the garish day;
 " The work an English classic late has writ,
 " And by adoption be the fire of wit---
 " Sure to be, this is to be something---sure, 170
 " Next to perform, 'tis glorious to procure.
 " Small was th' exertion of my godlike soul,
 " When privately Apollo's herd I stole;
 " Compar'd to him, who braves th' all-seeing sun,
 " And boldly bids th' astonish'd world look on."
 Her approbation Venus next opprest'd,
 And on Hillario's part the throne address'd.
 " If there be any praise the nails to pare,
 " And in soft ringlets wreath th' elastic hair, 180
 " In talk and tea to trifle time away,
 " The mien so easy, and the dress so gay!
 " Can my Hillario's worth remain unknown,
 " With whom my Sylvia trusts herself alone?
 " With whom, so pure, so innocent his life,
 " The jealous husband leaves his buxom wife.
 " What though he ne'er assume the post of Mars,
 " By me disbanded from all amorous wars;
 " His fancy (if not person) he employs,
 " And oft ideal countesses enjoys;
 " Though hard his heart, yet beauty shall controul,
 " And sweeten all the rancour of his soul; 191
 " While his black self, Florida ever near,
 " Shows like a diamond in an Ethiop's ear."
 When Pallas, thus: " Cease, ye immortals,
 " cease,

" Nor rob serene stupidity of peace:
 " Should Jove himself, in calculation mad,
 " Still negatives to blank negations add,
 " How could the barren cyphers ever breed?
 " But nothing still from nothing would proceed;

" Raise, or depress, or magnify, or blame, 200
 " Inanity will ever be the same."
 " Not so (says Phœbus) my celestial friend,
 " Ev'n blank privation has its use and end;
 " How sweetly shadows recommend the light,
 " And darkness renders my own beams more
 " bright!

" How rise from filth the violet and rose!
 " From emptiness how softest music flows!
 " How absence to possession adds a grace,
 " And modest vacancy to all gives place!
 " Contrasted when fair nature's works we spy,
 " More they allure the mind, and more they
 " charm the eye. 211

" So from Hillario some effect may spring,
 " Ev'n him, that slight penumbra of a thing."
 Morpheus at length in the debate awoke,
 And drowsily a few dull words he spoke---
 Declar'd Hillario was the friend of ease,
 And had a soporific pow'r to please;
 Once more Hillario he pronounc'd with pain,
 But at the very found was lull'd to sleep again.
 Momus, the last of all, in merry mood, 220
 As moderator in th' assembly stood,
 " Ye laughter-loving pow'rs, ye gods of mirth,
 " What! not regard my deputy on earth?
 " Whose chemic skill turns brags to gold with ease,
 " And out of Cibber forges Socrates;
 " Whose genius makes consistencies to fight,
 " And forms an union betwixt wrong and right;
 " Who (five whole days in senseless malice past)
 " Repents, and is religious at the last;
 " A paltry pray'r, that in no parts succeeds, 230
 " A hackney writer, whom no mortal reads.
 " The trumpet of a base deserted cause,
 " Damn'd to the scandal of his own applause.
 " While thus he stands a general wit confest,
 " With all these titles, all these talents blest,
 " Be he by Jove's authority assign'd
 " The universal butt of all mankind."

So spake, and ceas'd the joy-exciting god,
 And Jove immediate gave th' assenting nod,
 When fame her adamantin trump uprear'd, 240
 And thus th' irrevocable doom declar'd,
 " While in the vale perennial fountains flow,
 " And fragrant zephyrs musically blow;
 " While the majestic sea, from pole to pole,
 " In horrible magnificence shall roll;
 " While yonder glorious canopy on high
 " Shall overhang the curtains of the sky;
 " While the gay seasons their due course shall run,
 " Rul'd by the brilliant stars and golden sun;
 " While wit and fool antagonists shall be, 250
 " And sense, and taste, and nature, shall agree;
 " While love shall live, and rapture shall rejoice,
 " Fed by the notes of Handel, Arne, and Boyce;
 " While with joint force o'er humour's droll do-
 " main,
 " Cervantes, Fielding, Lucian, Swift, shall reign;
 " While thinking figures from the canvass start,
 " And Hogarth is the Garrick of his art;
 " So long in gross stupidity's extreme
 " Shall H---ll, th' arch-dunce, remain o'er eve" ry dunce supreme."

NOTES ON THE HILLIAD.

Ver. 1. As the design of heroic poetry is to celebrate the virtues and noble achievements of truly great personages, and conduct them through a series of hardships to the completion of their wishes, so the little epic delights in representing, with an ironical drollery, the mock qualities of those, who, for the benefit of the laughing part of mankind, are pleased to become egregiously ridiculous, in an affected imitation of the truly renowned worthies above-mentioned. Hence our poet calls upon Momus, at the first opening of his poem, to convert his hero into a jest. So that in the present case, it cannot be said, facit indignatio versum, but, if I may be allowed the expression, facit titillatio versum; which may serve to show our author's temper of mind is free from rancour, or ill-nature. Notwithstanding the great incentives he has had to prompt him to this undertaking, he is not actuated by the spirit of revenge; and to check the fallies of fancy and humorous invention, he further invokes the goddess Themis, to administer strict poetic justice.

Ver. 2. Several cavils have been raised against this passage. Quinbus Flestrin, the unborn poet, is of opinion that it is brought in merely to cke out a verse; but though in many points I am inclined to look upon this critic as irrefragable; I must beg leave at present to appeal from his verdict: and, though Horace lays it down as a rule not to admire any thing, I cannot help enjoying so pleasing an operation of the mind upon this occasion. We are here presented with a grand idea, no less than Jupiter shaking his sides and the heavens at the same time. The Pagan thunderer has often been said to agitate the pole with a nod, which in my mind gives too awful an image, whereas the one in question conveys an idea of him in good humour, and confirms what Mr. Orator Henley says in his excellent tracts, that "the deity is a joyous being."

Martinus Macularius,

M. D. Reg. Soc. Bur. &c. Soc.

Ver. 6. Much puzzle hath been occasioned among the naturalists concerning the engraftment here mentioned. Hill's Natural History of Trees and Plants, vol. 52. page 336. saith it has been frequently attempted, but that the tree of dullness will not admit any such inoculation. He adds in page 339, that he himself tried the experiment for two years successively, but that the twig of laurel, like a feather in the state of electricity, drooped and died the moment he touched it. Notwithstanding this authority, it is well known that this operation has been performed by some choice spirits. Erasmus, in his encomium on folly, shows how it may be accomplished; in our own times Pope and Garth found means to do the same: and in the sequel of this work, we make no doubt but the stem here mentioned will bear some luxuriant branches, like the tree in Virgil,

Nec longum tempus, et ingens
Exiit ad Cælum ramis felicibus arbos,
Miraturque novas frondes et non sua Poma.

Ver. 8. Pimp.] An old English word for a mean fellow. See Chaucer and Spencer.

Ibid. Pect.] Quinbus Flestrin saith, with his usual importance, that this is the only piece of justice done to our hero in this work. To this assents the widow at Cuper's who it seems is not a little proud of the "words by Dr. Hill, and the music by Lewis Granon, Esq." This opinion is further confirmed by Major England, who admires the pretty turns on Kitty, and Kate, and Catharine and Katy, but from these venerable authorities, judicious reader, you may boldly dissent Meo periculo.

Mart. Mac.

Ibid. Puffer.] Of this talent take a specimen. In a letter to himself he saith; "you have discovered many of the beauties of the ancients; they are obliged to you; we are obliged to you; were they alive they would thank you; we who are alive do thank you." His constant custom of running on in this manner, occasioned the following epigram,

Hill puffs himself, forbear to shide;
An insect vile and mean,
Must first, he knows, be magnify'd
Before it can be seen.

Ibid. 'Potbecary, Play'r.] For both these, vide Woodward's letter, passim.

Ver. 10. The allusion here seems to be taken from Ovid, who describes the earth fixed in the air, by its own stupidity, or vis inertiae:—

Pendebat in ære tellus,
Ponderibus librata suis.—

But, reader, dilate your imagination to take in the much greater idea our poet here presents to you: consider the immense inanity of space, and then the comparative nothingness of the globe, and you may attain an adequate conception of our hero's reputation, and the mighty basis it stands upon. It is worth observing here that our author, quasi aliud agens, displays at one touch of his pen more knowledge of the planetary system, than is to be found in all the volumes of the mathematicians.

This note is partly by Macularius, and partly by Mr. Jinkyns, Philomath.

Ver. 13. Observe, gentle reader, how tenderly our author treats his hero throughout his whole poem; he does not here impute his ridiculous conduct, and all that train of errors which have attended his consummate vanity, to his own perver-inclination; but with greater candour insinuates that some demon, foe to Hillario's repose, first misled his youthful imagination; which is a kind of apology for his life and character. He is not the only one who has been seduced to his ruin in this manner. We read it in Pope:

Some demon whisper'd—Visto have a taste.

Hence, then, arise our hero's misfortunes; and that the demon above mentioned was a foe to truth, will appear from Hillario's notable talent at misrepresenting circumstances, for which vide all the Inspectors.

Ver. 17. This seems to be wrote with an eye to a beautiful passage in a very elegant poem:

Ye gods annihilate both space and time,
And make two lovers happy.

The request is extremely modest; and I really wonder it was never complied with; but it must be said, in favour of Mr. Smart, that he is still more reasonable in his demand; and it appears by the alteration in the style, that his scheme may be reduced to practice, though the other is mighty fine in theory. The Inspector is of this opinion, and so is Monsieur de Scaizau.

Ver. 26. Our author has been extremely negligent upon this occasion, and has indolently omitted an opportunity of displaying his talent for poetic imagery. Homer has described the shield of Achilles with all the art of his imagination; Virgil has followed him in this point; and, indeed, both he and Ovid, seem to be delighted when they have either a picture to describe, or some representation in the labours of the loom. Hence arises a double delight; we admire the work of the artificer, and the poet's account of it; and this pleasure Mr. Smart might have impressed upon his readers in this passage, as many things were wrought into the tapestry here mentioned. In one part, our hero was administering to a patient, "and the fresh vomit runs for ever green." The theatre at May-fair, made a conspicuous figure in the piece; the pit seemed to rise in an uproar; the gallery opened its rude throats; and apples, oranges, and halfpence, flew about our hero's ears. The Mall in St. James's Park was displayed in a beautiful vista; and you might perceive Hillario, with his janty air, waddling along in Mary-le-Bone Fields, he was dancing round a glow-worm; and, finally, the Rotunda at Ranelagh filled the eye with its magnificence; and, in a corner of it stood a handsome young fellow, holding a personage, dressed in blue silk, by the ear; "the very worsted still looked black and blue." There were many other curious figures; but out of a shameful laziness has our poet omitted them. Polymetus Cantabrigiensis.

Ver. 44. This passage seems to be an imitation of the Sibyl, in the sixth book of Virgil.

Subito non vultus, non color unus
Nec comæ mansere comæ—

and is admirably expressive of the witch's prophetic fury, and ushers in the prediction of Hillario's fortune with proper solemnity.

This note is by one of the Æolists, mentioned with honour in the tale of a tub.

Ver. 58. When the distemper first raged among the horned cattle, the king and council ordered a certain officer to superintend the beasts, and to direct that such as were found to be infected, should be knocked in the head. This officer was called the Inspector; and from thence I would venture to lay a wager, our hero derived his title.

Bentley, junior,

Ver. 62. It is extremely probable, that our poet is intimately acquainted with the classics; he seems frequently to have them in his eye; and such an air of enthusiasm runs through his whole speech, that the learned reader may easily perceive he has taken fire at some of the prophecies in Homer and Virgil. The whole is delivered in breaks and unconnected transitions, which denote vehement emotions in the mind; and the hint here concerning the Irish, is perfectly in the manner of all great epic poets, who generally give the reader some idea of what is to ensue, without unfolding the whole. Thus we find in Virgil:

Bella, horrida bella,
Et Tybrim multo spumantem sanguine cerno.

And again,

Alius Latio jam partus Achilles.

And in the sequel of this work, I believe it will be found, that as Æneas had another Achilles; so our hero has had as formidable an adversary.

Ver. 69. The ingenious Mr. L——der says, that the following passage is taken from a work, which he intends shortly to publish by subscription; and he has now in the press a pamphlet, called, "Mr. Smart's Use and Abuse of the Moderns." But, with his leave, this passage is partly imitated from Cardinal Wolfey's speech, and from Othello.

Ver. 84. The train here described is worthy of Hillario; pertness, dullness, scandal, malice, &c. being the very constituents of an hero for the mock heroic: and it is not without propriety, that nonsense is introduced with the epithet neutral; nonsense being like a Dutchman, not only in an unmeaning stupidity, but in the art of preserving a strict neutrality. This neutrality may be aptly explained by the following epigram:

Word-valiant wight, thou great he-shrew,
That wrangles to no end;
Since nonsense is nor false nor true,
Thou'rt no man's foe or friend.

Ver. 85. This lady is described with two books in her hand; but our author choosing to preserve a neutrality, though not a nonsensical one, upon this occasion, the Tories are at liberty to fill up this blank with Rapin, Burnet, or any names that will fit the niches; and the Whigs may, if they please, insert Echard, Higgons, &c. But why, exclaimeth a certain critic, should falsehood be given to Hillario? Because, replieth Macularius, he has given many specimens of his talents that way. Our hero took it into his head some time since to tell the world that he caned a gentleman, whom he called by the name of Mario: what degree of faith the town gave him upon that occasion, may be collected from the two following lines, by a certain wag, who shall be nameless.

To beat one man great Hill was fated;
What man? a man that he created.

The following epigram may be also properly inserted here:

What H—ll one day says, he the next does deny,
And candidly tells us—'tis all a damn'd lie: [ed;
Dear Doctor—this candour from you is not want-
For why should you own it? 'tis taken for granted.

Ver. 91. Our hero is as remarkable for his encomiums, where it is his interest to commend, as for his abuse, where he has taken a dislike; but from the latter he is easily to be bought off, as may be seen in the following excellent epigram:

An author's writings oft reveal,
Where now and then he takes a meal.
Invite him once a week to dinner,
He'll saint you though the vilest finner,
Have you a smiling, vacant face,
He gives you soul, expression, grace.
Swears what you will, unswears it too;
What will not beef and pudding do?

Ver. 102. No, the devil a bit! I am the only person that can do that! My poems, written at fifteen, were done without the assistance of any muse; and, better than all Smart's poetry. The muses are strumpets; they frequently give an intellectual gonorrhœa; court debt not paid; I'll never be poet laureat; coup de grace unanswerable; our foes shall knuckle; five pounds to any bishop that will equal this; Cum guaiacum for Latin lignum vitæ; Adam the first Dutchman; victorious stroke for Old England; tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee.

Oratory-Right-Reason-Chapel, Saturday 13th January, and old style for ever.

Ver. 108. Jargon is here properly introduced gravely our hero's titles, which are admirably brought into verse; but the gentleman who wrote the last note, Mr. Orator H—ley, takes umbrage at this passage, and exclaimeth to the following effect: "Jargon is meant for me." There is more music in a peal of marrow bones and cleavers, than in these verses.—I am a logician upon fundamentals, a rationalist lover of maukande, Glastonberry thorn—huzza, boys!—Wit a vivacious command of all objects and ideas.—I am the only wit in Great Britain. See Oratory Tracts, &c. 10, 036.

Patience, good Mr. Orator! We are not at leisure to answer thee at present, but must observe, that Jargon has done more for our hero, than ever did the society at Bordeaux, as will appear from the following extract of a letter sent to Martinus Macularius, by a fellow of that society:

J'ai bien reçu la lettre, dont vous m'avez fait Phonneur le 12me passé. A l'égard de ce Monsieur Hillario, qui se vante si prodigieusement chez vous, je ne trouve pas qu'il est enrollé dans notre société, et son nom est parfaitement inconnu ici. J'attends de vous nouvelles, &c.

Ver. 114.

The important objects of his future speculations!
O would the sons of men once think their eyes
And reason given 'em but to study flies!

M. Macularius.

Ver. 117. This passage may be properly illustrated by a recollection of two lines in Mr. Pope's Essay on Criticism.

As things seem large which we through mists de-
Dullness is very apt to magnify.

{screy,

Ver. 119. Not the black lion in Salisbury-court, Fleet-street, where the New Craftsman is published, nor yet the red lion at Brentford, but the beast of the Bedford, who may truly be said to have been alive, when animated by Addison and Steele, though now reduced to the state of block-headism, which is so conspicuous in his master. Feculus, inutile lignum. Bentley, junior.

Ver. 127. Reader, do not turn up your nose at this passage. It is much more decent than Pope's. Recollect what Swift says, that a nice man has filthy ideas; and let it be considered, this discharge may have the same effect upon our hero, as a similar accident had upon a person of equal parts and genius.

Renew'd by ordure's sympathetic force,
As oil'd by magic juices for the course,
Vig'rous he rises from th' effluvia strong,
Imbibes new life, and scours and stinks along.

Pope's Dunciad.

Ver. 128. As soon as the philosopher, here mentioned, discovered the modern fave-all, and the new invented patent blackball, he threw down his pipe, and ran all along Piccadilly, with his shirt out of his breeches, crying out like a madman, svenska! svenska! which, in modern English, is, the job is done! the job is done!

Vetus Schol.

Ver. 135. Hillario, having a mind to celebrate and recommend a genius to the world, compares him to Stephen Duck; and, at the close of a late Inspector, cries out, "I have found another Duck, but who shall find a Caroline?"

Ver. 145. Our hero, for once, has spoke truth of himself, for which we could produce the testimonies of several persons of distinction. Bath and Tunbridge-wells have, upon many occasions, testified their gratitude to him on this head, as his works have been always found of singular use with the waters of those places. To this effect also, speaketh that excellent comedian, Mr. Henry Woodward, in an ingenious parody—on busy, curious, thirsty fly, &c.

Busy, curious, hungry Hill,
Write of me, and write your fill.
Freely welcome to abuse,
Couldst thou tire thy railing muse.
Make the most of this you can;
Strife is short, and life's a span.

Both alike your works and pay,
Hasten quick to their decay;
This a trifle, those no more,
Though repeated to threecore.
Threecore volumes, when they're writ,
Will appear at last b——t.

Ver. 146. This invocation is perfectly in the spirit of ancient poetry. If I may use Milton's words, our author here presumes into the heavens an earthly guest, and draws empyreal air. Hence he calls upon the goddess to assist his strain, while he relates the councils of the gods. Virgil, when the plot thickens upon his hands, as Mr. Byles has it, has offered up his prayers a second time to the muse; and he seems to labour under the weight of his subject, when he cries out:

Majus opus moveo, major rerum mihi nascitur ordo.
This is the case at present with the writer of the Hilliad; and this peace of machinery will evince the absurdity of that Lucretian doctrine, which asserts, that the gods are wrapped up in a lazy indolence, and do not trouble themselves about human affairs. The words of Lucretius are:

*Omnis enim per se divam natura necesse est
Immortali ævo summa cum pace fruatur,
Senota a rebus nostris, disjunctaque longè.*

It is now recommended to the editors of the Anti-Lucretius, to make use of this instance to the contrary, in the next publication of this work.

M. Macularius.

Ver. 163. Jupiter's speech is full of pomp and solemnity, and is finely closed by a description of our hero, who is here said to take up a place in the creation to no purpose. What a different notion of the end of his existence has Hillario, from what we find delivered by the excellent Longinus, in his Treatise on the Sublime. The passage is admirable, translated by the author of The Pleasures of Imagination. "The godlike geniuses of Greece were well assured that nature had not intended man for a low spirited or ignoble being; but bringing us into life, and the midst of this wide universe, as before a multitude assembled at some heroic solemnity, that we might be spectators of all her magnificence, and candidates high in emulation for the prize of glory; she has therefore implanted in our souls an inextinguishable love of every thing great and exalted, of every thing which appears divine beyond our comprehension. Hence, by the very propensity of nature, we are led to admire, not little springs or shallow rivulets, however clear and delicious, but the Nile, the Rhine, the Danube, and much more than all the ocean." Instead of acting upon this plan, Hillario is employed in pursuit of insects in Kensington gardens; and as this is all the gratitude he pays for the being conferred upon him, he is finely termed an insolvent tenant.

Ver. 169. Our hero has taken an entire letter from Sir Thomas Fitz-Osborne, and, with imitable effrontery, published it in his Inspector, No. 239, as a production of his own. We are informed that, having been taxed with this affair, he declares, with a great deal of art, that it was given him by another person, to which all we have to say is, that the receiver is as bad as the thief.

M. Macularius.

Ver. 171. If our author could be thought capable of punning, I should imagine that the word procure, in this place, is made use of in preference to an appellation given to our hero in the commencement of this poem, viz. a pimp; but the reader will please to recollect, that the term pimp is not in that passage used in its modern acceptation.

Ver. 172. Not so fast, good poet, cries out in this place M. Macularius. We do not find that Hillario, upon any occasion whatever, has been charged with stealing Apollo's quiver; and certain it is, that those arrows, which he has shot at all the world, never were taken from thence. But of

Mercury it is recorded by Horace, that he really did deceive the god of wit in this manner:

*Te bovis olim nisi reddidisses
Per dolum amotas, puerum minaci
Voce dum terret viduus pharetra. Rist Apollo.*

Ver. 176. Venus rises in this assembly quite in the manner attributed to her in the ancient poets; thus we see in Virgil, that she is all mildness, and, at every word, breathes ambrosia:

—At non Venus aurea contra,
Pauca refert.—

She is to speak upon this occasion, as well as in the case produced from the Æneid, in favour of a much loved son; though, indeed, we cannot say that she has been quite so kind to Hillario, as formerly she was to Æneas, it being evident that she has not bestowed upon him that lustre of youthful bloom, and that liquid radiance of the eye, which she is said to have given the pious Trojan:

—Lumenque juventæ
Purpureum, et lætos oculis afflavit honores.

On the contrary, Venus here talks of his black self; which makes it suspected, that she reconciled herself to this hue, out of a compliment to Vulcan, of whom she has frequent favours to solicit: and, perhaps, it may appear hereafter, that she procured a sword for our hero from the celestial blacksmith's forge. One thing is not a little surprising, that, while Venus speaks on the side of Hillario, she should omit the real utility he has been of to the cause of love, by his experience as an apothecary; of which he himself has told us, several have profited; and it should be remembered at the same time, that he actually has employed his person in the service of Venus, and has now an offspring of the amorous congress. It is, moreover, notorious, that having, in his elegant language, tasted of the cool stream, he was ready to plunge in again; and therefore publicly set himself up for a wife, and thus became a fortune-hunter with his pen; and if he has failed in his design, it is because the ladies do not approve the new scheme of propagation, without the knowledge of a man, which Hillario pretended to explain so handsomely in the Lucina sine concubitu. But the truth is, he never wrote a syllable of this book, though he transcribed part of it, and showed it to a bookseller, in order to procure a higher price for his productions. Quibus Flestrin:

Ver. 193. There is neither morality, nor integrity, nor unity, nor universality in this poem. The author of it is Smart. I hope to see a Smarteard published; I had my pocket picked the other day, as I was going through Paul's Churchyard, and I firmly believe it was this little author, as the man who can pun, will also pick a pocket. John Dennis, junior.

Ver. 201. Our author does not here mean to lift himself among the disputants concerning pure space, but the doctrine he would advance is, that nothing can come from nothing. In so unbelieving an age as this, it is possible this tenet may not be received; but if the reader has a mind to see it handled at large, he may find it in Rumgus-

tus, vol. xvi. pagina 1008. "De hac re multum
 "et turpiter hallucinantur scriptores tam exerti
 "quam domestici. Spatium enim absolutum et
 "relativum debent distingui, priusquam distincta
 "esse possunt; neque ulla alia regula ad normam
 "rei metaphysicæ quadrabit, quam triplex con-
 "sideratio de substantiâ inanitatis, sive entitate
 "nihilî, quæ quidem consideratio triplex ad unam
 "reduci potest necessitate; nempe idem spati-
 "um de quo jam satis dictum est." This opinion is further corroborated by the tracts of the society at Bourdeaux. "Selon la distinction entre les
 "choses, qui n'ont pas de difference, il nous faut
 "absolument agréer, que les idées, qui ont frappé
 "l'imagination, peuvent bien être effacées, pour-
 "vu qu'on ne s'avise pas d'oublier cet espace im-
 "mense, qui environne toute la nature, et le sys-
 "tème des étoiles." Among our countrymen, I do not know any body that has handled this subject so well as the accurate Mr. Fielding, in his Essay upon Nothing, which the reader may find in the first volume of his Miscellanies; but with all due deference to his authority, we beg leave to dissent from one assertion in the said essay; the residence of nothing might in his time have been in a critic's head; and we are apt to believe that there is a something like nothing in most critics heads to this day; and this false appearance misled the excellent metaphysician just quoted; for nothing, in its puris naturalibus, as Gravesend describes it in his Experimental Philosophy, does subsist nowhere so properly at present as in the pericranium of our hero. Mart. Macularius.

Ver. 207. "Persons of most genius," says the Inspector, Friday, Jan. 26. Number 537, "have,
 "in general, been the fondest of music. Sir Isaac
 "Newton was remarkable for his affection for "harmony; he was scarce ever missed at the be"ginning of any performance, but was seldom
 "seen at the end of it." And, indeed, of this opi"nion is M. Macularius: and he further adds, that if Sir Isaac was still living, it is probable he would be at the beginning of the Inspector's next song at Cuper's, but that he would not be at the end of it, may be proved to a mathematical demonstration, though Hillario takes so much pleasure in beating time to them himself, and though he so frequently exclaims—very fine! O fine! vastly fine!—Since the lucubration of Friday, Jan 26.
 has been mentioned, we think proper to observe here, that his Inspectorship has the most notable talent at a motto—Quinbus Flestrin saith, "he is
 "a tartar for that;" and of this, learned reader, take a specimen along with you. How aptly, upon the subject of music, does he bid his readers pluck grapes from the loaded vine!

Carpite de plenis pendentes vitibus uvas. Ovid.

The above-mentioned Quinbus Flestrin peremptorily says, this line has been cavilled at by some minor critics, because "the grapes are four;" and,
 indeed, of that way of thinking is Macularius, who hath been greatly astonished at the taste of Hillario, in so frequently culling from Valerius Flaccus. But he is clearly of opinion, that the lines from Welfstead and Dennis are selected with great judgment, and are hung out as proper signs of what entertainment is to be furnished up to his customers.

Ver. 213. Whatever mean opinion Dr. Phoc- ebus may entertain of his terrestrial brother, physician and poet, on earth Hillario is talked of in a different manner; as will appear from the following parody on the lines prefixed by Mr. Dryden to Milton's Paradise Lost.

Three wise great men in the same era born,
 Britannia's happy island did adorn:
 Henley in care of souls display'd his skill,
 Rock shone in physic, and in both John H—ll;
 The force of nature could no farther go,
 To make a third, the join'd the former two.

Quinbus Flestrin.

Ver. 219. The hypnotic, or soporiferous quality of Hillario's pen, is manifest from the following asseveration, which was published in the New Craftsman, and is a letter from a tradesman in the city.

"SIR,

"From a motive of gratitude, and for the sake
 "of those of my fellow-creatures, who may un-
 "happily be afflicted! as I have been for some "time past, I beg leave, through the channel of "your paper, to communicate the disorder I have "laboured under, and the extraordinary cure I
 "have lately met with. I have had for many "months successively a slow nervous fever, with
 "a constant flutter on my spirits, attended with
 "pertinacious watchings, twitchings of the nerves,
 "and other grievous symptoms, which reduced
 "me to a mere shadow. At length, by the in"terposition of Divine Providence, a friend who "had himself experienced it, advised me to have "recourse to the reading of the Inspectors. I
 "accordingly took one of them, and the effect it
 "had upon me was such, that I fell into a profound
 "sleep, which lasted near six and thirty hours.
 "By this I have attained a more composed habit
 "of body; and I now doze away almost all my "time; but, for fear of a lethargy, am ordered to "take them in smaller quantities. A paragraph
 "at a time now answers my purpose; and under
 "Heaven I owe my sleeping powers to the above-
 "mentioned Inspectors. I look upon them to be "a grand soporificum mirabile, very proper to be "had in all families. He makes great allowance
 "to those who buy them to sell again, or to send
 "abroad to the plantations; and the above fact
 "I am ready to attest whenever called upon.
 "Given under my hand this 4th day of January,
 "1753."

Humphrey Roberts, weaver in Crispin-street, Spitalfields, opposite the White Horse.

Ver. 225. Socrates was the father of the truest philosophy that ever appeared in the world; and though he has not drawn God's image, which was reserved for the light of the gospel, he has at least given the shadow, which together with his exemplary life, induces Erasmus to cry out, Sancte Socrates ora pro nobis; of Mr. Gibber we shall say nothing, as he has said abundantly enough of himself; but to illustrate the poet's meaning in this passage, it may be necessary to observe, that when the British worthy was indifposed some time since, the Inspector did not hesitate to prefer him to the godlike ancient philosopher. O te, Bollane, cerebri felicem.

M. Macularius.

Ver. 226. Alluding to his egregious talent at distinctions without a difference.

Ver. 229. On every Saturday the florid Hillario becomes, in Woodward's phrase, a lay preacher; but his simfley, heavy, impotent lucubrations have rather been of prejudice to the good old cause; and we hear that there is now preparing for the press, by a very eminent divine, a defence of Christianity, against the misrepresentations of a certain officious writer; and for the present we think proper to apply an epigram, occasioned by a dispute between two beaux concerning religion.

On grace, free-will, and myst'ries high,
Two wits harangu'd the table;
J—n H—ll believes he knows not why,
Tom swears 'tis all a fable.

Peace, idiots, peace, and both agree,
Tom, kiss thy empty brother;
Religion laughs at foes like thee,
But dreads a friend like t' other.

Ver. 230. It appears that the first effort of this universal genius, who is lately become remarkable as the Bopadil of literature, was to excel in pantomime. What was the event?—he was damned.—Mr. Crofs, the prompter, took great pains to fit him for the part of Oroonoko—he was damned.—He attempted Captain Blandford—he was damned.—He acted Constant in the Provok'd Wife—he was damned.—He represented the Botanist in Romeo and Juliet, at the Little Theatre in the Hay-Market, under the direction of Mr. The Gibber—he was damned.—He appeared in the character of Lothario, at the celebrated theatre in May-Fair—he was damned there too. Mr. Crofs, however, to alleviate his misfortune, charitably bestowed upon him a fifteenth part of his own benefit. See the Gentleman's Magazine for last December, and also Woodward's letter, pal-fim.

Ver. 231. Notwithstanding this assertion of Momus, our hero pro cã quã est, verecundia, compareth himself to Addison and Steele, which occasioned the following epigram by the Right Hon. the Earl , address'd to the Right Hon. G—-D—-n.

Art thou not angry, learning's great protector,
To hear that simfley author, the Inspector,
Of cant, of puff, that daily vain inditer,
Call Addison, or Steele, his brother writer?
So a pert H—ll (in Æsop's fabling days)
Sworn up with vanity, and self-giv'n praise,
To his huge neighbour mountain might have said,

“ See (brother); how We Mountains list the “ head!

“ How great we show! how awful, and how high,
“ Amidst these poultry mounts, that here around
“ us lie!”

And now, reader, please to observe, that, since so ingenious a nobleman hath condescended to take notice of his Inspectorship, Mr. Smart doth not need any apology for the notice he hath also taken of him.

M. Macularius.

Ver. 232. In a very pleasing account of the riots in Drury-Lane play-house, by Henry Fielding, Esq. we find the following humorous description of our hero in the character of a trumpeter. “ They all run away except the trumpeter, who having an empyema in his side, as well as several dreadful bruises on his breach, was taken. When he was brought before Garrick to be examined, he said the ninnies, to whom he had the honour to be trumpeter, had resent'd the use made of the monsters by Garrick. That it was unfair, that it was cruel, that it was inhuman to employ a man's own subjects against him. That Rich was lawful sovereign over all the monsters in the universe, with much more of the same kind; all which Garrick seem'd to think unworthy of an answer; but when the trumpeter challeng'd him as his acquaintance, the chief with great disdain, turn'd his back, and order'd the fellow to be dismissed with full power of trumpeting again on what side he pleas'd.” Hillario has since trumpeted in the cause of pantomime; the gaudy scenery of which, with great judgment, he dismisses from the Opera-house, and saith, it is now fix'd in its proper place in the theatre. On this occasion, Macularius cannot help exclaiming, “ O Shakpeare! O Johnson! rest, rest perturbed spirits.”

Ver. 253. The first of these gentlemen may be justly look'd upon as the Milton of music, and the talents of the two latter may not improperly be delineated by calling them the Drydens of their profession, as they not only touch the strings of love with exquisite art, but also, when they please, reach the truly sublime.

Ver. 257. The opinion which Mr. Hogarth entertains of our hero's writings, may be guess'd at, by any one who will take the pleasure of looking at a print call'd Beer-street, in which Hillario's critic upon the Royal Society is put into a basket, directed to the trunk-maker in St. Paul's Church-yard. I shall not only observe that the compliment in this passage to Mr. Hogarth is reciprocal, and reflects a lustre on Mr. Garrick, both of them having similar talents, equally capable of the highest elevation, and of representing the ordinary scenes of life, with the most exquisite humour.

And now, candid reader, Martinus Macularius hath attended thee throughout the first book of this most delectable poem. As it is not improbable that those will be inquisitive after the particulars relating to this thy commentator, he here gives thee notice that he is preparing for the press, Memoirs of Martinus Macularius, with his travels by sea and land, together with his flights aerial, and descents subterraneous, &c. And in the mean time he bids thee farewell, until the appearance of the second book of the Hilliad, of which we will say, speciosa miracula promet. And so as Terence says, Vos valete et plaudite.

THE JUDGMENT OF MIDAS.

A MASQUE.

" Auriculas Afini Midas Rex habet." Juv.

PERSONS REPRESENTED:

APOLLO.

PAN.

TIMOLUS, God of the Mountain.

MIDAS.

CALLIOPE.

MELPOMENE.

AGNO.

MELINOE. } Two Wood-Nymphs.

SATYRS, &c.

TIMOLUS, MELINOE, and AGNO, Two Wood-Nymphs.Timolus.

AGNO, to-day we wear our acorn crown,
The parsley wreath be thine: it is most meet
We grace the presence of these rival gods
With all the honours of our woodland weeds.
Thine was the task, Melinoe, to prepare
The turf-built theatre, the boxen bow'r,
And all the sylvan scenery.

Melinoe.

That task,

Sire of these shades, is done. On yester eve,
Assisted by a thousand friendly fays,
While fav'ring Dian held her glitt'ring lamp,
We ply'd our nightly toils, nor ply'd we long,
For art was not the mistress of our revels,
'Twas gentle nature whom we jointly woo'd;
She heard, and yielded to the forms we taught
her,

Yet still remain'd herself—Simplicity,
Fair nature's genuine daughters, too was there,
So soft, yet so magnificent of mien,
She shone all ornament without a gem.
The blithsome Flora, ever sweet and young,
Offer'd her various store: we cull'd a few
To robe, and recommend our darksome verdure,
But shunn'd to be luxuriant—

Timolus.

It was well.

AGNO, thy looks are pensive: What dejects
Thy pleasure-painted aspect? sweetest nymph,
That ever trod the turf, or sought the shade,
Speak, nor conceal a thought.

Agno.

King of the woods,

I tremble for the royal arbiter.
'Tis hard to judge, when'er the great contend,
Sure to displease the vanquish'd: When such pow'rs

Contend the laurel with such ardent strife,
Tis not the sentence of fair equity,
ut 'tis their pleasure that is right or wrong.

VOL. XI.

Timolus.

'Tis well remark'd, and on experience founded.
I do remember that my sister Ida
(When as on her own shadowy mount we met,
To celebrate the birth-day of the spring,
And th' orgies of the May) would oft recount
The rage of the indignant goddesses,
When shepherd Paris to the Cyprian queen,
With hand obsequious gave the golden toy.
Heaven's queen, the sister and the wife of Jove,
Rag'd like a feeble mortal; fall'n the seem'd,
Her deity in human passions lost;
Ev'n wisdom's goddess, jealous of her form,
Deem'd her own attribute her second virtue,
Both vow'd and fought revenge.

Agno.

If such the fate

Of him who judg'd aright, what must be his
Who shall mistake the cause? for much I doubt
The skill of Midas, since his fatal wish,
Which Bacchus heard, and curs'd him with the gift,

Yet grant him wife, to err is human still,
And mortal is the consequence.

Melinoe.

Most true.

Besides, I fear him partial; for with Pan
He tends the sheep-walks all the live-long day,
And on the braky lawn to the shrill pipe
In awkward gambols he affects to dance,
Or tumbles to the tabor—'tis not likely
That such an umpire should be equitable,
Unless he guess at justice.

Timolus.

Soft—no more—

'Tis ours to wish for Pan, and fear from Phœbus,
Whose near approach I hear. Ye stately cedars
Forth from your summits bow your awful heads,
And reverence the gods. Let my whole mountain tremble,
Not with a fearful, but religious awe,
And holiness of horror. You, ye winds,
That make soft solemn-music 'mongst the leaves,
Be all to stillness hush'd; and thou, their echo,
Listen, and hold thy peace; for see they come.

SCENE opens, and discovers APOLLO, attended by CLIO and MELPOMENE, on the right hand of MIDAS and PAN on the left, whom TIMOLUS, with ARGO and MELINOE, join.

Midas.

Begin, celestial candidates for praise,
Begin the tuneful contest: I, meanwhile,
With headful notice and attention meet,
Will weigh your merits, and decide your cause.

Apollo.

From Jove begin the rapturous song,
To him our earliest lays belong,
We are his offspring all:
'Twas he, whose looks supremely bright,
Smil'd darksome chaos into light,
And fram'd this glorious ball.

Pan.

Sylvanus, in his shadowy grove,
The seat of rural peace and love,
Attends my Doric lays;

L

By th' altar on the myrtle mount,
Where plays the wood-nymphs fav'rite fount,
I'll celebrate his praise.

Clio.

Parnassus, where's thy boasted height,
Where, Pegasus, thy fire and flight,
Where all your thoughts so bold and free,
Ye daughters of Mnemosyne?
If Pan o'er Phœbus can prevail,
And the great god of verse should fail?

Agnô.

From nature's works, and nature's laws,
We find delight, and seek applause;
The prattling streams and zephyrs bland,
And fragrant flow'rs by zephyrs fann'd,
The level lawns and buxom bow'rs,
Speak nature and her works are ours.

Melpomene.

What were all your fragrant bow'rs,
Splendid days, and happy hours,
Spring's verdant robe, fair Flora's blush,
And all the poets of the bush?
What the paintings of the grove,
Rural music, mirth, and love?
Life and ev'ry joy would pass,
If Phœbus shone not on them all.

Melinoe.

We chant to Phœbus, king of day,
The morning and the evening lay.
But Pan, each satyr, nymph, and fawn,
Adore as laureat of the lawn;
From peevish March to joyous June,
He keeps our restless souls in tune,
Without his oaten reed and song,
Phœbus, thy days would seem too long.

Apollo.

Am I not he, who prescient from on high,
Send a long look through all futurity?
Am I not he, to whom alone belong
The pow'rs of medicine, melody, and song?
Diffusely lib'ral, as divinely bright,
Eye of the universe and fire of light.

Pan.

O'er cots and vales, and every shepherd swain,
In peaceable pre-eminence I reign;
With pipe on plain, and nymph in secret grove,
The day is music, and the night is love.
I, blest with these, nor envy nor desire
Thy gaudy chariot, or thy golden lyre.

Clio.

Soon as the dawn dispels the dark,
Illustrious Phœbus 'gins t' appear,
Proclaimed by the herald lark,
And ever-wakeful chanticleer,
The Persian pays his morning vow,
And all the turban'd easterns bow.

Agnô.

Soon as the evening shades advance,
And the gilt glow-worm glitters fair,
For rustic gambol, gibe, and dance,
Fawns, nymphs, and dryads all prepare,
Pan shall his swains from toil relieve,
And rule the revels of the eve.

Melpomene.

In numbers smooth as Callirhœ's stream,
Glide the silver-ton'd verse when Apollo's the theme;

While on his own mount Cyparissus is seen,
And Daphne preserves her immutable green.
We'll hail Hyperion with transports so long,
Th' inventor, the patron, and subject of song.

Melinoe.

While on the calm ocean the Halcyon shall breed,
And Syrinx shall sigh with her musical reed,
While fairies, and satyrs, and fawns shall approve,
The music, the mirth, and the life of the grove,
So long shall our Pan be than thou more divine,
For he shall be rising when thou shalt decline.

Midas.

No more---To Pan and to his beauteous nymphs
I do adjudge the prize, as is most due.

Enter two Satyrs, and crown MIDAS with a pair of ass's ears.

Apollo.

Such rural honours all the gods decree,
To those who sing like Pan, and judge like thee.
[Exeunt omnes.]

REASON AND IMAGINATION.

A FABLE.

IMAGINATION, in the flight
Of young desire and gay delight,
Began to think upon a mate;
As weary of a single state;
For sick of change, as left at will,
And cloy'd with entertainment still,
She thought it better to be grave,
To settle, to take up, and save.
She therefore to her chamber sped,
And thus at first attir'd her head.
Upon her hair, with brilliants grac'd,
Her tow'r of beamy gold she plac'd;
Her ears with pendant jewels glow'd
Of various water, curious mode,
As nature sports the wint'ry ice,
In many a whimsical device.
Her eye-brows arch'd upon the stream
Of rays, beyond the piercing beam;
Her cheeks in matchless colour high,
She veil'd to fix the gazer's eye:
Her paps, as white as fancy draws,
She cover'd with a crimson gauze;
And on her wings she threw perfume
From buds of everlasting bloom.
Her zone, ungirded from her vest,
She wore across her swelling breast;
On which, in gems, this verse was wrought,
"I make and shift the scenes of thought."
In her right hand a wand she held,
Which magic's utmost pow'r excell'd;
And in her left retains a chart,
With figures far surpassing art,
Of other natures, suns and moons,
Of other moves to higher tunes.
The sylphs and sylphids, fleet as light,
The fairies of the gamefome night,
The muses, graces, all attend
Her service to her journey's end:
And fortune, sometimes at her hand
Is now the fav'rite of her band,
Dispatch'd before the news to bear,
And all th' adventure to prepare.

Beneath an horn-tree's friendly shade,
 Was reason's little cottage made;
 Before, a river deep and still;
 Behind, a rocky foaming hill.
 Himself, adorn'd in seemly plight,
 Was reading to the eastern light;
 And ever, as he meekly knelt,
 Upon the book of Wisdom dwelt.
 The spirit of the shifting wheel,
 Thus first essay'd his pulse to feel.—
 "The nymph supreme o'er works of wit,
 O'er labour'd plan and lucky hit,
 Is coming to your homely cot,
 To call you to a nobler lot;
 I, Fortune, promise wealth and pow'r,
 By way of matrimonial dow'r:
 Preferment crowns the golden day,
 When fair occasion leads the way."
 Thus spake the frail capricious dame,
 When the that sent the message came.—
 "From first invention's highest sphere,
 I, queen of imag'ry appear;
 And throw myself at reason's feet,
 Upon a weighty point to treat,
 You dwell alone, and are too grave;
 You make yourself too much a slave;
 Your shrewd deductions run a length,
 Till all your spirits waste their strength:
 Your favourite logic is full close;
 Your morals are too much a dose;
 You ply your studies till you risk
 Your senses—you should be more brisk—
 The doctors soon will find a flaw,
 And lock you up in chains and straw.
 But, if you are inclin'd to take
 The generous offer which I make,
 I'll lead you from this hole and ditch,
 To gay conception's topmost pitch;
 To those bright plains, where crowd in swarms
 The spirits of fantastic forms:
 To planets populous with elves;
 To nature still above themselves,
 By soaring to the wondrous height
 Of notions which they still create;
 I'll bring you to the pearly cars,
 By dragons drawn, above the stars;
 To colours of Arabian glow;
 And to the heart-dilating show
 Of paintings which surmount the life:
 At once your tut'refs and your wife."—
 "Soft, soft," says Reason, "lovely friend;
 Though to a parley I attend,
 I cannot take thee for a mate:
 I'm lost if e'er I change my state.
 But whensoever your raptures rise,
 I'll try to come with my supplies;
 To muster up my sober aid,
 What time your lively pow'rs invade;
 To act conjointly in the war
 Of dullness, whom we both abhor;
 And ev'ry folly that you make,
 I must be there for conduct's sake;
 Thy correspondent, thine ally:
 Or any thing but bind and tie—
 But, ere this treaty be agreed,
 Give me thy wand and winged steed:

"Take thou this compass and this rule,
 That wit may cease to play the fool;
 And that thy vot'ries who are born—
 For praise, may never sink to scorn,"

NEW VERSION OF PSALM CXLVIII.

HALLELUJAH! kneel and sing
 Praises to the Heav'nly King;
 To the God supremely great,
 Hallelujah in the height.

Praise him, arch-angelic band,
 Ye that in his presence stand;
 Praise him, ye that watch and pray,
 Michael's myriads in array.

Praise him, sun at each extreme,
 Orient streak and western beam;
 Moon and stars of mystic dance,
 Silv'ring in the blue expanse.

Praise him, O ye heights that soar
 Heav'n and heav'n for evermore;
 And ye streams of living rill
 Higher yet and purer still.

Let them praise his glorious name,
 From whose fruitful word they came;
 And they first began to be
 As he gave the great decree.

Their constituent parts he founds
 For duration without bounds;
 And their covenant has seal'd,
 Which shall never be repeal'd.

Praise the Lord on earth's domains:
 Praise, ye mutes, that sea contains;
 They that on the surface leap,
 And the dragons of the deep.

Batt'ring hail, and fires that glow,
 Streaming vapours, plummy snow;
 Wind and storm, his wrath incur'd
 Wing'd and pointed at his word.

Mountains of enormous scale,
 Every hill and every vale;
 Fruit trees of a thousand dyes,
 Cedars that perfume the skies!

Beasts that haunt the woodland maze,
 Nibbling flocks and droves that gaze;
 Reptiles of amphibious breed,
 Feather'd millions form'd for speed.

Kings, with Jesus for their guide,
 Peopled regions far and wide;
 Heroes of their country's cause,
 Princes, judges of the laws.

Age and childhood, youth and maid,
 To his name your praise be paid;
 For his word is worth alone
 Far above his crown and throne.

He shall dignify the crest
 Of his people, rais'd and blest;
 While we serve with praise and prayers,
 All in Christ his saints and heirs.

ODE TO LORD BARNARD,

ON HIS ACCESSION TO THAT TITLE.

“ Sis licet felix ubiennque mavis
 “ Et memor nostri.” HOR.

MELPOMENE, who charm'd the skies,
 Queen of the lyre and lute,
 Say, shall my noble patron rise,
 And thou, sweet muse, be mute?
 Shall fame, to celebrate his praise,
 Her loudest, loftiest accents raise,
 And all her silver trumps employ,
 And thou refrain thy tuneful hand,
 And thou an idle list'ner stand
 Amidst the general joy?

Forbid it, all ye powers above,
 That human hearts can try,
 Forbid it, gratitude and love,
 And every tender tie:
 Was it not he, whose pious cares
 Upheld me in my earliest years,
 And cheer'd me from his ample store,
 Who animated my designs,
 In Roman and Athenian mines,
 To search for learning's ore?

The royal hand my lord shall raise
 To nobler heights thy name,
 Who praises thee, shall meet with praise
 Ennobled in thy fame.
 A disposition form'd to please,
 With dignity endear'd by ease,
 And grandeur in good-nature lost,
 Have more of genuine desert,
 Have more the merit of the heart,
 Than arts and arms can boast.

Can I forget fair Raby's* towers,
 How awful and how great!
 Can I forget such blissful bowers,
 Such splendour in retreat!
 Where me, ev'n me, an infant bard,
 Cleveland † and Hope ‡ indulgent heard.
 (Then fame I felt thy first alarms)
 Ah, much lov'd pair!—though one is fled,
 Still one compensates for the dead,
 In merit and in charms.

O more than compensation, sure!
 O blessings on thy life!
 Long may the threefold bliss endure,
 In daughters, sons, and wife!
 Hope, copyist of her mother's mind,
 Is loveliest, liveliest of her kind,
 Her soul with every virtue teems,
 By none in wit or worth outdone,
 With eyes, that, shining on the sun,
 Defy his brightest beams.

Hark! charity's cherubic voice
 Calls to her numerous poor,
 And bids their languid hearts rejoice,
 And points to Raby's door;

* His Lordship's seat in the county of Durham.

† Her late Grace of Cleveland.

‡ The Honourable Mrs. Hope.

With open heart, and open hands,
 There Hospitality—she stands,
 A nymph, whom men and gods admire;
 Daughter of heavenly goodness she,
 Her sister's Generosity,
 And Honour is her fire.

What though my lord betwixt us lie
 Full many an envious league,
 Such vast extent of sea and sky
 As even the eye fatigue;
 Though interposing ocean raves,
 And heaves his heaven-assaulting waves,
 While on the shores the billows beat,
 Yet still my grateful muse is free
 To tune her warmest strains to thee,
 And lay them at thy feet.

Goodness is ever kindly prone
 To feign what fate denies,
 And others want of worth t' atone,
 Finds in herself supplies:
 Thus dignity itself restrains,
 By condescension's silken reins,
 While you the lowly muse upraise;
 When such the theme, so mean the bard,
 Not to reject is to reward,
 To pardon is to praise.

ODE TO LADY HARRIOT.

To Harriot, all-accomplish'd fair,
 Begin, ye nine, a grateful air;
 Ye graces join her worth to tell,
 And blazon what you can't excel.

Let Flora rifle all her bow'rs,
 For fragrant shrubs, and painted flow'rs,
 And, in her vernal robes array'd,
 Present them to the noble maid.

Her breath shall give them new perfume,
 Her blushes shall their dyes outbloom;
 The lily now no more shall boast
 Its whiteness, in her bosom lost.

See yon delicious woodbines rise
 By oaks exalted to the skies,
 So view in Harriot's matchless mind
 Humility and greatness join'd.

To paint her dignity and ease,
 Form'd to command, and form'd to please,
 In wreaths expressive be there wove
 The birds of Venus and of Jove.

There, where th' immortal laurel grows,
 And there, where blooms the crimson rose,
 Be with this line the chaplet bound,
 That beauty is with virtue crown'd.

ODE

TO THE EARL OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

On his being appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, presented on the Birth-day of Lord Warkworth.

WHATE'ER distinguish'd patriots rise
 The times and manners to revise,
 And drooping merit raise,
 The song of triumph still pursues
 Their footsteps, and the moral muse
 Dwells sweetly on their praise.

It is a task of true delight
The ways of goodness to recite,
And all her works refin'd;
Though modest greatness under-rate
Its lustre, 'tis as fix'd as fate,
Says truth with music join'd.
All hail to this auspicious morn,
When we, for gallant Warkworth born,
Our congratulations pay:
Though virtue all the live-long year
Refuse her eulogy to hear,
She must attend to-day.

All hail to that transcendent fair,
That crown'd thy wishes with an heir,
And bless'd her native land:
Still shoots thy undegenerate line,
Like oak from oak, and pine from pine,
As goodly and as grand.

O how illustrious and divine
Were all the heroes of thy line,
'Gainst Rome's ambitious cheat!
Born all these base insidious arts,
Which work the most in weakest hearts,
To dare and to defeat!

Live then in triumph o'er deceit,
That with new honours we may greet
The house of arms and arts,
Till blest experience shall evince
How fairly you present that prince,
Who's sovereign of our hearts.

In pity to our sister isle,
With sighs we lend thee for a while;
O be thou soon restor'd;
Though Stanhope, Hallifax, were there,
We never had a man to spare
Our love could less afford.

THE SWEETS OF EVENING.

THE sweets of evening charm the mind
Sick of the sultry day;
The body then no more confin'd,
But exercise with freedom join'd,
When Phœbus sheathes his ray.

While all serene the summer moon
Sends glances through the trees,
And Philomel begins her tune,
Asteria too shall help her soon
With voice of skilful ease.

A nosegay, every thing that grows,
And music, every sound
To lull the sun to his repose;
The skies are coloured like the rose
With lively streaks around.

Of all the changes rung by time,
None half so sweet appear
As those when thoughts themselves sublime,
And with superior natures chime
In fancy's highest sphere.

ODE

TO A VIRGINIA NIGHTINGALE.

Which was cured of a Fit in the Bosom of a young Lady, who afterwards nursed the Author in a dangerous Illness.

SWEET bird! whose fate and mine agree,
As far as proud humanity

The parallel will own;
O let our voice and hearts combine,
O let us fellow-warblers join,
Our patroness to crown.

When heavy hung thy flagging wing,
When thou couldst neither move nor sing,
Of spirits void and rest,
A lovely nymph her aid apply'd,
She gave the bliss to heaven ally'd,
And cur'd thee on her breast.

Me too the kind indulgent maid,
With gen'rous care and timely aid,
Restor'd to mirth and health;
Then join'd to her, O may I prove,
By friendship, gratitude, and love,
The poverty of wealth.

MARTIAL. BOOK I. EP. XXXVI.

WHEN Brutus' fall wing'd fame to Porcia brought,
Those arms her friends conceal'd, her passion fought,
She soon perceiv'd their poor officious wiles,
Approves their zeal, but at their folly smiles.
What Cato taught, Heaven sure cannot deny,
Bereav'd of all, we still have pow'r to die.
Then down her throat the burning coal convey'd,
Go now, ye fools, and hide your swords, she said.

ON A LADY THROWING SNOW-BALLS, AT HER LOVER.

FROM THE LATIN OF PETRONIUS ASCANIUS.

WHEN, wanton fair, the snowy orb you throw,
I feel a fire before unknown in snow:
Ev'n coldest snow I find has pow'r to warm
My breast, when flung by Julia's lovely arm.
T' elude love's powerful arts I strive in vain,
If ice and snow can latent fires contain.
These frolics leave; the force of beauty prove;
With equal passion cool my ardent love.

FABLES.

FABLE I.

THE WHOLESALE CRITIC AND THE HOT-MERCHANT.

HAIL to each ancient sacred shade
Of those who gave the muses aid,
Skill'd verse mysterious to unfold,
And set each brilliant thought in gold.
Hail Aristotle's honour'd shrine,
And great Longinus hail to thine;
Ye too, whose judgment ne'er could fail,
Hail Horace, and Quintilian hail;
And, dread of every Goth and Hun,
Hail Pope, and peerless Addison.

Alas! by different steps and ways,
Our modern critics aim at praise,
And rashly in the learned arts,
They judge by prejudice and parts;
For, cramp'd by a contracted soul,
How should they comprehend the whole?

I know of many a deep-learn'd brother,
Who weighs one science by another,
And makes 'mongst bards poetic schism,
Because he understands the prison;

Thinks in acuteness he surpasses,
 From knowledge of the optic glasses.
 There are some critics in the nation,
 Profoundly vers'd in gravitation,
 Who like the bulky and the great,
 And judge by quantity and weight.
 Some who're extremely skill'd in building,
 Judge by proportion, form, and gilding,
 And praise with a sagacious look
 The architecture of a book.

Soon as the hops arriv'd from Kent,
 Feth to the quay the merchant went,
 Went critically to explore
 The merit of the hops on shore.
 Close to a bag he took his standing,
 And at a venture thrust his hand in;
 Then, with the face of a physician,
 Their colour scann'd, and their condition;
 He trusts his touch, his smell, his eyes,
 The goods at once approves and buys.

Catchup, so dextrous, droll, and dry,
 It happen'd Catchup there was by,
 Who, like a lingo, arch on all,
 Is nothing, if not critical.

He with a sneer, and with a shrug,
 With eye of hawk, and face of pug;
 Cry'd, "Fellow, I admire thy fun,
 "Thou most judiciously hast done,
 "Who from one handful buy'st ten ton.
 "Does it not enter in thy crown
 "Some may be mouldy, some be brown,
 "The vacancies with leaves supply'd;
 "And some half pick'd, and some half dry'd?"
 The merchant, who Tom Catchup knew,

(A merchant and a scholar too)
 Said, "What I've done is not absurd,
 "I know my chap; and take his word—
 "On thee, thou caviller at large,
 "I here retort thy random charge;
 "Who, in an hypercritical rage,
 "Judge'st ten volumes by a page;
 "Whose wondrous comprehensive view
 "Grasps more than Solomon e'er knew;
 "With every thing you claim alliance,
 "Art, trade, profession, calling, science;
 "You mete out all things by one rule,
 "And are an universal fool.
 "Though swoln with vanity and pride,
 "You're but one driv'ller multiplied,
 "A prig—that proves himself by flarts,
 "As many dolts—as there are arts."

FABLE II.

THE ENGLISH BULL-DOG, DUTCH MASTIFF, AND QUAIL.

ARE we not all of race divine,
 Alike of an immortal line?
 Shall man to man afford derision,
 But for some casual division?
 To malice and to mischief prone,
 From climate, canton, or from zone,
 Are all to idle discord bent,
 These Kentish men—those men of Kent;

* "O, gentle lady, do not put me to't,
 "For I am nothing, if not critical."

OTHELLO, Act 2: scene 5.

And parties and distinction make,
 For parties and distinction's sake.
 Souls sprung from an ethereal flame,
 However clad, are still the same;
 Nor should we judge the heart or head,
 By air we breathe, or earth we tread.
 Dame nature, who, all meritorious,
 In a true Englishman is glorious,
 Is lively, honest, brave, and bonny,
 In Monsieur, Taffy, Teague, and Sawncy.
 Give prejudices to the wind,
 And let's be patriots of mankind.
 Bigots, avant! sense can't endure ye,
 But fabulists should try to cure ye.

A snub-nos'd dog, to fat inclin'd,
 Of the true hogan-mogan kind,
 The favourite of an English dame,
 Mynheer Van Trampo was his name.
 One morning as he chanc'd to range,
 Met honest Towzer on the 'Change;
 And whom have we got here, I beg;
 Quoth he, and lifted up his leg;
 An English dog can't take an airing,
 But foreign scoundrels must be staring.
 I'd have your French dogs, and your Spanish,
 And all your Dutch, and all your Danish;
 By which our species is confounded,
 Be hang'd, be poison'd, or be drowned;
 No mercy on the race suspected,
 Greyhounds from Italy excepted:
 By them my dames ne'er prove big bellied,
 For they poor toads are Farrinellied.
 Well, of all dogs it stands confess'd
 Your English bull-dogs are the best;
 I say it, and will set my hand to't;
 Camden records it, and I'll stand to't.
 'Tis true we have too much urbanity,
 Somewhat o'ercharg'd with soft humanity;
 The best things must find food for railing,
 And every creature has its failing.

And who are you? reply'd Van Trump,
 (Curling his tail upon his rump)
 Vaunting the regions of distraction,
 The land of party and of faction,
 In all fair Europe, who but we
 For national economy;
 For wealth and peace, that have more charms,
 Than learned arts, or noisy arms.
 You envy us our dancing bogs,
 With all the music of the frogs;
 Join'd to the Fretschcutz's bonny loon,
 Who on the cymbal grinds the tune.

For poets, and the muses nine,
 Beyond comparison we shine;
 O how we warble in our gizzards,
 With X X's, H H's, and with Z Z's.
 For fighting—now you think I'm joking;
 We love it better far than smoking.
 Ask but our troops, from man to boy,
 Who all surviv'd at Fontenoy.
 'Tis true, as friends, and as allies,
 We're ever ready to devise;
 Our loves, or any kind assistance,
 That may be granted at a distance;
 But if you go to brag, good bye t'ye,
 Nor dare to brave the high and mighty.

Wrong are you both, rejoins a quail,
 Confin'd within its wry jail:

Frequent from realm to realm I've rang'd,
 And with the seasons, climates chang'd.
 Mankind is not so void of grace,
 But good I've found in every place:
 I've seen sincerity in France,
 Amongst the Germans complaisance;
 In foggy Holland wit may reign,
 I've known humility in Spain;
 Free'd was I by a turban'd Turk,
 Whose life was one entire good work;
 And in this land, fair freedom's boast,
 Behold my liberty is lost.
 Despis'd Hibernia have I seen,
 Dejected like a widow'd queen;
 Her robe with dignity long worn,
 And cap of liberty were torn;
 Her broken lute, and harp unstrung,
 On the uncultur'd ground were flung;
 Down lay her spear, desil'd with rust,
 And book of learning in the dust;
 Her loyalty still blameless found,
 And hospitality renown'd:
 No more the voice of fame engross'd,
 In discontent and clamour lost.—
 Ah! dire corruption, art thou spread,
 Where never viper rear'd its head?
 And didst thy baleful influence fow,
 Where hemlock nor the nightshade grow.
 Hapless, disconsolate, and brave,
 Hibernia! who'll Hibernia save?
 Who shall assist thee in thy woe,
 Who ward from thee the fatal blow?
 'Tis done, the glorious work is done,
 All thanks to Heav'n and Hartington.

FABLE III.

FASHION AND NIGHT.

"Quam multa prava atque injusta sunt moribus."
 TERENT.

FASHION, a motely nymph of yore,
 The Cyprian queen to Proteus bore:
 Various herself in various climes,
 She moulds the manners of the times;
 And turns in every age or nation,
 The chequer'd wheel of variegation;
 True female that ne'er knew her will,
 Still changing, though immortal still,
 One day as the inconstant maid
 Was careless on her sofa laid,
 Sick of the sun, and tir'd with light,
 She thus invoc'd the gloomy night:
 "Come—these malignant rays destroy,
 "Thou screen of shame, and rife of joy;
 "Come from thy western ambushade,
 "Queen of the rout and masquerade:
 "Nymph, without thee no cards advance,
 "Without thee halts the loit'ring dance;
 "Till thou approach, all, all's restraint,
 "Nor is it safe to game or paint;
 "The belles and beaux thy influence ask,
 "Put on the universal mask.
 "Let us invert, in thy disguise,
 "That odious nature, we despise."
 She ceas'd—the sable-mantled dame
 With slow approach, and awful, came:

And frowning with sarcastic sneer,
 Reproach'd the female rioter:
 "That nature you abuse, my fair,
 "Was I created to repair;
 "And contrast with a friendly shade,
 "The pictures Heaven's rich pencil made;
 "And with my sleep-alluring dose,
 "To give laborious art repose;
 "To make both noise and action cease,
 "The queen of secrecy and peace.
 "But thou a rebel, vile and vain,
 "Usurp'st my lawful old domain;
 "My sceptre thou affect'st to sway,
 "And all the various hours are day;
 "With clamours of unreal joy,
 "My sister silence you destroy;
 "The blazing lamps unnatural light
 "My eyeballs weary and affright;
 "But if I am allow'd one shade,
 "Which no intrusive eyes invade,
 "There all th' atrocious imps of hell,
 "Theft, murder, and pollution dwell;
 "Thinks then how much, thou toy of chance,
 "Thy praise is likely worth t' inhance;
 "Blind thing that runn'st without a guide,
 "Thou whirlpool in a rushing tide,
 "No more my fame with praise pollute,
 "But damn me into some repute."

FABLE IV.

WHERE'S THE POKER?

THE poker lost, poor Susan storm'd,
 And all the rites of rage perform'd;
 As scolding, crying, swearing, sweating,
 Abusing, fidgetting, and fretting.
 "Nothing but villany, and thieving;
 "Good heavens! what a world we live in!
 "If I don't find it in the morning,
 "I'll surely give my master warning.
 "He'd better far shut up his doors,
 "Than keep such good for nothing whores;
 "For wheresoe'er their trade they drive,
 "We virtuous bodies cannot thrive."
 Well may poor Susan grunt and groan;
 Misfortunes never came alone,
 But tread each other's heels in throngs,
 For the next day the lost the tongs:
 The salt box, cullender, and pot,
 Soon shar'd the same untimely lot.
 In vain she vails and wages spent
 On new ones—for the new ones went.
 There'd been (she swore), some dev'l or witch in,
 To rob or plunder all the kitchen.
 One night she to her chamber crept,
 (Where for a month she had not slept;
 Her master being, to her seeming,
 A better play-fellow than dreaming.)
 Curse on the author of these wrongs,
 In her own bed she found the tongs,
 (Hang, Thomas for an idle joker!)
 In her own bed she found the poker;
 With salt-box, pepper-box, and kettle,
 With all the culinary metal.—
 Be warn'd, ye fair, by Susan's crosses,
 Keep chaste, and guard yourselves from losses;
 For if young girls delight in kissing,
 No wonder that the poker's missing.

FABLE V.

THE TEA-POT AND SCRUBBING-BRUSH.

A TAWDRY tea-pot, a-la-mode,
 Where art her utmost skill bestow'd,
 Was much esteem'd for being old,
 And on its sides with red and gold
 Strange beasts were drawn, in taste Chinese,
 And frightful fish, and hump-back trees.
 High in an elegant beaufet,
 This pompous utensil was set,
 And near it, on a marble slab,
 Forfaken by some careless drab,
 A veteran scrubbing-brush was plac'd,
 And the rich furniture disgrac'd.
 The tea-pot soon began to flout,
 And thus its venom spouted out:
 "Who from the scullery or yard,
 Brought in this low, this vile blackguard,
 And laid in insolent position,
 Among us people of condition?
 Back to the helper in the stable,
 Scour the close-stool, or wash-house table;
 Or cleanse some horfing block, or plank,
 Nor dare approach us folks of rank.
 Turn---brother coffee-pot, your spout,
 Observe the nasty stinking lout,
 Who seems to scorn my indignation,
 Nor pays due homage to my fashion;
 Take, silver sugar dish, a view,
 And cousin cream pot, pray do you.
 Pox on you all," replies old Scrub,
 Of coxcombs ye confederate club;
 Full of impertinence, and prate,
 Ye hate all things that are sedate.
 None but such ignorant infernals,
 Judge by appearance, and externals:
 Train'd up in toil and useful knowledge,
 I'm fellow of the kitchen college,
 And with the mop, my old associate,
 The family affairs negotiate---
 Am foe to filth, and things obscene,
 Dirty by making others clean---
 Not shining, yet I cause to shine,
 My roughness makes my neighbours fine;
 You're fair without, but foul within,
 With shame impregnated, and sin;
 To you each impious scandal's owing,
 You set each gossip's clack a going---
 How Parson Tythe in secret sins,
 And how Miss Dainty brought forth twins:
 How dear delicious Polly Bloom,
 Owes all her sweetness to perfume;
 Though grave at church, at cards can bet,
 At once a prude and a coquette---
 'Twas better for each British virgin,
 When on roast beef, strong beer, and sturgeon,
 Joyous to breakfast they set round,
 Nor were ashamed to eat a pound.
 These were the manners, these the ways,
 In good Queen Bels's golden days;
 Each damsel ow'd her bloom and glee,
 To wholesome elbow-grease, and me,
 But now they centre all their joys
 In empty rattle traps and noise.
 Thus where the fates send you, they send Flagitious times, which ne'er will mend,

"Till some philosopher can find
 A scrubbing-brush to scour the mind.

FABLE VI.

THE DUELLIST.

WHAT'S honour, did your lordship say?
 My lord, I humbly crave a day---
 'Tis difficult, and in my mind,
 Like substance, cannot be defin'd.
 It deals in numerous externals,
 And is a legion of infernals;
 Sometimes in riot and in play,
 'Tis breaking of the Sabbath day;
 When 'tis consider'd as a passion,
 I deem it lust and fornication.
 We pay our debts in honour's cause,
 Lost in the breaking of the laws.
 'Tis for some selfish impious end,
 To murder the sincerest friend;
 But would you alter all the clan,
 Turn out an honourable man.
 Why take a pistol from the shelf,
 And fight a duel with yourself---
 'Twas on a time, the Lord knows when,
 In Ely, or in Lincoln fen,
 A frog and mouse had long disputes,
 Held in the language of the brutes,
 Who of a certain pool and pasture,
 Should be the sovereign and master.
 Sir, says the frog, and d---n'd his blood,
 I hold that my pretension's good;
 Nor can a brute of reason doubt it,
 For all that you can squeak about it.
 The mouse averse to be o'erpower'd,
 Gave him the lie, and call'd him coward;
 Too hard for any frog's digestion,
 To have his froghood call'd in question!
 A bargain instantly was made,
 No mouse of honour could evade.
 On the next morn, as soon as light,
 With desperate bullrushes to fight;
 The morning came---and man to man,
 The grand monomachy began;
 Need I recount how each bravado
 Shone in motant and in passado;
 To what a height their ire they carry'd,
 How oft they thrust'd and they parry'd;
 But as these champions kept dispensing,
 Finesses in the art of fencing,
 A furious vulture took upon her,
 Quick to decide this point of honour,
 And, lawyer like, to make an end on't,
 Devour'd both plaintiff and defendant.
 Thus, often in our British nation
 (I speak by way of application),
 A lie direct to some hot youth,
 The giving which perhaps was truth,
 The treading on a scoundrel's toe,
 Or dealing impudence a blow,
 Disputes in politics and law,
 About a feather and a straw;
 A thousand trifles not worth naming,
 In whoring, jockeying, and gaming,
 Shall cause a challenge's inditing,
 And set two loggerheads a fighting;
 Meanwhile the father of despair,
 The prince of vanity and air,

His quarry, like an hawk discovering,
O'er their devoted heads hangs hovering,
Secure to get in his tuition,
These volunteers for black perdition.

FABLE VII.

THE COUNTRY SQUIRE AND THE MANDRAKE.

THE sun had rais'd above the mead,
His glorious horizontal head;
Sad Philomela left her thorn;
'The lively linnets hymn'd the morn,
And nature, like a waking bride,
Her blushes spread on ev'ry side;
The cock as usual crow'd up Tray,
Who nightly with his master lay;
The faithful spaniel gave the word,
Treloby at the signal stirr'd,
And with his gun, from wood to wood,
The man of prey his course pursu'd;
The dew and herbage all around,
Like pearls and emeralds on the ground;
Th' uncultur'd flowers that rudely rise,
Where smiling freedom art defies;
The lark, in transport, tow'ring high,
The crimson curtains of the sky,
Affected not Treloby's mind—
For what is beauty to the blind?
'Th' amorous voice of sylvan love,
Form'd charming concerts in the grove;
Sweet zephyr sigh'd on Flora's breast,
And drew the blackbird from his nest;
Whistling he leapt from leaf to leaf;
But what is music to the deaf?

At length, while poring on the ground,
With monumental look profound,
A curious vegetable caught
His—something similar to thought:
Wond'ring, he ponder'd, stooping low,
(Treloby always lov'd a show)
And on the mandrake's vernal station,
Star'd with prodigious observation.

'Th' affronted mandrake with a frown,
Address'd in rage the wealthy clown,
“ Proud member of the rambling race,
“ That vegetate from place to place,
“ Pursue the leveret at large,
“ Nor near thy blunderbuis discharge.
“ Disdainful though thou look'st on me,
“ What art thou or what can'st thou be?
“ Nature, that mark'd thee as a fool,
“ Gave no materials for the school.
“ In what consists thy work and fame?
“ The preservation of the game.—
“ For what? thou avaricious elf,
“ But to destroy it all thyself;
“ To lead a life of drink and feast,
“ T' oppress the poor, and cheat the priest,
“ Or triumph in a virgin lost,
“ Is all the manhood thou canst boast.—
“ Pretty, in nature's various plan,
“ To see a weed that's like a man;
“ But 'tis a grievous thing indeed,
“ To see a man so like a weed.”

FABLE VIII.

THE BROCADED GOWN AND LINEN RAG.

FROM a fine lady to her maid,
A gown descended of brocade,

French!—Yes, from Paris—that's enough,
That wou'd give dignity to stuff.
By accident or by design,
Or from some cause, I can't divine;
A linen rag (sad source of wrangling!)
On a contiguous peg was dangling,
Vilely besmear'd—for late his master,
It serv'd in quality of plaister.

The gown, contemptuous beholder,
Gave a French shrug from either shoulder,
And rustling with emotions furious,
Bespoke the rag in terms injurious.
“ Unfit for tinder, lint or fodder,
“ Thou thing of filth (and what is odder),
“ Discarded from thy owner's back,
“ Dar'st thou proceed, and gold attack?
“ Instant away—-or in this place,
“ Begar me give you coup de grace.”
To this reply'd the honest rag,

Who lik'd a jest, and was a wag:
“ Though thy gibe tongue without a halt run,
“ Thou shabby second-hand subaltern,
“ At once so ancient and so easy,
“ At once so gorgeous and so greasy;
“ I value not thy gaseonading,
“ Nor all thy alamoed parading;
“ But to abstain from words imperious,
“ And to be sober, grave, and serious.
“ Though says friend Horace, 'tis no treason,
“ At once to giggle, and to reason,
“ When me you lessen, friend, you dream,
“ For know I am not what I seem;
“ Soon by the mill's refusing motion,
“ The sweetest daughter of the ocean,
“ Fair Medway, shall with snowy hue,
“ My virgin purity renew,
“ And give me reinform'd existence,
“ A good retention and subsistence.
“ Then shall the sons of genius join,
“ To make my second life divine.
“ O Murray, let me then dispense,
“ Some portion of thy eloquence;
“ For Greek and Roman rhetoric shine,
“ United and improv'd in thine:
“ The spirit stirring * sage alarms,
“ And Ciceronian sweetness charms.
“ Th' Athenian Akenfide may deign
“ To stamp me deathless with his pen.
“ While flows approv'd by all the nine
“ Th' immortal soul of every line.
“ Collins, perhaps, his aid may lend,
“ Melpomene's selected friend.
“ Perhaps our great Augustan Gray
“ May grace me with a Doric lay;
“ With sweet, with manly words of woe,
“ That nervously pathetic flow,
“ What, Mason, may I owe to you?
“ Learning's first pride, and nature's too;
“ On thee she cast her sweetest smile,
“ And gave thee art's correcting file;
“ That file, which with assiduous pain,
“ The viper envy bites in vain.—
“ Such glories my mean lot betide,
“ Hear, tawdry fool, and check thy pride.—
“ Thou, after scouring, dying, turning,
“ (If haply thou escape a burning)

* Demosthenes.

" From gown to petticoat descending,
 " And in a beggar's mantle ending,
 " Shalt in a dunghill or a sty,
 " Midst filth and vermin rot and die."

FABLE IX.

MADAM AND THE MAGPIE.

YE thunders roll, ye oceans roar,
 And wake the rough resounding shore;
 Ye guns in smoke and flames engage,
 And shake the ramparts with your rage;
 Boreas distend your chops and blow;
 Ring, ring, ye bonny bells of Bow;
 Ye drums and rattles, rend the ears,
 Like twenty thousand Southwark fairs;
 Bellow ye bulls, and bawl ye bats,
 Encore, encore, ye amorous cats:
 In vain poor things ye squeak a squall,
 Soft Sylvia shall out-tongue you all:
 But here she comes—there's no relief,
 She comes, and blessed are the deaf.
 " A magpie! why, you're mad, my dear,
 " To bring a chattering magpie here.
 " A prating play-thing, fit for boys—
 " You know I can't endure a noise.—
 " You brought this precious present sure,
 " My headach and my cough to cure.
 " Pray hand him in and let him stain
 " Each curtain, and each counterpane;
 " Yes, he shall roost upon my toilet,
 " Or on my pillow—he can't spoil it:
 " He'll only make me catch my death.—
 " O heavens! for a little breath—
 " Thank God, I never knew repentment,
 " But am all patience and contentment,
 " Or else, you paltry knave, I should
 " (As any other woman would)
 " Wring off his neck, and down your gullet
 " Cram it by way of chick or pullet.—
 " Well, I must lock up all my rings,
 " My jewels, and my curious things:
 " My Chinese toys must go to pot;
 " My dear, my pinchbecks—and what not?
 " For all your magpies are, like lawyers,
 " At once thieves, brawlers, and destroyers.—
 " You for a wife have search'd the globe,
 " You've got a very female Job,
 " Pattern of love, and peace and unity,
 " Or how could you expect impunity?
 " O Lord! this nasty thing will bite,
 " And scratch and clapper, claw and fight.
 " O monstrous wretch, thus to devise,
 " To tear out your poor Sylvia's eyes.
 " You're a fine Popish plot pursuing,
 " By presents to affect my ruin;
 " And thus for good are ill retorting!
 " To me, who brought you such a fortune;
 " To me, you low-liv'd clown, to me,
 " Who came of such a family;
 " Me, who for age to age possess'd
 " A lion rampant on my crest;
 " Me, who have fill'd your empty coffers,
 " Me, who'd so many better officers;
 " And is my merit thus regarded,
 " Cuckold, my virtue thus rewarded.
 " O 'tis past sufferance—Mary—Mary,
 " I faint—the ciceron, or the clary.

The poor man, who had bought the creature,
 Out of pure conjugal good-nature,
 Stood at this violent attack,
 Like statues made by Rouilliac,
 Though form'd beyond all skill antique,
 They can't their marble silence break;
 They only breathe, and think, and start;
 Astonish'd at their maker's art.
 " Quoth Mag, fair Grizzle, I must grant,
 " Your spouse a magpie cannot want;
 " For troth (to give the dev'l his due)
 " He keeps a rookery in you.
 " Don't fear I'll tarry long, sweet lady,
 " Where there is din enough already,
 " We never should agree together,
 " Although we're so much of a feather;
 " You're fond of peace, no man can doubt it,
 " Who make such wond'rous noise about it,
 " And your tongue of immortal mould
 " Proclaims in thunder you're no scold.
 " Yes, yes, you're sovereign of the tongue,
 " And, like the king, can do no wrong;
 " Justly your spouse restrains his voice,
 " Nor vainly answers words with noise;
 " This storm, which no soul can endure,
 " Requires a very different cure;
 " For such four verjuice dispositions,
 " Your crabsticks are the best physicians."

FABLE X.

THE BLOCKHEAD AND BEEHIVE.

THE fragrance of the new-mown hay
 Paid incense to the god of day;
 Who issuing from his eastern gate,
 Replendent rode in all his state,
 Rous'd by the light from soft repose,
 Big with the muse, a bard arose,
 And the fresh garden's fill retreat
 He measur'd with poetic feet.
 The cooling, high, o'er-arching shade,
 By the embracing branches made,
 The smooth shorn sod, whose verdant gloss,
 Was check'd with intermingled moss,
 Cowslips, like topazes that shine,
 Close by the silver serpentine,
 Rude rustics which assert the bow's,
 Amidst the educated flow'rs.
 The lime tree and sweet-scented hay,
 (The sole reward of many a lay)
 And all the poets of the wing,
 Who sweetly without salary sing,
 Attract at once his observation,
 Peopling thy wilds, imagination!
 " Sweet nature, who this turf bedews,
 " Sweet nature, who's the thrush's muse!
 " How the each anxious thought beguiles,
 " And meets me with ten thousand smiles!
 " O infinite benignity!
 " She smiles, but not alone on me;
 " On hill, on dale, on lake, on lawn,
 " Like Celia when her picture's drawn;
 " Assuming countless charms and airs,
 " 'Till Hayman's matchless art despairs,
 " Pausing like me he dreads to fall
 " From the divine original."
 More had he said—but in there came
 A lout—Squire Booby was his name—

The bard, who at a distant view,
 The busy prattling blockhead knew,
 Retir'd into a secret nook,
 And thence his observations took.
 Vex'd he could find no man to tease,
 The 'quire 'gan chattering to the bees,
 And pertly with officious mien,
 He thus address'd their humming queen :

" Madam, be not in any terrors,
 " I only come t' amend your errors ;
 " My friendship briefly to display,
 " And put you in a better way.
 " Cease, Madam, (if I may advise)
 " To carry honey on your thighs,
 " Employ 'tis better, I aver)
 " Old Grub the fairies coach-maker ;
 " For he who has sufficient art
 " To make a coach, may make a cart.
 " To these you'll yoke some sixteen bees,
 " Who will dispatch your work with ease ;
 " And come and go, and go and come,
 " To bring your honey harvest home---
 " Ma'm, architecture you're not skill'd in,
 " I don't approve your way of building ;
 " In this there's nothing like design,
 " Pray learn the use of Gunter's line.
 " I'll serve your highness at a pinch,
 " I am a scholar every inch,
 " And know each author I lay fit on,
 " From Archimedes down to Whiston---
 " Though honey making be your trade,
 " In chemistry you want some aid---
 " Pleas'd with your work, although you sing,
 " You're not quite right---'tis not the thing,
 " Myself would gladly be an actor,
 " To help the honey manufacture---
 " I hear for war you are preparing,
 " Which I should like to have a share in ;
 " Yet though the enemy be landing,
 " 'Tis wrong to keep an army standing---
 " If you'll ensure me from the laws
 " I'll write a pamphlet in your cause---
 " I vow I am concern'd to see
 " Your want of state---economy.
 " Of nothing living I pronounce ill,
 " But I don't like your privy-council."
 " There is, I know, a certain bee,
 " (Would he was from the ministry)
 " Which certain bee, if rightly known,
 " Would prove no better than a drone ;
 " There are (but I shall name no names,
 " I never love to kindle flames)
 " A pack of rogues with crimes grown callous,
 " Who greatly would adorn the gallows ;
 " That with the wasps, for paltry gold,
 " A secret correspondence hold,
 " Yet you'll be great---your subjects free,
 " If the whole thing be left to me."---
 Thus, like the waters of the ocean,
 His tongue had run in ceaseless motion,
 Had not the queen ta'en p in wrath,
 This thing of folly and of froth.

" Impertinent and witless meddler,
 " Thou smattering, empty, noisy pedlar !
 " By vanity, thou bladder blown,
 " To be the football of the town.
 " O happy England, land of freedom,
 " Replete with statesmen, if she need 'em,

" Where war is wag'd by Sue or Nell,
 " And Jobson is a Machiavel !---
 " Tell Hardwick that his judgment fails,
 " Show Justice how to hold her scales---
 " To fire the soul at once, and please,
 " Teach Murray and Demosthenes ;
 " Say Vane is not by goodness grac'd,
 " And wants humanity and taste---
 " Though Pelham with Mæccenas vies,
 " Tell fame she's false, and truth she lies ;
 " And then return, thou verbal Hector,
 " And give the bees another lecture."
 This said, the portal she unbarr'd,
 Calling the bees upon their guard,
 And set at once about his ears
 Ten thousand of her granadiers---
 Some on his lips and palate hung,
 And the offending member stung.
 " Just (says the bard from out the grot)
 " Just, though severe, is your sad lot,
 " Who think, and talk, and live in vain,
 " Of sweet society the bane.
 " Business misplac'd is a mere jest,
 " And active idleness at best."

FABLE XI.

THE CITIZEN AND THE RED LION OF BRENTFORD.

I LOVE my friend---but love my ease,
 And claim a right myself to please ;
 To company however prone,
 At times all men would be alone.
 Free from each interruption rude,
 Or what is meant by solitude.
 My villa lies within the bills,
 So---like a theatre it fills :
 To me my kind acquaintance stray,
 And Sunday proves no Sabbath day ;
 Yet many a friend and near relation,
 Make up a glorious congregation ;
 They crowd by dozens and by dozens,
 And bring me all their country cousins.
 Though cringing landlords on the road,
 Who find for man and horse abode ;
 Though gilded grapes to sign-post chain'd,
 Invite them to be entertain'd,
 And straddling cross his kilderkin,
 Though jolly Bacchus calls them in ;
 Nay---though my landlady would trust 'em,
 Pilgarlick's sure of all the custom ;
 And his whole house is like a fair,
 Unless he only treats with air.
 What ! shall each pert half witted wit,
 That calls me Jack, or calls me Kit,
 Prey on my time, or on my table ?
 No---but let's hasten to the fable.

The eve advanc'd, the sun declin'd,
 Ball to the booby-hint was join'd,
 A wealthy cockney drove away,
 To celebrate Saint Saturday ;
 Wife, daughter, pug, all crowded in,
 To meet at country house their kin.
 Through Brentford, to fair Twickenham's bow'rs,
 The ungreas'd grumbling axle scow'rs,
 To pass in rural sweets a day,
 But there's a lion in the way :

The lion a most furious elf,
 Hung up to represent himself,
 Redden'd with rage, and shook his mane,
 And roar'd, and roar'd, and roar'd again.
 Wond'rous, though painted on a board,
 He roar'd, and roar'd, and roar'd, and roar'd.
 " Fool! (says the majesty of beasts)
 " At whose expence a legion feasts,
 " Foe to yourself, you those pursue,
 " Who're eating up your cakes and you;
 " Walk in, walk in, so prudence votes,
 " And give poor Ball a feed of oats,
 " Look to yourself, and as for Ma'm,
 " Coax her to take a little dram;
 " Let Miis and pug with cakes be fed
 " Then honest man go back to bed;
 " You're better, and you're cheaper there,
 " Where are no hangers on to fear.
 " Go buy friend Newberry's new Pantheon
 " And con the tale of poor Acteon,
 " Horn'd by Diana, and o'erpower'd,
 " And by the dogs he fed devour'd.
 " What he receiv'd from charity,
 " Lewdness perhaps may give to thee;
 " And though your spouse my lecture scorns,
 " Beware his fate, beware his horns."
 " Sir," says the cit, (who made a stand,
 And strok'd his forehead with his hand)
 " By your grim gravity and grace,
 " You greatly would become the mace.
 " This kind advice I gladly take,---
 " Draw'r, bring the dram, and bring a cake,
 " With good brown beer that's brisk and hum-
 " ming.

" A coming, Sir! a coming, coming!"
 The cit then took a hearty draught,
 And shook his jolly sides and laugh'd.
 Then to the king of beasts he bow'd,
 And thus his gratitude avow'd.---
 " Sir, for your sapient oration,
 " I owe the gréatest obligation.
 " You stand expos'd to sun and show'r,
 " I know Jack Ellis of the tow'r;
 " By him you soon may gain renown,
 " He'll show your highness to the town;
 " Or, if you choose your station here,
 " To call forth Britons to their beer,
 " As painter of distinguish'd note,
 " He'll send his man to clean your coat."
 The lion thank'd him for his proffer,
 And if a vacancy should offer,
 Declar'd he had too just a notion,
 To be averse to such promotion.
 The citizen drove off with joy,
 " For London---ball---for London---hoj."
 Content to bed, he went his way,
 And is no bankrupt to this day.

FABLE XII.

THE HERALD AND HUSBANDMAN.

--- Nobilitas sola est atque unica virtus.

JUVENAL.

I WITH friend Juvenal agree,
 Virtue's the true nobility;
 Has of herself sufficient charms,
 Although without a coat of arms.

Honestus does not know the rules,
 Concerning Or, and Fez, and Gules,
 Yet sets the wond'ring eye to gaze on,
 Such deeds no herald e'er could blaze on.
 Tawdry atchievements out of place,
 Do but augment a fool's disgrace;
 A coward is a double jest,
 Who has a lion for his crest;
 And things are come to such a pass,
 Two horses may support an ass;
 And on a gamester or buffoon,
 A moral motto's a lampoon.
 An honest rustic having done
 His master's work 'twixt sun and fun,
 Retir'd to dress a little spot,
 Adjoining to his homely cot,
 Where pleas'd, in miniature, he found
 His landlord's culinary ground,
 Some herbs that feed, and some that heal,
 The winter's medicine or meal.
 The sage, which in his garden seen,
 No man need ever die * I ween;
 The marjorum comely to behold,
 With thyme, and ruddiest marygold,
 And mint and pennyroyal sweet,
 To deck the cottage windows meet;
 And balm, that yields a finer juice
 Than all that China can produce;
 With carrots red, and turnips white,
 And leeks Cadwallader's delight;
 And all the favory crop that vie
 To please the palate and the eye.
 Thus, as intent, he did survey
 His plot, a herald came that way,
 A man of great escutcheon'd knowledge,
 And member of the motley college.
 Heedless the peasant pais'd he by,
 Indulging this soliloquy;
 " Ye gods! what an enormous space;
 " 'Twixt man and man does nature place;
 " While some by deeds of honour rise,
 " To such a height, as far outvies
 " The visible diurnal sphere;
 " While others, like this rustic here,
 " Grope in the grovelling ground content,
 " Without or lineage or descent.
 " Hail, heraldry! mysterious art,
 " Bright patroness of all desert,
 " Mankind would on a level lie,
 " And undistinguish'd live and die;
 " Depriv'd of thy illustrious aid,
 " Such! so momentous is our trade.
 " Sir," says the clown, " why sure you joke,
 " (And kept on digging as he spoke)
 " And prate not to extort conviction,
 " But merrily by way of fiction.
 " Say, do your manuscripts attest,
 " What was old father Adam's crest;
 " Did he a nobler coat receive
 " In right of marrying Mrs. Eve;
 " Or had supporters when he kiss'd her,
 " On dexter side, and side sinister;
 " Or was his motto, prithee speak,
 " English, French, Latin, Welch, or Greek?"

* " Cur moriatur homo, cui salvia crescit in
 " horto?"

" Or was he not, without a lie,
 " Just such a nobleman as I?
 " Virtue, which great defects can stifle,
 " May beam distinction on a trifle;
 " And honour, with her native charms,
 " May beautify a coat of arms;
 " Realities sometimes will thrive,
 " E'en by appearance kept alive;
 " But by themselves, Gules, Or, and Fez,
 " Are cyphers, neither more or less:
 " Keep both thy head and hands from crimes,
 " Be honest in the worst of times:
 " Health's on my countenance impress'd,
 " And sweet content's my daily guest,
 " My fame alone I build on this,
 " And Garter King at arms may kiss."—

FABLE XIII.

A STORY OF A COCK AND A BULL.

YES—we excel in arts and arms,
 In learning's lore, and beauty's charms.
 The seas wide empire we engross,
 All nations hail the British cross;
 The land of liberty we tread,
 And woe to his devoted head,
 Who dares the contrary advance,
 One Englishman's worth ten of France.
 These these are truths what man won't write for,
 Won't swear, won't bully, or won't fight for;
 Yet (though perhaps I speak through vanity)
 Would we'd a little more humanity;
 Too far, I fear, I've drove the jest,
 So leave to cock and bull the rest.

A bull who'd listen'd to the vows
 Of above fifteen hundred cows;
 And serv'd his master fresh and fresh,
 With hecatombs of special flesh,
 Like to an hermit or a dervise,
 (Grown old and feeble in the service)
 Now left the meadow's green parade,
 And sought a solitary shade.
 The cows proclaim'd in mournful lowing,
 The bull's deficiency in wooing,
 And to their disappointed master,
 All told the terrible disaster.

" Is this the case (quoth Hodge) O rare!
 " But hold, to-morrow is the fair.
 " Thou to thy doom, old boy, are fated,
 " To-morrow—and thou shalt be baited."
 The deed was done—curse on the wrong!
 Bloody description, hold thy tongue—
 Victorious yet the bull return'd,
 And with stern silence inly mourn'd.

A vet'ran, brave, majestic cock,
 Who serv'd for hour glass, guard and clock,
 Who crow'd the mansion's first relief,
 Alike from goblin and from thief;
 Whose youth escap'd the Christmas skillet,
 Whose vigour brav'd the Shrovetide billet,
 Had just return'd in wounds and pain,
 Triumphant from the barbarous train.—
 By riv'lets brink, with trees o'ergrown,
 He heard his fellow sufferer's moan;
 And greatly scorning wounds and smart,
 Gave him three cheers with all his heart.

" Rife, neighbour, from that pensive attitude,
 " Brave witness of vile man's ingratitude;

" And let us both with spur and horn,
 " The cruel reasoning monster scorn.—
 " Methinks at every dawn of day,
 " When first I chant my blithsome lay,
 " Methinks I hear from out the sky,
 " All will be better by and by;
 " When bloody, base, degenerate man,
 " Who deviates from his Maker's plan;
 " Who nature and her works abuses,
 " And thus his fellow servants uses,
 " Shall greatly, and yet justly want,
 " The mercy he refus'd to grant;
 " And (while his heart his conscience purges)
 " Shall wish to be the brute he scourges."

FABLE XIV.

THE SNAKE, THE GOOSE, AND NIGHTINGALE.
Humbly addressed to the Hissers and Catcallers attending both Houses.

WHEN rul'd by truth and nature's ways,
 When just to blame, yet fix'd to praise,
 As votary of the Delphic god,
 I reverence the critic's rod;
 But when inflam'd with spite alone,
 I hold all critics but as one;
 For though they class themselves with art,
 And each man takes a different part;
 Yet whatso'er they praise and blame;
 They in their motives are the same.

Forth as she waddled in the brake,
 A grey goose stumbled on a snake,
 And took th' occasion to abuse her,
 And of rank plagiarism accuse her.
 " 'Twas I," quoth she, " in every vale,
 " First hiss'd the noisy nightingale;
 " And boldly cavill'd at each note,
 " That twitter'd in the woodlark's throat:
 " I who sublime and more than mortal,
 " Must stoop to enter at the portal,
 " Have ever been the first to show
 " My hate to every thing that's low,
 " While thou mean mimic of my manner,
 " (Without enlisting to my banner)
 " Darest, in thy grow'ling situation,
 " To counterfeit my sibilation."
 The snake enrag'd reply'd, " Know, Madam,
 " I date my charter down from Adam;
 " Nor can I, since I bear the bell,
 " E'er imitate where I excel.
 " Had any other creature dar'd
 " Once to aver what you've averr'd,
 " I might have been more fierce and fervent,
 " But you're a goose,—and so your servant."
 " Truee with your folly and your pride,"
 The warbling Philomela cry'd;
 " Since no more animals we find
 " In nature, of the hissing kind,
 " You should be friends with one another,
 " Nay, kind as brother is to brother.
 " For know, thou pattern of abuse,
 " Thou snake art but a crawling goose;
 " And thou dull dabb'ler in each lake,
 " Art nothing but a feather'd snake."

FABLE XV.

MRS. ABIGAIL AND THE DUMB WAITER.

WITH frowning brow and aspect low'ring,
 As Abigail one day was scow'ring

From chair to chair the past along,
 Without folliology or song;
 Content in humdrum mood t' adjust
 Her matters to disperse the dust—
 Thus plodded on the sullen fair,
 Till a dumb waiter claim'd her care;
 She then in rage, with shrill salute,
 Bespoke the inoffensive mute:—
 "Thou stupid tool of vapourish asses,
 "With thy brown shelves for pots and glasses;
 "Thou foreign whirligig, for whom
 "Us honest folks must quit the room;
 "And, like young misses at a christ'ning,
 "Are forc'd to be content with list'ning;
 "Though thou'rt a fav'rite of my master's,
 "I'll set thee gadding on thy castors."
 This said—with many a rough attack,
 She scrub'd him till she made him crack;
 Insulted stronger still and stronger,
 The poor dumb thing could hold no longer.—
 "Thou drab, born mops and brooms to dandle,
 "Thou haberdasher of small scandal,
 "Factor of family abuse,
 "Retailer of domestic news;
 "My lord, as soon as I appear,
 "Confinest thee in thy proper sphere;
 "Or else, at ev'ry place of call,
 "The chandler's shop, or cobler's stall,
 "Or ale-house, where (for petty tales,
 "Gin, beer, and ale, are constant vails)
 "Each word at table that was spoke
 "Would soon become the public joke,
 "And cheerful innocent converse
 "To scandal warp'd—or something worse.—
 "Whene'er my master I attend,
 "Freely his mind he can unbend;
 "But when such praters fill my place,
 "Then nothing should be said—but grace."

FABLE XVI.

THE BAG-WIG AND THE TOBACCO-PIPE.

A BAG-WIG of a jauntier air,
 Trick'd up with all a barber's care,
 Loaded with powder and perfume,
 Hung in a spendthrift's dressing-room:
 Close by its side, by chance convey'd,
 A black tobacco-pipe was laid;
 And with its vapours far and near,
 Outstunk the essence of Monsieur;
 At which its rage, the thing of hair,
 Thus bristling up, began declare.
 "Bak'd dirt! that with intrusion rude
 Break'ft in upon my solitude
 "And whose offensive breath defiles
 "The air for forty thousand miles—
 "Avaunt—pollution's in thy touch—
 "O barb'rous English! horrid Dutch!
 "I cannot bear it—Here, Sue, Nan,
 "Go call the maid to call the man,
 "And bid him come without delay
 "To take this odious pipe away.
 "Hideous! sure some one smok'd thee, friend,
 "Reversely, at his t'other end.
 "Oh! what mix'd odours! what a throng
 "Of salt and sour, of stale and strong!
 "A most unnatural combination,
 "Enough to mar all perspiration—

"Monstrous! again—'twould vex a saint!
 "Susan, the drops—or else I faint!"
 The pipe (for 'twas a pipe of soul)
 Raising himself upon his bole,
 In smoke, like oracle of old,
 Did thus his sentiments unfold:
 "Why, what's the matter, Goodman Swagger,
 "Thou flaunting French, fantastic bragger?
 "Whose whole fine speech is (with a pox)
 "Ridiculous and heterodox.
 "Twas better for the English nation
 "Before such scoundrels came in fashion,
 "When none fought hair in realms unknown,
 "But every blockhead bore his own.
 "Know, puppy, I'm an English pipe,
 "Deem'd worthy of each Briton's gripe;
 "Who, with my cloud-compelling aid
 "Help our plantations and our trade,
 "And am, when sober and when mellow,
 "An upright, downright, honest fellow.
 "Though fools like you may think me rough,
 "And scorn me, 'cause I am in buff,
 "Yet your contempt I glad receive,
 "'Tis all the fame that you can give:
 "None finery or fopp'ry prize,
 "But they who've something to disguise;
 "For simple nature hates abuse,
 "And plainness is the dress of use."

FABLE XVII.

CARE AND GENEROSITY.

OLD Care with Industry and Art
 At length so well had play'd his part,
 He heap'd up such an ample store,
 That Av'rice could not sigh for more:
 Ten thousand flocks his shepherd told,
 His coffers overflow'd with gold;
 The land all round him was his own,
 With corn his crowded granaries groan.
 In short, so vast his charge and gain,
 That to possess them was a pain:
 With happiness oppress'd he lies,
 And much too prudent to be wise.
 Near him there liv'd a beauteous maid,
 With all the charms of youth array'd;
 Good, amiable, sincere, and free;
 Her name was Generosity.
 'Twas hers the largesse to bestow
 On rich and poor, on friend and foe.
 Her doors to all were open'd wide,
 The pilgrim there might safe abide:
 For th' hungry and the thirsty crew,
 The bread she broke, the drink she drew;
 There Sickness laid her aching head,
 And there Distress could find a bed.
 Each hour, with an all-bounteous hand,
 Diffus'd the blessings round the land:
 Her gifts and glory lasted long,
 And numerous was th' accepting throng.
 At length pale Penury seiz'd the dame,
 And Fortune fled, and Ruin came;
 She found her riches at an end,
 And that she had not made one friend.
 All curs'd her for not giving more,
 Nor thought on what she'd done before:
 She wept, she rav'd, she tore her hair,
 When, lo! to comfort her came Care

And cry'd, my dear, if you will join
Your hand in nuptial bonds with mine,
All will be well--you shall have store,
And I be plagu'd with wealth no more.
Though I refrain your bounteous heart,
You still shall act the generous part.
The bridal came---great was the feast,
And good the pudding and the priest.
The bride in nine moons brought him forth
A little maid of matchless worth:
Her face was mix'd of care and glee;
They christen'd her Economy;
And styl'd her fair discretion's queen,
The mistress of the golden mean.
Now generosity confin'd,
Perfectly easy in her mind,
Still loves to give, yet knows to spare,
Nor wishes to be free from care.

FABLE XVIII.

THE PIG.

In every age, and each profession,
Men err the most by prepossession;
But when the thing is clearly shown,
And fairly stated, fully known,
We soon applaud what we deride,
And penitence succeeds to pride.--
A certain baron on a day,
Having a mind to show away,
Invited all the wits and wags,
Foote, Massy, Shuter, Yates, and Skeggs,
And built a large commodious stage,
For the choice spirits of the age;
But above all, among the rest,
There came a genius, who profess'd
To have a curious trick in store,
Which never was perform'd before.
Through all the town this soon got air,
And the whole house was like a fair;
But soon his entry as he made,
Without a prompter or parade,
'Twas all expectation, all suspense,
And silence gagg'd the audience.
He hid his head behind his wig,
And with such truth took off a pig,
All swore 'twas serious, and no joke;
For doubtless underneath his cloak
He had conceal'd some grunting elf,
Or was a real hog himself.
A search was made, no pig was found---
With thund'ring claps the seats resound,
And pit, and box, and galleries roar,
With---O rare! bravo! and encore!
Old Roger Grouse, a country clown,
Who yet knew something of the town,
Beheld the mimic and his whim,
And on the morrow challeng'd him, rag-gatherer,
Declaring to each beau and bunter, his report was
That he'd out-grunt th' egregious grunter. woman
The morrow came---the crowd was greater---
But prejudice and rank ill-nature
Usurp'd the minds of men and wenches,
Who came to hiss, and break the benches.
The mimic took his usual station,
And squeak'd with general approbation.
Again, encore! encore! they cry---
'Twas quite the thing---'twas very high:

Old Grouse conceal'd, amidst the racket,
A real pig beneath his jacket---
Then forth he came---and with his nail
He pinch'd the urchin by the tail.
The tortur'd pig from out his throat
Produc'd the genuine nat'ral note.
All bellow'd out---'twas very sad!
Sure never stuff was half so bad!
That like a pig!--each cry'd in scoff,
Pshaw! nonsense! blockhead! off! off! off!
The mimic was extoll'd, and Grouse
Was hiss'd, and catcall'd from the house---
"Soft ye, a word before I go,"
Quoth honest Hodge---and stooping low
Produc'd the pig, and thus aloud
Bespoke the stupid, partial crowd:
"Behold, and learn from this poor creature,
"How much you critics know of nature."

BALLADS.

BALLAD I.

SWEET WILLIAM.

By a prattling stream, on a midsummer's eve,
Where the woodbine and jess'mine their boughs
interweave,
Fair Flora, I cry'd, to my harbour repair,
For I must have a chaplet for Sweet William's hair.
She brought me the violet that grows on the hill,
The vale-dwelling lily, and gilded jonquill:
But such languid odours how could I approve,
Just warm from the lips of the lad that I love?
She brought me, his faith and his truth to display,
The undying myrtle, and evergreen bay:
But why these to me, who've his constancy known?
And Billy has laurels enough of his own.
The next was a gift that I could not contemn,
For she brought me two roses that grew on a stem:
Of the dear nuptial tie they stood emblems confess,
So I kiss'd 'em, and press'd 'em quite close to my breast.
She brought me a sun-flow'r---this, fair one's your due;
For it once was a maiden, and love-sick like you:
Oh! give it me quick, to my shepherd I'll run,
As true to his flame as this flow'r to the sun.

BALLAD II.

THE LASS WITH THE GOLDEN LOCKS.

No more of my Harriot, of Polly no more,
Nor all the bright beautiest that charm'd me before;
My heart for a slave to gay Venus I've sold,
And barter'd my freedom for ringlets of gold:
I'll throw down my pipe, and neglect all my flocks,
And will sing to my lads with the golden locks.
Though o'er her white forehead the gilt tresses flow,
Like the rays of the sun on a hillock of snow:
Such painters of old drew the queen of the fair;
'Tis the taste of the ancients, 'tis classical hair:
And though wittings may scoff, and though rail-
lery mocks,
Yet I'll sing to my lads with the golden locks.
To live and to love, to converse and be free,
Is loving, my charmer, and living with thee:

Away go the hours in kisses and rhyme,
Spite of all the grave lectures of old father Time;
A fig for his dials, his watches and clocks,
He's best spent with the las of the golden locks.

Than the swan in the brook she's more dear to my sight,

Her mien is more stately, her breast is more white,
Her sweet lips are rubies, all rubies above,
They are fit for the language or labour of love;
At the park in the mall, at the play in the box,
My las bears the bell with her golden locks.

Her beautiful eyes, as they roll or they flow,
Shall be glad for my joy, or shall weep for my
woe;

She shall ease my fond heart, and shall sooth my
While thousands of rivals are fighting in vain;
Let them rail at the fruit they can't reach, like
the fox,

While I have the las with the golden locks.

BALLAD III.

ON MY WIFE'S BIRTH-DAY.

'Tis Nancy's birth-day---raise your strains,
Ye nymphs of the Parnassian plains,
And sing with more than usual glee
To Nancy, who was born for me.

Tell the blithe graces as they bound
Luxuriant in the buxom round;
They're not more elegantly free,
Than Nancy who was born for me.

Tell royal Venus, though she rove,
The queen of the immortal grove;
That she must share her golden fee
With Nancy, who was born for me.

Tell Pallas, though th' Athenian school,
And ev'ry trite pedantic fool,
On her to place the palm agree;
'Tis Nancy, who was born for me.

Tell spotless Dian, though she range,
The regent of the up-land grange,
In chastity she yields to thee,
O Nancy, who wast born for me.

Tell Cupid, Hymen, and tell Jove,
With all the pow'rs of life and love,
That I'd disdain to breathe or be,
If Nancy was not born for me.

BALLAD IV.

THE DECISION.

My Florio, wildest of his sex
(Who sure the veriest saint would vex),
From beauty roves to beauty;
Yet though abroad the wanton roam,
Whene'er he deigns to stay at home,
He always minds his duty.

Something to ev'ry charming she,
In thoughtless prodigality,
He's granting still and granting,
To Phyllis that, to Chloe this,
And every madam, every miss;
Yet I find nothing wanting.

If haply I his will displease,
Tempestuous as th' autumnal seas
He foams and rages ever;
But when he ceases from his ire,
I cry, such spirit and such fire,
Is surely wond'rous clever.

I ne'er want reason to complain;
But sweet is pleasure after pain,
And every joy grows greater.
Then trust me, damiels, whilst I tell,
I should not like him half so well,
If I could make him better.

BALLAD V.

THE TALKATIVE FAIR.

FROM morn to night, from day to day,
At all times, and at every place,
You scold, repeat, and sing, and say,
Nor are there hopes you'll ever cease,

Forbear, my Celia, oh! forbear,
If your own health, or ours you prize,
For all maunking that hear you, swear
Your tongue's more killing than your eyes.

Your tongue's a traitor to your face,
Your fame's by your own noise obscur'd,
All are distracted while they gaze;
But if they listen, they are cur'd.

Your silence would acquire more praise,
Than all you say, or all I write;
One look ten thousand charms displays;
Then hush—and be an angel quite.

BALLAD VI.

THE SILENT FAIR.

FROM all her fair loquacious kind,
So different is my Rosalind,
That not one accent can I gain
To crown my hopes, or sooth my pain.

Ye lovers, who can construe sighs,
And are the interpreters of eyes,
To language all her looks translate,
And in her gestures read my fate.

And if in them you chance to find
Aught that is gentle, aught that's kind,
Adieu mean hopes of being great,
And all the littleness of state.

All thoughts of grandeur I despise,
Which from dependence take their rise;
To serve her shall be my employ,
And love-sweet agony my joy.

BALLAD VII.

THE FORCE OF INNOCENCE.

To Miss C *****

THE blooming damsel, whose defence
Is adamantine innocence,
Requires no guardian to attend
Her steps, for modesty's her friend:
Though her fair arms are weak to wield
The glittering spear, and massy shield;

Yet safe from force and fraud combin'd,
She is an Amazon in mind.

With this artillery she goes,
Not only 'mongst the harmless beaux!
But e'en unhurt and undismay'd,
Views the long sword and fierce cockade,
Though all a tyren as she talks,
And all a goddesses as she walks,
Yet decency each action guides,
And wisdom o'er her tongue presides.

Place her in Russia's showery plains,
Where a perpetual winter reigns,
The elements may rave and range,
Yet her fix'd mind will never change.
Place her, ambition, in thy tow'rs,
'Mongst the more dang'rous golden show'rs,
E'en there she'd spurn the venal tribe,
And fold her arms against the bribe.

Leave her, defenceless and alone,
A pris'ner in the torrid zone,
The sunshine there might vainly vie
With the bright lustre of her eye;
But Phœbus' self, with all his fire,
Could ne'er one unchaste thought inspire;
But virtue's path she'd still pursue;
And still, my fair, would copy you.

BALLAD VIII.

THE DISTRESSED DAMSEL.

Of all my experience how vast the amount,
Scarce fifteen long winters I fairly can count!
Was ever a damsel so sadly betray'd,
To live to these years and yet still be a maid?

Ye heroes triumphant by land and by sea,
Sworn vot'ries to love, but unmindful of me;
You can storm a strong fort, or can form a blockade,

Yet ye stand by like dastards, and see me a maid.

Ye lawyers so just, who with slippery tongue,
Can do what you please, or with right, or with wrong,

Can it be or by law or by equity said,
That a buxom young girl ought to die an old maid.

Ye learned physicians, whose excellent skill
Can save or demolish, can cure, or can kill,
To a poor forlorn damsel contribute your aid,
Who is sick—very sick—of remaining a maid.

Ye sops, I invoke, not list to my song,
Who answer no end—and to no sex belong;
Ye echoes of echoes, and shadows of shade—
For if I had you—I might still be a maid.

BALLAD IX.

THE FAIR RECLUSE.

Ye ancient patriarchs of the wood,
That veil around these awful glooms,
Who many a century have stood
In verdant age that ever blooms.

Ye Gothic tow'rs, by vapours dense,
Obscur'd into severer state,

VOL. XI.

In pastoral magnificence
At once so simple and so great.

Why all your jealous shades on me,
Ye hoary elders, do ye spread?
Fair innocence should still be free,
Nought should be chain'd but what we dread.

Say, must these tears for ever flow?
Can I from patience learn content,
While solitude still nurses woe,
And leaves me leisure to lament.

My guardian, see!—who wards off peace,
Whose cruelty is his employ,
Who bids the tongue of transport cease,
And stops each avenue to joy.

Freedom of air alone is giv'n,
To aggravate, not soothe my grief,
To view th' immenly distant heav'n,
My nearest prospect of relief.

BALLAD X.

TO MISS * ONE OF THE CHICHESTER GRACES.

Written in Goodwood Gardens, September 1750.

“ Ye hills that overlook the plains,
“ Where wealth and Gothic greatness reigns;
“ Where nature's hand by art is check'd,
“ And taste herself is architect;
“ Ye fallows gray, ye forests brown,
“ And seas that the vast prospect crown,
“ Ye fright the soul with fancy's store,
“ Nor can she one idea more!”

I said—when dearest of her kind
(Her form the picture of her mind)
Chloris appear'd—The landscape flew!
All nature vanish'd from my view!
She seem'd all nature to comprise,
Her lips! her beauteous breasts! her eyes!
That rous'd, and yet abash'd desire,
With liquid, languid, living fire!

But then—her voice—how fram'd t' endear!
The music of the gods to hear!
Wit that so pierc'd without offence,
So brac'd by the strong nerves of sense!
Pallas with Venus play'd her part,
To rob me of an honest heart;
Prudence and passion jointly strove,
And reason was th' ally of love.

Ah me! thou sweet delicious maid,
From whence shall I solicit aid!
Hope and despair alike destroy,
One kills with grief, and one with joy.
Celestial Chloris! Nymph divine!
To save me the dear talk be thine.
Though conquest be the woman's care,
The angel's glory is to spare.

BALLAD XI.

LOVELY HARRIOT.

A Gramto Ballad.

GREAT Phœbus in his vast career,
Who forms the self-succeeding year,
Thron'd in his amber chariot;

M

Sees not an object half so bright,
Nor gives such joy, such life, such light,
As dear delicious Harriot.

Pedants of dull phlegmatic turns,
Whose pulse not beats, whose blood not burns,
Read Malebranche, Boyle, and Marriot;
I scorn their philosophic strife,
And study nature from the life,
(Where most she shines) in Harriot.

When she admits another wooer,
I rave like Shakspeare's jealous Moor,
And am as raging Barry hot.
True, virtuous, lovely, was his dove,
But virtue, beauty, truth, and love,
Are other names for Harriot.

Ye factious members who oppose,
And tire both houses with your profane,
Though never can ye carry ought;
You might command the nation's sense,
And without bribery convince,
Had ye the voice of Harriot.

You of the music commonweal,
Who borrow, beg, compose, or steal,
Cantata, air, or ariet;
You'd burn your cumb'rous works in score,
And sing, compose, and play no more,
If once you heard my Harriot.

Were there a wretch who dar'd essay,
Such wond'rous sweetness to betray,
I'd call him an Harriot;
But here e'en satire can't annoy,
So strictly chaste, but kindly coy,
Is fair angelic Harriot.

While sultans, emperors, and kings,
(Mean appetite of earthly things)
In all the waste of war riot:
Love's softer duel be my aim,
Praise, honour, glory, conquest, fame,
Are center'd all in Harriot.

I swear by Hymen and the pow'rs
That haunt love's ever blushing bow'rs,
So sweet a nymph to marry ought;
Then may I hug her silken yoke,
And give the last, the final stroke,
T' accomplish lovely Harriot.

BALLAD XII.

TO JENNY GRAY.

BRING, Phoebus, from Parnassian bow'rs,
A chaplet of poetic flow'rs,
That far outbloom the May;
Bring verse so smooth, and thoughts so free,
And all the muses heraldry,
To blazon Jenny Gray.

Observe you almond's rich perfume,
Presenting spring with early bloom,
In ruddy tints how gay!
Thus, foremost of the blushing fair,
With such a blithefome buxom air,
Blooms lovely Jenny Gray.

The merry, chirping, plumy throng,
The buffies and the twigs among,
That pipe the sylvan lay,

All hush'd at her delightful voice
In silent ecstasy rejoice,
And study Jenny Gray.

Ye balmy odour-breathing gales,
That lightly sweep the green rob'd vales,
And in each rose-bush play;
I know you all, you're arrant cheats,
And steal your more than natural sweets,
From lovely Jenny Gray.

Pomona and that goddess bright,
The florist's and the maids' delight,
In vain their charms display;
The luscious nectarine, juicy peach,
In richness, nor in sweetness reach
The lips of Jenny Gray.

To the sweet knot of graces three,
Th' immortal band of bards agree,
A tuneful tax to pay;
There yet remains a matchless worth,
There yet remains a lovely fourth,
And she is Jenny Gray.

BALLAD XIII.

TO MISS KITTY BENNET AND HER CAT CROP.

FULL many a heart that now is free,
May shortly, fair one, beat for thee,
And court thy pleasing chain;
Then prudent hear a friend's advice,
And learn to guard, by conduct nice,
The conquests you shall gain.

When Tabby Tom your Crop pursues,
How many a bite and many a bruise
The amorous swain endures?
E'er yet one favourite glance he catch,
What frequent squalls, how many a scratch
His tenderness procures?

Though this, 'tis own'd, be somewhat rude,
And pufs by nature be a prude,
Yet hence you may improve;
By decent pride, and diut of scoff,
Keep caterwauling coxcombs off,
And ward th' attacks of love.

Your Crop a mousin when you see,
She teaches you economy,
Which makes the pot to boil:
And when she plays with what she gains,
She shows you pleasure springs from pains,
And mirth's the fruit of toil.

BALLAD XIV.

THE PRETTY BAR-KEEPER OF THE NITRE.

Written at College, 1741.

"RELAX, sweet girl, your wearied mind,
"And to hear the poet talk,
"Gentlest creature of your kind,
"Lay aside your sponge and chalk;
"Cease, cease the bar-bell, nor refuse
"To hear the jingle of the musc.
"Hear your numerous vot'ries prayers,
"Come, O come, and bring with thee

"Giddy whimsies, wanton airs,
 "And all love's soft artillery;
 "Smiles and throbs, and frowns, and tears,
 "With all the little hopes and fears."

She heard—she came—and, e'er she spoke,
 Not unravish'd you might see
 Her wanton eyes that wink'd the joke,
 Ere her tongue could set it free.
 While a forc'd blush her cheeks inflam'd,
 And sect'n'd to say she was sham'd.

No handkerchief her bosom hid,
 No tippet from our sight debars
 Her heaving breasts, with moles o'erspread,
 Mark'd, little hemispheres, with stars;
 While on them all our eyes we move,
 Our eyes that meant immoderate love.

In every gesture, every air,
 Th' imperfect lip, the languid eye,
 In every motion of the fair,
 We awkward imitators vie,
 And, forming our own from her face,
 Strive to look pretty as we gaze.

If e'er she sneer'd, the mimic crowd
 Sneer'd too, and all their pipes laid down;
 If she but stoop'd, we lowly bow'd,
 And sullen, if she 'gan to frown,
 In solemn silence sat profound—
 But did she laugh!—the laugh went round.

Her snuff-box if the nymph pull'd out,
 Each Johnian in responsive airs
 Fed with the tickling dust his snout,
 With all the politesse of bears.
 Dropt she her fan beneath her hoop;
 Ev'n stake-stuck Clarians strove to stoop.

The sons of culinary Kays
 Smoking from the eternal treat,
 Lost in ecstasie transport gaze,
 As though the fair was good to eat;
 Ev'n gloomiest kings-men, pleas'd a while,
 "Grin horribly a ghastly smile."

But hark, she cries, "my mamma calls,"
 And straight she's vanish'd from our sight;
 'Twas then we saw the empty bowls,
 'Twas then we first perceiv'd it night;
 While all, sad synod, silent moan,
 Both that she went—and went alone.

BALLAD XV.

THE WIDOW'S RESOLUTION.

A Cantata.

RECITATIVE.

SYLVIA, the most contented of her kind,
 Remain'd in joyless widowhood resign'd:
 In vain to gain her every shepherd strove,
 Each passion ebb'd, but grief, which drowned love.

AIR.

Away, she cry'd, ye swains, be mute,
 Nor with your odious fruitless suit
 My loyal thoughts controul;
 My grief on resolution's rock
 Is built, nor can temptation shock
 The purpose of my soul.

Though blithe content, with jocund air,
 May balance comfort against care,
 And make me life sustain;
 Yet ev'ry joy has wing'd its flight,
 Except that pensive rear delight
 That takes its rise from pain.

RECITATIVE.

She said:—A youth approach'd, of manly grace,
 A son of Mars, and of th' Hibernian race:—
 In flow'ry rhetoric he no time employ'd,
 He came—he woo'd—he wedded, and enjoy'd.

AIR.

Dido thus of old protest'd
 Ne'er to know a second flame;
 But, alas! she found the jested,
 When the stately Trojan came.

Nature a disguise may borrow,
 Yet this maxim true will prove,
 Spite of pride, and spite of sorrow,
 She that has a heart must love.

What on earth is so enchanting
 As beauty weeping on her weeds!
 Through flowing eyes, on bosom panting,
 What a rapturous ray proceeds?

Since from death there's no returning,
 When th' old lover bids adieu,
 All the pomp and farce of mourning
 Are but signals for a new.

EPISTLE TO MRS. TYLER.

It ever was allow'd, dear madam,
 Ev'n from the days of father Adam,
 Of all perfection flesh is heir to,
 Fair patience is the gentlest virtue:
 This is a truth our grandames teach,
 Our poets sing, and parsons preach;
 Yet after all, dear Moll, the fact is
 We seldom put it into practice;
 I'll warrant (if one knew the truth)
 You've call'd me many an idle youth,
 And styl'd me rude ungrateful bear,
 Enough to make a parson swear.

I shall not make a long oration
 In order for my vindication,
 For what the plague can I say more
 Than lazy dogs have done before;
 Such stuff is haught but mere tautology;
 And so take that for my apology.
 First then for custards, my dear Mary,
 The produce of your dainty dairy,
 For stew'd, for bak'd, for boil'd, for roast,
 And all the téas, and all the toast;
 With thankful tongue; and bowing attitude;
 I here present you with my gratitude:
 Next for your apples, pears, and plumbs,
 Acknowledgment in order comes;
 For wine, for ale, for fowl, for fish—for Ev'n all one's appetite can wish for:
 But O ye pens, and O ye pencils,
 And all ye scribbling utensils,
 Say in what words, and in what metre,
 Shall unfeign'd admiration greet her,
 For that rich banquet so refin'd,
 Her conversation gave the mind;

The solid meal of sense and worth,
Set off by the desert of mirth;
Wit's fruit and pleasure's genial bowl,
And all the joyous flow of soul;
For these, and every kind ingredient,
That form'd your love—your most obedient.

TO THE REV. MR. POWELL.

ON THE NON-PERFORMANCE OF A PROMISE HE MADE THE AUTHOR OF A HARE.

FRIEND, with regard to this fame hare,
Am I to hope, or to despair?
By punctual post the letter came,
With Pll's hand, and Pll's name:
Yet there appear'd, for love or money,
Nor hare, nor leveret, nor coney.
Say, my dear Morgan, has my lord,
Like other great ones, kept his word?
Or have you been deceiv'd by 'quire?
Or has your poacher lost his wire?
Or in some unpropitious hole,
Instead of pufs, trepann'd a mole?
Thou valiant son of great Cadwallader,
Hast thou a hare, or hast thou swallow'd her?
But now, methinks, I hear you say
(And shake your head) "Ah, well-a-day!
" Painful pre-emption to be wifc,
" We wits have such short memories.
" Oh, that the act was not in force!
" A horse!—my kingdom for a horse!
" To love—yet be deny'd the sport!
" Oh! for a friend or two at court!
" God knows, there's scarce a man of quality
" In all our peerless principality—"

But hold—-for on his country joking,
To a warm Welchman's most provoking.
As for poor pufs, upon my honour,
I never set my heart upon her.
But any gift from friend to friend
Is pleasing in its aim and end.
I, like the cock, would spurn a jewel,
Sent by th' unkind, th' unjust, and cruel.
But honest Pll!—Sure from him
A barley-corn would be a gem.
Pleas'd therefore had I been, and proud,
And prais'd thy generous heart aloud,
If, 'stead of hare (but do not blab it)
You'd sent me only a Welch rabbit.

EPIGRAMS.

EPIGRAM I.

THE SICK MONKEY.

A LADY sent lately for one Doctor Drug,
To come in an instant, and clyster poor Pug—
As the fair one commanded, he came at the word,
And did the grand office in tye-wig and sword.

The affair being ended, so sweet and so nice!
He held out his hand with "you know, ma'am,
" my price."

"Your price," says the lady— "Why, Sir, he's
" your brother,
" And doctors must never take fees of each other."

EPIGRAM II.

APOLLO AND DAPHNE.

WHEN Phœbus was am'rous, and long'd to be rude,
Miss Daphne cry'd pish! and ran swift to the wood,
And rather than do such a naughty affair,
She became a fine laurel to deck the god's hair.

The nymph was be sure of a cold constitution,
To be turn'd to a tree was a strange resolution;
For in this she resembled a true modern spouse;
For she fled from his arms to distinguish his brows.

EPIGRAM III. (From the Greek).

THE MISER AND THE MOUSE.

To a Mouse says a Miser, "my dear Mr. Mouse,
" Pray what may you please for to want in my " house?"
Says the Mouse, "Mr. Miser, pray keep yourself
" quiet,
" You are safe in your person, your purse, and
" your diet:
" A lodging I want, which ev'n you may afford,
" But none would come here to beg, borrow, or " board."

EPIGRAM IV.

On a Woman who was Singing Ballads for Money to Bury her Husband.

FOR her husband deceas'd, Sally chants the sweet lay,
Why, faith, this is singular sorrow;
But (I doubt) since she sings for a dead man today,
She'll cry for a live one to-morrow.

To the Right Honourable
EARL OF DARLINGTON,

ON HIS BEING APPOINTED PAYMASTER OF HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES.

"The royal hand, my lord, shall raise
" To nobler heights thy name;
" Who praises thee shall meet with praise
" Ennobled in thy fame.

Smart's Ode.

WHAT the prophetic muse foretold is true,
And royal justice gives to worth its due;
The Roman spirit now breathes forth again,
And virtue's temple leads to honour's fane;
But not alone to thee this grant extends,
Nor in thy rise great Brunswick's goodness ends:
Whoe'er has known thy hospitable dome,
Where each glad guest still finds himself at home:
Whoe'er has seen the numerous poor that wait
To bless thy bounty at th' expanded gate;
Whoe'er has seen thee general joy impart,
And smile away chagrin from every heart,

All these are happy—pleasure reigns content,
And thy prosperity makes thousands blest.

On the Death of Master Newbery, after a lingering Illness.

HENCEFORTH be every tender tear suppress'd,
Or let us weep for joy, that he is blest;
From grief to blest, from earth to heav'n remov'd,
His mem'ry honour'd, as his life belov'd;
That heart o'er which no evil e'er had pow'r;
That disposition sickness could not sour;
That sense so oft to riper years denied,
That patience heroes might have own'd with pride.

His painful race undauntedly he ran,
And in the eleventh winter did a man.

Epitaph on the Rev. Mr. Reynolds, at St. Peter's in the Isle of Thanet.

Was rhetoric on the lips of sorrow hung,
Or could affliction lend the heart a tongue,
Then should my soul, in noble anguish free,
Do glorious justice to herself and thee.
But ah! when loaded with a weight of woe,
E'en nature, blessed nature is our foe.
When we should praise, we sympathetic groan,
For sad mortality is all our own.
Yet but a word: as lowly as he lies,
He spurns all empires and asserts the skies.
Blush, power! he had no interest here below;
Blush, malice! that he died without a foe;
'The universal friend, to form'd to engage,
Was far too precious for this world and age.
Years were denied, for (such his worth and truth),
Kind heaven has call'd him to eternal youth.

To my Worthy Friend Mr. T. B. one of the People called Quakers. Written in his Garden, July 1752.

FREE from the proud, the pompous, and the vain,
How simply neat and elegantly plain.
Thy rural villa lifts its modest head,
Where fair convenience reigns in fashion'd stead;
Where sober plenty does its bliss impart,
And glads thine hospitable, honest heart.
Mirth without vice, and rapture without noise,
And all the decent, all the manly joys!
Beneath a shadowy bow'r, the summer's pride,
Thy darling * Tullia sitting by thy side;
Where light and shade in varied scenes display
A contrast sweet, like friendly Yea and Nay.
My hand the secretary of my mind,
Leaves thee these lines upon the poplar's rind.

On Seeing the Picture of Miss R—G—n. Drawn by Mr. Varesse, of Threadneedle-street.

SHALL candid † Prior, in immortal lays,
Thy ancestor with generous ardour praise;
Who, with his pencil's animating pow'r,
In liveliest dyes immortaliz'd a flow'r,
And shall no just, impartial bard be found,
Thy more exalted merits to rebound?

* His Daughter.

† See verses on a flower painted by Varesse.

Who giv'st to beauty a perpetual bloom,
And lively grace, which age shall not consume;
Who mak'st the speaking eyes with meaning roll,
And paint'st at once the body and the soul.

An Invitation to Mrs. Tyler, a Clergyman's Lady, to Dine upon a Couple of Ducks on the Anniversary of the Author's Wedding-Day.

HAD I the pen of Sir John Suckling,
And could find out a rhyme for duckling,
Why dearest madam, in that case,
I would invite you to a brace.
Haste, gentle shepherdes, away,
To-morrow is the gaudy day,
That day, when to my longing arms,
Nancy resign'd her golden charms,
And set my am'rous inclination
Upon the bus'ness of the nation.
Industrious Moll, || with many a pluck,
Unwings the plumage of each duck;
And as she sits a-brooding o'er,
You'd think she'd hatch a couple more.
Come, all ye muses, come and sing—
Shall we then roast them on a string?
Or shall we make our dirty silt run,
To beg a roast of Mrs. § Bilton?
But to delight you more with these,
We shall provide a dish of pease:
On ducks alone we'll not regale you,
We'll wine, we'll punch you, and we'll ale you,
To-morrow is the gaudy day,
Haste, gentle shepherdes, away.

TO MISS S—P—E.

FAIR partner of my Nancy's heart,
Who feel'st, like me, love's poignant dart;
Who at a frown canst pant for pain,
And at a smile revive again;
Who dost't to that severe degree,
You're jealous, e'en of constancy;
Born hopes and fears and doubts to prove,
And each vicissitude of love!
To this my humble suit attend,
And be my advocate and friend.
So may just Heav'n in your goodness blest,
Successful ev'n in my success!
Oft at the silent hour of night,
When bold intrusion wings her flight,
My fair, from care and bus'ness free,
Unbosoms all her soul to thee,
Each hope with which her bosom heaves,
Each tender wish her heart receives
To thee are intimately known,
And all her thoughts become thy own:
Then take the blessed blissful hour,
To try love's sweet infectious pow'r;
And let your sister souls conspire
In love's, as friendship's calmer fire.
So may thy transport equal mine,
Nay—every joy be doubly thine!

† As every good parson is the shepherd of his flock, his wife is a shepherdes of course.

|| The maid.

§ The landlady of the public-house.

So may the youth, whom you prefer,
Be still I wish to be to her.

EXTEMPORE,

In the King's Bench, on hearing a Raven Croak.

YON raven once an acorn took
From Romney's stoutest tallest tree,
He hid it by a limpid brook,
And liv'd another oak to see.

Thus melancholy buries hope,
Which Providence keeps still alive,
Bids us with afflictions cope,
And all anxiety surive,

DISSERTISSIME Romuli Nepotum,
Quot sunt, quotque fuerit, Marce Tulli,
Et quot post aliis erunt in annis,
Gratias tibi maximas Catullus,
Agit pessimus omnium Poeta;—
Tanto pessimus omnium Poeta,
Quanto tu optimus omnium patronus.

Imitated after Dining with Mr. Murray.

O THOU, of British orators the chief
That were, or are in being, or belief;
All eminence and goodness as thou art,
Accept the gratitude of Poet Smart,—
The meanest of the tuneful train as far,
As thou transcend'st the brightest at the bar.

INSCRIPTIONS ON AN ÆOLIAN HARP.

On one End.

PARTEM aliquam, O venti, divum referatis ad aures.

On one Side.

Salve, quæ fingis proprio modulamine carmen,
Salve Memnoniam vox imitata lyram!
Dulce O di divinumque sonas sine pollicis ictu,
Dives naturæ simplicis, artis inops!
Talia, qua incultæ dant mellea labra puellæ,
Talia sunt faciles quæ modulantur aves.

On the other Side.

Hail heav'nly harp, where Memnon's skill is shown,
That charm'd the ear with music all thine own!
Which though untouch'd, can't rapturous strains
impart,
O rich of genuine nature, free from art!
Such the wild warblings of the sylvan throng,
So simply sweet the untaught virgins song.

On the other End.

Christophorus Sniart Henrico Bell, Armigero.

AN EPIGRAM BY SIR THOMAS MORE.

DE TYNDARO.

NON minimo insignem naso dum forte puellum
Bafiat, en! voluit Tyndarus esse dicax.
Frustra ait, ergo tuis mea profero labra labellis,
Nestra procul nasus desinet ora tuus.
Protinus crubuit, tacitæque exanduit irâ,
Neurpe parum falso tacta puella fale.

Nasus ab ore meus tua si tenet oscula, dixit,
Quâ nasus non est, hæc dare parte potes.

THE LONG-NOSED FAIR.

ONCE on a time I fair Dorinda kiss'd,
Whose nose was too distinguishing'd to be miss'd;
My dear, says I, I fain would kiss you closer,
But though your lips say aye—your nose says, no,
Sir.—

The maid was equally to fun inclin'd,
And plac'd her lovely lily-hand behind;
Here, swain, she cry'd, may'st thou securely kiss,
Where there's no nose to interrupt thy bliss.

FANNY, BLOOMING FAIR.

Translated into Latin, in the manner of Mr. Bourne.

CUM primùm ante oculos, viridi lasciva juvena,
Non tenere antonitos Fannia pulchra stetit,
Ut mihi se gratus calor insinuavit in ossa
Miranti speciem, virginumque decus!
Dum partes meditator varias, et amabile—quid non?
Lustrandique acies magna libido capit;
Prodigus et laudum dum formam ad sidera tollo,
Subdolos en! furtim labitur intus omor.

Idalii pueri, Venerisque exercitus omnis
Exornat multo lumina facta dolo;
Hic currus, hic tela jacent, hic arcus Amoris.
Cypri posthabitis hic manet ipse jugis.
Nativis genæ pulchra rosis vestita superbit,
Invalidam artificis spernere nata manum;
Non tantas jactat veneres suavissimis horti
Incola, quando novis spirat amoma comis.

Concinnis membris patet immortalis origo,
Illa Jovis monstrat quid potuere manus;
Reginamque Cnidii, formosam Cypridâ, reddidit,
Quicumque egregio ludit in ore cestus!
Quanta mihi nervos, heu, quanta est flamma medullas,
Pectoris ut video luxuriantis ebur—
Pectoris eximie nymphæ—jam dulce tumens
Jam subsidentis—sed cupit ante premi.

Circumdat mediam cestus (mihi credite) nympham
Insignis cestus, quem dedit ipsa Venus:
Dulce satellitium circa illum ludit amorum,
Atque hilares ducit turba jocosa choros.
Felix ante homines istius cingula zonæ
Qui solvas, felix, quisquis es, ante Deos!
Omnes, tanta omnes, nisi me, contingere posse
Guadia, vosque Dii, tuque puella neges.

FANNY, BLOOMING FAIR.

WHEN Fanny-blooming fair,
First caught my ravish'd sight,
Pleas'd with her shape and air,
I felt a strange delight:
Whilst eagerly I gaz'd,
Admiring ev'ry part,
And ev'ry feature prais'd,
She stole into my heart.

In her bewitching eyes
Ten thousand loves appear.

There Cupid basking lies,
His shafts are hoarded there.
Her blooming cheeks are dy'd
With colours all her own,
Excelling far the pride
Of roses newly blown.

Her well-turn'd limbs confess
The lucky hand of Jove;
Her features all-express
The beauteous Queen of Love.

What flames my nerves invade,
When I behold the breast
Of that too charming maid
Rife suing to be prest!

Venus round Fanny's waist
Has her own cestus bound,
There guardian Cupids grace,
And dance the circle round.
How happy must he be,
Who shall her zone unloose!
That bliss to all but me,
May Heav'n and she refuse.

THE PRETTY CHAMBERMAID.

*In Imitation of Horace, Ode IV.—Ne sit Ancil-
-le tibi amor pudori, &c.*

COLLIN, oh! cease thy friend to blame,
Who entertains a servile flame.
Chide not—believe me, 'tis no more
Than great Achilles did before,
Who nobler, prouder far than he is,
Ador'd his chambermaid Briseis.

The thund'ring Ajax Venus lays
In love's inextricable maze.
His slave Tecmessa makes him yield,
Now mistress of the sevenfold shield.
Atides with his captive play'd,
Who always flur'd the bed she made.

'Twas at the ten years siege, when all
The Trojans fell in Hector's fall,
When Helen rul'd the day and night,
And made them love and made them fight;
Each hero kiss'd his maid, and why,
Though I'm no hero, may not I?

Who knows? Polly perhaps may be
A piece of ruin'd royalty.
She has (I cannot doubt it) been
The daughter of some mighty queen;
But fate's irrem'able doom
Has chang'd her sceptre for a broom.

Ah! cease to think it—how can she,
So gen'rous, charming, fond, and free,
So lib'ral of her little store,
So heedless of amassing more,
Have one drop of plebeian blood
In all the circulating flood!

But you, by carping at my fire,
Do but betray your own desire—
Howe'er proceed—made tame by years,
You'll raise in me no jealous fears.
You've not one spark of love alive,
For, thanks to Heav'n, you're forty-five.

CHRISTOPHORUS SMART

SAMUELI SAUNDERS, COL. REGAL, S. P. D.

PHOEBUS et Liber, charitesque mecum
Nocte cœnabunt (ita spondet Hermes)
Nostra fed profusus, nisi te magistro,
Poc'la recusant.

Attici dives venias leporis,
Non sine affueto venias cacinno, et Blanda pinguedo explicitâ renidens
Fronte jocetur.

Georgium expecto, Salis architectum
Duplicis vastrum satis, æmuloſque
Spero vos inter fore nunc, ut olim,
Nobile bellum.

Dumque lucubrata per omne longi
Frigoris sæclum pueros tenellos
Alma nox pictas videt otiosos
Velvere chartas.

Proh pudor! devota lucro juventus
(Ut puellarum numerus senumque)
Pallet insomnis repetita duri
Jurgia ludi.

Sperne (nam multæ cerebrum Mineryæ
Est tibi) nugas age quæstuosas,
Arduas, vanas, et amara curæ
Eluc mecum.

Jam rigit tellus, hyemantque menses,
Vestra sed laurus vireat, tuisque
In genis dulcis rosa fanitatis
Sera moretur.

Aul. Pemb. Cantab. Cal. Jan.

THE FAMOUS GENERAL EPITAPH FROM DEMOSTHENES.

THESE for their country's cause were sheath'd in arms,
And all base imputations dare despise;
And nobly struck with glory's dreadful charms,
Made death their aim, eternity their prize.
For never could their mighty spirits yield,
To see themselves and countrymen in chains;
And earth's kind bosom hides them in the field
Of battle, so the Will Supreme ordains:
To conquer chance and error's not reveal'd,
For mortals sure mortality remains.

Οἶδε πατὴρας ἕνεκα σφετέρως εἰς θῆριν ἔθεντο
Οπλα, καὶ ἀντιπάλων ὕβριν ἀπισκιδάσαν;
Μαργάμενος δ' ἀρετῆς καὶ δειματός, οὐκ ἐσάσασα
Ψυκᾶς, ἀλλ' αἰδῶν κλονεῖτο βράδον,
Δουλοσύνης στυγερᾶν ἀμφὶς ἔχων ὕβριν.
Οὐκὲν Ἑλλήνων, ὡς μὴ ζυλὸν αὐχίνι θιντες,
Γαῖα δὲ πατρὶς ἔχει κάλποισι τῶν πληῖστοι καμονταν

Σάματ' ἐπὶ Θητοῖς ἐκ Διδος ἔδει κρείσας
Μηδῶν ἀραερτινῶν ἔστι Θεων καὶ πάντα κατορθοῦν,
Ἐν αἰσθηταῖς μαιραν δ' ὄντι φυγῶν ἴπποισι.

M IIIJ

CARMEN IN CÆCILIAM.

A Latin Version of Pope's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day.

DESCENDE cœlo, spiritu quæ melleo
 Imples, Camœna, tibias;
 Descende pulsas quæ lyram volucri manu,
 Nervumque sopitum excita:
 Discat funderè suaviter severas
 Testudo numerosa cantilenas:
 Cava classica clangoribus auras
 Repleant, resonent trémebundarum
 Laquaria convulsa demorum:
 Inque vicem lentâ gravia organa tumefate
 Spirent, augustoque sonore inflata tumescant.
 Ut clarè, ut placidè molliter auribus
 Se fartim bibulis insinuant modi!
 Mox tollunt violentum altiùs altiùs
 Auditum Superis sonum!
 Jamque exultantes numeri atque aulaciâ turgent
 Carmina, jam trémulus fractis fluitat furor auris;
 Donec minutatim remota,
 Jam liquefacta,
 Jam moritura,
 Murmura languent,
 Murmura dulci
 Leniter attenuata casu.
 Æquas ut servat moderatrix Musica mentes!
 / Ut premit, aut laxat mollibus imperiis;
 Seu gaudiorum turbida pectora
 Tumultuosos fluctibus æstuant,
 Tranquillat; urget seu malorum
 Pondus, humo levat Illa voce.
 Gestit bellantes animos accendere cantu;
 Blandaque amatori medicamina sufficit ægro:
 Linguens ecce! caput Mœstitia erigit,
 Morpheus molliculis proflit et toris,
 Ulnas implicatas pandit inertia,
 Audit didicidus Invidia anguibus:
 Intestina animi cessant bella; applicat aures
 Seditio, nec præcipites remisinitur iras.
 Ast ubi dulcis amor patriæ pia mittit in arma,
 O! quanto accendunt mavortia tympana pulsus!
 Sic, cum prima viam navis tentaret inausam,
 Thrax cecinit, puppique lyram tractavit in altâ,
 Dum vidit Argo Pelion arduum
 Pinus foretes descere impigras,
 Et turba circumfusa muto
 Semideum stupere plausu:
 Incedit heros, quisquis audit sonum,
 Amore flagrans gloriæ;
 Dum seminudum quisque rapit manu
 Ensem, et coruscet multiplicem ægida:
 Ad arma sylvæ, ad arina montes,
 Terra, mare, astra sonant ad arina!
 Sed, cum per orci limites cavernosi,
 Amplexibus quos igneis obit fumans,
 Phlegethon, Poetam, Morte non minus pollens,
 Adire jussit pallidos Amor manes,
 Quæ mirac'la sonorum!
 Quæ seralia monstra videri,
 Diras per oras distita!
 Horrida fulgura,
 Vox penetrabilis
 Sæva querentium,

Et picei ignis
 Triste crepusculum,
 Diri ululatus,
 Et gemitus gravis
 Mœsta profunditas.
 Dumque luunt penas animæ, tremuli singultus.
 Sed audin! audin! auream ferit chelyn,
 Miserisque fecit otium:
 En! tenue ut patulis auribus agmen adest!
 Quiescit ingens Sisyphi saxum, et fura
 Acclinis Ixion rotæ,
 Atque leves ineunt pallida spectra choros
 Ferratis sua membra toris collapsa reclinant
 Oblitæ irarum Eumenides, et lurica circum
 Colla aufuscitantes sese explicuere colubri!
 Per fluentorum vada, quæ perenni
 Rore delibant sinuoso ripas;
 Per levein, siqua Elysi vireta
 Ventilat aurâ;
 Per beatorum Genios colentes
 Arva quæ passim asphodelis renidet
 Gramen auratis, amaranthinæve um-bracula frondis;
 Per duces, si quis dubiam per umbram
 Splendidis late loca lustrat arnis;
 Myrtæ et quiquis querulus vagatur
 Incola sylvæ;
 Reddite (vos rapuistis enim) mibi reddite sponfam,
 Obtestor, parilive adjungite me quoque fato!
 Canit, canenti Dis serus annuit,
 Ceditque blandarum harmoniæ precum,
 Et victa mansuescunt severæ
 Persephones sine more corda.
 Io Triumphæ! Mors et Orcus Orpheo
 Lætantur domitore domari,
 Vatemque mirâ insignunt victoriâ!
 Fata obstant—novies Styx circumfusa coercet—
 Nequiquam—vincit musica, vincit amor.
 Sed niniùm, heu! niniùm impatiens respexit a-mator:
 Ah! cecidit, cecidit, subitoque elapsa refugit!
 Quâ prece jam surdas flectes, temerarie, Parcas?
 At tu, si crimen, crimen amantes habes,
 Nunc pendulis sub antris,
 Jugesve propter undas,
 Ubi callibus reductis
 Temerè vagatur Hebrus
 Heu! solus, neque
 Auditus, neque
 Cognitus ulli,
 Fletus integrat,
 Teque gemens vocat, Eurydice,
 Perdita, perdita,
 Heu! omne in ævum perdita!
 Nunc totum Eumenides exagitant, jugis
 En! canæ Rhodopes in gelidis tremunt,
 Ardescens trémunt, insanit, spemque abjicit omnem.
 Ecce! per avia lustra furens fugit ocyoi Euro;
 Evœ! persreptit, audin! ut Hæmus, et ingemit evœ! ---
 Ah! perit! ---
 Eurydicen tamen extremâ cum voce profundit,
 Eurydicen tremulo murmurè lingua canit,
 Eurydicen nemus,
 Eurydicen aquæ,
 Eurydicen montes, gemebundaque saxa retorquent.

Luctus musica temperat feroces,
 Et facti levat ingruentis ictus :
 Dulcis musica moliter dolorem
 Mutat lætitia ; sonante plectro
 Spes averſa redit, Furor recumbit :
 Nobis illa eadẽm breves adauget
 Terræ delicias, opesque cœli
 Præſentire docet remotiores .
 Hinc ſolum cecinit Numen, memor, unde beatam
 Cęperat harmoniam et modulamina non ſua, Virgo.

Organa plena choris ubi magnifico conſentũ
 Miſcentur, æurem æthyrei inclinant incolæ ;
 Terreſtres animæ tolluntur in aſtra tumentũ
 Carmine, divinoque alitur ſacra flamma furorẽ :
 Dum prona cœlo pendet angelũ cohortũ
 Orphẽũ jam taceant Plerides ſuum,
 Major Cęciliæ vis datur inclytæ .
 Ille vix umbram revocavit orco ;
 Illa ſublata ſuper aſtra mentes
 Inferit cœlo, ſuperiſque miſcet
 Carmine Divis .

O ΠΙΑΤΙΩΔΗΣ.

A Latin Verſion of Milton's L' Allegro.

Κωσμία χαλκείων, ἱκατομβοὶ ἰνῶσιων. Hom.

PROCU, hinc, O procul eſto informis Ægrimonia,
 Quam janitori Obſcuritas nigerrima
 Suſcepit olim Cerbero,
 Deſertem in caveâ Stygis profundâ,
 Horribilis inter formas, viſuſque profanos,
 Obſcœnoſque ululatus,
 Incultam licet invenire ſedem,
 Nox ubi parturiens
 Zelotypis furtim nido ſuperincubat aliis
 Queriturque triſtis noſtua,
 Sub denſis illic ebenis ſcopulis cavatis,
 Veſtri rugoſis more ſupercilii,
 Æternũ maneat Cimmeriã in domo.

Sed huc propinquet comis et pulcherrima,
 Quæ nympha diviſ audit Euphroſyne choris,
 Patiens ramen vocatur a mortalibus
 Medicina cordis hilaritas, quam candida
 Venuſ duabus inſuper cum Gratiis
 Dias Lyæo patri in auras edidit :
 Sive ille ventus (cæteri ut Myæ canunt)
 Jocundus aurã qui ver implet melleã,
 Zephyrus puellam amplexus eſt Tithoniam
 Quondam calendis, feriatam Maiis,
 Tunc pallidis, genuit ſuper violariis,
 Super et roſarum roſcidã lanugine,
 Alacrem, beatam, vividamque filiam.
 Agendum puella, quin pari vadant gradu
 Jocus et Juventas, Scœmmata et Protrevitas,
 Doſuſque duplex, nutus et niſtatio,
 Tenuiſque riſus huc et huc contortillis ;
 Qualis veniſt pendet Hebes in genã,
 Amatque jungi lævibus gelatiſis ;
 Curæ ſequatur Ludus infeſtus nigræ, et
 Laterum Cachinnus pinguium fruſtra tenax.
 Agite caterva ludat exultim levis,
 Pediſque dulcis ſublevet laſcivia ;
 Dextrumque claudat alma Libertas latus ;
 Oreadum palantium ſuaviſſima ;
 Et ſi tuis honoribus non deſui,

Me ſcribe veſtræ, læta Virgo, familiæ,
 Ut illius ſimul et tui conſortio
 Liberrimã juvenemur innocentia ;
 Ut cum volatus auſpicatur concitos ;
 Stupidamque alauda voce noctem territat ;
 Levata cœleſtem in pharon diluculo,
 Priuſque gilyum quam tubet crepuſculum .
 Tunc ad ſeneſtras (anxi nolint, velint)
 Diem precemur proſperam viciniæ,
 Caput exerentes e roſis ſylveſtribus,
 Seu vite, ſive flexili cynoſſato .
 Dum Martius, clainore Gallus vivido
 Tenuem laceſſit iu fugã caliginem,
 Graditurve faris ad ſtruem, vel horreum,
 Domine præcũs, graduque grandi glorians .
 Sæpe audiamus ut canes et cornua
 Sonore læto manẽ ſopitum cient,
 Dum quã præalti clivus albeſcit jugi,
 Docilis conora reddit Echo murinura .
 Mox, teſte multo, quã virent colles, vager,
 Ulmoſque ſepes ordiatas implicat,
 Eoa ſtans apricus ante limina,
 Ubi ſol coricum magnus inſtaurat diem
 Veſtitus igni, lucidoque ſuccino,
 Inter micantũ mille formas rubinum,
 Vicinus agrum dum colonus tranſitæat,
 Atque æmulatur ore ſitulam rudi,
 Mulctramque portat cantians pucllula,
 Falciqui cotem meſſor uprat fridulæ,
 Snamque paſtor quiſque garrat fabulam,
 Reclinis in convalle, ſubter arbuto,
 Mox illecebras oculus arripuit novas,
 Dum longus undiquaque proſpectus patet,
 Canum novale, et fuſca falus æquora,
 Quã peccora gramen demetunt vagantia ;
 Sublimium ſterilia terga montium,
 Qui ponderoſa ſæpe turquent nubila,
 Maculoſa vernis prata paſſim bellibus,
 Amnes vaduoſi, et latiora flumina,
 Pinnaſque murorum, atque turres cernere eſt
 Criſtata circum quas coronant robora,
 Ubi forte quadam nympha fallit, cui decor
 Viciniam (cynoſura tanquam) illuminat .
 Juxta quarum ſubter umbrã quercuum,
 Culmis opertã ſumus emicat cata,
 Quã jam vocati Thyriſ et Corydon ſedent,
 Famemque odoro compriment convivio,
 Herbis, cibique ruſticis, nitidiſſimã
 Quæ ſufficit ſuccinctã Phillis dexterã :
 Mox Theſtily morem gerens jacentia
 Auris catenis cogit in ſaſces fata :
 Verniſve in horis, ſole toſtum virgines
 Fœnum recenti pellicit fragrantia ;
 Et et ſerenis quando ſœta gaudiis
 Excelliora perplacent magalia ;
 Uteunque juxta flumen in numerum ſonant
 Campanæ, et icta dulce barbitos ſtrepit
 Dum multa nympha, multa pubes duriter
 Pellunt Trementes ad canorem ceſpites
 Dubias per umbras : qua labore liberi
 Juvenſque ludunt, et ſenes promiſcui,
 Melius nitente ſole propter ſerias .
 Jam quando veſperafcit, omnes allicit
 Auro liquenti Bacchus hordiaceus,
 Phylliſque narrat fabuloſa facinora,
 Lamiã ut paratas Mabbã conſumpſit dapes,
 Se vapulaſſe, et eſſe preſſam ab Incubo,

Fatuoque trita ab igne seductam viâ ;
 Ut et laborem subiit Idolom gravem,
 Floremque lacris meritis est stipendium ;
 Unius (inquit) ante noctis exitum
 Tot grana frugis fuisse trivit veneficus,
 Quot expedire rustici nequeunt decem,
 Quo jam peracto plumbeum monstrum cubat,
 Focumque totum laterere longo metiens
 Crinita membra fessus igne recreat ;
 Dein, priusquam gallus evocat diem,
 Tandem satur phantasma sese proripit.
 Sic absolutis fabulis ineunt toros,
 Atque ad furros dormiunt favonii.
 Turrita deinde perplacebunt oppida,
 Et gentis occupatæ mixta murmura,
 Equitumque turba, nobileque spendidi,
 Qui pacis ipsâ vel triumphant in togâ,
 Nurusque, quarum lumen impetus viris
 Jaculatur acres, præmiumque destinat
 Marti aut Minervæ, quorum uterque nititur
 Nymphæ probari, quæ probatur omnibus :
 Hymenæus illic sæpe prætendat facem
 Clarissimam, croceumque velamen trahat,
 Spectac'la, mimi, pompa, commissatio,
 Veterumque ritu nocte sint convivia,
 Taleque visus, quos videt in somnis
 Juvenes poetæ, dum celebris rivuli
 Securi ad oram vespere æstivo jacent.
 Tunc ad theatra demigrem frequentia
 Johnsonæ, si tu, doctæ focum proferas ;
 Sive * Ille musæ filius fundat sonos,
 Quam dulcè, quam feliciter, temerarios !
 Curæque carmen semper antidotos modis
 Mentem relaxet involutam Lydiis ;
 Oh ! sim perenni emancipatus carmini,
 Quod tentet usque ad intimum cor emicans,
 Aurefque gratis detinens ambagibus
 Pedibus legatis suaviter nectar moras,
 Dum liquida vox, labyrinthus ut, desecit
 Dolo perita et negligenti industriâ,
 Variâque cætos arte nodos explicat,
 Animam latentem qui coercent musices ;
 Adeo ut quiete expergefactus auræ
 Toros relinquit ipse Thrax amaranthinos,
 Medioque tales captet Elyfio sonos,
 Quales avaram suadeant Proserpinam
 Nullâ obligatam lege sponfam reddere.
 His si redundes gaudiis, prudentis est,
 Læticia tacum velle vitam degere.

DATUR MUNDORUM PLURALITAS.

UNDE labor novus hic menti? Quæ cura quietam
 Sollicitat, rapiensque extra confinia terræ,
 Cœlestes sine more jubet volitare per ignes?
 Scilicet impatiens angusto hoc orbe teneri,
 Fontinelle, tuos audax imitator ausus
 Gestio est insolitas spirant præcordia flammæ.

Fallor, an ipse venit? Delapsus ab æthere sum-mo

Pegasus urget eques, laterique flagellifer instat:
 Me vocat; et duris desiste laboribus, inquit,
 "Mê doce, carpe viam facilem, tibi singula clarè
 "Expediam, tibi cernere erit, quos fidera nôrunt,
 "Indigenas cultusque virûm, morefque docebo."

* Sbatzpegro.

Nec mora, pennipedem conscendo iussus, ovanfque (Quamquam animus secum volvens exempla prio-
 rum

Bellerophonæ pallet dispendia famæ)
 Post equitem sedeo, liquidumque per aëro labor.
 —Mercurium petimus primum: Dux talibus inquit;
 "Aspicias vanæ malefana negotia gentis,
 "Quam mens destituit Titanæ exult propinquo.
 "Stramineis viden? Hic velatus tempora fertis
 "Emicat, et solos reges crepat atque tetrarchas.
 "Ille suam carbone Chleon depingit amator
 "Infelix, ægram rudia indigestaque mentem
 "Garmina demulcent, inductoque tibia musas.
 "En! sedet incomptus crines barbataque menta
 "Astrologos, nova venatur fidera, solus
 "Semper in obfuro penetrati; multaque muros
 "Linea nigrantes, et multa triangula pingunt.
 "Ecce! sed interea curro flamante propinquat
 "Titan—Clamo, O me! gelidâ sub rupe, sub
 "umbra

"Siste precor: tantos nequeo perferre calores."

Pegasus inde tuo genius felicior astro
 Appulit, alma Venus. Spirant quam molliter auræ:
 Ridet ager, frugum facilis, lascivie florum
 Nutrix; non Euri ruit hic per dulcia Tempe
 Vis fera, non Boreæ; sed blandior aura Favoni,
 Lenis agens tremulo nutantes vertice sylvas,
 Usque fovet teneros, quos usque rescuscitat, ignes,
 Hic lætis animata sonis Saltatio vivit:
 Hic jam voce ciet cantum, jam pectine, dulces
 Musica docta modos: pulchræ longo ordine nymphæ.

Festivas ducunt choreas, dilecta juvenus
 Certatim stipant comites: lætè halat amomo
 Omnè nemus, varioque æterni veris adore:
 Cura procul: circumvolitant risusque jocique:
 Atque amor est, quodcumque vides. Venus ipsa volentes

Imperio regit indigenas, hic innuba Phœbæ,
 Innuba Pallas amet, cupiant fervire Catones,
 Jamque datum molimur iter, sedesque beatas
 Multa gemens linquo; et lugubre rubentia Martis
 Arva, ubi sanguinæ dominantur in omnia rixæ,
 Advehimur, ferro riget horrida turba, geritque
 Spiculaque, gladiofque, ferosque in bella dolones,
 Pro choræâ, et dulci modulamine, Pyrrhicus illis
 Saltus, et horribiles placet ære ciere sonores.

Hic conjux viduata viro longo essera luctu [næos
 Flet noctem, solumque torum sterilefque Hyme-
 Deplorans, lacerat crines, et pectora plangit:
 Nequiquam—sponsus ni fortè appareat, hospes
 Heu! brevis, in somnis, et ludicra fallat imago.
 Immemor ille tori interea ruit acer in hostem:
 Horrendum strepit armorum fragor undique cam-
 pis;

Atque immortales durant in secula pugnæ.
 Hinc Jovis immensum delati accedimus orbem.
 Illic mille locis exercet sæva tyrannus
 Imperia in totidem servus, totidemque rebelles:
 Sed brevis exitus: parat illi fata veneno
 Perjurus, populosofque premit novus ipse tyrannus.
 Hi decies pacem figunt pretio atque resigunt:
 Tum demum arma parant: longe lateque cohortes
 Extenduntur agris; simul æquora tota teguntur
 Classibus, et ficti celebrantur utriusque triumpho.
 Fœdera mox ineunt nunquam violanda; brevique
 Belli iterum simulachra cient: referuntur in altum

Classeſ, pacificeque replentur mille campi.
 Alius hic patri meditatur, ſponſa marito.
 Servus hero inſidias. Haſ leges ſcilicet illis
 Impoſuit natura locis, quo tempore patrem
 Jupiter ipſe ſuum folio detrufit avito.
 Iudæ venena viris, perjuria, munera, fraudes
 Suvadet opum fitis, et regnandi dira cupido.
 Saturni tandum nos illeætabilis ora.

Accipit: ignavum pecus hic per opaca locorum
 Pingueſcunt de more, gravi torpentque vetero.
 Vivitur in ſpecubus: quis enim tam ſedulus, arcus
 Qui ſtruat ingentes, operoſaque mænia condat?
 Idem omnes ſtupor altus habet, ſub pectore fixus.
 Non ſtudio ambitioſa Jovis, varioſque labores
 Mercurii, non Martis opus, non Cypridæ uſunt.
 Poſt obitum, ut perhibent, ſedes glomerantur in iſtas.

Qui longam nullas vitam excoluere per artes;
 Sed Crerere et Baccho pleni, ſomnoque ſepulti
 Cunctarum duxere æterna oblivia rerum.

Non avium auditur cantus, non murmur aquarum,
 Mugituſve boum, aut pecorum balatus in agris:
 Nudos non decorant fegetes, non gramina compos,
 Sylva, uſquam ſi ſylva, latet ſub monte nivali,
 Et cænet viduata comis: hic nectua tantum
 Gliſque habitat, buſoque et cum teſtudine, talpa.
 Flumina dum tardè ſubterlabentia terras
 Pigram undam volvunt, et ſola papavera paſcunt:
 Quorum lentus odor, lethæaque pocula ſomnos
 Suvadent perpetuos, circumſuſæque tenebræ.
 Horrendo viſu obſtupui: quin Pegaſon ipſum
 Deſecere animi: ſenſit dux, terque ſtagello.
 Inſonuit clarum, terque altâ voce morantem
 Increpuit: ſecat ille cito pede lævia campi
 Ætherei, terræque ſecundâ allabitur aurâ.

Cantabr. in Comitibus prioribus, 1740-1.

A VOYAGE TO THE PLANETS.

Translated by the Rev. Francis Farwkes, A. M.

SAY, what uncommon cares diſturb my reſt,
 And kindle raptures foreign to my breaſt?
 From earth's low confines liſt my mind on high,
 To trace new worlds revolving in the ſky?
 Yes—I'm impatient of this orb of clay,
 And boldly dare to meditate my way,
 Where Fontinelle firſt ſaw the planets roll,
 And all the god tumultuous ſhakes my ſoul. [ſkies
 'Tis he! he comes! and through the ſun-bright
 Drives foaming Pegaſus, and thus he cries:
 " Ceafe, ceafe, dear youth, too ſtudioſly employ'd,
 " And wing with me the unrefiſting void;
 " 'Tis thine with me round other worlds to ſoar,
 " And viſit kingdoms never known before;
 " While I ſuccinctly ſhow each various race,
 " The manners and the genius of the place."
 I thought my mind with lively horror fraught,
 'Thinks on Bellerophon, and ſhudders at the thought),
 Mount quick the winged ſteed; he ſprings, he flies,
 Shoots through the yielding air, and cleaves the liquid ſkies!—
 Firſt, ſwift Cyllenius, circling round the ſun,
 We reach, when thus my friendly guide begun:
 " Mark well the genius of this fiery place,
 " The wild amuſements of the brain-ſick race,
 " Whoſe minds the beams of Titan, too intense,
 " Affect with frenzy, and diſtract the ſenſe.

" A monarch here gives ſubject princes law,
 " A mighty monarch with a crown of ſtraw.
 " There ſits a lover, ſad in penſive air,
 " And like the diſmal image of deſpair,
 " With charcoal paints his Chloë heav'nly fair. }
 " In ſadly-ſoothing ſtrain rude notes he ſings,
 " And ſtrikes harſh numbers from the jarring
 " ſtrings.
 " Lo! an astrologer, with filth beſmear'd,
 " Rough and neglected with a length of beard,
 " Pores round his cell for undiſcover'd ſtars,
 " And decks the walls with triangles and ſquares.
 " Lo!—But the radiant car of Phoebus nigh
 " Glows with red ardour, and inflames the ſky—
 " Oh! waſt me, hide me in ſome cool retreat;
 " I faint, I ficken with the fervent heat."

Thence to that milder orb we wing our way,
 Where Venus governs with an eaſy ſway.
 Soft breathes the air; for Flora paints the ground,
 And laughing Ceres deals her gifts around.
 'This bliſſful Tempe no rough blaſts moleſt,
 Of bluſt'ring Boreas, or the baleful eaſt;
 But gentle zephyrs o'er the woodlands ſtray,
 Court the tall trees, and round the branches play.
 Ethereal gales diſpenſing as they flow,
 To fan thoſe paſſions which they teach to glow.
 Here the gay youth in meaſur'd ſteps advance,
 While ſprightly muſic animates the dance;
 There the ſweet melody of ſounds admire,
 Sigh with the ſong, or languish to the lyre:
 Fair nymphs and amorous youths, a lovely band,
 Blend in the dance, light bounding hand in hand.
 From every grove the buckſome zephyrs bring
 The rich ambroſia of eternal ſpring.
 Care dwells not here, their pleaſures to deſtroy,
 But laughter, jeſt, and univerſal joy:
 All, all is love; for Venus reigns confeſs'd
 The ſole ſultana of each captive breaſt:
 Cold Cynthia here would Cupid's victim prove,
 Or the chaste daughter of imperial Jove,
 And Cato's virtue be the ſlave of love,

But now through deſtin'd fields of air we fly,
 And leave thoſe manſions, not without a ſigh:
 'Thence the dire coaſt we reach, the dreary plains,
 Where Mars, grim god, and bloody diſcord reigns.
 The hoſt in arms enbattled ſternly ſtands,
 The ſword, the dart, the dagger, in their hands.
 Here no fair nymphs to ſilver ſounds advance,
 But buſkin'd heroes form the Pyrrhic dance;
 And brazen trumpets, terrible from far,
 With martial muſic fire the ſoul to war;
 Here the lone bride bewails her abſent lord,
 'The ſterile nuptials, the deſerted board,
 Sighs the long nights, and, frantic with deſpair,
 Beats her bare breaſt, and rends her flowing hair:
 In vain the ſighs, in vain diſſolves in tears—
 In ſleep, perhaps, the warrior lord appears,
 A fleeting form that glides before her ſight,
 A momentary viſion of the night.
 Meanwhile regardless of her anxious pray'r,
 The hardy huſband ſternly ſtalks to war;
 Our ears the clang of ringing armour rends,
 And the immortal battle never ends.

Hence through the boundleſs void we nimbly
 move,
 And reach the wide-extended plains of Jove.
 Here the ſtern tyrant ſways an iron rod;
 A thouſand vailals tremble at his nod.

How short the period of a tyrant's date!
 The poisonous phial speeds the work of fate:
 Scarce is the proud imperious tyrant dead,
 But, lo! a second lords it in his stead.
 Here peace a common merchandise, is sold,
 Heav'n's first best blessing for pernicious gold:
 War soon succeeds, the sturdy squadrons stand
 Wide o'er the fields, a formidable band: [main
 With numerous fleets they crowd the groaning
 And triumph for the victories they feign:
 Again in strict alliances unite,
 Till discord raise again the phantom of a fight;
 Again they sail; again the troops prepare—
 Their falchions for the mockery of war.
 The son inhuman seeks his father's life,
 The slave his master's, and her lord's the wife.
 With vengeance thus their kindling bosoms fire,
 Since Jove usurp'd the sceptre of his fire.
 Thence poisons, perjuries, and bribes betray;
 Nor other passions do their souls obey,
 Than thirst of gold, and avarice of sway.

At length we land, vast fields of ether cross,
 On Saturn's cold uncomfortable coast;
 Here in the gloom the pamper'd sluggard's lull
 The lazy hours lethargically dull.
 In caves they live; for who was ever known
 So wise, so sedulous to build a town?
 The same stupidity infects the whole,
 Fix'd in the breast, and center'd in the soul:
 These never feel th' ambitious fires of Jove,
 To industry nor Mercury can move,
 Mars cannot spur to war, nor Venus woo to love.

Here rove those souls, 'tis said when life departs,
 Who never cultivated useful arts;
 But, stupify'd with plenty and repose,
 Dream'd out long life in one continual dose!
 No feather'd songsters, with sweet-warbled strains
 Attune to melting melody the plains,
 No flocks wide past'ring bleat, nor oxen low,
 No fountains musically murmur'ing flow;
 Th' ungenial waste no tender herbage yields,
 No harvest waves luxuriant in the fields.
 Low lie the groves, if groves this land can boast,
 Chain'd in the fetters of eternal frost,
 Their beauty wither'd, and their verdure lost.
 Dull animals inhabit this abode,
 The owl, mole, dormouse, tortoise, and the toad.
 Dull rivers deep within their channels glide;
 And slow roll on their tributary tide:
 Nor ought th' unvegetative waters feed,
 But sleepy poppy and the slimy reed;
 Whose lazy fogs, like Lethe's cups, dispense
 Eternal slumbers of dull indolence.

Aghast I stood, the drowsy vapours lull
 My soul in gloom, ev'n Pegasus grew dull.
 My guide observ'd, and thrice he urg'd his speed,
 Thrice the loud lash resounded from the steed;
 Fir'd at the strokes, he flies with slacken'd rein
 Swift o'er the level of the liquid plain,
 Guides me with gentle gale, and lights on earth again.

MATERIES GAUDET VI INERTIÆ.

VERVECUM in patria, quæ latè Hibernia squalent
 Arva inarata, palus horenda voragine erebrâ

Ante oculos jacet; haud illic impune viator
 Per tenebras iter insiliat; tremet undique tellus
 Sub pedibus mæstida, vapores undique densos
 Sudat humus, nebulisque amicitur tristibus herba.

Huc fato infelix sic quando agiteris iniquo,
 Et tutò in medium licet penetrare, videbis
 Attonitus, nigrâ de nube emergere templum,
 Tempum ingens, immane, altum penetrare stuporis.
 Plumbea stat turris, plumbum sinuatur in arcus,
 Et solido limosa tument fundamina plumbo.
 Hanc, pia materies, divo ædem extruxit inerti,
 Stultitiæ impulsus—quid enim? Lithargica semper
 Sponte sua nihil aggredditur, dormitat in horas,
 Et sine vi, nullo gaudet dea languida motu.

Hic ea monstra habitant, quæ olim sub luminis
 auras

Materies peperit fomo patre, lividus iste
 Zoilus, et Bavo non impar Mævius, audaç
 Spinoza, et Pyrrho, cunq̃ue Hobbesio Epicurus.
 At omnes valeat quæ mutâ referre? frequentes
 Usque adeo videas Hebetes properare?—nec ad-fert

Quidquam opis Anglorum doctæ vicinia gentis.
 Sic quondam, ut perhibent, stupuit Bæotica tellus
 Vicinâ licet Antycirâ, nihil inde salutis.
 Nil tulit hellebori Zephyrus, cum sæpe per æquor
 Felicem ad Lesbion levibus volitaverit alis,
 Indigenæ mellita ferens suspiria Floræ.

Porticus illa vides? Gothicis suffulta columnis
 Templi auditus, quam laxa patet! custodia qualis.
 Ante fores! quatuor formæ sua rolle miris
 Ora modis! en! torva tuens stat limine in ipso
 Personam logicis induta sophistica, denis
 Cinctâ categoriis, matrem quæ maxima natu [est!
 Filia materiem agnoscit—quantam instar in ipsâ
 Grande caput, tenues oculi, cutis arida produnt
 Fallacem: rete una manus tenet, altera sustena,
 Vestis arachneis fordit circumdata telis,
 Quis gaudet labyrinthos dea callida nodos.

Alpicias jam funereo gradientem incessu—
 Quam lentè celo Saturni volvitur astrum,
 Quam lentè saltaverunt post Orpheæ montes,
 Quam lentè, Oxonii, solemnis pondera cænz
 Gestant tergeminoz abdomina bedellorum.

Proxima deinde tenet loca forte insana Mathesis,
 Nuda pedes, chlamydem discincta, incompta capillos.

Inmemor externi, punctoque innixa reclinat.
 Ante pedes vario inscriptam diagrammate arenam
 Cernas, rectis curva, atque intertexta rotunda
 Schemata quadratis—quis scilicet abdita rerum
 Pandere se jactat solam, doctasque sorores
 Fastidit, propriæque nihil non arrogat arti.
 Illam olim, duce Newtono, tum tendit ad astra,
 Ætheriasque domos superum, indignata volentem
 Turba mathematicam retrahit, pœnasque repescens
 Detenit in terris, nugisque exercet ineptis.

Tertia Microphile, proles furtiva parentis
 Divinæ; produxit enim commixta furenti
 Diva viro physice—muscas et papilioncs
 Lustrat inæpletum, collumque et tempora ridet
 Floribus, et fungis, totâque propagine veris.
 Rara oculis nugarum avidis animalia quærit
 Omne genus, seu serpit humi, seu ludit in undis,
 Seu voltans tremulis liquidum fecat acra pennis.
 O! ubi litoribus nostris felicius aura
 Polypon appulerit, quanto cava templa stuporis
 Mugitu concussa trement, reboabit et ingens

Pulsa palus! Plausa excipiet dea blanda secunda Microphile ante omnes; jam non crocodilon ado-
ram; [det,

Non bombyx, conchæve juvat: sed Polypon ar-
Solum Polypon ardet,—et ecce! faceta feraci
Falce novos creat assidue, pascitque creatos,
Ah! modo dilectis pascit nova gaudia muscis.

Quartam materies peperit conjuncta stupori,
Nomen Atheia illi, monstrum cui lumen ademp-
tum,

Atque aures; cui sensus abest; sed mille trifulca
Ore micant linguæ, refugas quibus insicit auras.
Hanc stupor ipse parens odit, vicina nefandos
Horret sylvæ fonos, neque furda repercutit echo.
Mendacem natura redarguit ipsa, demque
Et cælum, et terræ, veracique astra fatentur.
Si simul agglomerans surgit chorus omnis aqua-
rum,

Et puro sublimè sonat grave fulmen olympo.

Fonte ortus Iethæo, ipæus ad ossia templi,
Ire sporifero tendit cum murmure rivus,
Huc potum stolidos Deus evocat agmine magno:
Crebri adsunt, largisque sitim restinguere gaudent
Hautibus, atque iterant calices, certantque stupen-
do. [aurem

Me, me etiam, clamo, occurrens;—sed vellicat
Calliope, nocuasque vetat contingere lymphas.

THE TEMPLE OF DULNESS.

In Ireland's wild, uncultivated plains,
Where torpid sloth, and foggy dulness reigns,
Full many a fen infects the putrid shore,
And many a gulf the melancholy moor.
Let not the stranger in these regions stray,
Dark is the sky, and perilous the way;
Beneath his footsteps shakes the trembling
ground,

Dense fogs and exhalations hover round,
And with black clouds the tender turf is crown'd.

Here should'st thou rove, by fate's severe com-
And safely reach the centre of the land; [mand,
Thine eyes shall view, with horror and surprise,
The fane of dulness, of enormous size,
Emerging from the sable cloud arise.

A leaden tow'r upheaves its heavy head,
Vast leaden arches press the slimy bed,
The soft soil swells beneath the load of lead.
Old matter here erected his abode,

At folly's impulse, to the slothful god.
And here the drone lethargic loves to stray,
Slumb'ring the dull, inactive hours away;
For still, unless by foreign force impress'd,
The languid goddess holds her state of rest.

Their habitation here those monsters keep,
Whom matter father'd on the god of sleep:
Here Zoiulus, with cank'ring envy pale,
Here Mævius bids his brother Bavius, hail;
Spinoza, Epicure, and all those mobs
Of wicked wits, from Pyrrho down to Hobbes.
How can the muse recount the numerous crew
Of frequent fools that crowd upon the view?
Nor can learn'd Albion's sun that burns so clear,
Disperse the dulness that involves them here.

Bœotia thus remain'd, in days of yore
Senseless and stupid, through the neighb'ring
shore,
Afforded salutary hellicore.

No cure exhal'd from zephyr's buxom breeze,
That gently brush'd the bosom of the seas,
As oft to Lesbian fields he wing'd his way,
Fanning fair Flora, and in airy play
Breath'd balmy sighs, that melt the soul away.

Behold that portico! how vast, how wide!
The pillars Gothic, wrought with barb'rous pride:

Four monstrous shapes before the portal wait,
Of horrid aspect, sentry to the gate;
Lo! in the entrance, with disdainful eye,
In logic's dark disguise, stands sophistry;
Her very front would common sense confound,
Encompass'd with ten categories round:
She from old matter, the great mother, came,
By birth the eldest—and how like the dame!
Her shrivell'd skin, small eyes, prodigious pate,
Denote her shrewd, and subtle in debate:
This hand a net, and that sustains a club,
T' entangle her antagonist, or drub.

The spider's toils, all o'er her garment spread,
Imply the mazy errors of her head.

Behold her marching with funereal pace,
Slow as old Saturn rolls through boundless space,
Slow as the mighty mountains mov'd along,
When Orpheus rais'd the lyre-attending song:

Or, as at Oxford, on some gaudy day,
Fat beadies in magnificent array,
With big round bellies bear the pond'rous treat,
And heavily lag on, with the vast load of meat.

The next, mad Mathesis; her feet all bare,
Ungirt, untrimm'd, with dissoluted hair:

No foreign objects can her thoughts disjoint;
Reclin'd she sits, and ponders o'er a point.
Before her, lo! inscrib'd upon the ground,
Strange diagrams, th' astonish'd sight confound,
Right lines and curves, with figures square and round.

With these the monster, arrogant and vain,
Boasts that she can all mysteries explain,
And treats the sacred sisters with disdain.
She, when great Newton fought his kindred
skies,

Sprung high in air, and strove with him to rise,
In vain—the mathematic mob restrains
Her flight, indignant, and on earth detains;
E'er since the captive wretch her brains employs
On trifling trinkets, and on gewgaw toys.

Microphile is station'd next in place,
The spurious issue of celestial race;
From heav'nly Physice she took her birth,
Her sire a madman of the sons of earth;
On flies the pores with keen unvaried sight,
And moths and butterflies, her dear delight:
Mushrooms and slow'rs, collected on a string,
Around her neck, around her temples cling,
With all the strange production of the spring.

With greedy eyes she'll search the world to find
Rare, uncouth animals of every kind;
Whether along the humble ground they stray,
Or nimbly sportive in the waters play,
Or through the light expanse of ether fly,
And with fleet pinions cleave the liquid sky.
Ye gales, that gently breathe upon our shore,
O! let the Polypos be wasted o'er;

How will the hollow dome of dulness ring,
With what loud joy receive the wond'rous thing?
Applause will rend the skies, and all around
The quivering quagmires bellow back the sound;

How will Microphie her joy attest,
 And glow with warmer raptures than the rest?
 This will the curious crocodile excel,
 The weaving worm, and silver-shining shell;
 No object e'er will wake her wonder thus,
 As Polypus, her darling Polypus.
 Lo! by the wounds of her creating knife
 New Polypusses wriggle into life,
 Fast as they rise, she seeds with ample store
 Of once rare flies, but now esteem'd no more.

The fourth dire shape from mother matter came,
 Dulness her sire, and Atheism her name;
 In her no glimpse of sacred sense appears,
 Depriv'd of eyes, and destitute of ears;
 And yet she brandishes a thousand tongues,
 And blasts the world with air-infesting lungs:
 Curs'd by her fire, her very words are wounds,
 No grove re-echoes the detested sounds.
 Whate'er she speaks, all nature proves a lie,
 The earth, the heav'ns, the starry spangled sky
 Proclaim the wise eternal Deity: }
 The congregated waves in mountains driven
 Roar in grand chorus to the Lord of heaven.
 Through skies serene the glorious thunders roll,
 Loudly pronounce the god, and shake the sounding pole.

A river, murmuring from Lethæan source,
 Full to the sane directs its sleepy course;
 The pow'r of dulness leaning on the brink,
 Here calls the multitude of fools to drink.
 Swarming they crowd to stupify the skull.
 With frequent cups contending to be dull.
 Me, let me taste the sacred stream, I cry'd,
 With out-stretch'd arm—the muse my boon de- } ny'd
 And sav'd me from the sense intoxicating tide. }

MUTUA OCITATIONUM PROPAGATIO SOLVI POTEST MECHANICE.

MOMUS, scurra, procax superûm, quo tempore
 Pallas

Exiit cerebro Jovis, est pro more jocatus
 Nescio quid stultum de partu: excaudit irâ
 Jupiter, asper, acerba tuens; “et tu quoque, dixit,
 “Garrule, concipis, fetumq. ex ore profundes:”
 Haud mora, jamque supinus in aulâ extenditur ingens
 Derisor; dubiâ velantur lumina nocte;
 Stertit hians immane;—e naso Gallica clangunt
 Classica, Germaniq. simul sermonis amator:
 Edita vix tandem est monstrum Polychasmia, proles.

Tanto digna parente, aviaeq. similima nocti.
 Illa oculos tentat nequicquam aperire, veterino
 Torpida, et horrendo vultum distorta cachinno.
 Æmulus hanc Jovis aspiciens, qui fictile vulgus
 Fecerat infelix, imitariet are Prometheus
 Audet—nec flammis opus est cœlestibus: auræ
 Tres Stygiæ flatus, nigræ tria pocula Lethes
 Miscet, et innuptæ suspiria longa puellæ!
 His adipem suis et guttur conjungit aselli,
 Tenſaque cum gemitu somnisque sequacibus ora.
 Sic etiam in terris dea, quæ mortalibus ægris
 Ferræt opem, inque hebetes dominariet apta, cre-
 ata est.

Nonne vides, ut præcipiti petit oppida cnſu.
 Rustica plebs, stipatque forum? sublime tribunal
 Armigerique equitesque premunt, de more parati
 Justitiæ lanceas proferre fideliter aques,

Grande capillitium induti, frontemque minacem
 Non temerè attoniti caupones, turbaque forum
 Aufugiunt, gravideque timent trucia ora puellæ.
 At mox sîda comes Polychasmia, matutinis
 Quæ se miscuerat poc'lis cerealibus, ipsum
 Judicis in cerebrum scandit—jamque unus et alter
 Cæperunt longas in hiatus ducere voces:
 Donec per cunctos dea jam solenne, profundum
 Sparſerit hum—nutant taciti, tum brachia magno
 Extendunt nisu, patulis et faucibus hifcent.
 Interea legum caupones jurgia miscent,
 Quæis nil rhetorice est, nisi copia major hiandi:
 Vocibus ambiguus certant, nugasque strophasque
 Alternis jaculantur, et irascuntur amice,
 Donanteque accipiuntque stuporis missile plumbum.
 Vox, fanatica turba, nequit pia musa tacere.

Majoremne aliunde potest deducere rictum?
 Ascendit gravis orator, miserique loquelâ
 Extromit thesin; in partes quam deinde minutas
 Distrahit, ut connectat, et explicat obscurando:
 Spargitur heu! pigris verborum sonus ab alis,
 Grex circum genit, et plausum declarat hiando.
 Nec vos, qui falsò matrem jactatis hygeian
 Patremque Hippocratem, taceam—Polychasmia, vestros

Agnosco natos: tumidas sine ponderè voces
 In vulgum eructant; emuncto quisque bacillum
 Applicat auratum naso, graviterque facetus
 Totum se in vultum cogit, medicamina pandens—
 Rusticus haurit amara, atque insanabile dormit;
 Nec sensus revocare queant fomenta, nec herbæ,
 Nen ars, non miræ magicus sonus Abracadabræ.

Ante alios summa es, Polychasmia, cura Sospitæ:
 Ille tui cæcas vires, causamque latentem
 Sedulus exquirat—quo scilicet impete fauces
 Invitæ disjungantur; quo vortice aquosæ [bres,
 Particulæ fluitent, commitesque, ut fulminis im-
 Cum strepitu erumpant; ut deinde vaporet ocellos
 Materies subtilis; ut in cutis insinuet se
 Retia; tum, si forte datur contingere nervos
 Concordes, cunctorum ora expanduntur hiulca.
 Sic ubi, Phœbe pater, fumis chelyn, harmoniamque
 Abstrusam in chordis simul elicis, altera, siquam
 Æqualis tenor aptavit, tremat æmula cantûs,
 Memnoniamque imitata lyrum sine pollicis ictu
 Divinum resonat proprio modulamine carmen.

Me quoque, mene tuum tetigisti, ingrata, po-etam?

Hei mihi! totus hio tibi jam stupefactus; in ipſo
 Parnasso captus longè longèque remotas
 Prospecto musas, sitioque, ut Tantalus alter,
 Castalias situs iiter aquas, inhiantis ab ore
 Nectarei fugiunt latices—hos Popius urnâ
 Excipit undanti, et fontem sibi vendicant omnem.

Haud aliter socium esuriens Sjzator edacem
 Dum videt, appositusque cibus frustratur hiantem,
 Dentibus inſcendens nequicquam lumine torvo
 Sæpius exprobrat; nequicquam brachia tendit
 Sedulus officiosa, dapes remove re paratus.
 Olli nunquam excimpta fames, quin frustra suprema
 Devoret, et peritura immiani ingurgitet ore:
 Tum demum jubet auferri; nudata capaci
 Ossa sonant, lugubre sonant, allisâ catino.

A MECHANICAL SOLUTION OF THE PROPAGATION OF YAWNING.

WHEN Pallas issued from the brain of Jove,
 Momus, the mimic of the gods above;

In his mock mood impertinently spoke
About the birth, some low, ridiculous joke:
Jove, sternly frowning, glow'd with vengeful ire,
And thus indignant said th' almighty fire:
" Loquacious slave, that laugh'st without a cause,
" Thou shalt conceive, and bring forth at thy
" jaws."

He spoke---stretch'd in the hall the mimic lies,
Supinely dull, thick vapours dim his eyes:
And as his jaws a horrid chafm disclose,
It seem'd he made a trumpet of his nose;
Though harsh the strain, and horrible to hear,
Like German jargon grating on the ear.

At length was Polychasnia brought to light,
Worthy her sire, a monster of a sight,
Resembling her great grandmother, old night. }
Her eyes to open oft in vain the try'd,
Lock'd were the lids, her mouth distended wide.
Her when Prometheus happen'd to survey
(Rival of Jove, that made mankind of clay), }
He form'd without the aid of heav'nly ray.
To three Lethæan cups he learnt to mix
Deep sighs of virgins, with three blasts from Styx,
The bray of asses, with the fat of brawn,
The sleep preceding groan, and hideous yawn.
Thus Polychasnia took her wond'rous birth,
A goddess helpful to the sons of earth.

Lo! how the rustic multitude from far
Haste to the town, and crowd the clam'rous bar.
The preft bench groans with many a 'squire and knight,

Who weigh out justice, and distribute right;
Severe they seem, and formidably big,
With front important, and huge periwig.
The little villains skulk aloof dismay'd,
And panic terrors seize the pregnant maid.
But soon friend Polychasnia, who always near,
Herself had mingled with their morning beer, }
Steals to the judges brain, and centres there.
Then in the court the horrid yawn began,
And hum profound and solemn, went from man to man:

Silent they nod, and with prodigious strain
Stretch out their arms, then listless yawn again;
For all the flow'rs of rhetoric they can boast
Amidst their wranglings, is to gape the most:
Ambiguous quirks, and friendly wrath they vent,
And give and take the leaden argument.

Ye too, fanatics, never shall escape
The faithful muse; for who so greatly gape?
Mounted on high, with serious care perplex'd,
The miserable preacher takes his text;
Then into parts minute, with wond'rous pain,
Divides, connects, and then divides again, }
And does with grave obscurity explain:
While from his lips lean periods ling'ring creep,
And not one meaning interrupts their sleep.
The drowsy hearers stretch their weary jaws
With lamentable groans, and, yawning, gape applause.

The quacks of physic next provoke my ire;
Who falsely boast Hippocrates their sire:
Goddess! thy sons I ken---verbose and loud,
They puff their windy bubble on the crowd;
With look important, critical, and vain,
Each to his nose applies the gilded cane;
And as he nods and ponders o'er the case,
Gravely collects himself into his face,

Explains his med'cines---which the rustic buys,
Drinks the dire draught, and of the doctor dies;
No pills, no potions can to life restore;
Abracadabra, necromantic pow'r
Can charm, and conjure up from death no more. }

But more than aught that's marvellous and rare,
The studious Soph makes Polychasnia's care;
Explores what secret spring, what hidden cause,
Distends with hideous chafm th' unwilling jaws,
What latent ducts the dewy moisture pour
With sound tremendous, like a thunder-show'r:
How subtle matter, exquisitely thin,
Pervades the curious net-work of the skin,
Affects th' accordant nerve---all eyes are drown'd
In drowsy vapours, and the yawn goes round.
When Phœbus thus his flying fingers flings
Across the chords, and sweeps the trembling strings;

If e'er a lyre at unison there be,
It swells with emulating harmony,
Like Memnon's harp, in ancient times renown'd,
Breathing, untouch'd, sweet-modulated sound.

But oh! ungrateful! to thy own true bard,
Oh, Polychasnia, is this my just reward?
Thy drowsy dews upon my head distil,
Just at the entrance of th' Aonian hill;
Listless I gape, unactive, and supine,
And at vast distance view the sacred nine;
Witful I view---the streams increase my thirst,
In vain---like Tantalus, with plenty curst;
No draughts nectareous to my portion fall,
These godlike Poë exhausts, and greatly claims them all.

Thus the lean Sizar views, with gaze aghast,
The hungry tutor at his noon's repast;
In vain he grinds his teeth---his grudging eye,
And visage sharp, keen appetite imply;
Oft he attempts, officious, to convey
The lessening relics of the meal away---
In vain---no morsel 'scapes the greedy jaw,
All, all is gorg'd in magisterial maw;
Till at the last, observant of his word,
The lamentable waiter clears the board,
And inly-murmuring miserably groans.
To see the empty dish, and hear the sounding bones.

THE

HORATIAN CANONS OF FRIENDSHIP.

(a) Nay, 'tis the same with all th' affected crew
Of singing men, and singing women too:
Do they not set their catcalls up of coarse?
The king himself may ask them till he's hoarse;
But would you crack their windpipes and their lungs,
The certain way's to bid them hold their tongues.

(a) Omnibus hoc vitium est cantoribus, inter amicos

Ut nunquam inducant animum cantare rogati:
Injusti nunquam desistant. Sardus habebat
Ille Tigellius hoc. Cæsar, qui cogere posset,
Si peteret per amicitiam patris atque suam, non Quidquam proficeret: si colluisset, ab ovo
Uique ad mala citaret, Io Bacche! modo summa
Voce, modo hac resonat que chordis quatuor im-

'Twas thus with Minum—Minum one would think,

My lord mayor might have govern'd with a wink.
Yet did the magistrate e'er condescend

To ask a song, as kinsman or as friend,

The urchin coin'd excuses to get off,

'Twas—hem—the devil take this whorson cough.

But wait awhile, and catch him in the glee,

He'd roar the * the lion in the lowest key,

Or strain the † Morning Lark quite up to G—

Act Beard, or Lowe, and show his tuneful art

From the plumb-pudding down to the desert.

(b) Never on earth was such a various elf,

He every day possess'd a different self;

Sometimes he'd scour along the streets like wind,

As if some fifty bailiffs were behind;

At other times he'd sadly, faunt'ring crawl,

As though he led the hearse, or held the sable pall.

(c) Now for promotion he was all on flame,

And ev'ry sentence from St. James's came.

He'd brag how Sir John * met him in the Strand, [hand;

And how his Grace of  took him by the

How the prince saw him at the last review,

And ask'd who was that pretty youth in blue?

Now would he praise the peaceful sylvan scene,

The healthful cottage, and the golden mean.

Now would he cry, contented let me dwell

Safe in the harbour of my college cell;

No foreign cooks, nor livry'd servants nigh,

Let me with comfort eat my mutton-pye;

While my pint-bottle, op'd by help of fork,

With wine enough to navigate a cork,

My sober solitary meal shall crown, [down.

To study eke the mind, and drive the vapours

Yet, strange to tell, this wond'rous student lay

Snoring in bed for all the livelong day;

Night was his time for labour—in a word,

Never was man so cleverly absurd.

(d) But here a friend of mine turns up his nose,

And you (he cries) are perfect, I suppose:

(b) Nil æquale homini fuit illi: sæpe velut qui Currebat fugiens hostem: persæpe velut qui Junonis sacra ferret. Habebat sæpe ducentos,

Sæpe decem servos: modo reges, atque tetrarchas.

(c) Omnia magna loquens. Modo, sit mihi mensa tripes, et

Concha falis puri, et toga, quæ defendere frigus,
Quamvis crassa, queat, decies centena dedisses

Huic parco paucis contento: quinque diebus
Nil erat in loculis, noctes vigilabat ad ipsum

Manc: diem totum sterterebat, nil fuit unquam
Sic impar sibi, nunc aliquis dicat mihi: quid tu?

(d) Nullane habes vita? immo alia, et fortasse minora.

Mænius absentem novium cum carperet: heus tu,
Quidam ait, ignoras te? an ut ignotum dare nobis

Verba putas? egomet mi ignosco, Mænius inquit.
Stultus, et improbus hic arior est, dignosque notari.

Cum tua pervideas oculis mala lippus inunctis,
Cur in amicorum vitiiis tam cernis acutum.

* The Lion's Song, in Pyramus and Thisbe.

† A song in one of Mr. Handel's oratorios.

Perfect! not I (pray, gentle Sir, forbear)
In this good' age, when vices are so rare,

I plead humanity, and claim my share.

Who has not faults? 'great Marlborough had one,

Nor Chesterfield is spotless, nor the fun.

Grubworm was railing at his friend Tom Quacer,

When Witwood thus reproach'd him with a sneer,

Have you no flaws, who are so prone to snub,

I have—but I forgive myself, quoth Grub.

This is a fervile selfishness, a fault

Which justice scarce can punish, as the ought.

Blind as a poking, dirt-compelling mole,

To all that stains thy own polluted soul,

Yet each small failing spy'it in other men,

Spy'it with the quickness of an eagle's ken.

Though strong resentment rarely lag behind,

And all thy virulence be paid in kind.

(c) Philander's temper's violent, nor fits

The wond'rous waggishness of modern wits;

His cap's awry, all ragged is his gown,

And (wicked rogue)! he wears his stockings down;

But he's a foul ingenious as his face,

To you a friend, and all the human race;

Genius, that all the depths of learning sounds,

And generosity, that knows no bounds.

In fruits like these if the good youth excel,

Let them compensate for the awkward snell.

Sit then yourself, I say, and sit again,

Glean the pernicious tares from out the grain;

And ask thy heart if custom, nature's heir,

Hath sown no undiscover'd fern-seed there.

'This be our standard then, on this we rest,

Not search the casuists for another test.

(f) Let's be like lover's gloriously deceiv'd,

And each good man a better still believ'd:

Quam aut aquila, aut serpens epidaurius? at tibi contra

Eventit, inquirant vitia ut tua rursus et illi.

(e) Iracundior est paullo? minus aptus acutis
Narius horum hominum? rideri possit, eo quod
Rusticius tonsio toga desuit, et male laxus

In pede calceus hæret, at est bonus, ut melior vir
Non alius quisquam: at tibi amicus: at ingenium ingens

Inculo latet hoc sub corpore, denique teipsum
Concute, num qua tibi vitiorum inteverit olim

Natura, aut etiam consuetudo mala, namque
Neglectis urenda siliæ innascitur agris.

(f) Illuc prævertamur: amatorem quod amice
Turpia decipiunt cæcum vitia, aut etiam ipsa hæc
Delectant: veluti Balbinum polypum Agnæ:

Vellem in amicitia sic erarimus; et isti
Errori nomen virtus posuisset honestum.

At, pater ut nati, sic nos debemus amici,
Si quod sit vitium, non fastidium, strabonem

Appellat pætrum pater: et pullum, male parvum
Si cui filius est: ut abortivus fuit olim

Sisyphus, hunc varum, distortis eruribus, illum
Balbutit scaurum, pravus sultum male talis.

Parcius hic vivit? frugi dicatur ineptus,
Et jactantior hic paullo est? concinnus amicus

Postulat ut videatur. at est turculentior, atque
Plus æquo liber? simplex, fortisque labeatur.

Galdior est? acres inter numeretur opinor,
Hæc res et jungit, junctos et servat amicos.

E'en Celia's wart Strephon will not neglect,
But praises, kisses, loves the dear defect.
Oh! that in friendship we were thus to blame,
And ermin'd candour, tender of our fame,
Would clothe the honest error with an honest
name!

Be we then still to those we hold most dear,
Fatherly fond, and tenderly severe.
The fire, whose son squints forty thousand ways,
Finds in his features mighty room for praise:
Ah! born (he cries) to make the ladies sigh,
Jacky, thou hast an am'rous cast o' the eye.
Another's child's abortive—he believes
Nature most perfect in diminutives;
And men of ev'ry rank, with one accord
Salute each crooked rascal with my lord.
(For bandy legs, humph-back, and knocking knee,
Are all excessive signs of Q—ty.)

Thus let us judge our friends—if Scrub substitt
Too meanly, Scrub is an economist;
And if Tom Tinkle is full loud and pert,
He aims at wit, and does it to divert.
Largus is apt to bluster, but you'll find
'Tis owing to his magnitude of mind;
Lollius is passionate, and loves a whore,
Spirit and constitution!—nothing more—
Ned to a bullying peer is ty'd for life,
And in commendam holds a scolding wife;
Slave to a fool's caprice, and woman's will;
But patience, patience is a virtue still!
Ask of Chamont a kingdom for a fish,
He'll give you three rather than spoil a dish;
Nor pride nor luxury is in the case,
But hospitality—an't please your grace.
Should a great gen'ral give a drab a pension—
Meanness!—the devil—'tis perfect condescension,
Such ways make many friends, and make friends long
Or else my good friend Horace reasons wrong,
(g) But we alas! e'en virtuous deeds invert,
And into vice misconstrue all desert.

See we a man of modesty and merit,
Sober and meek—we swear he has no spirit;
We call him stupid, who with caution breaks
His silence, and will think before he speaks.
Fidelio treads the path of life with care,
And eyes his footsteps; for he fears a snare.
His wary way still scandal misapplies,
And calls him subtle, who's no more than wise.
If any man is unconstrain'd and free,
As oft, my Lælius, I have been to thee,
When rudely to thy room I chance to scour,
And interrupt thee in the studious hour;
From Coke and Lyttleton thy mind unbend,
With more familiar nonsense of a friend;
'Talk of my friendship, and of thy desert,
Show thee my works, and candidly impart
At once the product of my head and heart,

(g) At vos virtutes ipsas invertimus, atque
Sincerus cupimus vas incrustare. Probus quis
Nobiscum vivit? multum est demissus homo. illi
Tardo, cognomen pingui damus. hic fugit omnes
Insidias, nullique malo latus obdit apertum?
(Cum genus hoc inter vite veretur, ubi acris Invidia, atque vigent ubi erugini) pro bene sano,
Ac non incauto, fictum astutumque vocamus.
Simplicior, quis, qualem me sepe libenter
Obtulerim tibi, Mæcenas, ut forte legentem

Vol. XI,

5

Nafutus calls me fool, and clownish bear,
Nor (but for perfect candour) stops he there.
(b) Ah! what unthinking heedless things are men,
'T' enact such laws as mult themselves condemn?
In every human soul some vices spring
(For fair perfection is no mortal thing);
Whoe'er is with the fewest faults endu'd,
Is but the best of what cannot be good.
Then view me, friend, in an impartial light,
Survey the good and bad, the black and white;
And if ye find me, Sir, upon the whole,
To be an honest and ingenious soul,
By the same rule I'll measure you again,
And give you your allowance to a grain.
'Tis friendly and 'tis fair on either hand,
To grant th' indulgence we ourselves demand.
If on your hump we cast a fav'ring eye,
You must excuse all those who are awry.
In short, since vice or folly, great or small,
Is more or less inherent in us all,
Who'er offends, our censure let us guide,
With a strong bias to the candid side;
Nor (as the Stoics did in ancient times)
Rank little foibles with enormous crimes.
(i) If, when your butler, e'er he brings a dish,
Should lick his fingers, or should drop a fish,
Or from the side-board slich a cup of ale,
Enrag'd you send the puny thief to goal;
You'd be (methink) as infamous an oaf,
As that immense portentous scoundrel ———*.
Yet worse by far (if worse at all can be)
In folly and iniquity is he;
Who, for some trivial, social, well-meant joke,
Which candour should forget as soon as spoke,
Would shun his friend, neglectful and unkind,
As if old Parson Packthread was behind;
Who drags up all his visitors by force,
And, without mercy, reads them his discourse.

Aut tacitum impellat quovis sermone? molestus?
Communi sensu plane caret, iniquimus. (b) Eheu,
Quam temere in nosmet legem sancimus iniquam?
Nam vitium nemo sine nascitur: optimus ille est,
Qui minimis urgetur. amicus dulcis, ut æquum est,
Cum mea compenset vitium bona, pluribus hisce
Si modo plura mihi bona sunt, inclinet; amari
Si volet hac lege, in trutina ponetur cadem.
Qui, ne tuberibus propriis offendant amicum
Postulat: ignoscat verrucis illius æquum est.
Peccatis veniam postcentem reddere rursus.
Denique, quatenus excidi penitus vitium iræ,
Cætera item nequeunt stultus hærentia; cur non,
Ponderibus, modulisque suis ratio utitur? ac res
Ut quæque est, ita supplitiis delicta coeret?

(i) Si quis eum servum, patinam qui tollere jus-
sus,

Semesos pisces, tipidumque liguricrit jus,
In cruce suffigat; Labeone insano; inter
Sanos dicatur. Quanto hoc furiosus atque
Majus peccatum est? paulum delinquit amicus,
(Quod nisi concedas, libere insuavis, acerbis);
Odisti et fugis, ut Drosoneum debitor æris?
Qui nisi cum tristes misero venere calendæ,
Mercedem aut nummos unde unde extricat, amara
Porrecto jugulo historias, captivus ut, audit.

* An infamous attorney,

N

(l) If sick at heart, and heavy at the head,
 My drunken friend shall reel betimes to bed;
 And in the morn with affluent discharge,
 Should sign and seal his residence at large;
 Or should he in some passionate debate,
 By way of instance, break an earthen plate;
 Would I forsake him for a piece of delf?
 No—not for China's wide domain itself.
 If toys like these were cause of real grief,
 What should I do, or whither seek relief,
 Suppose him perjurd, faithless, pimp, or thief?
 Away—a foolish knavish tribe you are,
 Who falsely put all vices on a par.
 From this fair reason her assent withdraws,
 E'en fordid interest gives up the cause,
 That mother of our cuffs and our laws. }
 When first yon golden sun array'd the east,
 Small was the difference 'twixt man and beast;
 With hands, with nails, with teeth, with clubs
 they fought, [wrought
 Till malice was improv'd, and deadlier weapons
 Language, at length, and words experience found,
 And sense obtain'd a vehicle in sound.
 Then wholesome laws were fram'd, and towns were built,
 And justice seiz'd the lawless vagrants guilt;
 And theft, adultery, and fornication [fashion:
 Were punish'd much, forsooth, though much in (l) For long before fair Helen's fatal charms
 Had many a

Hiatus magnus lacrymabilis

set the world in arms.

But kindly kept by no historians care,
 They all goodluck, have perish'd to an hair.
 But be that as it may, yet in all climes,
 There's diff'rent punishment for diff'rent crimes.
 Hold, blockhead hold—this sure is not the way,
 For all alike I'd lash, and all I'd slay,
 Cries Wn, if I'd sovereign sway. }

(h) Commixit lectum potus, mensave catillum
 Evandri manibus tritum dejecit: ob hanc rem,
 Aut positam ante mea quia pullum in parte catini
 Sustulit esuriens, minus hoc jocundus amicus
 Sit mihi? quid faciam, si furtum fecerit? aut si
 Prodiderit commissa fide? sponsumve negarit?
 Quis paria esse ferè placuit peccata, laborant,
 Cum ventum ad verum est; sensus, moresque repugnant
 Atque ipsa utilitas justi prope mater, et æqui.
 Cum prorepserunt primis animalia terris, [ter,
 Murum et turpe pecus, glandem atque cubilia præp-
 Unguibus, et pugnis, dien sustibus, atque ita porro
 Pugnant armis, quæ post fabricave at usus:
 Donec verba, quibus voces sensusque notarent,
 Nominaque invener; dehinc abistere bello,
 Oppida cæperunt munire, et ponere leges;
 Ne quis fur esset, neuq; latra, neu quis adulter.

(l) Nam fuit ante Helenam cunnus teterrima belli

Causa: sed ignotis perierunt mortibus illi,
 Quos Venerem incertam rapientes more ferarum
 Viribus editior cædebat, ut in grege taurus.

Have sov'reign sway, and an imperial robe,
 With fury * sultunate o'er half the globe.
 Meanwhile, if I from each indulgent friend,
 Obtain remission, when I chance t' offend,
 Why, in return, I'll make the balance even,
 And, for forgiving, they shall be forgiven.
 (m) With zeal I'll love, be courteous e'en to strife,
 More blest than emperors in private life.

PROLOGUE

TO A TRIP TO CAMBRIDGE, OR THE GRATEFUL
 FAIR.

*A Mock Play, acted at Pembroke College, Hall,
 Cambridge, 1747.*

In ancient days, as jovial Horace sings,
 When laurell'd bards were lawgivers and kings,
 Bold was the comic muse, without restraint,
 To name the vicious and the vice to paint;
 Th' enliven'd picture from the canvass flew,
 And the strong likeness crowded in the view.
 Our author practises more general rules,
 He is no niggard of his knaves and fools:
 Both small and great, both pert and dull his muse,
 Displays, that every one may pick and choose.
 The rules dramatic, though he scarcely knows,
 Of time and place, and all the piteous prows,
 That pedant Frenchmen snuffle through their nose. [done,

Fools, who personate what Homer should have
 Like tattling watches they correct the sun.
 Critics, like posts, undoubtedly may show
 The way to Pinus, but they cannot go.
 Whene'er immortal Shakspeare's works are read,
 He wins the heart before he strikes the head.
 Swift to the soul the piercing image flies,
 Swifter than Harriot's wit, or Harriot's eyes;
 Swifter than some romantic traveller's thought;
 Swifter than British fire when William fought.
 Fancy precedes, and conquers all the mind;
 Deliberating judgment slowly comes behind;
 Comes to the field with blunderbuss and gun,
 Like heavy Falstaff, when the work is done. [pain,
 Fights, when the battle's o'er, with wondrous
 By Shrewsbury's clock, and nobly slays the slain.
 The critic's censures are beneath our care,
 We strive to please the generous and the fair;
 To their decision we submit our claim,
 We write not, speak not, breath not, but for them.

SOLILOQUY OF THE PRINCESS PERRI- WINKLE,

In the Mock Play of "A Trip to Cambridge, or the Grateful Fair."

[The Princess PERRIWINKLE sola, attended by four teen maids of great honour.]

SURE such a wretch as I was never born,
 By all the world deserted and forlorn:

 dum tu quadrante lavatum
 Rex ibis, neque te quisquam stipator, ineptum
 Præter Crispinum, scædabitur: et mihi dulces
 Ignoscent, si quid peccavero stultus, amici.

(m) Inque vicem illorum patiar delicta libenter,
 Privatiusque magis vivam te rege beatus.

* A word coined in the manner of Mr. W—M.

This bitter sweet, this honey-gall to prove,
 And all the oil and vinegar of love;
Pride, love, and reason, will not let me rest,
 But make a devilish bustle in my breast.
 To wed with Fizzig pride, pride, pride, denies,
 Put on a Spanish padlock, reason cries; [plies.
 But tender, gentle love, with every with com-
Pride, love, and reason, fight till they are cloy'd,
 And each by each in mutual wounds destroy'd.
 Thus when a barber and a collier fight,
 The barber beats the luckless collier---white;
 The dusty collier heaves his ponderous sack,
 And, big with vengeance, beats the barber---black.
 In comes the brick-dustman, with grime o'er'spread,
 And beats the collier and the barber---red;
 Black, red, and white, in various clouds are tof'd,
 And in the dust they raise, the combatants are lost.

AN OCCASIONAL
 PROLOGUE AND EPILOGUE TO OTHELLO,

As it was acted at the Theatre-Royal in Drury-Lane, on Thursday the 7th of March 1751, by Persons of Distinction, for their Diversions.

WHILE mercenary actors tread the stage,
 And hiring scribblers lash or lull the age,
 Our's be the task t' instruct and entertain,
 Without one thought of glory or of gain.
 Virtue's her own---from no external cause---
 She gives, and she demands the self-applause:
 Home to her breast she brings the heart-felt bays,
 Heedless alike of profit and of praise.
 This now perhaps is wrong---yet this we know,
 'Twas sense and truth a century ago:
 When Britain with transcendent glory crown'd,
 For high achievements, as for wit renown'd;
 Cull'd from each growing grace the purest part,
 And cropt the flowers from every blooming art,
 Our noblest youth would then embrace the task
 Of comic humour, or the mystic masque. [bards
 'Twas their's t' encourage worth, and give to
 What now is spent in boxing and in cards.
 Good sense their pleasure---virtue still their guide,
 And English magnanimity---their pride.
 Methinks I see with fancy's magic eye,
 The shade of Shakspeare, in yon azure sky.
 On yon high cloud behold the bard advance,
 Piercing all nature with a single glance:
 In various attitudes around him stand
 The passions, waiting for his dread command.
 First kneeling love before his feet appears,
 And, musically sighing, melts in tears.
 Near him fell jealousy with fury burns,
 And into storms the amorous breathings turns;
 Then hope, with heavenward look, and joy drawn near,
 While palsied terror trembles in the rear.
 Such Shakspeare's train of horror and delight,
 And such we hope to introduce to-night,
 But if, though just in thought, we fail in fact,
 And good intention ripens not to act,
 Weigh our design, your censure still defer,
 When truth's in view, 'tis glorious e'en to err.

EPILOGUE,
 SPOKEN BY DESDEMONA.

TRUE woman to the last---my peroration
 I come to speak, in spite of suffocation;

To show the present and the age to come,
 We may be chok'd, but never can be dumb.
 Well, now methinks I see you all run out,
 And haste away to Lady Bragwell's rout;
 Each modish sentiment to hear and weigh,
 Of those who nothing think, and all things say.
 Prudella first in parody begins
 (For nonsense and buffoonery are twins).
 "Can beaux the court for theatres exchange?"
 'I swear by Heaven 'tis strange, 'tis passing strange;
 "And very whimsical, and mighty dull,"
 And pitiful, and wond'rous pitiful:
 'I wish I had not heard it'---blessed dame!
 Whene'er she speaks, her audience with the same.
 Next Neddy Nicely---"Fie, O fie, good lack,
 "A nasty man, to make his face all black."
 Then Lady Stiffneck shows her pious rage,
 And wonders we should act---upon a stage.
 "Why, ma'am, says Coquetilla, a disgrace?
 "Merit in any form may show her face:
 "In this dull age the male things ought to play,
 "To teach them what to do, and what to say."
 In short, they all with different cavils cram us,
 And only are unanimous to damn us.
 But still there are a fair judicious few,
 Who judge-unbias'd, and with candour view;
 Who value honesty, though clad in buff,
 And wit, though dress'd in an old English ruff.
 Behold them here---I beaming sense decay,
 Shot from the living lustre of each eye
 Such meaning smiles each blooming face adorn,
 As deck the pleasure-painted brow of morn;
 And show the person of each matchless fair,
 Though rich to rapture, and above compare,
 Is, ev'n with all the skill of Heav'n design'd,
 But an imperfect image of their mind;
 While chastity, unblemish'd and unbridd'
 Adds a majestic mien, that scorns to be describ'd:
 Such we will vaunt, and only such as these,
 'Tis our ambition and our fame to please.

EPILOGUE TO THE APPRENTICE.

(Enters reading a Play-Bill.)

A VERY pretty bill---as I'm alive!
 The part of---nobody---by Mrs. Clive!
 A paltry scribbling fool---to leave me out---
 He'll say, perhaps---he thought I could not spont.
 Malice and envy to the last degree!
 And why?---I wrote a farce as well as he,
 And fairly ventur'd it---without the aid
 Of prologue dress'd in black, and face in maf-
 querade;
 Oh! pit---have pity---see how I'm dismay'd!
 Poor soul! this canting stuff will never do,
 Unless, like Bayes, he brings his hangman too.
 But granting that from these same obsequies,
 Some pickings to our bard in black arise;
 Should your applause to joy convert his fear,
 As Pallas turns to feast---Lardella's bier;
 Yet 'twould have been a better scheme by half.
 T' have thrown his weeds aside, and learnt with me to laugh,
 I could have shown him, had he been inclin'd,
 A spouting junto of the female kind.
 There dwells a milliner in yonder row,
 Well dress'd, full voic'd, and nobly built for show;
 N ij

Who, when in rage, she scolds at Sue and Sarah, ‘Damn’d, damn’d dissembler!’—thinks she more than Zara?

She has a daughter too that deals in lace,
And sings—O ponder well—and Chevy Chase,
And fain would fill the fair Ophelia’s place.
And in her cock’d up hat, and gown of camblet,
Presumes on something—‘touching the Lord
Hamlet.

A cousin too she has with squinting eyes,
With waddling gait, and voice like London cries;
Who for the stage too short by half a story,
Acts Lady Townly—thus—in all her glory.
And while she’s traversing her scanty room,
Cries—‘Lord! my lord, what can I do at home?’
In short, we’ve girls enough for all the fellows,
The rapturing, whining, starting, and the jealous,
The Hotspurs, Romeos, Hamlets, and Othellos.
Oh! little do those silly people know,
What dreadful trials—actors undergo.
Myself—who most in harmony delight,
Am scolding here from morning until night.
Then take advice from me, ye giddy things,
Ye royal milliners, ye apron’d kings;
Young men, beware, and shun our slippery ways,
Study arithmetic, and shun our plays;
And you, ye girls, let not our tinself train
Échant your eyes, and turn your madd’ning brain;
Be timely wise, for oh! be sure of this,
A shop with virtue, is the height of bliss.

EPILOGUE,

SPOKEN BY MR. SHUTER,

At Covent-Garden, after the Play of the “Conscious Lovers,” acted for the Benefit of the Middlesex Hospital for Lying-in Women, 1755, in the Character of a Man-Midwife.

(Enters with a Child.)

WHOE’ER begat thee has no cause to blush;
Thou’rt a brave chopping boy (child cries), nay,
hush, hush, hush!

A workman faith! a man of rare discretion,
A friend to Britain, and to our profession:
With face so chubby, and with looks so glad,
O rare roast beef of England!—here’s a lad!

(Shows him to the company.)

(Child makes a noise again.)

Nay, if you once begin to puke and cough,
Go to the nurse. Within!—here, take him off.
Well, Heav’n be prais’d, it is a peopling age,
Thanks to the bar, the pulpit, and the stage;
But not to th’ army— that’s not worth a farthing,
The captains go too much to Covent-Garden,
Spoil many a girl—but seldom make a mother;
They foil us one way—but we have them t’
other.

(Shakes a box of pills.)

The nation prospers by such joyous souls,
Hence smokes my table, hence my chariot rolls.
Though some snug jobs, from surgery may spring,
Man-midwifery, man-midwifery’s the thing!
Lean should I be, e’en as my own anatomy,
By mere cathartics and by plain phlebotomy.
Well, besides gain, besides the power to please,
Besides the music of such birds as these,

(Shakes a purse.)

It is a joy refin’d, unmix’d, and pure,
To hear the praises of the grateful poor.
This day comes honest Taffy to my house,
“Cot plefs her, her has sav’d her poy and spouse,
“Her sav’d her Gwinnifrid, or death had swal-low’d her,
“Though creat grand, creat grand child of “Cadwallader.”

Cries Patrick Toulz’em, “I am bound to pray,
“You’ve sav’d my Sue in your same physic way,
“And further shall I thank you yesterday.”
Then Sawney came, and thank’d me for my love
(I very readily excus’d his glove),
He blefs’d the mon, e’en by St. Andrew’s cross,
“Who cur’d his bonny bairn, and blithsome las.”
But merriment and mimicry apart,
Thanks to each bounteous hand and gen’rous
heart,

Of those, who tenderly take pity’s part;
Who in good-natur’d acts can sweetly grieve,
Swift to lament, but swifter to relieve.
Thanks to the lovely fair ones, types of heaven,
Who raise and beautify the bounty given;
But chief to * him in whom distrefs confides,
Who o’er this noble plan so gloriously presides.

DE ARTE CRITICA.

A Latin Version of Pope’s Essay on Criticism.

“Nec me animi fallit—

Difficile illustrare Latinis versibus esse
(Multa novis verbis præsertim cum sit agendum)
Propter egestatem linguæ, et rerum novitatem.”

LUCRET.

Dicitur difficile est, an sit dementia major
Egisse invitæ vatem criticumne Minervâ;
Ille tamen certe venia tibi dignior errat
Qui lassat, quam qui seducit in avia sensus.
Sunt, qui absurda canunt; sed enim stultissima
stultos:

Quam longe exuperat criticorum natio vates;
Se solum exhibuit quondam, melioribus annis
Natus hebes, ridendum; ac nunc musa improba proleto

Innumeram gignit, quæ mox sermone soluto
Æquipater stolidos versus, certetque stupendo.

Nobis judicium, veluti quæ dividit horas
Machina, construitur, motus non omnibus idem,
Non prætium, regit usque tamen sua quemque,
Poetas;

Divite perpaucos venâ donavit Apollo,
Est criticis recte sapere est rarissima virtus;
Arte in traque nitent felices indole solti,
Musaque quos placido nascentes lumine vidit.
Ille † alios melios, qui inclaruit ipse, docebit,
Jureque quam meruit, poterit tribuisse coronam.
Scriptores (fateor) fidunt propriæ nimis arti,
Nonne autem criticis pravus favor urget ibidem?
At vero proprius sitemus, cuique fatendum est,
Judicium † quoddam natura inleverit olim:

* The Earl, afterwards Duke of Northumberland.
† “Qui scribit artificioso, ab abliis commode scripta facile intelligere poterit.” Cic. ad Herenn.
b. 4.

† “Omnes tacito quodam sensu, sine ultâ arte, aut ratione, quæ sint in artibus ac rationibus recta
ac prava adjudicant.” Cic. de Orat. lib. 3.

Ilia diem certe dubiam diffundere callet
Et, strictim descripta licet, sibi linea constat.
Sed minimum ut specimen, quod pictor doctus
adumbrat,

Deterius tibi fiat co mage, quo mage vilem
Inducat isti fucum, sic mentis honestæ
Doctrina effigiem maculabit prava decoram.
His inter cæcæ mens illaqueata scholarum
Ambages errat, stolidisque supervenit illis
(Diis alter visum est) petulantia. Perdere sensum Communem hi sudant, dum frustra ascendere Pin-dum

Conantur, mox, ut se defensoribus ipsi
Utantur, critici quoque fiunt: omnibus idem
Ardor scribendi, studio hi rivalis aguntur,
Illis invalida eunuchi violentia gliscit.
Ridendi proprium est fatuis cacoethes, amantque
Turbæ perpetuo sese immiscere jocosa.
Mævius invito dum sudat Apolline, multi
Pinguè opus exuperant (si diis placet) emendando.

Sunt qui belli homines primo, tum deinde poetæ,
Mox critici evasere, meri tum denique stulti.
Est, qui nec criticum nec vatem reddit, inersque
Ut mulus, medium quoddam est asinum inter equumque

Bellula semi-hominum vix pœne elementa scientem
Primula gens horum est, premitur quibus Anglia, quantum

Imperfecta scitent ripis animalcula nili,
Futile, abortivum genus, et prope nominis experts,
Usque adeo æquivoca est, e qua generantur, origo.
Hos centum nequeunt linguæ numerare, nec una
Unius ex ipsis, quæ centum sola fatiget.

At tu qui famam simul exigis atque redohas
Pro meritis, criticique affectas nobile nomen.
Metitor te ipsam, prudensque expendito quæ sit
Judicii, ingenii tibi, doctrinæque facultas;
Si qua profunda nimis, cauto vitentor, et ista
Linea, quæ coeunt stupor ingeniumque, notator.
Qui finem imposuit rebus Deus omnibus aptum,
Humani vanum ingenii restrinxit acumen.
Qualis ubi oceani vis nostra irrupit in arva,
Tunc defolatas alibi denudat arenas;
Sic animæ reminiscendi dum copia restat,
Consilii gravioris abest plerumque potestas;
Ast ubi Phantasiæ fulgent radiantia tela,
Mnemosyne teneris cum formis victa liquefcit.
Ingenio tantum musa uni sufficit una,
Tanta ars est, tantilla scientia nostra videtur:
Non solum ad certas artes stricta sequendas,
Sæpe has non nisi quâdam in simplice parte sequa-
tur.

Deperdas partos utcunque labore triumphos,
Dum plures, regum instar, aves acquirere lauros;
Sed sua tractatu facilis provincia cuique est,
Si non, quæ pulchre sciat, ut vulgaris, tenuat.

Naturam sequere imprimis, atque illius æquâ
Judicium ex normâ singas, quæ nescia slecti:
Illatenim, sine labe micans, ab origine divâ,
Clarâ, constanti, lustratque omnia luce,
Vitamque, speciemque, et vires omnibus addat,
Et fons, et finis simul, atque criterion artis.
Quærit opes ex hoc thesauro ars, et sine pompâ
Præsidet, et nullas turbas facit inter agendum.
Talis, vivida vis formoso in corpore mentis,
Lætium toti inspirans et robore massæ,
Ordinat et motus, et nervos sustinet omnes,
Inter opus varium tamen ipsa abscondita fallit.

Sæpe is, cui magnum ingenium Deus addidit, idem
Indigus est majoris, ut hoc bene calleat uti;
Ingenium nam iudicio velut uxor habendum est
Atque viro, cui fas ut pareat usque repugnat.
Musæ quadrupedum labor est inhibere capistro,
Præcipientes regere, at non irritare volatus
Pegasos, instar equi generosi, grandior ardet
Cum sentit retinacula, nobiliorque tutur.

Regula quæque vetus tantum observata peritis
Non iuventa fuit criticis, debetque profecto
Naturæ ascribi, sed enim quam lima polivit;
Nullas naturæ divina monarchia leges,
Exceptis solum quas sanxerit ipsa, veretur.

Qualibus, audistim' resonat celeberrima normis
Græcia, seu doctum premit, indulgetve furorem?
Illa suos sistit Parnassi in vertice natos,
Et, quibus ascendere docet, salebrosa viarum,
Sublimique manu dona immortalia monstrat,
Atque æquis reliquis procedere passibus urget.
Sic magnis doctrina * ex exemplaribus haustâ,
Sumit ab hisce, quod hæc duxerunt ab Jove summe.
Ingenium judex musarum ventilat ignes,
Et fretus ratione docet præcepta placendi.

Ars critica officiosa Camœnæ servit, et ornat
Egregias veneres, pluresque irretit amantes.
Nunc vero docti longè diversa sequentes,
Contempti dominæ, vilem petiere ministram;
Propriaque in miseros veterum tela poetas,
Discipuli que suos pro more odere magistros.
Haud aliter sanè nostrates pharmacopolæ
Ex medicum crevit quibus ars plagiarum chartis,
Audaces errorum adhibent sine mente medelas,
Et veræ Hippocratis jactant convicia proli.
Hi veterum authorum scriptis vescuntur, et ipsos
Vermiculos, et tempus edax vicere vorando.
Stultitiâ simplex ille, et sine divite venâ,
Carnina quo fiant pacto miserabile narrat.
Doctrinam ostentans, mentem alter perdidit omnem

Atque alteri nodis vafer implicat enodando.

Tu quicumque cupis iudex procedere rectè,
Fac veteris cuiusque stylus discatur ad unguem;
Fabula, materies, quo tendat pagina quævis;
Patria, religio quæ sint, quæis moribus ævum;
Si non intuitu cuncta hæc complecteris uno,
Scurra, cavilator—criticus mihi non eris unquam.
Illas esto tibi studium, tibi sola voluptas,
Perque diem lege, per noctes meditare serenas;
Hinc tibi iudicium, hinc ortum sententia ducat,
Musarumquæ undas fontem bibe letus ad ipsum.
Ipse suorum operum sit commentator, et author,
Mæonidifve legas interprete scripta Marone.

† Cum caneret primum parvus Maro bella virosque,

Nec monitor Phœbus tremulas jam velleret aures,
Legibus immutem criticis se forte putabat,
Nil nisi naturam archetypam dignatus adire:
Sed simul ac caute mentem per singula volvit,
Nunc invenit, quacunque invenit Homerum.
Victus, et attonitus, malefani desinit auri,
Jamque laboratum in numerum vigil omnia cogit,

* "Nec enim artibus editis factum est ut argu-
menta inveniremus, sed dicta sunt omnia antequam preciperentur, mox ea scriptores observata et collecta ediderunt.

QUINTIL.
† "Cum canerem Reges et Prælia, Cythius aurem—Vellit."
VIRG. Ecl. 6.

Cultaque Aristotelis metitur carmina normâ.
Hinc veterum difcas præcepta veterier, illos
Secdator sic naturam sectaberis ipsam.

At vero virtus restat jam plurima, nullo
Describenda modo, nullaque parabilis arte,
Nam felix tam fortuna est, quam cura canendi.
Muscam in hoc reddidit divina poesis, utramque
Multæ orant veneres quas verbis pingere non est,
Quafque attingere nil nisi summa peritia possit.
* Regula quâocumque minus diffusa videtur, (Quum tantum ad propriam collinet singula metam)

Si modo consiliis inferviat ulla juvandis
Apta licentia, lex enim ista licentia fiat.
Atque ita quo citius procedat, calle relicto
Communi musæ sounipes bene devius erret.
Accidit interdum, ut scriptores ingenium ingens
Evehat ad culpam egregiam, maculasque micantes
Quas nemo criticorum audet detergere figat;
Accidit ut linquat vulgaria claustra furore
Magnanimo, rapiatque solum lege decorcm,
Qui, quum iudicium non intercedat, ad ipsum
Cor properat, sineque illic simul obtinet omnes.
Haud aliter si forte jugo specularum aprico,
Luminibus res arident, quas Dædella tellus
Parciore ostentare solet, velut ardua montis
Asperitas, scopulive exili pendulus horror.
Cura tamen semper magna est adhibenda poesi,
Atque hic cum ratione insaniat auctor, oportet:
Et, quamvis veteres pro tempore jura resigunt,
Et leges violare suas regaliter audent,
Tu caveas, moneo, quisquis nunc scribis, et ipsam
Tu legem frangas, memor ejus respice finem.
Hoc semper tamen evites, nisi te gravis urget
Nodus, præmonstrantque authorum exempla prio-
rum.

Ni facias, criticus totam implacabilis iram
Exerret, turpique notâ tibi nomen inurit.
Sed non me latuere, quibus sua liberiores
Has veterum veneres vitio dementia vertit.
Et quædam tibi signa quidem monstrosa videntur,
Si per se vel perpendas, propiorave lufures,
Quæ rectâ cum constitutas in luce loquoque,
Formam conciliat distantia justa venustam.
Non aciem semper belli dux callidus artis
Instruit æquali serie ordinibusque decoris,
Sed se temporibusque loquoque accommodat, agmen
Celando jam, jamque fugæ simulachra ciendo.
Mentitur speciem erroris sæpe astus, et ipse
Somnia emunctus iudex, non dormit Homerus.
Aspic, laurus adhuc antiquis vernat in aris,
Quas rabida violare manus non amplius audent;
Flammæ arum a rabie tetas, Stygiæque veneno
Invidiæ, martisque minis et moribus ævi.
Docta caterva, viden! fert ut fragrantia thura;
Audin ut omnigenis resonant præconia linguis!
Laudes usque adeo meritis vox quæque rependat,
Humanique simul generis chorus omnis adesto.
Salvere, O vates! nati melioribus annis,
Munus et immortale æternæ laudis adepti!
Queis juvenescit honos longo maturior ævo,

* "Neque tam sancta sunt ista præcepta, sed hoc quicquid est, utilitas excogitavit; non negabo autem, sic utile est plerumque; verum si eadem illa nobis aliud suadebit utilitas, hanc, relictis magistrorum auctoritatibus, sequemur.

QUINT. lib. 2. cap. 13.

Ditior ut diffundit aquas, dum defluit annis!
Vos populi mundique canent, sacra nomnia, quos jam

Inventrix (sic diis visum est) non contigit ætas!
Pars aliqua, o utinam! sacro scintillet ab igne
Illi, qui vestra est extrema et humillima proles!
(Qui longe sequitur vos debilioribus alis
Lector magnanimus, sed enim, sed scriptor inaudax)

* Sic critici vani, me præcipiente, priores
Mirari, arbitrioque suo dissidere discant.

Omnibus ex causis, quæ animum corrumpere junctis

Viribus, humanoque solent obtundere acumen,
Pinguè caput solita est momento impellere summo
Stultitiæ semper cognata superbia; quantum
Mentis nascenti fata invadere, profuso
Tantum subsidio factus superaddere gaudent;
Nam veluti in membris, sic sæpe animabus, inanè
Exundant vice * spirituum, vice sanguinis auræ
Suppetias inopi venit alma superbia menti,
Atque per immensum capitis se extendit inane!
Quod si recta valent ratio hanc dispergere nubem
Naturæ verique dies sincera refulget.

Cuicunque est animus penitus cognoscere culpas,
Nec sibi, nec sociis credat, verum omnibus aurem
Commодet, apponatque inimica opprobria lucro.

Ne musæ invigiles mediocriter, aut fuge fon-tem

Castalium omnino, aut haustu te prole pleno:
Istius laticis tibi mens abstemia torpet
Ebria, sobrietasque redit revocata bibendo.
Intuitu musæ primo, novitateque capta
Aspirat doctrinæ ad culmina summa juvenus
Intrepida, et quoniam tunc mens est arcta, suoque
Omnia, metiur modulo, malè lippa labores
Ponè secuturos oculis non aspicit æquis:
Mox autem attonitæ jam jamque scientia menti
Crebrescit variata modis sine limite miris!
Sic ubi desertis descendere vallibus Alpes
Aggredimur, nubesque humiles calcare videmur,
Protinus æternas superasse nives, et in ipso
Invicisse viæ lætamur limine finem:
His vero exactis tacito terrore stupemus
Durum crescentem magis et magis usque laborem,
Jam longus tandem prospectus læsâ fagitat
Lumina, dam colles assurgunt undique sæti
Collibus, impositæque emergunt Alpibus Alpes.

† Ingeniosa leget iudex perfectus eadè
Quâ vates scripsit studiosus opuscula curâ,
Totum perpendet, consorquet est parcus, ubi ardor
Exagitat naturæ animos et concitat æstrum;
Nec tam fervili generosa libidine mutet
Gaudia, quæ bibule menti catus ingerit auctor.
Verum stagnantis mediocria carmina musæ,
Quæ reptant sub limâ et certâ lege stupefunt,
Quæ torpent uno erroris securâ tenore,
Hæc equidem nequeo culpâre---et dormio tantum.
Ingenii, veluti naturæ, non tibi constant
Illecebæ forniâ quæ certis partibus infit;
Nam te non reddit labiumve oculusve venustum,
Sed charitum cûmulus, collectaque tela decoris.

* Animalium scilicet.

† "Diligenter legendum est, ac pene ad scribendi sollicitudinem; nec per partes modo scrutanda sunt omnia; sed perfectus liber utique ex integro resumendus."

QUINTIL.

Sic ubi lustramus perfectam insignitè ædem, (Quæ Romam splendore, ipsumque ita percudit orberem).

Læta diu nosi ullâ insimplice parte morantur
Lumina, sed sese per totum errantia pascunt;
Nil longum latumve nimis, nil altius æquo
Cernitur, illustris nitore omnibus, omnibus ordo.

Quod consummatum est opus omni ex parte, nec
usquam

Nunc existat, nec eras, nec erit labentibus annis.
Quas sibi proponat metas adverte, poeta
Ultra aliquid sperare, illas si absolvat, iniquum est;
Si recta ratione utatur, consilioque
Perfecto, missis maculis, vos plaudite clamo.
Accidit, ut vates, veluti vaser Aulicus, erret
Scopius errorem, ut vitet graviora, minorem.
Neglige, quas criticus, verborum fatilis anceps,
Leges edicit: nugas nescire decorum est.
Artis cuiusdam tantum auxiliaris amantes
Partem aliquam plerique colunt vice totius; illi
Multa crepant de iudicio, nihilominus istam
Stultitiam, sua quam sententia laudat, adorant.

Quixotus quondam, si vera est fabula, cuidam
Occurrens vati, criticum certamen inivit Docta citans, graviterque tuens, tanquam arbiter alter

Dennisus, Graii moderatis fræna theatri;
Acriter id dein affectuit, stultum esse hebentemque,
Quisquis Aristotelis posset contemnere leges.
Quid?—talem comitem nactus felicitèr author,
Mox tragicum, quod composuit, proferre poema
Incipit, et critici scitari oracula tanti.

Jam *μυθε, τα παθη, τ' αθη περιβληρα λυρις*que et Cætera de genere hoc equi describat hianti
Quæ cuncta ad normam quadrarent, inter agendum
Si tantum prudens certamen omitteret author.

“ Quid vero certamen omittes? excipit heros;
Sic venerando Sophi suadent documenta. “ Quid
ergo, [oportet,

Armigerumque equitumque cohors scenam intret,
Foras, at ipsa capax non tantæ scena catervæ est:
“ Edificave allam—vel apertes utere campis.”

Sic ubi supposito morosa superbia regnat
Judicio, criticæque tenent fastidia curæ
Vana locum, curto modulo æstimat omnia censor,
Atque modo perverfus in artibus errat eodem,
Moribus, ac multi, dum parte laborat in unâ.

Sunt, qui nil sapiant, salibus nisi quæque redun-
dec

Pagina, perpetuoque nitet distincta lepore,
Nil aptum soliti iustumve requirere, latè
Si micet ingenii chaos, indiscretæque moles.
Nudas naturæ veneres, vivumque decorem
Fingere, qui nequeunt, quorundam exempla secuti
Pictorum, haud gemmis parcunt, haud sumptibus
auri,

Ut sese abscondat rutilis inscitia velis.
Vis veri ingenii * natura est cultior, id quod
Senserunt multi, sed jam scite exprimit unus,
Quod primo pulchrum intuitu, restitumque videtur
Et mentis menti simulachra repercutit ipsi.
Haud secus ac lucem commendant suaviter umbræ,
Ingenuo sic simplicitas superaddit honorem:

* “ Naturam intueamur, hanc sequamur; id facillime accipiunt animi quod agnoscunt.”

QUINTIL. lib. 8. cap. 3.

Nam fieri possit misa ingeniosior æquo,
Et pereant tumida nimio tibi sanguine venæ.

Nonnulli vero verborum in cortice ludunt,
Ornatusque libri solos muliebriter ardent. Iis
Egregium ecce! stylum clamant: sed semper ocel-
Prætereunt malè, si quid inest rationis, inunctis.

Verba, velut frondes, nimio cum tegmine opacant
Ramos, torpescunt mentis sine germine. Prava
Rhetorice, vitri latè radiantis ad instar
Primitivici, rutilos diffundit ubique colores;
Non tibi naturæ licet amplius ora tueri;
At malè discretis scintillant omnia flammis
Sed contra veluti jubar immutabile solis,

Quicquid contractat facundia, lustrat et auget,
Nil variat, sed cuncta oculo splendoris inaurat.
Elòquium mentis nostræ quasi vestis habenda est;

Quæ si sit satis apta, decentior inde videtur;
Scommata magnificis ornata procacia verbis
Indutos referunt regalia symmata fannos;
Diversis etenim diversa vocabula rebus
Appingi fas est, aulæ velut aulica vestis,
Alteraque agricolis, atque altera congruit urbi.
Quidam scriptores * antiquas vocibus usi,
Gloriolam affectant, veterum æmula turba sonos-
rum,

Si mentem spectes juvenentur more recentum.
Tantula nugamenta styloque operosa vetusto,
Docti derident soli placitura popello.

Hi nihilo magè felices quam comicus iste
Fungo †, ostentat absurdo pepla tumore,
Qualia nescio quis gestavit nobilis olim;

Atque modo veteres doctos imitantur eodem,
Ac hominem veteri in tunica dum simia ludit.
Verba, velut mores, a justis legibus errant,

Si nimium antiquæ fuerint, nimiumve novatæ;
Tu cave ne tentes infusa vocabula primus,
Nec vetera abjicias postremus nomina rerum.

† Lævian asper eat versus plerique requirunt
Censores, soloque sonos damnantive probantive;
Mille licet veneres formosam Pierin ornent,
Stultitiâ vox argutâ celebrabitur una:

Qui juga Parnassi non ut mala corda repurgent,
Auribus ut placeant, visunt: sic sæpe profanos
Impulit ad resonum pietas aurita facellum.
His solum criticis semper par syllaba cordi est;
Vastu est usque omnis † pateat vocalis hiatus;

* “ Abolita et abrogata retinere, insolentia cu-jusdam est, et irivolæ in parvis jactantia.”

QUINTIL. lib. 1. cap. 6.

“ Opus est ut verba a vetustate repetita neque cæbra sint, neque manifesta; quia nil est odiosius affectatione, nec utique ab ultimis repetita temporibus. Oratio, cujus summa virtus est perspicuitas; quam si vitiosa, si egeat interprete? Ergo ut novorum optima erunt maxime vetera, ira veterum maxime nova.”

IBID.

† Ben Jonson's Every Man in his Humour.

‡ “ Quis populi sermo est? quis enim? nisi carmine molli

Nunc demum numero fluere ut per læve severos
Effugit junctura unguis; scit tendere versum,
Nec secus ac si oculo rubricam dirigat uno.”

PERSIUS, sat. 1.

§ “ Fugemus crebras vocalium confusiones,
quæ vastam atque hiantem orationem reddunt.”

CIC. AD HERENN. lib. 4.

N IIIJ

Expletivæque sæpe suas quoque suppetias dent,
Ac verum unum oneret levium heu! decas en!
pigna vocum;

Dum non mutato resonant malè cymbala planctu,
Atque augur miser usque scio, quid deinde sequatur.

Quæcumque aspirat clementior aura Fanovi,
Mox (nullus dubito) graciles vibrantur aristæ,
Rivulus ut molli serpit per lævia lapsu, [nos.
Lector, non temerè expectes, post murmura, som-
Tum demum qua latè extremum ad distichon, ipsa
Magnificum sine mente nihil, Sententia splendet.
Segnis Hypermeter, audin? adest, et claudicat, instat

Anguis faucia terga trahentis, prorepentisque.
Hi proprias stupeant nugas, tu discere tentes,
Quæ tereti properant venâ, vel amabilè languent
Istaque fac laudes, ubi vivida Denhamii vis
Walleriæ condita fluit dulcedine musæ.

Scribendi numerosa facultas provenit arte,
Ut soli incessu faciles fluitare videntur,
Plectro morigeros qui callet fingere gressus.

Nôn solum asperitas teneras cave verberet anres,
Sed vox quæque expressa tuæ sit mentis imago.

Lenè edat Zephyrus suspiria blanda, politis
Lævius in numeris labatur læve fluentum;

At reboat, furit, estuat æmula musa sonoris
Littoribus cum rauca horrendum impingitur unda.

Quando est faxum Ajax vastâ vi volvere adortus,
Tardè incedat versus, multum perque laborem.

Non ita sive Camilla cito falis æquora rasit,
Sive levis levitèrque terit, neque flectit aristas.

Audin! Timothei * cœlestia carmina, menti
Dulcibus alloquiis varios suadentia motus!

Audin! ut alternis Lybici Juvis inclyta proles
Nunc ardet famam, solos nunc spirat amores,
Lumina nunc vivis radiantia volvere flammis,
Mox furtim suspiria, mox effundere fletum!

Dum Persæ, Græcique pares sentire tumultus
Discunt, victricemque lyram rex orbis adorat.

Musica quid poterit corda ipsa fatentur, et audit
Timotheus nostras merita cum laude Drydenus.

Tu fervare modum studeas benè cautus, et iitos
Quæis aut nil placuisse potest, aut omnia, vites.

Exiguas naso maculas suspendere noli,
Namque patent nullo stupor atque superbia mentis
Clariùs indicio; neque mens est optima certè,
Nôn secus ac stomachus, quæcumque recusat et odit
Omnia, difficilisque nihil tibi concoquit unquam.
Non tamen idcirco vegeti vis ulla leporis
Te tibi surripiat; mirari mentis ineptæ est,
Prudentis vero tantum optima quæque probare.
Majores res apparent per nubila visæ,
Atque ita luminibus stupor ampliat omnia densis.

His Galli minus arident, illisque poetæ
Nostrates, hodiemi aliis, aliisque vetusti.

Sic † fidei simile, ingenium sectæ arrogat uni
Quisque suæ; solis patet illis janua cœli

Scilicet, inque malam rem cætera turba jumentur.
Frustra autem immensis cupiunt imponere metam
Muneribus Divium, atque illius tela coarctant
Solis hyperboræas etiam qui temperat auras,
Nôn solum australes genius fecundat et auget.

His Galli minus arident, illisque poetæ
Nostrates, hodiemi aliis, aliisque vetusti.

Sic † fidei simile, ingenium sectæ arrogat uni
Quisque suæ; solis patet illis janua cœli

Scilicet, inque malam rem cætera turba jumentur.
Frustra autem immensis cupiunt imponere metam
Muneribus Divium, atque illius tela coarctant
Solis hyperboræas etiam qui temperat auras,
Nôn solum australes genius fecundat et auget.

His Galli minus arident, illisque poetæ
Nostrates, hodiemi aliis, aliisque vetusti.

Sic † fidei simile, ingenium sectæ arrogat uni
Quisque suæ; solis patet illis janua cœli

Scilicet, inque malam rem cætera turba jumentur.
Frustra autem immensis cupiunt imponere metam
Muneribus Divium, atque illius tela coarctant
Solis hyperboræas etiam qui temperat auras,
Nôn solum australes genius fecundat et auget.

His Galli minus arident, illisque poetæ
Nostrates, hodiemi aliis, aliisque vetusti.

Sic † fidei simile, ingenium sectæ arrogat uni
Quisque suæ; solis patet illis janua cœli

Scilicet, inque malam rem cætera turba jumentur.
Frustra autem immensis cupiunt imponere metam
Muneribus Divium, atque illius tela coarctant
Solis hyperboræas etiam qui temperat auras,
Nôn solum australes genius fecundat et auget.

His Galli minus arident, illisque poetæ
Nostrates, hodiemi aliis, aliisque vetusti.

Sic † fidei simile, ingenium sectæ arrogat uni
Quisque suæ; solis patet illis janua cœli

Qui primis latè sua lumina sparsit ab annis,
Illustrat præsens, summumque accenderet ævum.
(Cuique vices variæ tamen: et jam secula fœclis Succedunt, pejora, et jam meliora peractis)

Pro meritis musam laudare memento, nec unquam
Neglige quod novitas distinguit, quodve vetustas.

Sunt qui nil proprium in mædium proferre suerunt,

Judiciumque suum credunt popularibus auris;
Tum vulgi quò exempla trahunt retrahuntque sequuntur,

Tolluntque expositas latè per compita nugas.
Turba alia authorum titulos et nomina dicit
Scriptorefque ipsos, non scripta examinat. Horum
Pessimus iste cluet, si quem servilitèr ipsos
Visere magnates stupor ambitiosus adegit.

Qui critice ad mensem domino ancillatur inepto;
Futiles ardelio, semper referensque ferensque
Nuntia nugarum. Quam pinguis, quam male nata
Carmina censentur, quæcumque ego fortè vel ullus
Pangere Apollinæ tentat faber improbus artis!

At quis vero, siquis vir magnus adopter
Felicem musam, quantus nitor ecce! venusque
Ingenio accidit! quam prodigialitèr acer
Fit stulto stylus! omnigenam venerabile nomen
Prætexit sacris culpam radiis, et ubique
Carmina culta nitent, et pagina parturit omnis.

Stultula plebs doctos studiosa imitari errat,
Ut docti nullos imitando sæpius ipsi;

Qui, si forte unquam plebs rectum viderit, (illis Tanto turba odio est) consultò lumina claudunt.

Talis schismaticus Christi, grege sæpe relicto,
Cœlos ingenii pro laude pascificitur ipsos.

Non desunt quibus incertum mutatur in horas
Judicium, sed semper eos sententia ducit
Ultima palantes. Illis miseranda camæna
More meretricis tractatur, nunc Dea certè,
Nunc audit vilis lupa: dum præpingue cerebrum,
Debilis et male munitæ statione ad instat,
Jam recti, jam stultitiæ pro partibus astat.
Si causam rogitas, aliquis tibi dicat eundo
Quisique dies teneræ præbet nova pabula menti,
Et sapimus magis atque magis. Nos docta propago

Scilicet et sapiens proavos contemnimus omnes,
Heu! pariter nostris temnenda nepotibus olim.

Quondam per nostrum dum turba scholastica fines
Regnavit, si qui quam plurima clausula semper
In promptu, ille inter doctissimus audiit omnes;
Religiosa fides simul ac sacra omnia nasci
Sunt visa in litem; sapuit sat nemo reselli
Ut se sit passus. Jam gens insulsa Scotiæ,
Intactique abaci Thomistæ pace fruentes
Inter araneolos pandunt sua retia fratres.
Ipsa fides igitur cum sit variata, quid ergo,
Quid mirum ingenium quoque sevaria induat ora?
Naturæ verique relicti sinibus amens
Sæpius insanire parat popularitèr author,
Expectatque sibi vitalem hoc nomine famam,
Suppetit usque suas plebi quia risus ineptæ.

Hic solitus propriâ metitèr omnia normâ,
Solos, qui secum sunt mente et partibus isdem
Approbat, ac vanos virtuti reddit honores,
Cui tantum sibi larvata superbia plaudit.
Partium in ingenio studium quoque regnat aut
aulâ,

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

Seditioque auget privatas publica rixas.

* Alexander's Feast, or the Power of Music; an ode by Mr. Dryden.

† Christianæ scilicet.

Drydeno obstabant odium atque superbia nuper
Et stupor omnigenæ latitans sub imagine formæ,
Nunc criticus, nunc bellus homo, mox deinde sacerdos:

Attamen ingenium, joca cum siluere, superstes
Vivit adhuc, namque olim utcunque sepulta profundis

Pulchrior emerget tenebris tamen inclyta virtus.
Milibourni, rursus si fas foret ora tueri,
Blackmorique novi deducem insequeruntur; Homerus

Ipsæ etiam erigeret vultus si forte verendos
Zoilus ex orco gressus revocaret. Ubique
Virtuti malus, umbra velut nigra livor adhæret,
Sed verum ex vanâ corpus cognoscitur umbrâ.

Ingenium, solis viâ deficient ad instar
Invisum, oppositi tenebras tantum arguit orbis,
Dum claro intemerata manent sua lumina divo.
Sol prodit cum primum, atque intolerabile fulget
Attrahit obscuros flammâ magnetæ vapores;
Mox vero pingunt etiam invidia nubila callem
Multa coloratum, et crescentia nubila spargunt
Uberius, geminoque dic viridaria donant.

Tu primus meritis plaudas, a nihil ipse meretur
Qui serus laudator adest. Brevis heu! brevis ævi
Participes nostri vates celebrantur, et æquum est
Angustam quam primum affuecunt degere vitam.
Aurea nimirum jamdudum evanuit ætas,
Cum vates patriarchæ extabant mille per annos:
Jam spes deperit nobis vita altera, famæ,
Nostraque marcescit sexagenaria laurus!
Aspicimus nati patriæ dispendia linguæ,
Et vestris Chaucer, olim gestanda Drydena est.
Sic ubi parturit mens divas imagine multâ
Pictori, calamoque interprete cœpit acuti
Concilium cerebri narrare coloribus aptis,
Protinus ad nutum novus emicat orbis, et ipsa
Evolvit manus sese natura difertæ;
Dulcia cum molles cocunt in fœdera fuci
Tandem maturi, liquidamque decenter obumbrant

Admissis lucem tenebris, et euntibus annis
Quando opus ad summum perductum est culmen, et audent

Et vivâ formæ extantes spirare tabellâ:
Perfidus heu! pulchram color ævo prodidit artem,
Egregiusque decor jam nunc fuit omnis, et urbes,
Et fluvii, pictique homines, terræque fuerunt!

Heu! dos ingenii, veluti quodcumque furore
Cæco prosequimur, nihil unquam muneris adfert,
Quod redimat comitem invidiam! juvenilibus
annis

Nil nisi inane sophos jactamus, et est, voluptas
Vana, brevis, momento evanuit alitis horæ!
Flos veluti veris peperit quem prima juvenus,
Ille viret, peritque virens sine falce caducus.

Quid verò ingenium est quæso? Quid ut illius ergo

Tantum insudemus! nonne est tibi perfida conjux
Quam dominus vestis, vicinia tota potita est;
Quo placuisse magis nobis fors obtigit, inde
Nata magis cura est. Quid enim? crescentibus almæ

Musæ muneribus populi spes crescit avari.
Laus ipsa acquiri est operosa, et lubrica labi;
Quin quosdam irritare necesse est: omnibus autem

Nequaquam fecisse satis datur: ingeniumque
Expallet vitium, devitat conscia virtus,
Stulti omnes oderè, seclési perdere gaudent.

Quando adeo insectam sese ignorantia præstet,
Abiit, ut ingenium bello doctrina læscat!
Præmia proposuit meritis olim æqua vetustas,
Et sua laus etiam conatos magno secuta est;
Quamquam etenim fortis dux solus ovabat, at ipsis

Militibus crines pulchræ impedire corollæ.
At tunc qui bifidi superarunt improba montis
Culmina, certatim socios detrudere tentant;
Scriptorem, quid enim! dum quemque philantia
ducit

Zeletypum, instaurant certamina mutua vates,
Et sese alterni stultis ludibria præbent.
Fert agrè alterius, qui pessimus audit honores,
Improbis improbuli vice fungitur author amici;
En fœdis quam fœda viis mortalia corda
Cogit persequier famæ malefuda libido!
Ah! ne gloriolæ usque adeo fitis impia regnet,
Nec critici affectans, hominis simul exue nomen:
Sed candor cum judicio conjuret amicè,
Peccare est hominum, peccanti ignoscere, divum.

At vero si cui ingenio præcordia bilis
Non despumatæ fatis acri face laborant,
In scelera accensas pejora exerceat iras,
Nil dubitet, seget præbent hæc tempora largam.
Obscæno detur nulla indulgentia vati,
Ars licet ingenio superaddita cerea flecti
Pectora pelliciat. Verum, hercule, juncta stupori

Scripta impura pari vano molimine profus
Invalidam æquiparant eunuchi turpis amorem.
Tunc ubi regnavit dives cum pace voluptas
In nostris flos iste molus caput extulit oris.
Tunc ubi rex facilis viguit, qui semper amore,
Consiliis raro, nunquam se exercuit armis:
Scripterunt mimos proceres, meretricibus aulæ
Successit regimen; nec non magnatibus ipsis
Assuit ingenium, stipendiaque ingeniosis.
Patriæ in scenis spectavit opuscula musæ
Multa nurus, lasciva tuens, atque auribus hausit
Omnia larvato securâ modestia vultu.
Machina, virginibus quæ ventilat ora, pudicum
Dedit clausa officium, ad ludicra cachinnus
Increpuit, rubor ingenius nihil amplius arsit.
Deinde ex externo traducta licentia regno
Audacis fœces Socini absorbit ima,
Sacriligique sacerdotes tum quemque docebant
Conati officere, ut gratis paradison adiret:
Ut populus patriæ cum libertate sacris
Asserent sua jura locis, ne scilicet unquam
(Crediderim) Omnipotens foret ipse potentior æquo.

Templa sacram satiram jam tum violata filebant:
Et laudes vitii, vitio mirante, sonabant!
Accensi hinc musæ Titanes ad astra ruerunt,
Legeque sanctum quassit blasphemiam prælum.—
Hæc monstra, O critici, contra hæc convertite telum,

Huc fulmen, tonitruque styli torquete severi,
Et penitus totum obnixi exonerate furorem!
At tales fugias, qui, non sine fraude severi,
Scripta malam in partem, livore interprete, ver-
tunt;

Pravis omnia prava videntur, ut omnia passim

Ictericus propria ferrugine tingit ocellus.

Jam mores critici proprios, adverte, docebo ;
Dimidia etenim est tibi sola scientia virtus.
Non fatis est ars, ingenium, doctrinaque vires
Quæque fuas jungant, si non quoque candor honestis,

Et veri sincerus amor sermonibus insit.

Sic tibi non solum quisque amplius solvet honores,
Sed te, qui criticum probat, exoptabit amicum.

Mutus, quando animus dubius tibi fluctuat, esto ;
Sin tibi confidis, dictis confide prudenter.
Quidam hebetes semper perstant erroribus ; at tu
Præteritas lætas culpas fateare, dies que
Quisque dies redimat, criticoque examine tentet.

Hoc tibi non fatis est, verum, quod præcipis,
esse,

Veridici mala rusticitas magè sæpe molesta est
Auribus, ingenuam quam verba ferentia fraudem ;
Non ut præceptor, cave des procepta, reique
Ignaros, tanquam inmemores, catus instrue :

Ipse placet, si non careat candore, nec ullos
Judicium, urbanis quod fulget moribus, urit.

Tu nulli videas monitus, rationis avarus
Si sis, præ reliquis fordes miserandus avaris.
Ne vili obsequio criticorum jura refugas,
Nec ser judicium nimis officiosus iniquum ;
Prudentem haud irritabis (ne finge) monendo,
Qui laude est dignus patiens culpabitur idem.

Consultum melius criticis foret, illa maneret
Si nunc culpandi libertas. Appius autem,
Ecce ! rubet, quoties loqueris, torvoque tremendus

Intuitu, reddit sævi trucia ora gigantis
Jam picta in veteri magè formidanda tapete.
Fac mitas tumidum tituloque et stemmate stultum,

Cui quædam est data jure licentia sæpe stupendi ;
Tales et libitum vates absque indole, eadem.
Quæ sine doctrinâ doctores lege creantur.
Contemptis prudens fatiris res lingue tacendas,
Assentatorumque in amien exercat artem,
Nominibus libros magnis gens gnara dicandi ;
Quæ cum mendaci laudes effusit ore,
Non magne credenda est, quam quando perjerat olim

Non iteram pingues unquam conscribere versus.
Non raro est satius bilem cohibere fuscas,
Humanusque sinas habetem sibi plaudere : prudens
Hic taceas moneo, nihil indignatio prodest,
Fessus eris culpando, ea gens haud festiva canendo :
Nam temens stultulos, tandem cum murmure cursum

Continuat, donec jam tandem, turbinis instar
Vapulet in torporem, et semper eundo quiescat.
Talibus ex lapsu vis est reparata frequenti,
Ut tardi citubata urgent vestigia mani.
Horum pleraque pars, cui nulla amentia desit,
Tinnitu numerorum et amore fenescit inani,
Festat difficili carmen deducere venâ,
Donec inexhausto restat fax ulla cerebro,
Reliquias stillat vix expressa male mentis,
Et miseram invalidâ exercet prurigine musam.

Sunt nobis vates hoc de grege, sed tamen idem
Affirmo, criticorum ejusdem fortis abande est.
Helluo librorum, qui sudat, hebetque legendo,
Cui mens nugarum doctâ sarragine turget.

Attentas propriae voci malè recreat aures,
Auditorque sibi solus miser ipse videtur.
Ille omnes legit authores, omnesque læcessit
Durscio infestus pariter magnoque Drydeno.
Judice sub tali semper furatur, emitve
Quisque suum bonus author opus : non Garthius (illi

Si credas) proprium contextuit ipse poema.
In scenis nova si cœmædia agatur, "amicus
" Hujus scriptor (ait) meus est, cui non ego
" paucas

" Ostendi maculas, sed mens est nulla poetis."
Non locus est tam sanctus, ut hunc expellere possit,
Nec templa in tuto est, plusquam via ; quin pete sacrâs

Aufugiens aras, et ad aras iste sequetur
Occidetque loquendo ; etenim stultus ruet ultro
Nil metuens, ubi ferre pedem vix angelus audet.
Diffidit sibi nec sapientia cantâ, brevesque
Excursus tentans in se sua lumina vertit ;
Stultitia at præceps violento vortice currit
Non unquam tremefacta, nec unquam è tramite
cedens,

Flumine fulmineo se totam invidiâ profundit.
Tu vero quisnam es monita instillare peritus,
Qui, quod scis, lætas monstras, neque scire superbis,

Non odio ductus pravove favore, nec ulli
Addictus scæ, ut pecces, neque cæcus, ut erres ;
Doctus, at urbanus, sincerus, at æsticus idem,
Adactèrque pudens mediâque humanus in irâ.
Qui nunquam dubites vel amico ostendere culpas,
Et celebres inimicum haud parçâ laude merentem.
Furgato ingenio felix, sed et infinito,
Et quod librorumque hominumque scientia dicit ;
Colloquium cui come, animus summissus et in-gens,

Laudandique omnes, ratio cum præcipit, ardor !
Tales exiterunt critici, quos Græcia quondam
Romaque mirata est natos melioribus annis.
Primus Aristoteles est ausus solvere navem,
Atque datis velis vastum explorare profundum.
Tutus it longèque ignotas attingit oras
Lunina Mæonia observans radiantia stellæ.
Jam vates, gens illi, diu quæ lege soluta est,
Et sæva capta est malè libertatis amore,
Lætantes dominum accipiunt, atque omnis eodem
Qui domuit naturam, exultat præside musa.

Nusquam non grata est incuria comis Horati,
Qui nec opinantes nos erudit absque magistro.
Ille suas leges, affabilis instat amici
Quam veras simul et quam clamo more profundie !
Ille licet tam judicio quam divite venâ
Maximus, audacem criticum, non scriptor inaudax
Præstaret se jure, tamen sedatus ibidem
Censor, ubi cecinit divino concitus æstro,
Carminibusque eadem inspirat, quæ tradidit Artæ.
Nosstrates homines planè in contraria currunt,
Turba, stylo vehemens critico, sed frigida Phæbo :
Nec malè vertendo Flaccum torserè poetæ
Absurdi, magè quam critici sine mente citando.
Aspice, ut expoliât numeros Dionysius * ipsi
Mæonidæ venerescque accersat ubique recentes !
Conditam ingenio jactat Petronius artem,
Cui doctrina scholas redolet simul et sapit aulam

* Dionysius of Halicarnassus.

Cum docti Fabii cumulata volumina versas,
Optima perspicuâ in serie documenta videre est,
Haud secus utilia ac apothecis condimus arma,
Ordine perpetuo sita juncturâque decorâ,
Non modo ut obtineat quo sese oblectet ocellus,
Verum etiam in promptu, quando venit usus, habenda

[mænæ,

Te solum omnigenæ inspirant, Longine, Ca-
Et propriam penitus tibi mentem animumque dederunt;

En! tibi propofiti criticum fideique tanecem,
Qui vehemens sua jura, sed omnibus æqua ministrat;

Quo probat exemplo, quas tradit acumine leges,
Semper sublimes sublimior argumento!

Succedere diu sibi tales, pulsaque fugit
Barbara præscriptas exosa licentia leges,
Româ perpetuo crescente scientia crevit,
Atque artes aquilarum equitare audacibus alis;
Sed tandem superata iisdem victoribus uno
Roma triumphata est musis comitantibus ævo.
Dira superstitio et comes est bacchata tyrannis,
Et simul illa animos, hæc corpora sub juga misit
Credita ab omnibus omnia sunt, sed cognita nullis,
Et stupor est ausus titulo pietatis abuti!
Obrotô diluvio sic est doctrina secundo,
Et Monachis finita Gothorum exortâ fuerunt.

At vero tandem memorabile nomen Erasmus,
(Cuique sacerdoti iactandus, cuiqui pudendus)
Barbariæ obnixus torrentia tempora vincit,
Atque Gothos propriis sacros de finibus arcet.

At Leo jam rursus viden' ourea secula condit,
Sertaque neglectis revirescunt laurea musis!
Antiquus Romæ Genius de pulvere sacro
Attollit sublime caput. Tunc cœpit amari
Scultura atque artes sociæ, cælataque rupes
Vivere, et in pulchras lapides mollescere formas;
Divinam harmoniam surgentia templa sonabant,
Atque stylo et calamo Raphael et Vida * vige-bant;

Illustres vates! cui lauræ ferta poetæ
Intertexta hederis critici geminata resplendent;
Jamque æquat clarum tibi, Mantua Vida Cre-
monam,

Utque loci, sic semper erit vicinia famæ.
Mox autem profugæ metuentes improba musæ
Arma, Italos fines linquunt, inque Arctica migrant

Littora; sed criticam sibi Gallia vendicat artem.
Gens ulla leges, docilis servire, capeffit,
Boiloviusque vices domini gerit acer Horati.
At fortes spernunt præcepta externa Britanni,
Moribus indomitique quoque; nam pro jure furendi
Anglicus pugnat genius, Romamque magistrâ,
Romanumque jugum semper contemnere pergit.
At vero jam tum non desuit unus et alter
Corde, licet tumefacta minis, magis alta gerentes,
Ingenii partes veri studiosa fovendi
Inque basi antiquâ leges et jura locandi.
Talis, qui cecinit doctrinæ exemplar et author,

* Hieronymus Vida, an excellent Latin poet, who writ an art of poetry in verse. He flourished in the time of Leo X.

"Ars bene scribendi naturæ est summa po-
"testas †."

Talis Roscommon—bonus et doctissimus idem,
Nobilis ingenio magè nobilitate honesto;
Qui Graios Latiosque authores novit ad unguem,
Dum veneres textit pudibunda industria privas.

Talus Walsenius ille fuit—judex et amicus
Mufarum, censuræ æquus laudisque minister,
Mitis peccantum censor, vehementisque merentium
Laudator, cerebrum sine mendo, et cor sine fumo!
Hæc saltem accipias, lacrymabilis umbra, liciber,
Hæc debet mea musa tuæ munuscula famæ.
Illa eadem, infantem cujus tu fingere vocem,
Tu monstrare viam; horridulus componere pla-mas

Tu sæpe est solitus—duce jam miseranda remoto
Illa breves humili excursus molimine tentat,
Nec jam quid sublime, quid ingens amplius audeat.
Illi hoc jam satis est—si hiinc turba indocta do-
cetur,

Docta recognoscit studii vestigia prisci:
Censuram haud curat, famam mediocriter adet,
Culpare intrepida, ad laudis tamen æqua ministra;
Haud ulli prudens assentaturve notetve;
Se demum mendis haud immunem esse fatetur,
At neque fastidit limâ, quando indiget, uti.

STANZAS, IN A SONG TO DAVID.

.. ..

SUBLIME invention, ever young,
Of vast conception, tow'ring tongue
To God th' eternal theme;
Notes from yon exaltation taught,
Unrivall'd royalty of thought,
O'er meaner strains supreme.

His muse, bright angel of his verse,
Gives balm for all the thorns that pierce,
For all the pangs that rage;
Blest light, still gaining on the gloom,
The more than Michael of his gloom
Th' Abisbag of his age.

He sung of God, the mighty source
Of all things, the stupendous force
On which all strength depends,
From whose right arm, beneath whose eyes
All period, power, and enterprise
Commences, reigns, and ends.

The world, the clust'ring spheres he made,
The glorious light, the soothing shade,
Dale, campaign, grove, and hill,
The multitudinous abyss
Where secrecy remains in bliss,
And wisdom hides her skill.

Tell them, I AM, Jehovah said
To Moses; while earth heard in dread,
And, smitten to the heart,
At once above, beneath, around
All nature, without voice or sound
Replied, O Lord, THOU ART.

.. ..

† Essay on poetry, by the Duke of Buckingham.

THE POETICAL WORKS
OF
JOHN LANGHORNE, D. D.

Containing

VISION OF FANCY,
GENIUS AND VALOUR,
THE ENLARGEMENT OF THE MIND,
FABLES OF FLORA,
PRECEPTS OF CONJUGAL HAPPINESS,
VERSES IN MEMORY OF A LADY,
COUNTRY JUSTICE,

ORIGIN OF THE VEIL,
OWEN OF CARRON,
ODES, ELEGIES,
EPISTLES, SONNETS,
TRANSLATIONS,

&c. &c. &c.

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

A muse that lov'd in nature's walks to stray,
And gather'd many a wild flower in her way;
To nature's friend her genuine gifts would bring,
The light amusements of life's vacant spring.
The friends of Pope indulge her native lays,
And Gloucester joins with Lyttleton to praise.
Each judge of art, her strain, though artless, loves;
And Sbenstone smil'd, and polish'd Hurd approves.

VERSES TO THE HON. CHARLES YORKE.

EDINBURGH:
PRINTED BY MUNDELL AND SON, ROYAL BANK CLOSE.

Anno 1795.

THE LIFE OF LANGHORNE.

OF the personal history of LANGHORNE, the present writer is sorry that the information he has obtained is so scanty, that he must give his life to the world much more briefly than his rank in literature and poetry deserves.

John Langhorne was born at Kirkby-Stephen, on "the banks of the Eden," in Westmoreland, as appears from Burn's "History of Westmoreland," Vol. I. p. 549, his Ode to the River Eden, and his Stanzas to the Genius of Westmoreland, in the Effusions of Friendship and Fancy, Vol. I. let. 25. The year of his birth is not ascertained. His father was the Rev. Joseph Langhorne of Winston; who, dying when he was young, left him and his brother William to the care of his mother, whose virtues he has commemorated in his Monody on her death, 1759.

Source of my life, that led my tender years

With all a parent's pious fears,

That nurs'd my infant thought, and taught my mind to grow.

The place of his education is unknown, nor does it appear from what seminary he obtained the academical honours by which he was distinguished. His name is not to be found in the list of graduates either of Oxford or Cambridge.

From some circumstances which may be collected from his poems, he seems to have resided, between the years 1756 and 1758, near Studley, in Yorkshire. His Elegy written among the Ruins of Pontefract Castle, is dated 1756, and his Verses left with the Minister of Ripendon, are dated 1758.

The first notice we find of him as an author was in 1758, when several pieces of poetry, written by him, were inserted in "The Grand Magazine," a periodical work, published by Mr. Ralph Griffiths, the proprietor of the "Monthly Review," which continued only three years.

His first publication was The Death of Adonis, a Pastoral Elegy, from Bion, 4to, 1759; which was followed in the same year, by The Tears of Music, a Poem to the Memory of Mr. Handel, with an Ode to the River Eden, 4to.

After entering into holy orders, he became tutor to the sons of Robert Cracroft, Esq. of Hackthorne, in Lincolnshire; and published at Lincoln a volume of Poems on Several Occasions, 4to, 1760, for the benefit of a gentleman. In the preface to this volume, he says, "If any one into whose hands this work may fall, should be dissatisfied with his purchase, let him remember that they are published for the relief of a gentleman in distress; and that he has not thrown away five shillings in the purchase of a worthless book, but contributed so much to the assistance of indigent merit. I had rather have my readers feel that pleasure which arises from the sense of having done one virtuous deed, than all they can enjoy from the works of poetry and wit." The same year he published a Hymn to Hope, 4to.

In 1760, he was at Clarehall, Cambridge, and wrote a poem on the accession of his present Majesty, and the year following, an Ode on the royal nuptials, printed in the Cambridge collection of verses, and afterwards in Solyman and Almena.

Soon after, he removed to London, engaged as a writer in the "Monthly Review," espoused the interest of Lord Bute, and became a frequent and successful publisher of various performances in prose and verse.

In 1762, he published The Viceroy, a panegyric poem, addressed to the Earl of Halifax, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; which was followed, in the same year, by Solyman and Almena, 12mo, an eastern tale; Letters on Religious Retirement, Melancholy, and Enthusiasm, 8vo; and The Visions of Fancy, in four Elegies.

In 1763, he stood forth in defence of Scotland, so rudely attacked by Churchill, in his celebrated Prophecy of Famine, and published Genius and Valour, a Pastoral Poem, written in Honour of a

Sister-Kingdom, 4to. This poem is "inscribed to the Earl of Bute, as a testimony of respect from an impartial Englishman."

The same year he published The Effusions of Friendship and Fancy, in several Letters to and from Select Friends, 2 vols, 12mo; The Letters that passed between Theodosius and Constantia, after she had taken the veil, now first published from the Original Manuscripts, with a dedication to Warburton, 12mo; and The Enlargement of the Mind, Epistle I. to General Craufurd, written at Belvidere, near Dartford in Kent, 4to. The second edition of the Effusions, was published in 1766, with alterations and additions.

His connection with the "Monthly Review," and the desire he had shown of discountenancing the prejudices of the times, and of testifying his respect for the character of Lord Bute, in his Genius and Valour, exposed him, with Dr. Francis and Mr. Murphy, to the censure of Churchill, in the following lines of "The Candidate."

Why may not Langhorne, simple in his lay,
Effusion on Effusion pour away;
With Friendship and with Fancy trifle here,
Or sleep in Pastoral at Belvidere?
Sleep let them all with dulness on her throne,
Secure from any malice but their own.

In 1764, he published Sermons, 2 vols, 12mo.

Having dedicated the Letters of Theodosius and Constantia to Warburton, he became known to that eminent prelate, by whose interest, it may be presumed, he was, in December 1765, appointed assistant preacher at Lincoln's-Inn.

The same year, he published The Correspondence between Theodosius and Constantia, from their first acquaintance, to the Departure of Theodosius, 12mo, with a poetical dedication to Coleman; The Poetical Works of Mr. William Collins, with Memoirs of the Author; and Observations on his Genius and Writings, 12mo; Letters on the Eloquence of the Pulpit, 8vo; The Enlargement of the Mind, Epistle II. to William Langhorne, M. A. 4to.

His brother, to whom he inscribed this Epistle, was himself a poet; and published "Job, a Poem," 4to, 1760, and "A poetical Paraphrase on some part of Isaiah," 4to, 1761. The habitudes of early affection seem to have been improved, by a familiarity of taste and pursuits, into a friendship of uncommon ardour and sincerity.

— thou partner of my life and name,
From one dear source, whom nature form'd the same,
All'd more nearly in each nobler part,
And more the friend than brother of my heart!

In 1766, he published his Poetical Works, in 2 vols, 12mo, with a poetical dedication to the Hon. Charles Yorke: This collection, included the pieces formerly printed separately, and The Fatal Prophecy, a Dramatic Poem, in five acts, written in 1765.

The same year, among other successful writers, he fell under the censure of Kelly, on account of some criticisms imputed to him in the "Monthly Review," in the following harsh and illiberal invective in his "Thespis, or Examination into the Merits of the Principal Performers at Drury-Lane." 4to

Triumphant dunce, illustrious Langhorne, rise,
And while whole worlds detest thee and despise,
With rage uncommon, cruelly deny
Thy hapless muse, ev'n privilege to die;
While Theodosius, basely torn from night,
Recks, festers, stinks, and putrifies to sight,
And mad Constantia damns thy recreant name,
To drive with Flecknoe down the sink of fame.
Say, with what charm, what magic art thou blest,
That grief or shame ne'er rankle in thy breast;]
That ev'n mere instinct never points a way
To fly from man, and refuge from the day?
Ne'er kindly tells thee of some pitying grave,
To snatch the blockhead, and to hide the slave?
Oh! that like Langhorne, with a blushless face,
I bore the stroke of merited disgrace;

THE LIFE OF LANGHORNE.

Like him, with some fine apathy of soul,
 I stood the thunder in its mightiest roll,
 Smil'd when the bolt indignantly was hurl'd,
 Or gap'd unconscious on a scorning world !
 Then could I view, with temper in my look,
 The just damnation of a favourite book ;
 Could see my labours, with unaching eye,
 Form the grand outwork of a giblet-pye,
 Pil'd in nice order for the suburb stalls,
 Or sent in carts to Clement's at St. Paul's ;
 Then the sharp censure, or the biting jeer,
 Had fall'n all-blunted on my nerveless ear ;
 And leagu'd perhaps with ——— I might stand,
 To save or damn at random through the land ;
 To blast each work of excellence e'er known,
 And write eternal praises of my own.

About this time, he obtained or purchased the valuable Rectory of Blagdon in Somersetshire, and was appointed a Prebendary of Wells. He was also in the Commission of the Peace for the county of Somerset, and distinguished himself as an active and useful magistrate.

On the 15th of January 1767, he married Miss Cracroft, siter of his former pupils ; but his prospects of happiness from his union with this lady were soon clouded by her death, in childhed of a daughter.

This mournful event occasioned his pathetic Verfes to the Memory of a Lady; written at Sandgate Castle, 1768, 4to. The death of his beloved wife was also lamented by two of his friends ; Mr Cartwright, in a poem called " Constantia," and Mr. Abraham Portal, in some elegiac verses printed in his works.

In the same month that proved fatal to this amiable person, died also in childbed the first wife of Scott, the poet of Amwell, who solaced his sorrow, by composing an " Elegy" to the memory of one who had been dear to him ; a copy of which he sent to Langhorne. This simularity of circumstance and congenial affliction gave rise to a friendship between these two poets, which, though they rarely corresponded, and more rarely met, continued without abatement till the death of Langhorne.

The same year, Shaw published his celebrated " Monody" on the death of his wife ; which occasioning some severe lines in a newspaper, which were imputed to Langhorne, they produced a paper war between the two poets, which was conducted very liberally on either side.

In 1768, he published Precepts of Conjugal Happiness ; a poem addressed to his sister-in-law, on her marriage, 4to.

About this time, he added the title of Doctor of Divinity to his name, which he probably obtained from the Archbishop of Canterbury.

In 1769, he published Frederick and Pharamond, or the Consolations of Human Life, 12mo; and Letters supposed to have passed between M. de St. Evremond and Mr. Waller, 2 vols, 12mo.

The year following, he published, in conjunction with his brother, Plutarch's Lives, translated from the Original Greek, with Notes Critical and Explanatory, and a New Life of Plutarch, in 6 vols, 8vo.

In 1771, he published The Fables of Flora, 4to; and having intermitted his intercourse with the press for one year, he published, in 1773, The Origin of the Veil, a poem, 4to; and A Dissertation, Historical and Political, on the Ancient Republics of Italy, from the Italian of Carlo Denina, with Original Notes and Observations, 8vo.

In the summer 1773, he resided for a few months at Weston-Supra-Mare in Somersetshire, for the benefit of the sea-air. At the same time, and for the same reason, the amiable and ingenious Miss Hannah More resided at Uphill, a mile from Weston. Meeting one day upon the sea-shore, Langhorne wrote with the end of his stick upon the sand,

Along the shore
 Walk'd Hannah More ;
 Waves, let this record last ;
 Sooner shall ye,
 Proud earth and sea,
 Than what she writes be past.

Miss More scratched underneath with her whip,

THE LIFE OF LANGHORNE.

Some firmer basis, polish'd Langhorne, choofe,
To write the dictates of thy charming muse;
Her strains in solid characters rehearse,
And be thy tablet lasting as thy verse.

Langhorne praised her wit, and copied the lines, which he presented to her at a house near the sea where they adjourned, and she afterwards wrote under as follows:

Langhorne, whose sweetly-varying muse has power
To raise the pensive, crown the social hour;
Whose very trifling has the charm to please,
With nature, wit, and unaffected ease;
How soon, obedient to thy forming hand,
The letters grew upon the flexible sand.
Should some lost traveller the scene explore,
And trace thy verses on the dreary shore,
What sudden joy would feast his eager eyes,
How from his eyes would burst the glad surprise!
Methinks I hear, or seem to hear, him say,
This letter'd shore has smooth'd my toilsome way;
Hannah (he adds) though honest truths may pain,
Yet here I see an emblem of the twain,
As these frail characters with ease impress
Upon the yielding sand's soft watery breast,
Which, when some few short hours they shall have stood,
Shall soon be swept by yon impetuous flood.
Presumptuous maid! so shall expire thy name,
Thou wretched feeble candidate for fame!
But Langhorne's fate in yon firm rock [Brean Down] I read,
Which rears above the cloud its towering head;
Long as that rock shall rear its head on high,
And lift its bold front to the azure sky;
Long as these adamantine hills survive,
So long, harmonious Langhorne! shalt thou live;
While envy's waves shall lash and vainly roar,
And only fix thy solid base the more.

In 1774, he published The Country Justice, a Poem, Part I.; "written professedly at the request of his friend, countryman, and brother-justice, Dr. Burn, to whom it is addressed. "The distinction you have acquired on the subject," says the dedication, "and true taste for the arts, gives that address every kind of propriety."

It was followed, in 1775, by the Second Part of the Country Justice, 4to, which he dedicated, in some elegant introductory stanzas, to his pupil and brother-in-law, Robert Wilson Crocroft, Esq.

The year following, he published The Proper Happiness of Ecclesiastic Life, in a Public and Private Sphere; A Sermon preached before the Bishop of Bath and Wells, at his Primary Visitation at Axbridge, July 4. 1776, 4to; and The Love of Mankind the Fundamental Principle of the Christian Religion; A Sermon preached before the Gentlemen Natives of the County of Somerset, at their Annual Meeting, in the Church of St. Mary Redcliff, Bristol, September 16. 1776, 4to.

The same year, he published Milton's Italian Poems translated, and addressed to a Gentleman of Italy, 4to; which was followed by The Country Justice, Part III. 4to, 1777; and Owen of Carron, a Poem, 4to, 1778, which was the last publication he gave to the world.

From this time, finding his health gradually declining, he no longer strained his faculties with any literary composition. After a lingering illness, he died at Blagdon-House, April 1. 1779. He married a second time; but it is apprehended he left no issue by his second marriage. After his death, an "Elegy to his Memory" was published by Mr. Portal; who mentions, that he left the care of his daughter, by his first marriage, to Mrs. Gillman, a lady whom he has frequently celebrated in his poems.

His Poetical Works, reprinted from the edition in 2 vols, 1766, with The Precepts of Conjugal Happiness, Verses to the Memory of a Lady, Fables of Flora, and Owen of Carron, &c. were collected into the edition of "The English Poets," 1790. His poems, originally printed in The Effusions of Friendship and Fancy, Theodosius and Constantia, and Solyman and Almena, are now, for the first time, collected into an edition of his works.

Of his numerous prose writings, no editions have been called for since his death, except of Solyman and Almena, Theodosius and Constantia, and Plutarch's Lives, which have been frequently reprinted.

Of the domestic manners and petty habits of Langhorne, few particulars have been recorded. His private character appears to have been very amiable and respectable. All his contemporaries bear testimony to his candour, probity, liberality of sentiment, and amiable benevolence. Tenderness, in every sense of the word, seems to have been his peculiar characteristic. He had from his childhood, as he himself informs us, a remarkable turn for retirement; and frequently walked, when he was very young, two miles from home, to a solitary place, whose shady privacy aided contemplation. The romantic aspect of his native country probably added to this innocent enthusiasm; and the rude contrast of rocks, and woods, and waters, impressed something of their own wild irregularity on his imagination. His poems abound with images and descriptions connected with the place of his nativity. In his fable of The Garden Rose and the Wild Rose, the recollection of the scenes of thoughtless gaiety and puerile amusement, which he had long forsaken, restored to his mind the pleasing images which were connected with them, and rekindled, in some measure, that enthusiasm which they first cherished and inspired.

— Enon's wild and silent shade,
Where oft my lonely youth was laid,
What time the woodland genius came,
And touch'd me with his holy flame—
Or, where the hermit Belau leads
Her waves through solitary meads,
And only feeds the desert flower,
Where once she sooth'd my slumbering hour;
Or, rous'd by Stammer's wint'ry sky,
She wearies echo with her cry—
Where Eden's fairer waters flow
By Milton's bower, or Ossy's brow,
Or Brockley's alder-shaded cave;
Or, winding round the druid's grave,
Silently glide with pious fear,
To found his holy slumbers near—

When he resided in London, and became a writer of celebrity, his company was very earnestly solicited; and he became as much distinguished for his social and convivial spirit, as for the force of his genius, and the amiable simplicity of his manners. He is recollected to have been a very constant visitor at the Burton Ale-house, the sign of the Peacock, in Gray's-Inn Lane, where he is supposed to have taken too liberally that substitute for the Castalian fountain, which the house supplied. His manner of living in the country was genial and elegant; and he died much lamented by his brother justices and convivial friends.

As a prose writer, few of his compositions have obtained much popularity, though they afford such pregnant proofs of genius, taste, and learning, as render them in general deserving more attention than they have hitherto received.

His Letters on Religious Retirement are addressed to a lady of good sense and fine accomplishments, but unhappily a little tinctured with enthusiasm, and inclined to that sort of melancholy and aversion to the rational pleasures of society, which naturally arises from mistaken apprehensions of the Supreme Being, and the absurd notion of divine impulses and illuminations. They contain a variety of striking arguments and observations, clothed in elegant and pathetic language, not unlike the flowery style of Harvey, though applied to a very opposite purpose.

His Solyman and Almena is one of the most popular of his performances. In invention, originality, and interest, it is inferior to the "Rafelas" of Dr. Johnson, and the "Almorán and Hamet" of Dr. Hawkefworth. The design and tendency of the story are more commendable than the execution. In venturing to sport in the flowery fields of fiction, he has sometimes forgotten the poet's precept, convenientia fingere. In the composition, few strong marks of the eastern style or manners are visible; but the defects of the style, though in general easy and elegant, is compensated by the useful instruction it conveys. The design of the tale is perfectly chaste and moral, tending to confirm the habits of virtue, and to inspire us with a confidence in Providence.

In his Effusions of Friendship and Fancy, he has ventured into the pleasant province of humour; in which, if he does not make such a distinguished figure as Sterne, it ought to be remembered, that few have succeeded in the art of agreeable trifling. The second volume contains a variety of ingenious criticisms, and remarks on the study of poetry, addressed to Mr. Cartwright, which evince his abilities as a classical scholar, and his good taste in polite literature.

His Theodosius and Constantia is founded on the unfortunate love tale told in the "Spectator," No. 164. The design of the work is to inculcate many of the great duties of natural and revealed religion, and the practice of some of the most amiable virtues of private life. The merit of this moral and entertaining Correspondence is very considerable. The letters are written in a polite and pleasing style, though his manner is too poetical for prose composition; his language too flowery, too luxuriant, and in some places too finely polished for epistolary writing; in which art should never want ease, nor elegance lose sight of nature.

His Sermons are in general animated, eloquent, and pathetic compositions; but they are sometimes more verbose, diffuse, and affected, than a polished taste can patiently endure. They have been severely censured by Mr. Mainwaring, in the preface to his "Sermons," 8vo, 1780; where, speaking of specimens of false pathos, he refers to sermons "by writers of little judgment and no genius—to those of Dr. Langhorne in particular, and of the Methodists in general, where the instances of false pathos are so numerous, and so easy to be found, that I think it needless to quote them." Again: "Although method cannot be too exact, it may be too studiously displayed. There are sermons of the first merit, in all other respects, that may justly be compared to fine skeletons, in which the bones, muscles, and sinews, are fashioned, arranged, and adjusted, in the most perfect manner; but a composition of this sort, though ever so consummate for its strength and symmetry, can only be pleasing to the eye of a virtuoso. The extreme opposed to this is the loose soft texture of Dr. Langhorne's style."

His Memoirs of Collins, though general and scanty, are elegantly written; and the Observations on his Genius and Writings, though sometimes slight and nugatory, are commonly just and pertinent, and always lively and ingenious.

His Letters on the Eloquence of the Pulpit, contain few observations that are new or striking; but the composition is more close and pure than the generality of his prose writings.

In his Frederick and Pharamond, there is a liberality, as well as a rectitude of sentiment, which merits the highest praise; but neither the conduct of the dialogue nor the style are commendable.

His Letters between St. Evremond and Waller, are in general characteristic and elegant, and do equal credit to his taste and judgment.

Of Plutarch's Lives, the translators have given a version that amply supplies the defects of that translation to which Dryden lent his glorious name, written, as he himself acknowledges, by as many hands as there were lives. It had indeed been corrected in the editions 1727 and 1758, with great learning and abilities, as far as correction was possible; but the cast and complexion could only be improved by a new work, which has been executed by the poetical brothers, with an elegance, fidelity, spirit, and precision, that merit the highest praise, and must for ever preclude the necessity of a subsequent version. The Life of Plutarch is well written; and the Notes are very valuable.

His translation of Denina's Dissertation on the Ancient Republics of Italy, is an accession to English literature, that has received an additional value from his Original Notes and Observations.

As a poet, his compositions are distinguished by undoubted marks of genius, a fine imagination, and a sensible heart. Imagery and enthusiasm, the great essentials of poetry, inspirit all his works, and place them far above the strain of vulgar compositions. The tenderness of love, and the soft language of complaint, were adapted to his genius, as well as elevation of thought, opulence of imagery, and the highest beauties of poetry. But the qualities for which he is chiefly distinguished, are imagination, pathos and simplicity, animated sentiment, opulence of allusion, warmth and vivacity of expression, and a melodious versification. His sentimental productions are exquisitely tender and beautiful; his descriptive compositions show a feeling heart and a warm imagination; and his lyric pieces are pregnant with the genuine spirit of poetical enthusiasm; but his style, in the midst of much splendour and strength, is sometimes harsh and obscure, and may be censured as deficient in ease and distinctness. His chief fault is redundant decoration, an affectation of false and unnecessary ornament. He is not always contented with that concise and simple language which is sufficient to express his sentiments, but is tempted to indulge in superfluous diction, by the fascinating charms of novelty or harmony. By giving way to the luxury of words and immoderate embellishment, he sometimes, though rarely, violates simplicity, and becomes unavoidably inaccurate and redundant. His sentiments, however, are always just, often new, and generally striking. A great degree of elegance and classical simplicity runs through all his compositions; and his descriptions of nature, rural imagery, pictures of private virtue and pastoral innocence, have a judicious selection of circumstances, a graceful plainness of expression, and a happy mixture of pathos and sentiment, which mark the superior poet.

His Death of Adonis is a classical and spirited version of one of the most beautiful pastoral poems of antiquity. The diction is easy and elegant, and the numbers musical and flowing.

The Poem to the Memory of Mr. Handel may be considered as the genuine and animated wailings of poetry, who deploras her sister's loss in Handel, in very elegant and harmonious verse. There is a considerable variety in the numbers, which are happily adapted to the subject, and modulated with a judicious correspondence to the images and the sentiments. In the passage beginning, I feel, I feel the sacred impulse, &c. the pauses and cadences of the numbers are so nervously sweet and mutable, that it must revive the idea of a fine band in every relisher of music.

The Ode to the River Eden is very pretty and fanciful. The stanza extends to ten lines of eight syllables, except the tenth, which, sinking into six, changes the cadence agreeably enough. The expression laughing wing, in the fourth stanza, is a bold, but very pardonable experiment in metaphorical language. Of the Hymn to Hope, the versification is smooth, the diction elegant, the imagery agreeable, and the sentiment is mostly simple and pathetic. The Viceroy praises Lord Halifax with truth and delicacy, but little poetry.

The Visions of Faucy are the effusions of a contemplative mind, sometimes plaintive, and always serious, but too attentive to the glitter of slight ornaments. The thoughts are pure, simple, and pathetic; and the lines are such as elegy requires, smooth, easy, and flowing; but the diction is often affected, and the phrase unskilfully inverted. The Autumnal Elegy, and other pieces of that kind, deserve a more unqualified commendation.

His Genius and Valour is a proper contrast to the "Prophecy of Famine." If he does not exceed Churchill in the fire and force of his numbers, he is at least equal to him in the easy and harmonious flow of his versification. In that part of the pastoral where he celebrates those natives of North Britain who have been distinguished for their genius and learning, the representation of the Four Seasons appearing to Thomson, and claiming the palm, like the fabled competition of the rural goddesses before the royal shepherd on Mount Ida, is entitled to the highest praise. The Seasons are distinguished by a brilliancy of colouring, and a distinctness and propriety of attribute, that rival, if not surpass, what we meet with of the kind even in Thomson. The decision contains an elegant compliment to the amiable "poet of the Seasons."

——— The bard, whose gentle heart ne'er gave
One pain or trouble that he knew to save,
No favour'd nymph extols with partial praise,
But gives to each her picture for her praise.

In the First Epistle on The Enlargement of the Mind, he recommends the study of Nature, in order to enlarge our minds by a due contemplation of her works. The plan is somewhat defective; but it possesses, in many parts, the concise and happy expression, and the melodious versification of Pope's "Essay on Man." In the Second Epistle, like the first, there is more poetry than plan. The panegyric on Reason is eminently beautiful, and the reflection on the proper culture of the flower divine is pathetic and spirited. The description of those graceful arts which flock round the throne of Science, particularly Poetry, Painting, Sculpture, and Music, is appropriate and striking; and the elegiac lines to the memory of his friend General Crauford, are tender and pathetic. The Precepts of Conjugal Happiness contain much valuable instruction, delivered in chaste and elegant diction, and easy and harmonious verse.

The Verses to the Memory of a Lady rank with the celebrated elegiac compositions of Lyttleton and Shaw, to which they are equal in poetical merit, and scarcely inferior in pathetic tenderness. They must please every body, because there are beauties in them which affect every body. The following lines must touch every feeling heart:

THE LIFE OF LANGHORNE.

See the last aid of her expiring state,
 See love, ev'n love has lent his darts to fate!
 Oh! when beneath his golden shafts I bled,
 And vainly bound his trophies on my head;
 When crown'd with flowers he led the rosy day,
 Liv'd to my eye, and drew my soul away—
 Could fear, could fancy, at that tender hour,
 See the dim grave demand the nuptial flower?
 There, there his wreaths dejected Hymen strew'd,
 And mourn'd their bloom unfaded as he view'd;
 There each fair hope, each tenderness of life,
 Each nameless charm of soft obliging strife,
 Delight, love, fancy, pleasure, genius, fled,
 And the best passions of my soul lie dead.—

These pathetic verses came so near the feelings of the present writer, when he experienced a similar affliction nine years ago, that they hurt his peace of mind; and while he admired the poet and pitied the man, he saw his own miseries in the strongest point of view, and fought, like him, a vain relief by composing a "Monody to the Memory of a Beloved Wife," in the same measure, which he extended, with a melancholy pleasure that mourners only know, beyond the bounds which custom has prescribed to elegiac verses. He has seen the scene he describes, and knows how dreadful it is. He knows what it is to lose one, that his eyes and heart have been long used to, and he never desires to part with the remembrance of that loss.

—though the inexorable urn
 Never to me shall her lov'd form return;
 Though cold the breast that life's warm current fed,
 And pale the cheek that modest beauty spread;
 Though clos'd the eye that glanc'd endearing thought,
 And mute the voice that living goodness taught;
 Never from me shall her lov'd image part,
 But live and reign unrival'd in my heart;
 Ev'n death's dim shadow seeks to hide in vain,
 The modest aspect, and the smile humane!
 In day's broad glare, and in the gloom of night,
 Her pale-ey'd phantom rises to my sight!
 In vain—confest, I see my ANNA stand,
 And the pen falls—falls from my trembling hand!
 Faint on my lips th' unhallow'd sounds expire,
 That vainly emulate the muse's fire;
 Afresh my tears in fond remembrance flow,
 And rising anguish stops the strain of woe;
 Bleeds in my breast with aggravated pain,
 Throbs at my heart, and thrills in every vein!

In his Fables of Flora, the plan of fable is somewhat enlarged, and the province so far extended, that the original narrative and moral may be accompanied with imagery, description, and sentiment. The scenery is formed in a department of nature adapted to the genius and disposition of poetry, where she finds new objects, interests, and connections, to exercise her fancy and her powers. The plan is judicious, and the execution truly admirable. None of his compositions bear stronger marks of poetical invention and enthusiasm; none are distinguished by simplicity, tenderness, and delicacy, in a more eminent degree; and none have a stronger tendency to promote the love of nature and the interests of humanity. Of these charming compositions, The Sun-Flower and the Ivy, The Laurel and the Reed, The Violet and the Parsly, The Wall-Flower, and The Mistletoe and the Passion-Flower, deserve particular commendation. The two last are distinguished by imagination, pathos, and sublimity, in a superior degree.

The Origin of the Veil is an elegant compliment to the fair sex, expressed in his usual melodious flow of versification.

The Country Justice breathes throughout a laudable spirit of poetry and humanity; and is farther recommended to us by the additional charms of a flowing and elegant versification. The First Part opens with a retrospective view of the forlorn state of liberty and civil security in England before the institution of justices of the peace, in the reign of Edward III. He then celebrates this most falutory and excellent appointment and its purposes. The description of Ancient Justice Hall succeeds, in which there are some exquisite strokes of humour and pleasantry. The moral character of a country justice, such as that of every magistrate ought to be, is admirably drawn. The general motives for lenity in the exercise of the justice's office, are enforced with much energy and benevolence. In his apology for vagrants, he pleads the probable misery of the widow'd parent who might have born one of those wretches, in the richest vein of fancy and pathos.

Cold on Canadian hills or Minden's plain,
Perhaps that parent mourn'd her soldier slain,
Bent o'er her babe, her eye dissolv'd in dew,
The big drops mingling with the milk he drew,
Gave the sad preface of his future years,
The child of misery, baptiz'd in tears!

His declaration against that pernicious species of vagrants known by the name of gyffies, will be read with peculiar pleasure.

The subject of the Second Part is the protection of the poor, in which he points out, with great energy, and well-placed satire, the evils that result from a deserted country and an overgrown metropolis. It is introduced by a dedication, which is equally moral and poetical. In the Third Part, he treats on depredation, prisons, and filiation, with the same pathetic elegance, benevolence, and well-placed satire. The prose titles to the several divisions of the poem, which break the thread of the subject, and interrupt the reader, rather unpleasingly, are omitted in the present edition.

His Owen of Carron is a pathetic tale, told with simplicity and elegance. The scene is laid in Scotland, in the reign of William the Lyon. The characters are interesting, and the events distressing. Lady Ellen, a Highland beauty, daughter of the Earl of Moray, after being unsuccessfully addressed by many suitors, meets with one who succeeds, but whose success proves fatal to herself. Ellen is casually met by the Earl of Nithisdale, who becomes enamoured of, and connected with her. This intercourse is observed by Earl Barnard, a rejected and jealous suitor, who provides a band of ruffians to assassinate his rival. Ellen, unconscious of her lover's fate, goes to meet him at the accustomed bower, and finds him dead.

What was that form so ghastly pale,
That low beneath the poplar lay?
'Twas some poor youth—Ah, Nithisdale!
She said, and silent sunk away!

She is found by a friendly shepherd, who conveys her to his cottage, where she returns to life, but not to reason. Her situation at this juncture is finely described.

O, hide me in thy humble bower,
(Returning late to life, she said),
I'll bind thy crook with many a flower,
With many a rosy wreath thy head, &c.

Ellen, after recovering from her insanity, and residing some years with the shepherd, is espoused to Lord Barnard, the unsuspected murderer of her husband.

The Lord of Lothian's fertile vale, &c.

From this event, it can scarce be supposed that Ellen deserves much happiness. She had confided to the care of the shepherd a young Nithisdale, the Owen of Carron, who gives name to the poem. Owen, when arrived at years of understanding, adverting to some circumstances which he thinks inconsistent with his supposed birth and present situation, indulges a very natural anxiety.

Why is this crook adorn'd with gold?
Why am I tales of ladies told?
If I am but a shepherd's boy, &c.

The shepherdes, his foster-mother, previous to her death, reveals the secret, and Owen resolves to attempt an interview with his real mother, in the halls of Lothian. His resolution produces a dreadful catastrophe.

'Tis o'er—these locks that wav'd in gold,
That wav'd adown those cheeks so fair,
Wreath'd in the gloomy tyrant's hold,
Hang from the fever'd head in air—

116
THE LIFE OF LANGHORNE.

The trembling victim straight he led,
Ere yet her soul's first fear was o'er,
He pointed to the ghastly head—
She saw—and sunk to rise to more.

The story, which reminds us of "Gil Morrice," is skilfully told, and distinguished by rich imagery, and flowing versification; but the illicit commerce of Nithisdale and Ellen should not have passed unrebuked, as if it were irreproachable.

Of the pieces now first collected into his works, the Hymn to the Rising Sun, Farewell Hymn to the Valley of Irwan, The Happy Villager, To Almena, Hymeneal Song, Hymn to the Eternal Mind, Epitaphium Damonis, Epistles to Colman and Mr. Lamb, and the verses Written in a Cottage-Garden at a Village in Lorrain, are distinguished by tenderness of sentiment, luxury of description, force of pathos, and harmony of numbers. The last, in pathetic simplicity and unaffected tenderness, is not to be surpassed by any thing of the kind in the English language. In the pieces taken from Solyman and Almena, the river Eden may be substituted for Irwan, without any local impropriety. His Sonnets, and smaller pieces, have their brighter passages, but require no distinct enumeration, or particular criticism.

THE WORKS OF LANGHORNE.

"Et vos, O Lauri, carpam; et te, proxima Myrte!
 "Sic positæ, quoniam suaves miscetis odores." VIRG.

TO THE HON.
 CHARLES YORKE.

A MUSE that lov'd in nature's walks to stray,
 And gather'd many a wild flower in her way,
 To nature's friend her genuine gifts would bring,
 The light amusements of life's vacant spring;
 Nor shalt thou, Yorke, her humble offering blame,
 If pure her increase, and unmix'd her flame.
 She pours no flatt'ry into folly's ear;
 No shameless hiring of a shameless peer,
 The friends of Pope indulge her native lays,
 And Gloucester joins with Lyttelton to praise.
 Each judge of art her strain, though artless loves;
 And Shenstone smil'd, and polish'd Hurd approves.
 O may such spirits long protect my page,
 Surviving lights of wit's departed age!
 Long may I in their kind opinion live!
 All meaner praise, all envy I forgive—

Yet fairly be my future laurels won!
 Nor let me bear a bribe to Hardwicke's son!
 Should his free suffrage own the favour'd strain,
 Though vain the toil, the glory were not vain—

PROEMIUM,

WRITTEN IN 1766.

IN Eden's * vale, when early fancy wrought
 Her wild embroidery on the ground of thought,
 Where Pembroke's † grotto, strew'd with Sid-ney's bays,
 Recall'd the dreams of visionary days,
 Thus the fond muse, that sooth'd my vacant
 youth,

Prophetic sung, and what she sung was truth.
 "Boy, break thy lyre, and cast thy reed away;
 Vain are the honours of the fruitless bay,

* The river Eden, in Westmoreland.

† The Countess of Pembroke, to whom Sir Philip Sydney dedicated his Arcadia, resided at Appleby, a small but beautiful town in Westmoreland, situated upon the Eden.

Though with each charm thy polish'd lay should please,

Glow into strength, yet soften into ease;
 Should Attic fancy brighten every line,
 And all Aonia's harmony be thine;
 Say would thy cares a grateful age repay?
 Fame wreath thy brows, or fortune gild thy way?
 Ev'n her own fools, if fortune smile, shall blame;
 And envy lurks beneath the flowers of fame.

Yet, if resolv'd secure of future praise,
 To tune sweet songs, and live melodious days,
 Let not the hand that decks my holy shrine,
 Round folly's head the blasted laurel twine.
 Just to thyself, dishonest grandeur scorn;
 Nor gild the bust of meanness nobly born.
 Let truth, let freedom still thy lays approve!
 Respect my precepts, and retain my love!"

HYMN TO HOPE, 1761.

Μην δ' αὐτοὶ Ἑλλῆς ἐν ἀρεκτοῖσι δομοῖσιν
 Ἐνδον ἔμμενε— HES.

SUN of the soul! whose cheerful ray
 Darts o'er this gloom of life a smile;
 Sweet hope, yet further gild my way,
 Yet light my weary steps awhile,
 Till thy fair lamp dissolve in endless day.

O come with such an eye and mien,
 As when by amorous shepherd seen;
 While in the violet-breathing vale
 He meditates his evening tale!
 Nor leave behind thy fairy train,
 Repose, belief, and fancy vain:
 That towering on her wing sublime,
 Outstrips the lazy flight of time,
 Riots on distant days with thee,
 And opens all futurity.

O come! and to my pensive eye
 Thy far-foreseeing tube apply,
 Whose kind deception steals us o'er
 The gloomy waste that lies before;

Still opening to the distant sight
The sunshine of the mountain's height;
Where scenes of fairer aspect rise,
Elysian groves, and azure skies.

Nor, gentle hope, forget to bring
The family of youth and spring;
The hours that glide in sprightly round,
The mountain-nymphs with wild thyme crown'd;
Delight, that dwells with raptur'd eye
On stream, or flow'r, or field, or sky:
And foremost in thy train advance
The loves and joys in jovial dance;
Nor last be expectation feen,
That wears a wreath of evergreen.

Attended thus by Belau's streams,
Oft hast thou sooth'd my waking dreams,
When, prone beneath an osier shade,
At large my vacant limbs were laid;
To thee and fancy all resign'd,
What visions wander'd o'er my mind!
Illusions dear, adieu! no more
Shall I your fairy-haunts explore;
For hope withholds her golden ray,
And fancy's colours faint away.
To Eden's shores, to Enon's groves,
Resounding once with Delia's loves,
Adieu! that name shall found no more
O'er Enon's groves, or Eden's shore:
For hope withholds her golden ray,
And fancy's colours faint away.

Life's ocean slept—the liquid gale
Gently mov'd the waving sail.
Fallacious hope! with flattering eye
You smil'd to see the streamers fly.
The thunder bursts, the mad wind raves,
From slumber, wake the frighted waves:
You saw me, fled me thus distrust,
And tore your anchor from my breast.

Yet come, fair fugitive, again!
I love thee still, though false and vain!
Forgive me, gentle hope, and tell
Where, far from me, you deign to dwell.
To sooth ambition's wild desires;
To feed the lover's eager fires;
To swell the miser's mouldy store;
To gild the dreaming chemist's ore;
Are these thy cares? or more humane?
To loose the war-worn captive's chain;
And bring before his languid sight
The charms of liberty and light;
The tears of drooping grief to dry:
And hold thy glass to sorrow's eye?

Or dost thou more delight to dwell
With silence in the hermit's cell?
To teach devotion's flame to rise,
And wing her vespers to the skies;
To urge, with still returning care,
The holy violence of prayer;
In rapt'rous visions to display
The realms of everlasting day,
And snatch from time the golden key,
That opens all eternity?

Perchance, on some unpeopled strand,
Whose rocks the raging tide withstand,
Thy soothing smile, in deserts drear,
A lonely mariner may cheer,

Who bravely holds his feeble breath,
Attack'd by famine, pain, and death.
With thee, he bears each tedious day
Along the dreary beach to stray:
Whence their wide way his toil'd eyes strain
O'er the blue bosom of the main;
And meet where distant surges rave,
A white sail in each foaming wave.

Doom'd from each native joy to part,
Each dear connection of the heart,
You the poor exile's steps attend,
The only undeferting friend.
You wing the slow-declining year;
You dry the solitary tear;
And oft, with pious guile, restore
Those scenes he must behold no more.

O most ador'd of earth or skies!
To thee ten thousand temples rise;
By age retain'd, by youth carest,
The same dear idol of the breast.
Depriv'd of thee, the wretch were poor,
That rolls in heaps of Lydian ore;
With thee the simple hind is gay,
Whose toil supports the passing day.

The rose-lip'd loves, that round their queen
Dance o'er Cythera's smiling green,
Thy aid implore, thy power display
In many a sweetly-warbled lay.
Forever in thy sacred shrine

Their unextinguish'd torches shine;
Italian flowers their sweets diffuse,
And myrtles shed their balmy dews.
Ah! still propitious, may'st thou deign
To sooth an anxious lover's pain!
By thee deserted, well I know,
His heart would feel no common woe.
His gentle prayer propitious hear,
And stop the frequent-falling tear.

For me, fair hope, if once again,
Perchance, to smile on me you deign,
Be such your sweetly-rural air,
And such a graceful visage wear,
As when, with truth and young desire,
You wak'd the lord of Hagley's lyre,
And painted to her poet's mind
The charms of Luey, fair and kind.

But ah, too early lost!—then go,
Vain hope, thou harbinger of woe.
Ah, no!—that thought distracts my heart:
Indulge me, hope, we must not part;
Direct the future as you please;
But give me, give me present ease.

Sun of the soul! whose cheerful ray
Darts o'er this gloom of life a smile;
Sweet hope, yet further gild my way,
Yet light my weary steps awhile,
Till thy fair lamp dissolve in endless day.

GENIUS AND VALOUR.

A PASTORAL POEM.

Written in Honour of a Sister-Kingdom, 1763.

Amyntor. Chorus of Shepherds.

WHERE Tweed's fair plains in liberal beauty lie,
And Flora laughs beneath a lucid sky;

Long-winding vales, where crystal waters lave,
Where blithe birds warble, and where green-
woods wave,

A bright-hair'd shepherd, in young beauty's bloom,
Tun'd his sweet pipe behind the yellow broom.

Free to the gale his waving ringlets lay,
And his blue eyes diffus'd an azure day.
Light o'er his limbs a careless robe he flung;
Health rais'd his heart, and strength his firm nerves strung.

His native plains poetic charms inspir'd,
Wild scenes, where ancient fancy oft retir'd!
Oft led her fairies to the shepherd's lay,
By Yarrow's banks, or groves of Endermay.

Nor only his those images that rise
Fair to the glance of fancy's plastic eyes;
His country's love his patriot soul possess'd,
His country's honour fir'd his filial breast.
Her lofty genius, piercing, bright, and bold,
Her valour witness'd by the world of old,
Witness'd once more by recent heaps of slain
On Canada's wild hills, and Minden's plain,
To sounds sublimer wak'd his pastoral reed—
Peace, mountain-echoes! while the strains proceed.

Amyntor.

No more of Tiviot, nor the flowery braes,
Where the blithe shepherd tunes his lightsome
lays;

No more of Leader's fairy-haunted shore,
Of Athol's lawns, and Gledwood-banks no more.
Unheded smile my country's native charms,
Lost in the glory of her arts and arms.

These, shepherds, these demand sublimer strains
Than Clyde's clear fountains, or than Athol's plains.

Chorus of Shepherds.

Shepherd, to thee sublimer lays belong,
The force divine of soul-commanding song.
These humble reeds have little learnt to play,
Save the light airs that cheer the pastoral day.
Of the clear fountain and the fruitful plain
We sing, as fancy guides the simple strain.
If then thy country's sacred fame demand
The high-ton'd music of a happier hand—
Shepherd, to thee sublimer lays belong,
The force divine of soul-commanding song.

Amyntor.

In spite of faction's blind, unmanner'd rage,
Of various fortune and destructive age,
Fair Scotland's honours yet unchang'd are seen,
Her palms still blooming, and her laurels green.

Freed from the confines of her Gothic grave,
When her first light reviving science gave,
Alike o'er Britain shone the liberal ray,
From * Enfwith's mountains to the banks of Tay.

For James † the muses tun'd their sportive lays,
And bound the monarch's brow with Chaucer's bays.

Arch humour smil'd to hear his mimic strain,
And plausive laughter thrill'd through every vein.

When taste and genius form the royal mind,
The favour'd arts a happier era find.

By James below'd, the muses tun'd their lyres
To nobler strains, and breath'd diviner fires.
But the dark mantle of involving time
Has veil'd their beauties, and obscur'd their rhyme.

Yet still some pleasing monuments remain,
Some marks of genius in each later reign.
In nervous strains Dunbar's bold music flows,
And time yet spares the Thistle and the Rose*.

O! while his course the hoary warrior steers
Through the long range of life-dissolving years,
Through all the evils of each changeful age,
Hate, envy, faction, jealousy, and rage,
Ne'er may his scythe these sacred plants divide,
These plants by Heaven in native union tied!
Still may the flower its social sweets disclose,
The hardy thistle still defend the rose.

Hail happy days! appeas'd by Margaret's charms.

When rival valour sheath'd his fatal arms.
When kindred realms unnatural war suppress,
Nor aim'd their arrows at a sister's breast.

Kind to the muse is quiet's genial day;
Her olive loves the foliage of the bay.

With bold Dunbar arose a numerous choir
Of rival bards, that strung the Dorian lyre,
In gentle Henryson's † unlabour'd strain
Sweet Arethusa's shepherd breath'd again:
Nor shall your tuneful visions be forgot,
Sage Bellentyne ‡ and fancy-painting Scott §.
But, O my country! how shall memory trace
Thy bleeding anguish, and thy dire disgrace?
Weep o'er the ruins of thy blasted bays,
Thy glories lost in either Charles's days?
When through thy fields destructive rapine spread,
Nor spating infants tears, nor hoary head,
In those dread days the unprotected swain
Mourn'd on the mountains o'er his wasted plain.
Nor longer vocal with the shepherd's lay
Were Yarrow's banks, or groves of Endermay.

Chorus of Shepherds.

Amyntor, cease! the painful scene forbear,
Nor the fond breast of filial duty tear.
Yet in our eyes our fathers sorrows flow,
Yet in our bosoms lives their lasting woe.
At eve, returning from their scanty fold,
When the long sufferings of their fires they told,
Oft have we sigh'd the piteous tale to hear,
And infant wonder dropt the mimic tear.

Amyntor.

Shepherds, no longer need your sorrows flow,
Nor pious duty cherish endless woe.
Yet should remembrance, led by filial love,
Through the dark vale of old affliction's rove,

* A poem so called, written in Honour of Margaret, daughter of Henry VII. on her marriage to James IV. King of Scots. By Mr. William Dunbar.

† Mr. Robert Henryson, an ingenious pastoral poet.

‡ Mr. John Bellentyne, Archdeacon of Murray, author of a beautiful allegorical poem, intitled, Virgins and Vice.

§ Mr. Archibald Scott, in the year 1524, translated the Vision, a poem, said to have been written in the year 1360. He was author of the Eagle and the Redbreast also, and several other pieces written with uncommon elegance for their day.

* A chain of mountains near Falkstone in Kent.

† James the First, King of Scotland, author of the famous old song, intitled, "Christ's Kirk on the Green."

The mournful shades of sorrows past explore,
And think of miseries that are no more;
Let those sad scenes that ask the dutious tear,
The kind return of happier days endear.

Hail, Anna, hail! O may each muse divine
With wreaths eternal grace thy holy shrine
Grav'd on thy tomb this sacred verse remain,
This verse, more sweet than conquest's founding
strain.

"She bade the rage of hostile nations cease,
"The glorious arbitress of Europe's peace."
She, through whose bosom roll'd the vital tide
Of Britain's monarchs in one stream allied,
Clos'd the long jealousies of different sway,
And saw united sister-realms obey.

Auspicious days! when tyranny no more
Rais'd his red arm, nor drench'd his darts in gore.
When, long an exile from his native plain,
Safe to his fold return'd the weary swain;
Return'd, and, many a painful summer past,
Beheld the green bench by his door at last.

Auspicious days! when Scots, no more oppress,
On their free mountains bar'd the fearless breast.
With pleasure saw their flocks unbounded feed,
And tun'd to strains of ancient joy the reed.

Then, shepherds, did your wondering fires behold
A form divine, whose vesture flam'd with gold.
His radiant eyes a starry lustre shed,
And solar glories beam'd around his head.
Like that strange power by fabled poets feign'd,
From east to west his mighty arms he strain'd.

A rooted olive in one hand he bore,
In one a globe, inscrib'd with sea and shore.
From Thames's banks to Tweed, to Tay he came,
Wealth in his rear, and Commerce was his name.

Glad industry the glorious stranger hails,
Rears the tall masts, and spreads the swelling sails;
Regions remote with active hope explores
Wild Zembla's hills, and Afric's burning shores.

But chief, Columbus, of thy various coast,
Child of the union, commerce bears his boast.
To seek thy new-found worlds, the vent'rous
swain,

His lads forsaking, left the lowland plain.
Aside his crook, his idle pipe he threw,
And bade to music and to love adieu.

Hence, Glasgow fair, thy wealth-diffusing hand,
Thy groves of vessels, and thy crowded strand.
Hence, round his folds the moorland shepherd spies

New social towns and happy hamlets rise.

But me not splendour, nor the hopes of gain,
Should ever tempt to quit the peaceful plain.
Shall I, possess'd of all that life requires,
With tutor'd hopes, and limited desires,
Change these sweet fields, these native scenes of ease,

For climes uncertain, and uncertain seas?

Nor yet, fair commerce, do I thee disdain,
Though guilt, and death, and riot, swell thy train.
Cheer'd by the influence of thy gladdening ray,
The liberal arts sublimer works essay.
Genius for thee relumes his sacred fires,
And science nearer to her heaven aspires.

The sanguine eye of tyranny long clos'd,
By commerce foster'd, and in peace repos'd,
No more her miseries when my country mourn'd,
With brighter flames her glowing genius burn'd.

Soon wandering fearless many a muse was seen
O'er the dun mountain, and the wild wood green.
Soon, to the warblings of the pastoral reed,
Started sweet echo from the shores of Tweed.

O favour'd stream! where thy fair current flows;
The child of nature, gentle Thomson rose.
Young as he wander'd on thy flowery side,
With simple joy to see thy bright waves glide,
Thither, in all their native charms array'd,
From climes remote the sister Seasons stray'd.

Long each in beauty boasted to excel,
(For jealousies in silver-bosoms dwell)
But now, delighted with the liberal boy,
Like heaven's fair-rivals in the groves of Troy,
Yield to an humble swain their high debate,
And from his voice the palm of beauty wait.

Her naked charms, like Venus, to disclose,
Spring from her bosom threw the shadowing rose;
Ear'd the pure snow that feeds the lover's fire,
The breast that thrills with exquisite desire;
Assum'd the tender smile, the melting eye,
The breath saxonian, and the yielding sigh.
One beautiful hand a wilding's blossom grac'd,
And one fell careless o'er her zoneless waist.

Majestic summer, in gay pride adorn'd,
Her rival sister's simple beauty scorn'd.
With purple wreaths her lofty brows were bound,
With glowing flowers her rising bosom crown'd.
In her gay zone, by artful fancy fram'd,
The bright rose blush'd, the full carnation flam'd.
Her cheeks the glow of splendid clouds display,
And her eyes flash insufferable day.

With milder air the gentle Autumn came;
But seem'd to languish at her sister's flame.
Yet, conscious of her boundless wealth, she bore
On high the emblems of her golden store.
Yet could she boast the plenty-pouring hand,
The liberal smile, benevolent and bland.
Nor might she fear in beauty to excel,
From whose fair head such golden tresses fell;
Nor might she envy summer's flowery zone,
In whose sweet eye the star of evening shone.

Next the Pale Power, that blots the golden sky, Wreath'd her grim brows, and roll'd her stormy
eye;

"Behold," she cried, with voice that shook the
ground,
(The bard, the sisters trembled at the sound)

"Ye weak admirers of a grape, or rose,
Behold my wild magnificence of snows!
See my keen frost her glassy bosom bare!
Mock the faint sun, and bind the fluid air!
Nature to you may lend a painted hour,
With you may sport, when I suspend my power.
But you and nature, who that power obey,
Shall own my beauty, or shall dread my sway."
She spoke: the bard, whose gentle heart ne'er gave

One pain or trouble that he knew to save,
No favour'd nymph extols with partial lays,
But gives to each her picture for her praise.
Mute lies his life in death's uncheerful gloom,
And truth and genius weep at Thomson's tomb.

Yet still the muse's living sounds pervade
Her ancient scenes of Caledonian shade.
Still nature listens to the tuneful lay,
On Kilg's mountain's and in Enderinay.
Th' ethereal brilliance of poetic fire,
The mighty hand that smites the sounding lyre;

Strains that on fancy's strongest pinion rise.
Conceptions vast, and thoughts that grasp the skies,
To the rapt youth that mus'd on * Shakspeare's grave,

To Ogilvie the muse of Pindar gave,
† Time, as he sung, a moment ceav'd to fly,
And lazy † sleep unfolded half his eye.

O wake, sweet bard, the Theban lyre again;
With ancient valour swell the founding strain.

Hail the high trophies by thy country won,
The wreaths that flourish for each valiant fon.

While Hardyknute frowns red with Norway's
gore,

Paint her pale matrons weeping on the shore.
Hark! the green clarion pouring floods of breath
Voluminously loud: high scorn of death
Each gallant spirit elates! see Rothsay's thane
With arm of mountain oak his firm bow strain!
Hark! the string twangs—the whizzing arrow flies;

The fierce Norse falls—indignant falls—and dies.
O'er the dear urn, wheré glorious § Wallace sleeps,
Thine valour bleeds, and patriot virtue weeps.
Son of the lyre, what high ennobling strain,
What meed from thee shall generous Wallace gain?
Who greatly scorning an usurper's pride,
Bar'd his brave breast for liberty, and died.

Boast, Scotland, boast thy sons of mighty name,
Thine ancient chiefs of high heroic fame.
Souls that to death their country's foes oppos'd,
And life in freedom, glorious freedom clos'd.

Where, yet bewail'd, Argyll's || warm ashes lie,
Let music breathe her most persuasive sigh.
To him, what Heaven to man could give, it gave,
Wife, generous, honest, eloquent and brave.
Genius and valour for Argyll shall mourn,
And his own laurels flourish round his urn.
O, may they bloom beneath a sav'ring sky,
And in their shade reproach and envy die!

THE VISIONS OF FANCY.

IN FOUR ELEGIES, 1762.

Là raison sçait que c'est un Songe,
Mais elle en faitit les douceurs:
Elle a besoin de ces fantomes,
Presque tous les plaisirs des hommes
Ne sont que de douces erreurs. GRESSET.

ELEGY I.

CHILDREN of fancy, whither are ye fled?

Where have you borne those hope-enliven'd
hours,

That once with myrtle garlands bound my head,
That once bestrew'd my vernal path with flowers?

* See Mr. Ogilvie's Ode to the Genius of Shakspeare.

† Ode to Time. Ibid.

‡ Ode to Sleep. Ibid.

§ William Wallace, who after bravely defending his country against the arms of Edward I. was executed as a rebel, though he had taken no oath of allegiance.

|| Archibald, the third Duke of Argyll, died April 15. 1761.

In yon fair vale, where blooms the beechen grove
Where winds the slow wave through the flowery
plain,

To these fold arms you led the tyrant, love,
With fear, and hope, and folly in his train.

My lyre, that, left at careless distance, hung
Light on some pale branch of the osier shade,
To lays of amorous blandishment you strung,
And o'er my sleep the lulling music play'd.

" Rest, gentle youth! while on the quivering
" breeze

" Slides to thine ear this softly breathing strain:
" Sounds that move smoother than the steps of
" ease,

" And pour oblivion in the ear of pain.

" In this fair vale eternal spring shall smile,
" And time unenvious crown each roseate hour;
" Eternal joy shall every care beguile, [flower.
" Breathe in each gale, and bloom in every

" This silver stream, that down its crystal way,
" Frequent has led thy musing steps along,
" Shall still the fame, in sunny mazes play,
" And with its murmurs melodize thy song.

" Unfading green shall these fair groves adorn;
" Those living meads immortal flowers unfold;
" In rosy smiles shall rise each blushing morn,
" And every evening close in clouds of gold.

" The tender loves that watch thy slumbering rest,
" And round the flowers and balmy myrtles
" frew, [breast,

" Shall charm, through all approaching life, thy
" With joys for ever pure, for ever new.

" The genial power that speeds the golden dart,
" Each charm of tender passion shall inspire;
" With fond affection fill the mutual heart,
" And feed the flame of ever-youth desire.

" Come, gentle loves! your myrtle garlands bring;
" The smiling bower with cluster'd roses spread;
" Come, gentle airs! with incense-dropping wing
" The breathing sweets of vernal odour shed.

" Hark, as the strains of swelling music rise,
" How the notes vibrate on the fav'ring gale!
" Auspicious glories beam along the skies,
" And powers unseen the happy moments hail!

" Ecstatic hours! so every distant day
" Like this serene on downy wings shall move;
" Rise crown'd with joys that triumph o'er decay,
" The faithful joys of fancy and of love."

ELEGY II.

AND were they vain, those soothing lays he sung?
Children of fancy! Yes, your song was vain;
On each soft air though rapt attention hung,
And silence listen'd on the sleeping plain.

The strains yet vibrate on my ravish'd ear,
And still to smile the mimic beauties seem;
Though now the visionary scenes appear,
Like the faint traces of a vanish'd dream.

Mirror of life! the glories thus depart
Of all that youth, and love, and fancy frame,

When painful anguish speeds the piercing dart,
Or envy blasts the blooming flowers of fame.

Nurse of wild wishes, and of fond desires,
The prophetess of fortune, false and vain,
To scenes where peace in ruin's arms expires
Fallacious hope deludes her hapless train.

Go, fyren, go,—thy charms on others try;
My beaten bark at length has reach'd the shore;
Yet on the rock my drooping garments lie;
And let me perish, if I trust thee more.

Come, gentle quiet! long-neglected maid!
O come, and lead me to thy mossy cell;
There unregarded in the peaceful shade,
With calm repose and silence let me dwell.

Come happier hours of sweet unanxious rest,
When all the struggling passions should subside;
When peace shall clasp me to her plumed breast,
And smooth my silent minutes as they glide.

But chief, thou goddess of the thoughtless eye,
Whom never cares or passions discompose,
O blest insensibility be nigh,
And with thy soothing hand my weary eyelids
close.

Then shall the cares of love and glory cease,
And all the fond anxieties of fancy;
Alike regardless in the arms of peace,
If these extol, or those debase a name.

In Lyttelton though all the muses praise,
His generous praise still then delight no more,
Nor the sweet magic of his tender lays
Shall touch the bosom which it charm'd before.

Nor then, though malice, with insidious guise
Of friendship, ope the unsuspecting breast;
Nor then, though envy broach her blackening lies,
Shall these deprive me of a moment's rest.

O state to be desir'd! when hostile rage
Prevails in human more than savage haunts;
When man with man eternal war will wage,
And never yield that mercy which he wants.

When dark design invades the cheerful hour;
And draws the heart with social freedom warm,
Its cares, its wishes, and its thoughts to pour,
Smiling insidious with the hopes of harm.

Vain man, to other's failings still severe,
Yet not one foible in himself can find;
Another's faults to folly's eye are clear,
But to her own e'en wisdom's self is blind.

O let me still, from these low follies free,
This fordid malice, and inglorious strife,
Myself the subject of my censure be,
And teach my heart to comment on my life.

With thee, philosophy, still let me dwell,
My tutor'd mind from vulgar meanness save;
Bring peace, bring quiet to my humble cell,
And bid them lay the green turf on my grave.

ELEGY III.

BRIGHT o'er the green hills rose the morning ray,
The wood-lark's song resounded on the plain;
Fair nature felt the warm embrace of day,
And smil'd through all her animated reign.

When young delight, of hope and fancy born,
His head on tufted wild thyme half reclin'd,
Caught the gay colours of the orient morn,
And thence of life this picture vain design'd.

“O born to thoughts, to pleasures more sublime
“Than beings of inferior nature prove!
“To triumph in the golden hours of time,
“And feel the charms of fancy and of love!

“High-favour'd man! for him unfolding fair
“In orient light this native landscape smiles;
“For him sweet hope disarms the hand of care,
“Exalts his pleasures, and his grief beguiles.

“Blows not a blossom on the breast of spring,
“Breathes not a gale along the bending mead,
“Trills not a songster of the soaring wing,
“But fragrance, health and melody succeed.

“O let me still with simple nature live,
“My lowly field-flowers on her altar lay,
“Enjoy the blessings that she meant to give,
“And calmly waste my inoffensive day!

“No titled name, no envy-teasing dome,
“No glittering wealth my tutor'd wishes crave;
“So health and peace be near my humble home,
“A cool stream murmur, and a green tree wave.

“So may the sweet Euterpe not disdain
“At Eve's chaste hour her silver lyre to bring;
“The muse of pity wake her soothing strain,
“And tune to sympathy the trembling string.

“Thus glide the pensive moments, o'er the vale
“While floating shades of dusky night descend;
“Nor left untold the lover's tender tale,
“Nor unenjoy'd the heart-enlarging friend.

“To love and friendship flow the social bowl!
“To Attic wit and elegance of mind;
“To all the native beauties of the soul,
“The simple charms of truth, and sense refin'd!

“Then to explore whatever ancient sage “Studious from nature's early volume drew,
“To chase sweet fiction through her golden age,
“And mark how fair the sun flower, science,
“blew!

“Haply to catch some spark of eastern fire,
“Hesperian fancy, or Aonian ease;
“Some melting note from Sappho's tender lyre,
“Some strain that love and Phœbus taught to “please.

“When waves the gray light o'er the mountain's
“head,
“Then let me meet the morn's first beauteous
“ray;

“Carelessly wander from my sylvan shed,
“And catch the sweet breath of the rising day.

“Nor seldom, loit'ring as I muse along,
“Mark from what flower the breeze its sweet“ness bore;

“Or listen to the labour-soothing song
“Of bees that range the thymy uplands o'er.

“Slow let me climb the mountain's airy brow,
“The green height gain'd, in musel's rapture lie,
“Sleep to the murmur of the woods below,
“Or look to nature with a lover's eye.

“ Delightful hours! O, thus for ever flow;
 “ Led by fair fancy round the varied year:
 “ So shall my breast with native raptures glow,
 “ Nor feel one pang from folly, pride, or fear.
 “ Firm be my heart to nature and to truth,
 “ Nor vainly wander from their dictates sage;
 “ So joy shall triumph on the brows of youth,
 “ So hope shall smooth the dreary paths of age.

ELEGY IV.

Oh! yet, ye dear, deluding visions stay!
 Fond hopes of innocence and fancy born!
 For you I'll cast these waking thoughts away,
 For one wild dream of life's romantic morn.
 Ah! no: the sunshine o'er each object spread
 By flattering hope, the flowers that blew so fair;
 Like the gay gardens of Armida fled,
 And vanish'd from the powerful rod of care.
 So the poor pilgrim, who in rapturous thought
 Plans his dear journey to Loretto's shrine,
 Seems on his way by guardian seraphs brought,
 Sees aiding angels favour his design.
 Ambrosial blossoms, such of old as blew
 By those fresh founts on Eden's happy plain,
 And Sharon's roses all his passage strew:
 So fancy dreams; but fancy's dreams are vain.
 Wasted and weary on the mountain's side,
 His way unknown, the hapless pilgrim lies,
 Or takes some ruthless robber for his guide,
 And prone beneath his cruel sabre dies.
 Life's morning-landscape gilt with orient light,
 Where hope and joy and fancy hold their reign,
 The grove's green wave, the blue stream sparkling bright, [vain:
 The blithe hours dancing round Hyperion's
 In radiant colours youth's free hand pourtrays,
 Then holds the flattering tablet to his eye;
 Nor thinks how soon the vernal grove decays,
 Nor sees the dark cloud gathering o'er the sky.
 Hence fancy conquer'd by the dart of pain,
 And wandering far from her Platonic shade,
 Mourns o'er the ruins of her transient reign,
 Nor unrepining sees her visions fade.
 Their parent banish'd, hence her children fly,
 Their fairy race that fill'd her festive train;
 Joy rears his wreath, and hope inverts her eye,
 And folly wonders that her dream was vain.

A POEM,

TO THE MEMORY OF MR. HANDEL, 1760*.

SPIRITS of music, and ye powers of song!
 That wak'd to painful melody the lyre,
 Of young Jeshides, when, in Zion's vale
 He wept o'er bleeding friendship: ye that mourn'd
 While freedom drooping o'er Euphrates' stream,
 Her pensive harp on the pale osier hung,
 Begin once more the sorrow-soothing lay.
 Ah! where shall now the muse fit numbers find?
 What accents pure to greet thy tuneful shade,

* He died 14th April 1759.

Sweet harmonist? 'twas thine, the tender fall
 Of pity's plaintive lay; for thee the stream
 Of silver-winding music sweeter play'd,
 And purer flow'd for thee,—all silent now
 * Those airs that, breathing o'er the breast of Thames,

Led amorous echo down the long, long vale,
 Delighted: studious from thy sweeter strain
 To melodize her own; when fancy-lorn,
 She mourns in anguish o'er the drooping breast
 Of young Narcissus. From their amber urns,
 † Parting their green locks streaming in the sun,
 The maids rose and smil'd: nor since the day,
 When first by music, and by freedom led
 From Grecian Acidale; nor since the day,
 When last from Arno's weeping fount they came,
 To smooth the ringlets of Sabrina's hair,
 Heard they like minstrelsy—fountains and shades
 Of Twit'nam, and of Windsor fam'd in fong!
 Ye heights of Clermont, and ye bowers of Ham!
 That heard the fine strain vibrate through your groves,

Ah! where were then your long-lov'd muses fled,
 When Handel breath'd no more?—and thou, sweet queen,

That nightly wrapt thy Milton's hallow'd ear
 In the soft ecstasies of Lydian airs;
 † That since attun'd to Handel's high-wound lyre
 The lay by thee suggest'd; could't not thou
 Sooth with thy sweet song the grim § fury's
 breast?

Cold-hearted death! his wanly-glaring eye
 Nor virtue's smile attract's, nor fame's loud trump
 Can pierce his iron ear, for ever barr'd

To gentle sounds: the golden voice of song,
 That charms the gloomy partner of his birth,
 That sooths despair and pain, he hears no more,
 Than rude winds, blust'ring from the Cambrian cliffs,

The traveller's feeble lay. To court fair fame,
 To toil with slow steps up the star-crown'd hill,
 Where science, leaning on her sculptur'd urn,
 Looks conscious on the secret-working hand
 Of nature: on the wings of genius borne,
 To soar above the beaten walks of life,
 Is like the paintings of an evening cloud;
 Th' amusement of an hour. Night, gloomy night
 Spreads her black wings, and all the vision dies.

Ere long, the heart, that heaves this sigh to thee,
 Shall beat no more! ere long, on this fond lay
 Which mourns at Handel's tomb, insulting time Shall strew his cankering rust. Thy strain, perchance,

Thy sacred strain shall the hoar warrior spare;
 For sounds like thine, at nature's early birth,
 Arous'd him slumbering on the dead profound
 Of dusky Chaos; by the golden harp
 Of choral angels summon'd to his race:
 And sounds like thine, when nature is no more,
 Shall call him weary from the lengthen'd toils
 Of twice ten thousand years.—O would his hand

* The water-music.

† Rorantescq. comas a fronte remotis ad aures.
OVID. MET.‡ L' Allegro and Il Penseroso, set to music by M^r.
Handel.

§ See Milton's Lycidas.

Yet spare some portion of this vital flame,
The trembling muse that now faint effort makes
On young and artless wing, should bear thy praise
Sublime, above the mortal bounds of earth,
With heavenly fire relume her feeble ray,
And, taught by seraphs, frame her song for thee.

I feel, I feel the sacred impulse—hark!
Wak'd from according lyres the sweet strains flow
In symphony divine; from air to air

The trembling numbers fly: swift bursts away
The flow of joy—now swells the flight of praise.
Springs the shrill trump aloft; the toiling chords
Melodious labour through the flying maze;
And the deep bass his strong sound rolls away,
Majestically sweet.—Yet, Handel, raise,
Yet wake to higher strains thy sacred lyre:
The name of ages, the supreme of things,
The great Messiah asks it; he whose hand
Led into form yon everlasting orbs,
The harmony of nature—He whose hand
Stretch'd o'er the wilds of space this beauteous ball,
Whose spirit breathes through all his smiling works
Music and love—yet Handel raise the strain.

Hark! what angelic sounds, what voice divine
Breathes through the ravish'd air! my rapt ear feels

The harmony of heaven. Hail sacred choir!
Immortal spirits, hail! If haply those
That erst in favour'd Palestine proclaim'd
Glory and peace: her angel-haunted groves,
Her piny mountains, and her golden vales,
Re-echo'd peace. But, oh! suspend the strains—
The swelling joy's too much for mortal bounds!
'Tis transport even to pain.

Yet, hark! what pleasing sounds invite mine ear
So venerably sweet? 'Tis Zion's lute.

Behold her * hero? from his valiant brow
Looks Judah's lion, on his thigh the sword
Of vanquish'd Apollonius—The shrill trump
Through Bethoron proclaims th' approaching fight.
I see the brave youth lead his little band,
With toil and hunger faint; yet from his arm
The rapid Syrian flies. Thus Henry once,
The British Henry, with his way-worn troop,
Subdu'd the pride of France—Now louder blows
The martial clangor; lo, Nicanor's host!
With threaten'g turrets crown'd, slowly advance
The ponderous elephants—

The blazing sun, from many a golden shield
Reflected, gleams afar. Judean chief!
How shall thy force, thy little force sustain
The dreadful shock!

† The hero comes—'Tis boundless mirth and song,
And dance and triumph; every labouring string,
And voice, and breathing shell, in concert strain,
To swell the raptures of tumultuous joy.

O master of the passions and the soul,
Séraphic Handel! how shall words describe
Thy music's countless graces, nameless powers!

When † he of Gaza, blind, and sunk in chains,
On female treachery looks greatly down,
How the breast burns indignant: in thy strain,
When sweet-voic'd piety resigns to heaven,
Glow's not each bosom with the flame of virtue?

* Judas Maccabeus.

† Chorus of youths in Judas Maccabeus.

‡ See the Oratorio of San Jen.

O'er Jephtha's votive maid, when the soft lute
Sounds the slow symphony of funeral grief,
What youthful breast but melts with tender pity?
What parent bleeds not with a parent's woe?

O, longer than this worthy lay can live!
While fame and music soothe the human ear!
Be this thy praise: to lead the polish'd mind
To virtue's noblest heights; to light the flame
Of British freedom, rouse the generous thought,
Refine the passions, and exalt the soul
To love, to heaven, to harmony, and thee.

THE ENLARGEMENT OF THE MIND.

EPISTLE I.

To General Craufurd. Written at Belvidere, 1763.

WHERE is the man, who, prodigal of mind,
In one wild wish embraces humankind?
All pride of sects, all party zeal above,
Whose priest is reason, and whose god is love;
Fair nature's friend, a foe to fraud and art—
Where is the man so welcome to my heart?

The fightless herd sequacious, who pursue
Dull folly's path, and do as others do,
Who look with purblind prejudice and scorn
On different sects, in different nations born,
Let us, my Craufurd, with compassion view,
Pity their pride, but shun their error too.

From Belvidere's fair groves, and mountains
green,

Which nature rais'd, rejoicing to be seen,
Let us, while raptur'd on her works we gaze,
And the heart riots on luxurious praise,
Th' expanded thought, the boundless wish retain,
And let not nature moralize in vain.

O sacred guide! preceptress more sublime
Than fables boasting o'er the wrecks of time!
See on each page her beauteous volume bear
The golden characters of good and fair.
All human knowledge (blush collegiate pride!)
Flows from her works, to none that reads denied:

Shall the dull inmate of pedantic walls,
On whose old walk the sunbeam seldom falls,
Who knows of nature, and of man no more
Than fills some page of antiquated lore—
Shall he, in words and terms profoundly wise,
The better knowledge of the world despise,
Think wisdom center'd in a false degree,
And scorn the scholar of humanity? [know,

Something of men these sapient drones may
Of men that liv'd two thousand years ago.
Such human monsters if the world e'er knew,
As ancient verse and ancient story drew!
If to one object, system, scene confin'd,
The sure effect is narrowness of mind.

'Twas thus St. Robert, in his lonely wood,
Forsook each social duty—to be good.
Thus Hobbes on one dear system fix'd his eyes,
And prov'd his nature wretched—to be wise.
Each zealot thus, elate with ghostly pride,
Adores his God, and hates the world beside.

Though form'd with powers to grasp this various ball,

Gods! to what meannets may the spirit fall?
Powers that should spread in reason's orient ray,
How are they darken'd, and debar'd the day?

When late where Tajo rolls his ancient tide,
Reflecting clear the mountain's purple side,

Thy genius, Craufurd, Britain's legions led,
 And fear's chill cloud forsook each bright ning head,
 By nature brave, and generous as thou art,
 Say did not human follies vex thy heart?
 Glow'd not thy breast indignant, when you saw
 The dome of murder consecrate by law?
 Where fiends, commission'd with the legal rod,
 In pure devotion, burn the works of God.
 —O change me, powers of nature, if ye can,
 Transform me, make me any thing but man.
 Yet why? This heart all human kind forgives,
 While Gillman loves me, and while Craufurd lives.

Is nature, all-benevolent, to blame,
 That half her offspring are their mother's shame?
 Did the ordain o'er this fair scene of things
 The cruelty of priests, or pride of kings? [same,
 Though worlds lie murder'd for their wealth or
 Is nature, all-benevolent, to blame?

“ Yet surely once, my friend, she seem'd to err;
 “ For W—ch—t was ”—He was not made by her.
 Sure, form'd of clay that nature held in scorn,
 By fiends constructed, and in darkness born,
 Rose the low wretch, who, despicably vile,
 Would sell his country for a courtier's smile;
 Would give up all to truth and freedom dear,
 To dine with * or some idiot peer,
 Whose mean malevolence, in dark disguise
 The man that never injur'd him belies,
 Whose actions bad and good two motives guide,
 The serpent's malice, and the coxcomb's pride.
 “ Is there a wretch so mean, so base, so low?”
 I know there is—ask W—ch—t if he know.

O that the world were emptied of its slaves!
 That all the fools were gone, and all the knaves!
 Then might we, Craufurd, with delight embrace,
 In boundless love the rest of human race.

But let not knaves misanthropy create,
 Nor feel the gall of universal hate.
 Wherever genius, truth, and virtue dwell,
 Polish'd in courts, or simple in a cell.
 All views of country, sects, and creeds apart,
 These, these I love, and hold them to my heart.

Vain of our beauteous isle, and justly vain,
 For freedom here, and health, and plenty reign,
 We different lots contemptuously compare,
 And boast, like children, of a favourite's share.

Yet though each vale a deeper verdure yields,
 Than Arno's banks, or Andalusia's fields,
 Though many a tree-crown'd mountain teems
 with ore,

Though flocks innumerable whiten every shore,
 Why should we, thus with nature's wealth elate,
 Behold her different families with hate?
 Look on her works—on every page you'll find
 Inscrib'd the doctrine of the social mind.

See countless worlds of insect being share
 Th' unenvied regions of the liberal air!
 In the same grove what music void of strife!
 Heirs of one stream what tribes of scaly life!
 See earth, and air, and fire, and flood combine
 Of general good to aid the great design!

Where Ancon drags o'er Lincoln's lurid plain,
 Like a slow snake, his dirty winding train,
 Where fogs eternal blot the face of day,
 And the lost bittera moans his gloomy way;
 As well we might, for unpropitious skies,
 The blameless native with his climate despise,

VOL. XI.

As him who still the poorer lot partakes
 Of Biscay's mountains, or Batavia's lakes.

Yet look once more on nature's various plan!
 Behold, and love her noblest creature, man!
 She, never partial, on each various zone,
 Bestow'd some portion to the rest unknown,
 By mutual interest meaning thence to bind
 In one vast chain the commerce of mankind.

Behold, ye vain disturbers of an hour!
 Ye dupes of faction! and ye tools of power!
 Poor rioter's on life's contracted stage!
 Behold, and lose your littleness of rage!
 Throw envy, folly, prejudice, behind!
 And yield to truth the empire of the mind.
 Immortal truth! O from thy radiant shrine,
 Where light created first essay'd to shine;
 Where clust'ring stars eternal beams display,
 And gems ethereal drink the golden day;
 To chase this moral, clear this sensual night,
 O shed one ray of thy celestial light!
 Teach us, while wandering through the vale below,

We know but little, that we little know.
 One beam to mole-ey'd prejudice convey,
 Let pride perceive one mortifying ray;
 Thy glass to fools, to infidels apply,
 And all the dimness of the mental eye.

Plac'd on this shore of time's far-stretching bourn,
 With leave to look on nature and return;
 While wave on wave impels the human tide,
 And ages sink, forgotten as they glide;
 Can life's short duties better be discharg'd,
 Than when we leave it with a mind enlarg'd?

Judg'd not the old philosopher aright,
 When thus ye preach, his pupils in his sight?
 “ It matters not, my friends, how low or high,
 Your little walk of transient life may lie;
 Soon will the reign of hope and fear be o'er,
 And warring passions militate no more:
 And trust me, he who having once survey'd
 The good and fair, which nature's wisdom made,
 The soonest to his former state retires,
 And feels the peace of satisfied desires,
 (Let others deem more wisely if they can)
 I look on him to be the happiest man.”

So thought the sacred sage, in whom I trust,
 Because I feel his sentiments are just,
 “Twas not in lustrous of long counted years
 That (swell'd th' alternate reign of hopes and fears;
 Not in the splendid scenes of pain and strife,
 That wisdom plac'd the dignity of life;
 To study nature was the task design'd,
 And learn from her th' enlargement of the mind;
 Learn from her works whatever truth admires,
 And sleep in death with satisfied desires.

THE ENLARGEMENT OF THE MIND.

—EPISTLE II.

To William Langborne, M. A. 1765.

LIGHT heard his voice, and, eager to obey,
 From all her orient fountains burst away.

At nature's birth, O! had the power divine
 Commanded thus the moral sun to shine,
 Beam'd on the mind all reason's influence bright,
 And the full day of intellectual light,
 Then the free soul, on truth's strong pinion born,
 Had never languish'd in this shade forlorn.

Yet thus imperfect form'd, thus blind and vain,
Doom'd by long toil a glimpse of truth to gain;
Beyond its sphere shall human wisdom go,
And boldly censure what it cannot know?
'Tis our's to cherish what Heav'n deign'd to give,
And thankful for the gift of being live.

Progressive powers, and faculties that rise
From earth's low vale, to grasp the golden skies,
Though distant far from perfect, good or fair,
Claim the due thought, and ask the grateful care.

Come, then, thou partner of my life and name,
From one dear source, whom nature form'd the same,

Ally'd more nearly in each nobler part,
And more the friend than brother of my heart!

Let us, unlike the lucid twins that rise
At different times, and shine in distant skies,
With mutual eye this mental world survey,
Mark the slow rise of intellectual day,
View reason's source, if man the source may find,
And trace each science that exalts the mind.

"Thou self-appointed lord of all below!
"Ambitious man, how little dost thou know?
"For once let fancy's towering thoughts subside;
"Look on thy birth, and mortify thy pride!
"A plaintive wretch, so blind, so helpless born,
"The brute sagacious might behold with scorn.
"How soon, when nature gives him to the day,
"In strength exulting, does he bound away!
"By instinct led, the soothing tear he finds,
"Sports in the ray, and shuns the searching winds.
"No grief he knows, he feels no groundless fear,
"Feeds without cries, and sleeps without a tear.
"Did he but know to reason and compare,
"See here the vassal, and the master there,
"What strange reflections must the scene afford,
"That show'd the weakness of his puling lord."

Thus sophistry unfolds her spacious plan,
Form'd not to humble, but depreciate man.
Unjust the censure, if unjust to rate
His pow'rs and merits from his infant state.
For, grant the children of the flowery vale
By instinct wiser, and of limbs more hale,
With equal eye their perfect state explore,
And all the vain comparison's no more.

"But why should life, so short by Heav'n ordain'd,

"Be long to thoughtless infancy confin'd—
"To thoughtless infancy, or vainly sage,
"Mourn through the languors of declining age?"
O blind to truth! to nature's wisdom blind!
And all that she directs, or Heav'n design'd!
Behold her works in cities, plains, and groves,
All life that vegetates, and life that moves!
In due proportion, as each being stays
In perfect life, it rises and decays.

Is man long helpless? Through each tender hour,
See love parental watch the blooming flow'r!
By opening charms, by beauties fresh display'd,
And sweets unfolding see that love repaid!

Has age its pains? For luxury it may—
The temperate wear insensibly away,
While sage experience, and reflection clear
Beam a gay sunshine on life's fading year.

But see from age, from infant weakness see,
That man was destin'd for society?
There from those ills a safe retreat behold,
Which young might vanquish, or afflict him old.

"That in proportion as each being stays
In perfect life, it rises and decays—
Is nature's law—to forms alone confin'd,
The laws of matter act not on the mind.
Too feebly, sure, its faculties must grow,
And reason brings her borrow'd light too slow."

O! still censorious? art thou then possess'd
Of reason's power, and does she rule thy breast?
Say what the use—had Providence assign'd
To infant years maturity of mind?
That thy pert offspring, as their father wife,
Might scorn thy precepts, and thy pow'r despise?
Or mourn, with ill-match'd faculties at strife,
O'er limbs unequal to the task of life?
To feel more sensibly the woes that wait
On every period, as on every state;
And slight, sad convicts of the painful truth,
The happier trifles of unthinking youth?

Conclude we then the progress of the mind,
Ordain'd by wisdom infinitely kind:
No innate knowledge on the soul impress'd,
No birthright instinct acting on the breast,
No natal light, no beams from heaven display'd,
Dart through the darkness of the mental shade.
Perceptive powers we hold from Heaven's decree
Alike to knowledge as to virtue free,
In both a liberal agency we bear,
The moral here, the intellectual there;
And hence in both an equal joy is known,
The conscious pleasure of an act our own.

When first the trembling eye perceives the day,
External forms on young perception play;
External forms affect the mind alone,
Their different pow'rs and properties unknown.
See the pleas'd infant court the flaming brand,
Eager to grasp the glory in its hand!
The crystal wave as eager to pervade.
Stretch its fond arms to meet the smiling shade!
When memory's call the mimic words obey,
And wing the thought that falters on its way;
When wise experience her slow verdict draws,
The sure effect exploring in her cause,
In nature's rude, but not unfruitful wild,
Reflection springs, and reason is her child:
On her fair stock the blooming cion grows,
And brighter through revolving seasons blows.

All-beauteous flow'r! immortal shalt thou shine,
When dim with age yon golden orbs decline;
Thy orient bloom, unconscious of decay,
Shall spread and flourish in eternal day.

O! with what art, my friend, what early care,
Should wisdom cultivate a plant so fair!
How should her eye the rip'ning mind revise,
And blast the buds of folly as they rise!
How should her hand with industry restrain,
The thriving growth of passion's fruitful train,
Aspiring weeds, whose lofty arms would tower
With fatal shade o'er reason's tender flow'r.

From low pursuits the ductile mind to save,
Creeds that contract, and vices that enslave;
O'er life's rough seas its doubtful course to steer,
Unbroke by avarice, bigotry, or fear!
For this fair science spreads her light afar,
And fills the bright urn of her eastern star.
The liberal power in no sequester'd cells,
No moonshine court of dreaming schoolmen dwells,
Distinguish'd far her lofty temple stands,
Where the tall mountain looks o'er distant lands;

All round her throne the graceful arts appear,
That boast the empire of the eye or ear.

See favour'd first, and nearest to the throne
By the rapt mien of musing silence known,
Fled from herself, the pow'r of numbers plac'd,
Her wild thoughts watch'd by harmony and taste.

There (but at distance never meant to vie)
The full-form'd image glancing on her eye,
See lively painting! on her various face,
Quick-gliding forms a moment find a place;
She looks, she acts the character she gives,
And a new feature in each feature lives.

See Attic ease in sculpture's graceful air,
Half loose her robe, and half unbound her hair;
To life, to life, the smiling seems to call,
And down her fair hands negligently fall.

Last, but not meanest of the glorious choir,
See music, list'ning to an angel's lyre.

Simplicity, their beauteous handmaid drest
By nature, bears a field-flower on her breast.

O arts divine! O magic powers that move
The springs of truth, enlarging truth, and love!
Lost in their charms each mean attachment ends,
And taste and knowledge thus are virtue's friends.

Thus nature deigns to sympathise with art,
And leads the moral beauty to the heart;
There, only there, that strong attraction lies,
Which wakes the soul, and bids her graces rise;
Lives in those powers of harmony that bind
Congenial hearts, and stretch from mind to mind:
Glow'd in that warmth, that social kindness gave,
Which once—the rest is silence and the grave.

O tears, that warm from wounded friendship
flow!

O thoughts that wake to monuments of woe!
Reflection keen, that points the painful dart;
Mem'ry, that speeds its passage to the heart;
Sad monitors, your cruel power suspend,
And hide, for ever hide, the buried friend:
—In vain—confest I see my Craufurd stand,
And the pen falls—falls from my trembling hand,
E'en death's dim shadow seeks to hide in vain,
That lib'ral aspect, and that smile humane;
E'en death's dim shadow wears a languid light,
And his eye beams through everlasting night.

Till the last sigh of genius shall expire,
His keen eye faded, and extinct his fire,
Till time, in league with envy and with death,
Blast the skill'd hand, and stop the tuneful breath,
My Craufurd still shall claim the mournful song,
So long remember'd, and bewail'd so long.

ODE

TO THE RIVER EDEN *. 1759.

DELIGHTFUL Eden! parent stream,
Yet shall the maids of memory say,
(When, led by fancy's fairy dream,
My young steps trac'd thy winding way)
How oit along thy mazy shore,
That many a gloomy alder bore,
In pensive thought their poet stray'd;
Or, careless thrown thy bank beside,
Beheld thy dimly waters glide,
Bright through the trembling shade,

* In the county of Westmoreland.

Yet shall they paint those scenes again,
Where once with infant-joy he play'd
And bending o'er thy liquid plain,
The azure worlds below survey'd:
Led by the rosy-handed hours,
When time tripp'd o'er yon bank of flowers,
Which in thy crystal bosom smil'd;
Though old the god, yet light and gay,
He flung his glads and scythe away,
And seem'd himself a child.

The poplar tall, that waving near
Would whisper to thy murmurs free;
Yet rustling seems to sooth mine ear,
And trembles when I sigh for thee,
Yet seated on thy shelving brim,
Can fancy see the naiads trim
Burnish their green locks in the sun;
Or at the last lone hour of day,
To chase the lightly glancing fay,
In airy circles run.

But, fancy, can thy mimic power
Again those happy moments bring?
Canst thou restore that golden hour,
When young joy wav'd his laughing wing?
When first in Eden's rosy vale,
My full heart pour'd the lover's tale,
The vow sincere, devoid of guile!
While Delia in her panting breast,
With sighs the tender thought suppress,
And look'd as angels smile.

O goddess of the crystal bow,
That dwell'st the golden meads among;
Whose streams still fair in memory flow,
Whose murmurs melodise my song!
Oh! yet those gleams of joy display,
Which brightening glow'd in fancy's ray,
When near the lucid urn reclin'd,
The dryad, nature, bar'd her breast,
And left, in naked charms impress,
Her image on my mind.

In vain—the maids of memory fair
No more in golden visions play;
No friendship smooths the brow of care,
No Delia's smile approves my lay.
Yet, love and friendship lost to me,
'Tis yet some joy to think of thee,
And in thy breast this moral find—
That life, though stain'd with sorrow's showers,
Shall flow serene, while virtue pours
Her sunshine on the mind.

AUTUMNAL ELEGY.

TO ————. 1763.

WHILE yet my poplar yields a doubtful shade,
Its last leaves trembling to the zephyr's sigh,
On this fair plain, ere every verdure fade,
Or the last smiles of golden autumn die;
Wilt thou, my ———, at this pensive hour,
O'er nature's ruins hear thy friend complain;
While his heart labours with th' inspiring power,
And from his pen spontaneous flows the strain?
Thy gentle breast shall melt with kindred sighs,
Yet haply grieving o'er a parent's bier;

Poets are nature's children: when she dies
Affection mourns, and duty drops a tear.

Why are ye silent, brethren of the grove,
Fond Philomel, thy many-chorded lyre
So sweetly tun'd to tenderness and love,
Shall love no more, or tenderness inspire?

O, mix once more thy gentle lays with mine!
For well our passions, well our notes agree:
An absent love, sweet bird, may soften thine;
An absent love demands a tear from me.

Yet, ere we slumber, songsters of the sky,
Through the long night of winter, wild and drear:
O, let us tune, ere love and fancy die,
One tender farewell to the fading year!

Farewell ye wild hills, scatter'd o'er with spring!
Sweet solitude, where Flora smil'd unseen!
Farewell each breeze of balmy-burden'd wing!
The violet's blue bank, and the tall wood green!

Ye tuneful groves of Belvidere adieu! [rest!
Kind shades, that whisper o'er my Craufurd's
From courts, from senates, and from camps to you,
When fancy leads him, no inglorious guest.

Dear shades, adieu! where late the moral muse,
Led by the dryad, silence, oft reclin'd,
Taught meanness to extend her little views,
And look on nature to enlarge her mind.

Farewell the walk along the woodland vale!
Flower-feeding rills in murmurs drawn away!
Farewell the sweet breath of the early gale,
And the dear glories of the closing day!

The nameless charms of high, poetic thought,
That spring's green hours to fancy's children
bore;

The words divine, imagination wrote
On slumber's light leaf, by the murmuring shore.

All, all adieu: from autumn's sober power
Fly the dear dreams of spring's delightful reign;
Gay summer strips her rosy-mantled bower,
And rude winds waste the glories of her train,

Yet autumn yields her joys of humbler kind;
Sad o'er her golden ruins as we stray,
Sweet melancholy soothes the musing mind,
And nature's charms, delightful in decay.

All-bounteous Power, whom happy worlds adore,
With every scene some grateful change she brings—

In winter's wild snows, autumn's golden store,
In glowing summers, and in blooming springs!

O most belov'd! the fairest and the best
Of all her works! may still thy lover find
Fair nature's frankness in thy gentle breast;
Like her be various, but like her be kind.

Then, when the spring of smiling youth is o'er;
When summer's glories yields to autumn's sway;
When golden autumn sinks in winter's hoar;
And life declining yields its last weak ray;

In thy lov'd arms my fainting age shall close,
On thee my fond eye bend its trembling light:
Remembrance sweet shall soothe my last repose,
And my soul bless thee in eternal night.

TO THE SAME. 1763.

WHEN pale beneath the frowning shade of death,
No soothing voice of love or friendship nigh,
While strong convulsions seiz'd the lab'ring breath,
And life suspended left each vacant eye;

Where, in that moment, fled th' immortal mind?
To what new region did the spirit stray?
Found it some bosom hospitably kind,
Some breast that took the wanderer in its way?

To thee my —, in that deathful hour,
To thy dear bosom it once more return'd;
And wrapt in —'s solitary bower,
The ruins of its former mansion mourn'd.

But didst thou, kind and gentle as thou art,
O'er thy pale lover shed the generous tear?
From those sweet eyes did pity's softness start,
When fancy laid him on the lowly bier?

Didst thou to Heav'n address the forceful prayer,
Fold thy fair hands, and raise the mournful eye,
Implore each power benevolent to spare,
And call down pity from the golden sky?

O, born at once to bless me and to save,
Exalt my life, and dignify my lay!
Thou too shalt triumph o'er the mouldering grave,
And on thy brow shall bloom the deathless bay.

Dear shades of genius! heirs of endless fame!
That in your laureat crowns the myrtle wave,
Snatch'd from oblivion beauty's sacred name,
And grew immortal in the arms of love!

O, may we meet you in some happier clime!
Some safer vale beneath a genial sky!
Whence all the woes that load the wing of time,
Disease, and death, and fear, and frailty fly!

TO THE SAME.

The Complaint of her Ring-Dove.

FAR from the smiles of blue hesperian skies,
Far from those vales, where flowery pleasures dwell,
(Dear scenes of freedom lost to these sad eyes!)
How hard to languish in this lonely cell!

When genial gales relume the sites of love;
When laughing spring leads round the jocund year;

Ah, view with pity, gentle maid, your dove,
From every heart-felt joy secluded here!

To me no more the laughing spring looks gay;
Nor annual loves relume my languid breast;
Time slowly drags the long, delightful day,
Through one dull scene of solitary rest.

Ah! what avails that dreaming fancy roves
Through the wild beauties of her native reign!
Breathes in green fields, and feeds in freshening
groves,
To wake to anguish in this hopeless chain?

Though fondly sooth'd with pity's tenderest care,
Though still by —'s gentle hand caress'd,
For the free forest, and the boundless air,
The rebel, nature, murmurs in my breast.

Ah, let not nature, —, plead in vain!
 For kindness, sure, should grace a form so fair:
 Restore me to my native wilds again,
 To the free forest, and the boundless air.

TO THE SAME.

SONNET.

In the Manner of Petrarch. 1765.

ON thy fair morn, O hope-inspiring May!
 The sweetest twins that ever nature bore,
 Where ——— vale her field-flower garland wove,
 Young love and fancy met the genial day.
 And, as on the thyme-green bank I lay,
 A nymph of gentlest mien their train before,
 Came with a smile; and, swain, she cried, no
 more
 To pensive sorrow tune thy hopeless lay.
 Friends of thy heart, see love and fancy bring
 Each joy that youth's enchanted bosom warms!
 Delight, that rises all the fragrant spring!
 Fair-handed hope, that paints unfading charms!
 And dove-like faith, that waves her silver wing.—
 These, swain, are thine; for ——— meets thy arins.

TO THE SAME.

Wrapped round a Nefegay of Violets. 1761.

DEAR object of my late and early prayer!
 Source of my joy, and solace of my care!
 Whose gentle friendship such a charm can give,
 As makes me wish, and tells me how to live!
 To thee the muse with grateful hand would bring
 These first fair children of the doubtful spring.
 O may they, fearless of a varying sky,
 Bloom on thy breast, and smile beneath thine eye!
 In fairer lights their vivid blue display,
 And sweeter breathe their little lives away!

TO THE SAME.

On the Moral Reflections contained in her Answer to the above Verses. 1761.

SWEET moralist! whose moving truths impart
 At once delight and anguish to my heart!
 Though human joys their short-liv'd sweets exhale,
 Like the wan beauties of the wasted vale;
 Yet trust the muse, fair friendship's flower shall last,
 When life's short sunshine, like its storms, is past;
 Bloom in the fields of some ambrosial shore,
 Where time, and death, and sickness, are no more.

WRITTEN IN A COLLECTION OF MAPS.
 1765.

REALMS of this globe, that ever-circling run,
 And rise alternate to embrace the sun;
 Shall I with envy at my lot repine,
 Because I boast so small a portion mine?
 If e'er in thought of Andalusia's vines,
 Golconda's jewels, or Potofi's mines;
 If these, or those, if vanity forgot
 The humbler blessings of my little lot;

Then may the stream that murmurs near my door,
 The waving grove that loves its mazy shore,
 Withhold each soothing pleasure that they gave,
 No longer murmur, and no longer wave!

THEODOSIUS TO CONSTANTIA. 1760.

LET others seek the lying aids of art,
 And bribe the passions to betray the heart;
 Truth, sacred truth, and faith unskill'd to feign;
 Fill my fond breast, and prompt my artless strain.
 Say, did thy lover, in some happier hour,
 Each ardent thought in wild profusion pour;
 With eager fondness on thy beauty gaze,
 And talk with all the ecstacy of praise?
 The heart sincere its pleasing tumult prov'd;
 All, all declar'd that Theodosius lov'd.
 Let raptur'd fancy on that moment dwell,
 When thy dear vows in trembling accents fell;
 When love acknowledg'd wak'd the tender sigh,
 Swell'd thy full breast, and fill'd thy melting eye.
 O! blest for ever be th' auspicious day,
 Dance all its hours in pleasure's golden ray!
 Pale sorrow's gloom from every eye depart!
 And laughing joy glide lightly through the heart!
 Let village-maids their festive brows adorn,
 And with fresh garlands meet the smiling morn;
 Each happy swain, by faithful love repaid,
 Pour his warm vows, and court his village-maid.

Yet shall the scene to ravish'd memory rise:
 Constantia present, yet shall meet these eyes;
 On her fair arm her beauteous head reclin'd,
 Her locks flung careless to the sportful wind.
 While love and fear contending in her face,
 Flush every rose, and heighten every grace.
 O never, while of life and hope possess't,
 May this dear image quit my faithful breast!
 The painful hours of absence to beguile,
 May thus Constantia look, Constantia smile!

ELEGY. 1760.

THE eye of nature never rests from care;
 She guards her children with a parent's love;
 And not a mischief reigns in earth or air,
 But time destroys, or remedies remove.
 In vain no ill shall haunt the walks of life,
 No vice in vain the human heart deprave,
 The pois'nous flower, the tempest's raging strife,
 From greater pain, from greater ruin save.
 Lavinia, form'd with every powerful grace,
 With all that lights the flame of young desire;
 Pure ease of wit, and elegance of face,
 A soul of fancy, and an eye all fire.
 Lavinia!—Peace, my busy fluttering breast!
 Nor fear to languish in thy former pain:
 At length she yields—she yields the needful rest;
 And frees her lover from his galling chain.
 The golden star, that leads the radiant morn,
 Looks not so fair, fresh-rising from the main;
 But her bent eyebrow bears forbidding scorn,
 But pride's fell furies every heart-string strain.
 Lavinia, thanks to thee with ungentle mind;
 I now behold thee with indifferent eyes;
 And reason dares, thou love as death be hind,
 Thy gay, thy worthles being to despise.

Beauty may charm without one inward grace,
And fair proportions win the captive heart;
But let rank pride the pleasing form debase,
And love disgusted breaks his erring dart.

The youth that once the sculptur'd nymph admir'd,

Had look'd with scornful laughter on her charms,
If the vain form, with recent life inspir'd,
Had turn'd disdainful from his offer'd arms.

Go, thoughtless maid! of transient beauty vain,
Feed the high thought, the towering hope extend;

Still may'st thou dream of splendour in thy train,
And smile superb, while love and flattery bend.

For me, sweet peace shall sooth my troubled mind,
And easy slumbers close my weary eyes;
Since reason dares, though love as death be blind,
Thy gay, thy worthless being to despise.

INSCRIPTION ON THE DOOR OF A STUDY.

O THOU that shalt presume to tread
This mansion of the mighty dead,
Come with the free, untainted mind;
The nurse, the pedant leave behind;
And all that superstition, fraught
With folly's lore, thy youth has taught—
Each thought that reason can't retain—
Leave it, and learn to think again.
Yet, while thy studious eyes explore;
And range these various volumes o'er,
'Trust blindly to no fav'rite pen,
Remembering authors are but men.
Has fair philosophy thy love?
Away! she lives in yonder grove.
If the sweet muse thy pleasure gives,
With her, in yonder grove, she lives:
And if religion claims thy care,
Religion, fled from books, is there.
For first from nature's works we drew
Our knowledge, and our virtue too.

TO LORD GRANBY.

In spite of all the rusty fools
That glean old nonsense in the schools;
Nature, a mistress, never coy,
Has wrote on all her works—enjoy.
Shall we then starve, like Gideon's wife,
And die to save a makeweight's life?
No, friend of nature, you disdain,
So fair a hand should work in vain.

But, good my lord, make her your guide,
And err not on the other side:
Like her, in all you deign to do,
Be liberal, but be sparing too.

When fly Sir Toby, night by night,
With his dear bags regales his sight;
And conscience, reason, pity, sleep,
Though virtue pine, though merit weep;
I see the keen reproaches fly
Indignant from your honest eye;
Each bounteous wish glows unconfin'd,
And your breast labours to be kind.

At this warm hour, my lord, beware
The servile flatterer's specious snare,

The fawning sycophant, whose art
Marks the kind motions of the heart;
Each idle, each insidious knave,
That acts the graceful, wife, or brave.

With festive beard, and social eye,
You've seen old hospitality;
Mounted astride the moss-grown wall,
The genius of the ancient hall.
So reverend, with such courtly glee,
He serv'd your noble ancestry;
And turn'd the hinge of many a gate,
For Ruffel, Rous, Plantagenet.
No lying porter levied there
His dues on all imported ware;
There, rang'd in rows, no livery'd train
E'er begg'd their master's beef again;
No flatterer's planetary face
'Plied for a bottle, or a place,
Toad-eating France, and fiddling Rome,
Kept their lean rascals starv'd at home.

"Thrice happy days!"

In this, 'tis true,

Old times werè better than the new;
Yet some egregious faults you'll see
In ancient hospitality.
See motley crowds, his roof beneath,
Put poor society to death!
Priests, knights, and 'squires, debating wild,
On themes unworthy of a child;
Till the strange compliment commences,
To praise their host, and lose their senses.

Go then, my lord! keep open hall;
Proclaim your table free for all;
Go, sacrifice your time, your wealth,
Your patience, liberty, and health,
To such a thought-renouncing crew,
Such foes to care—even care for you.

"Heav'n's! and are these the plagues that wait

"Around the hospitable gate—
"Let tenfold iron bolt my door,
"And the gaunt mastiff growl before;
"There, not one human creature nigh,
"Save, dear Sir Toby, you and I,
"In cynic silence let us dwell;
"Ye plagues of social life farewell!"

Displeases this? The modern way,
Perhaps, may please—a public day.

"A public day! detested name!
"The farce of friendship, and the shame.
"Did ever social freedom come
"Within the pale of drawing-room?
"See pictur'd round the formal crowd!
"How nice, how just each attitude!
"My lord approaches—what surprise!
"The pictures speak, the pictures rise!
"Thrice ten times told, the same salute,
"Once more the mimic forms the mute.
"Meanwhile the envious rows between,
"Distrust and scandal walk unseen;
"Their poisons silently insufe,
"Till these suspect, and those abuse.
"Far, far from these, in some lone shade,
"Let me, in easy silence laid,
"Where never fools, or slaves intrude,
"Enjoy the sweets of solitude!"
What, quit the commerce of mankind?
Leave virtue, fame, and worth behind!

Who fly to solitary rest,
 Are reason's savages at best.
 Though human life's extensive field
 Wild weeds, and vexing brambles yield;
 Behold her smiling vallies bear
 Mellifluous fruits, and flowers fair!
 The crowds of folly you despise—
 Associate with the good and wife;
 For virtue, rightly understood,
 Is to be wight, and to be good.

MONODY. 1759.

Ah, scenes belov'd! ah, conscious shades,
 That wave these parent-vales along!
 Ye bowers, where fancy met the tuneful maids,
 Ye mountains vocal with my Doric song,
 Teach your wild echoes to complain
 In sighs of solemn woe, in broken sounds of pain.
 For her I mourn,
 Now the cold tenant of the thoughtless urn—
 For her bewail these streams of woe,
 For her these filial sorrows flow;
 Source of my life, that led my tender years
 With all a parent's pious fears;
 That nurs'd my infant thought, and taught my mind to grow.

Careful she mark'd each dangerous way,
 Where youth's unwary footsteps stray:
 She taught the struggling passions to subside;
 Where sacred truth and reason guide,
 In virtue's glorious path to seek the realms of day.

Lamented goodness! yet I see
 The fond affection melting in her eye:
 She bends its tearful orb on me,
 And heaves the tender sigh;
 As thoughtful, she the toils surveys,
 That crowd in life's perplexing maze,
 And for her children feels again
 All, all that love can fear, and all that fear can feign.

O best of parents! let me pour
 My sorrows o'er thy silent bed:
 There early strew the vernal flower,
 The parting tear at evening shed—
 Alas! are these the only meed
 Of each kind thought, each virtuous deed,
 These fruitless offerings that embalm the dead?

Then, fairy-seated hope, forbear—
 No more thy fond illusions spread;
 Thy shadowy scenes dissolv'd in air,
 Thy visionary prospects fled;
 With her they fled, at whose lamented shrine,
 Love, gratitude, and duty, mingled tears,
 Condemn'd each filial office to resign, [years.
 Nor hopeful more to sooth her long-declining

TO MRS. ———

In Tears for the Death of a Friend. 1762.

So feeble nature weeps o'er friendship's grave,
 And mourns the rigour of that law she gave:
 Yet, why not weep? When in that grave expire
 All Pembroke's elegance, all Waldegrave's fire.
 No more those eyes in soft effulgence move,
 No more that bosom feels the spark of love.

O'er those pale cheeks the drooping graces mourn,
 And fancy tears her wild wreath o'er that urn.
 There hope at heav'n once cast a doubtful eye,
 Content repin'd, and patience stole a sigh.
 Fair friendship griev'd o'er ———'s sacred bier,
 And virtue wept, for ——— dropt a tear.

TO MRS. GILLMAN.

With sense enough for half your sex beside,
 With just no more than necessary pride;
 With knowledge caught from nature's living page,
 Politely learn'd, and elegantly sage—
 Alas! how piteous, that in such a mind
 So many foibles free reception find!
 Can such a mind, ye gods! admit disdain?
 Be partial, envious, covetous, and vain?
 Unwelcome truth! to love, to blindness clear!
 Yet Gillman, hear it;—while you blush to hear—
 That in your gentle breast disdain can dwell,
 Let knavery, meanness, pride that feel it, tell!
 With partial eye a friend's defects you see,
 And look with kindness on my faults and me.
 And does no envy that fair mind o'ershade?
 Does no short sigh for greater wealth invade;
 When silent merit wants the fostering meed,
 And the warm wish suggests the virtuous deed?
 Fairly the charge of vanity you prove,
 Vain of each virtue of the friends you love.

What charms, what arts of magic have conspir'd
 Of power to make so many faults admir'd?

FRAGMENT OF A POEM,

*Written at Clare-Hall, on the King's Accession.
 1760.*

.....

WHILE every gale the voice of triumph brings,
 And smiling victory waves her purple wings;
 While earth and ocean yield their subject powers,
 Neptune his waves and Cybele her towers;
 Yet will you deign the muse's voice to hear,
 And let her welcome greet a monarch's ear?
 Yes; 'midst the toils of glory ill-repaid,
 Oft has the monarch sought her soothing aid.
 See Frederic court her in the rage of war,
 Though rapid vengeance urge his hostile car:
 With her repos'd in philosophic rest,
 The sage's sunshine smooths the warrior's breast.

Whate'er Arcadian fancy feign'd of old
 Of halcyon days, and minutes plum'd with gold;
 Whate'er adorn'd the wisest, gentlest reign,
 From you she hopes—let not her hopes be vain!
 Rise ancient fons! advance Pierian days!
 Flow Attic streams! and spring Aonian bays!
 Cam, down thy wave in brulker mazes glide,
 And see new honours crown thy hoary side!
 Thy offers old see myrtle groves succeed!
 And the green laurel meet the waving reed!

.....

CÆSAR'S DREAM.

BEFORE HIS INVASION OF BRITAIN. 1758.

WHEN rough Helvetia's hardy sons obey,
 And vanquish'd Belgia bows to Cæsar's sway;

When scarce-beheld, embattled nations fall,
The fierce Sicambrian, and the faithless Gaul:
Tir'd freedom leads her savage sons no more,
But flies, subdued, to Albion's utmost shore.

'Twas then, while filibess grafp'd the sleeping
air,

And dewy slumbers seal'd the eye of care;
Divine ambition to her votary came;
Her left hand waving, bore the trump of fame;
Her right a regal sceptre seem'd to hold,
With gems far-blazing from the burnish'd gold.
And thus, " My son," the queen of glory said;
' Immortal Cæsar, raise thy languid head.
' Shall night's dull chains the man of counsels
" bind ?

" Or Morpheus rule the monarch of mankind ?
" See worlds unvanquish'd yet await thy sword !
" Barbaric lands, that scorn a Latian lord !
" See yon proud isle, whose mountains meet the " sky,

" Thy foes encourage, and thy power defy !
" What, though by nature's firmest bars secur'd,
" By seas encircled, and with rocks immur'd,
" Shall Cæsar shrink the greatest toils to brave,
" Scale the high rock, or beat the maddening
" wave ?"

She spoke—her words the warrior's breast inflame

With rage indignant, and with conscious shame ;
Already beat, the swelling floods give way,
And the fell genii of the rocks obey.

Already shouts of triumph rend the skies,
And the thin rear of barbarous nations flies.

Quick round their chief his active legions stand,
Dwell on his eye, and wait the waving hand :
The hero rose, majestically flow,
And look'd attention to the crowds below.

' Romans and friends ! is there who seeks for ' rest,

' By labours vanquish'd, and with wounds oppress'd ?
' That spite Cæsar shall with pleasure yield,

' Due to the toils of many a well-fought field.

' Is there, who shrinks at thought of dangers past,

' The ragged mountain, or the pathless waste—

' While savage hells, or savage floods oppose,

' Or shivering fancy pines in Alpine snows ?

' Let him retire to Latium's peaceful shore ;

' He once has toil'd, and Cæsar asks no more.

' Is there a Roman, whose unshaken breast

' No pains have conquer'd, and no fears depress'd ?

' Who, doom'd through death's dread ministers
' to go,

' Dares to chastise the insults of a foe ;

' Let him, his country's glory and her stay,

' With reverence hear her, and with pride obey.

' A form divine, in heavenly splendour bright,

' Whose look threw radiance round the pall of
' night,

' With calm severity approach'd and said,

' Wake thy dull ear, and lift thy languid head.

' What ! shall a Roman sink in soft repose,

' And tamely see the Britons aid his foes ?

' See them secure the rebel Gaul supply ;

' Spurn his vain eagles and his power defy ?

' Go ! burst their barriers, obstinately brave ;

' Scale the wild rock, and beat the maddening
" wave."

Here paus'd the chief, but waited no reply.
The voice assenting spoke from every eye ;
Nor, as the kindness that reproach'd with fear,
Were dangers dreadful, or were toils severe.

INSCRIPTION

IN A TEMPLE OF SOCIETY.

SACRED rise these walls to thee,
Blithe-ey'd nymph, society !
In whose dwelling, free and fair,
Converse smooths the brow of care.

Who, when waggish wit betray'd
To his arms a sylvan maid,
All beneath a myrtle tree,
In some vale of Arcady,
Sprung, I ween, from such embrace,
The lovely contrast in her face.

Perchance, the muses as they stray'd,
Seeking other spring, or shade,
On the sweet child cast an eye
In some vale of Arcady ;
And blitheest of the sisters three,
Gave her to Euphrosyne.

The grace, delighted, taught her care
The cordial smile the placid air ;

How to chafe, and how restrain
All the fleet, ideal train ;
How with apt words well combin'd,
To dress each image of the mind—

Taught her how they disagree,
Awkward fear and modesty,
And freedom and rusticity.

True politeness how to know
From the superficial show ;
From the coxcomb's shallow grace,
And the many modell'd face :
That nature's unaffected ease
More than studied forms would please—
When to check the sportive vein :
When to fancy yield the rein,
On the subject when to be
Grave or gay, reserv'd or free :
The speaking air, th' impassion'd eye,
The living soul of symmetry ;
And that soft sympathy which binds
In magic chains congenial minds.

INSCRIPTION

IN A SEQUESTERED GROTTTO. 1763.

SWEET peace, that lov'st the silent hour,

The still retreat of leisure free ;

Associate of each gentle power,

And eldest born of harmony !

O, if thou own'st this mossy cell,

If thine this mansion of repose ;

Permit me, nymph, with thee to dwell,

With thee my wakeful eye to close.

And though those glittering scenes should fade,

That pleasure's rosy train prepares ;—

What vot'ry have they not betray'd ?

What are they more than splendid cares ?

But smiling days exempt from care,
 But nights, when sleep, and silence reign;
 Serenity with aspect fair.
 And love and joy are in thy train.

ANOTHER INSCRIPTION,

IN THE SAME GROTTO. 1756.

O FAIREST of the village born,
 Content, inspire my careless lay!
 Let no vain wish, no thought forlorn
 Throw darkness o'er the smiling day.
 Forgett'st thou, when we wander'd o'er
 The sylvan Belau's * sedgey shore,
 Or rang'd the woodland fairs along;
 How oft on Herclay's † mountains high
 We've met the morning's purple eye,
 Delay'd by many a song?
 From thee, from those by fortune led;
 To all the farce of life consiu'd;
 At once each native pleasure fled,
 For thou, sweet nymph, was left behind.
 Yet could I once, once more survey
 Thy comely form in mantle gray,
 Thy polish'd brow, thy peaceful eye;
 Where'er, forsaken fair, you dwell,
 Though in this dim sequester'd cell,
 With thee I'd live and die.

LEFT WITH THE MINISTER OF RIPON-DEN,

A ROMANTIC VILLAGE IN YORKSHIRE. 1758.

THRICE happy you, whose'er you are,
 From life's low cares secluded far,
 In this sequester'd vale—!
 Ye rocks on precipices pill'd!
 Ye ragged deserts, waste and wild!
 Delightful horrors hail!

What joy within these sunless groves,
 Where lonely contemplation roves,
 To rest in fearless ease!
 Save weeping rills, to see no tear,
 Save dying gales no sigh to hear,
 No murmur but the breeze.

Say, would you change that peaceful cell
 Where sanctity and silence dwell,
 For splendour's dazzling blaze?
 For all those gilded toys that glare
 Round high-born power's imperial chair,
 Inviting fools to gaze?

Ah friend! ambition's prospects close,
 And, studious of your own repose,
 Be thankful here to live;
 For, trust me, one protecting shed
 And nightly peace, and daily bread
 Is all that life can give.

* A small river in Westmoreland.
 † A romantic village in the abovementioned county, formerly the seat of the Herclays, Earls of Carlisle.

WRITTEN AMONGST THE RUINS OF

PONTECRAFT CASTLE. 1756.

RIGHT sung the bard, that all-involving age,
 With hand impartial deals the ruthless blow;
 That war, wide-wasting, with impetuous rage,
 Lays the tall spire, and sky-crown'd turret low.

A pile stupendous, once of fair renown,
 This mould'ring mass of shapeless ruin rose,
 Where nodding heights of fractur'd columns
 frown,
 And birds obscene in ivy bow'rs repose

Oft the pale matron from the threat'ning wall,
 Suspicious, bids her heedless children fly;
 Oft, as he views the meditated fall,
 Full swiftly steps the frightened peasant by.

But more respectful views th' historic sage,
 Musing, these awful relics of decay,
 That once a refuge form'd from hostile rage,
 In Henry's and in Edward's dubious day.

He pensive oft reviews the mighty dead,
 That erst have trod this desolated ground;
 Reflects how here unhappy Salisbury bled,
 When faction aim'd the death-dispensing wound,

Rest, gentle rivers! and ill-fated Gray!
 A flow'r or tear oft strews your humble grave,
 Whom envy slew, to pave ambition's way,
 And whom a monarch wept in vain to save.

Ah! what avail'd th' alliance of a throne?
 The pomp of titles what, or pow'r rever'd!
 Happier! to these the humble life unknown,
 With virtue honour'd, and by peace endear'd.

Had thus the sons of bleeding Britain thought,
 When hapless here inglorious Richard lay,
 Yet many a prince, whose blood full dearly bought
 The shameful triumph of the long-fought day:

Yet many a hero whose defeated hand
 In death resign'd the well-contested field,
 Had in his offspring sav'd a sinking land,
 The tyrant's terror, and the nation's shield.

Ill could the muse indignant grief forbear,
 Should mem'ry trace her bleeding country's woes;

Ill could she count, without a bursting tear,
 Th' inglorious triumphs of the vary'd rose!

While York, with conquest and revenge elate,
 Insulting triumphs on St. Alban's plain,
 Who views, nor pities Henry's hapless fate,
 Himself a captive, and his leaders slain?

Ah prince! unequal to the toils of war,
 To stem ambition, faction's rage to quell;
 Happier! from these had fortune plac'd thee far,
 In some lone convent, or some peaceful cell.

For what avail'd that thy victorious queen
 Repair'd the ruins of that dreadful day?
 That vanquish'd York, on Wakefield's purple
 green,

Prostrate amidst the common slaughter lay:

In vain fair vict'ry beam'd the glad'ning eye,
And, waving oft, her golden pinions, smil'd :
Full soon the flatt'ring goddess meant to fly,
Full rightly deem'd unsteady fortune's child.

Let Towton's field—but cease the dismal tale :
For much its horrors would the muse appal,
In softer strains suffice it to bewail
The patriot's exile, or the hero's fall.

Thus silver Wharf *, whose crystal-sparkling urn
Reflects the brilliance of his blooming shore,
Still, melancholy-mazing, seems to mourn,
But rolls, confus'd, a crimson wave no more.

FRAGMENT. 1762.

'Twas on time's birth-day, when the voice divine

Wak'd sleeping nature, while her infant eye,
Yet trembling, struggled with created light ;
The heav'n-born muse, sprung from the source sublime

Of harmony immortal, first receiv'd
Her sacred mandate. " Go, seraphic maid,
" Companion still to nature! from her works
" Derive thy lay melodious; great like those,
" And elegantly simple. In thy train,
" Glory, and deathless fame and fair renown
" Attendant ever, each immortal name,
" By thee deem'd sacred, to yon starry vault
" Shall bear, and stamp in characters of gold.
" Be thine the care, alone where truth directs
" The firm heart, where the love of human kind
" Inflames the patriot spirit, there to sooth
" The toils of virtue with melodious praise:
" For those, that smiling seraph bids thee wake
" His golden lyre; for those, the young-ey'd fun
" Gilds this fair-formed world; and genial spring
" Throws many a green wreath, liberal, from his
" bosom."

So spake the voice divine; the raptur'd muse
In strains like these, but nobler, fram'd her lay.
Spirits of ancient time, to high renown
By martial glory rais'd, and deeds august,
Atchiev'd for Britain's freedom! patriot hearts,
That, fearless of a tyrant's threatening arm,
Embrac'd your bleeding country! o'er the page,
Where history triumphs in your holy names,
O'er the dim monuments that mark your graves,
Why streams my eye with pleasure †? 'tis the joy
The soft delight that through the full breast flows,
From sweet remembrance of departed virtue!

O Britain, parent of illustrious names,
While o'er thy annals memory shoots her eye,
How the heart glows, rapt with high-wondering
love,

And emulous esteem! hail, Sydney hail!
Whether Arcadian blithe, by fountain clear,
Piping thy love-lays wild, or Spartan bold,
In freedom's van distinguish'd, Sydney, hail!
Oft o'er thy laurell'd tomb from hands unseen

* A river near the scene of battle, in which were slain 35,000 men.

† Exultat Animus Maximorum Virorum Memoriam percurrens." VAL. MAX.

Fall flowers; oft in thy vale of Penshurst fair
The shepherd wandering from his nightly fold,
Listeneth strange music, by the tiny breath
Of fairy minstrels warbled.

On Raleigh's grave, O strew the fairest flowers,
That on the bosom of the green vale blow!
There hang your vernal wreaths, ye village-maids!

Ye mountain nymphs, your crowns of wild thyme
bring
To Raleigh's honour'd grave! There bloom the bay,

The virgin rose, that, blushing to be seen,
Folds its fair leaves; for modest worth was his:
A mind where truth philosophy's first born,
Held her harmonious reign; a Briton's breast,
That, careful still of freedom's holy pledge,
Disdain'd the mean arts of a tyrant's court,
Disdain'd and dy'd! Where was thy spirit then,
Queen of sea-crowning isles, when Raleigh bled?
How well he serv'd thee, let Iberia tell!

Ask prostrate Cales, yet trembling at his name,
How well he serv'd thee; when her vanquish'd
hand

Held forth the base bribe, how he spurn'd it from him,

And cried, I fight for Britain! History rise,
And blast the reigns that redden with the blood
Of those that gave them glory!

THE DEATH OF ADONIS.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GREEK OF BION *. 1759.

ADONIS dead, the muse of woe shall mourn;
Adonis dead, the weeping loves return.
The queen of beauty o'er his tomb shall shed
Her flowing sorrows for Adonis dead;
For earth's cold lap her velvet couch forego,
And robes of purple for the weeds of woe.
Adonis dead, the muse of woe shall mourn;
Adonis dead, the weeping loves return.

* Bion the pastoral poet, lived in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. By the epithet Σμυρναίος, every where applied to him, it is probable that he was born at Smyrna. Moschus confirms this, when he says to the river Meles, which had before wept for Homer,

—Νὺν πάλιν ἄλλον

Ἴτις ἄκρηγυς—

It is evident, however, that he spent much of his time in Sicily. Moschus, as he tells us, was his scholar; and by him we are informed that his master was not a poor poet: "Thou hast left to others thy riches," says he, "but to me thy poetry." It appears from the same author that he died by poison. The best edition of his works is that of Paris, by M. de Longue-Pierre, with a French translation.

Ver. 1. Adonis, the favourite of Venus, was the son of Cynaras, king of Cyprus. His chief employment was hunting, though he is represented by Virgil as a shepherd.

Ovis ad flumina pavit Adonis.

Stretch'd on this mountain thy torn lover lies,
Weep, queen of beauty! for he bleeds—he dies.
Ah! yet behold life's last drops faintly flow, 11
In streams of purple, o'er those limbs of snow!
From the pale cheek the perish'd roses fly,
And death dims flow the ghastly gazing eye.
Kiss, kiss those fading lips, ere chill'd in death;
With soothing fondness stay the fleeting breath.
'Tis vain!—ah! give the soothing fondness o'er!
Adonis feels the warm salute no more.
Adonis dead, the muse of woe shall mourn;
Adonis dead, the weeping loves return. 20
His faithful dogs bewail their master slain,
And mourning dryads pour the plaintive strain.

Not the fair youth alone the wound opprest,
The queen of beauty bears it in her breast.
Her feet unsandal'd floating wild her hair,
Her aspect woeful, and her bosom bare,
Distrest, she wanders the wild wastes forlorn,
Her sacred limbs by ruthless brambles torn,
Loud as the grieves, furrounding rocks complain,
And echo through the long vales calls her absent
swain. 30

Adonis hears not: Life's last drops fall flow
In streams of purple, down his limbs of snow.
The weeping Cupids round their queen deplore,
And mourn her beauty and her love no more.

He was killed by a wild boar, if we may believe Propertius, in Cyprus.

—Percussit Adonim
Venantem Idalio vertice durus Aper.

The anniversary of his death was celebrated through the whole Pagan world. Aristophanes, in his Comedy of Peace, reckons the feast of Adonis
among the chief festivals of the Athenians.
The Syrians observed it with all the violence of grief, and the greatest cruelty of self-castigation.
It was celebrated at Alexandria in St. Cyril's time;
and when Julian the Apostate made his entry at Antioch, in the year 362, they were celebrating the feast of Adonis.

The ancients differ greatly in their accounts of this divinity. Athenæus says that he was the favourite of Bacchus; Plutarch maintains that he and Bacchus are the same; and that the Jews abstained from swines flesh because Adonis was killed by a boar. Aulonius, Epig. 30. affirms that Bacchus, Osiris, and Adonis, are one and the same.

Ver. 21, 24. The lines in the original run thus:

*Αγριον αγριον ἴλλκος ἔχει κατὰ μῆρον Ἀδωνίς,
Μεῖζον δ' ἂν Κυθέρεια φέρει ποτικαρίδιον ἴλλκος.
Κεῖνον μὲν μοι πάντα φίλοι κύνες ὤρυσσαντο,
Και Νυμφαὶ κλαίοντι οὐρανίδες.*

The two first of these lines contain a kind of witticism, which it was better to avoid. This author had, however, too much true genius to be fond of these little affected turns of expression, which Musæus and others have been industrious to strike out.

These four verses are transposed in the translation for the sake of the connection.

Ver. 27. This image of the sorrow of Venus is very affecting, and is introduced in this place with

Each rival grace that glow'd with conscious pride,
Each charm of Venus with Adonis dy'd.

Adonis dead, the vocal hills bemoan,
And hollow groves return the saddening groan.
The swelling floods with sea-born Venus weep,
And roll in mournful murmurs to the deep: 40
In melting tears the mountain-springs comply;
The flow'rs, low-drooping, blush with grief, and die.

Cythera's groves with strains of sorrow ring;
The dirge funereal her sad cities sing.
Hark! pitying echoes Venus' sighs return;
When Venus sighs, can aught forbear to mourn?
But when she saw her fainting lover lie,
The wide wound gaping on the withering thigh;
But streaming when she saw life's purple tide,
Stretch'd her fair arms, with trembling voice
the cry'd: 50

Yet stay, lov'd youth! a moment ere we part,
O let me kiss thee!—hold thee to my heart!
A little moment, dear Adonis! stay,
And kiss thy Venus, ere those lips are clay.
Let those dear lips by mine once more be prest,
Till thy last breathe expire into my breast;
Then when life's ebbing pulse scarce scarce can move,

I'll catch thy soul, and drink thy dying love.
That last-left pledge shall sooth my tortur'd breast,
When thou art gone. 80

When, far from me, thy gentle ghost explores
Infernal Pluto's grimly-glooming shores.

Wretch that I am! immortal and divine,
In life imprison'd whom the fates confine,
He comes! receive him to thine iron arms;
Blest queen of death! receive the prince of charms:
For happier thou, to whose wide realms repair
Whatever lovely, and whatever fair.

great beauty and propriety. Indeed, most modern poets seem to have observed it, and have profited by it in their scenes of elegiac woe.

Ver. 39. When the poet makes the rivers mourn for Venus, he very properly calls her Αφροδίτα;
but this propriety perhaps was merely accidental,
as he has given her the same appellation when she wanders the desert.

Ver. 42.
Ἀδωνίς δ' ἔξ ἄδωνος ἰουθέρωνται.—

Palenets being the known effect of grief, we do not at first sight accept this expression; but when we consider that the first emotions of it are attended with blushes, we are pleased with the obscuration.

Ver. 43.
*ἂν δι Κυθέρην
Παντας ἀνα κρημῶς καὶ ἀνα πέλοιν ἀκίλον ἀίδιον.*

This passage the scholiast have entirely misunderstood. They make Κυθέρην Venus, for which they have neither any authority, the Doric name
she borrows from that island being always Κυθίρεια, nor in the least probability from the connection.

This proves that the island Cythera was the place where Adonis perished, notwithstanding the opinion of Propertius and others to the contrary.

The smiles of joy, the golden hours are fled;
Grief, only grief, survives Adonis dead. 70

The loves around in idle sorrow stand,
And the dim torch falls from the vacant hand.
Hence the vain zone! the myrtle's flow'ry pride!
Delight and beauty with Adonis dy'd.

Why didst thou, vent'rous, the wild chase explore,

From his dark lair to rouse the tusky boar?
Far other sport might those fair limbs essay,
Than the rude combat, or the savage fray.

Thus Venus griev'd—the Cupids round deplore
And mourn her beauty and her love no more. 80

Now flowing tears in silent grief complain,
Mix with the purple streams, and flood the plain.

Yet not in vain those sacred drops shall flow,
The purple streams in blushing roses glow;
And catching life from ev'ry falling tear,
Their azure heads anemones shall rear.

But cease in vain to cherish dire despair,
Nor mourn unpitied to the mountain air,

The last sad office let thy hand supply, 89
Stretch the stiff limbs, and close the glaring eye.

That form repos'd beneath the bridal vest,
May cheat thy sorrows with the feint of rest.

For lovely smile those lips, though void of breath,
And fair those features in the shade of death.

Haste, fill with flow'rs, with rosy wreaths his bed;
Perish the flow'rs! the princè of beauty's dead.

Round the pale corse each breathing essence strew,
Let weeping myrtles pour their balmy dew;

Perish the balms, unable to restore 99
Those vital sweets of love that charm no more!

'Tis done—Behold, with purple robes array'd,
In mournful state the clay-cold limbs are laid.

The loves lament with all the rage of woe,
Stamp on the dart, and break the useless bow.

Officious these the wat'ry urn supply,
Unbind the bulkin'd leg, and wash the bleeding thigh.

O'er the pale body those their light wings wave,
As yet, though vain, solicitous to save.

All wild with grief, their hapless queen deplore,
And mourn her beauty and her love no more. 110

Dejected Hymen droops his head forlorn,
His torch extinct, and flow'ry tresses torn:

For nuptial airs, and songs of joy, remain
The sad, slow dirge, the sorrow-breathing strain,

Who would not, when Adonis dies, deplore?
Who would not weep when Hymen smiles no

more?
The graces mourn the princè of beauty slain,
Loud as Dione on her native main:

The fates relenting join the general woe,
And call the lover from the realms below. 120

Vain hopeless grief! can living sounds pervade
The dark, dead regions of eternal shade?

Spare, Venus, spare that too luxuriant tear
For the long sorrows of the mournful year.

Ver. 124. Numa seems to have borrowed the custom he instituted of mourning a year for the deceased from the Greeks. For though it is said only ten months were set apart, yet ten months were the year of Romulus till regulated by his successor.

THE

HAPPINESS OF A MODERATE FORTUNE
AND MODERATE DESIRES.

FROM THE FRENCH OF MR. GRESSET. 1760.

O GOODNESS of the golden mean,
Whom still misjudging folly flies,

Seduc'd by each delusive scene;
Thy only subjects are the wifè.

These seek thy paths with nobler aim,
And trace them to the gates of fame.

See foster'd in thy fav'ring shade
Each tender bard of verse divine!
Who, lur'd by fortune's vain parade,
Had never form'd the tuneful line;
By fortune lur'd, or want confin'd,
Whose cold hand chills the genial mind.

In vain you slight the flowery crown
That fame wreathes round the favour'd head!
Whilst laurell'd victory and renown
Their heroes from thy shades have led;
There form'd from courtly softness free,
By rigid virtue and by thee.

By thee were form'd, from cities far,
Fabricius just, Camillus wifè,
Those philosophic sons of war,
That from imperial dignities
Returning, plough'd their native plain,
And plac'd their laurels in thy fanè.

Thrice happy he, on whose calm breast
The smiles of peaceful wisdom play,
With all thy sober charms possess'd,
Whose wishes never learnt to stray.
Whom truth, of pleasures pure but grave,
And pensive thoughts from folly save.

Far from the crowd's low-thoughted strife,
From all that bounds fair freedom's aim,
He envies not the pomp of life,
A length of rent-roll, or of name:
For safe he views the vale-grown elm,
While thunder-founding storms the mountain pine o'erwhelm.

Of censure's frown he feels no dread,
No fear he knows of vulgar eyes,
Whose thought, to nobler objects led,
Far, far o'er their horizon flies!
With reason's suffrage at his side,
Whose firm heart rests self-satisfied.

And while alternate conquest sways
The northern or the southern shore,
He smiles at fortune's giddy maze,
And calmly hears the wild storm roar.
Ev'n nature's groans, unmov'd with fear,
And bursting worlds he'd calmly hear.

Such are the faithful hearts you love,
O friendship fair, immortal maid;
The few caprice could never move,
The few whom interest never sway'd;
Nor shed unseen, with hate refin'd,
The pale cares o'er the gloomy mind.

Soft sleep, that lov'st the peaceful cell,
On these descends thy balmy power;
While no terrific dreams dispel
The slumbers of the sober hour;
Which oft, array'd in darkness drear,
Wake the wild eye of pride to fear.

Content with all a farm would yield,
Thus Sidon's monarch liv'd unknown,
And sigh'd to leave his little field
For the long glories of a throne—
There once more happy and more free
Than rank'd with Dido's ancestry.

With these pacific virtues blest,
These charms of philosophic ease,
Wrapt in your Richmond's tranquil rest,
You pass, dear C——, your useful days.
Where Thames your silent vallies laves,
Proud of his yet untainted waves.

Should life's more public scenes engage
Your time that thus consistent flows,
And following still these maxims sage
For ever brings the same repose;—
Your worth may greater fame procure,
But hope not happiness to sure.

SONNET CLXXIX.

TRANSLATED FROM PETRARCH. 1765.

THOUGH nobly born, to humble life resign'd;
The purest heart, the most enlighten'd mind;
A vernal flower that bears the fruits of age!
A cheerful spirit, with an aspect sage,—
The power that rules the planetary train
To her has given, nor shall his gifts be vain.
Put on her worth, her various praise to dwell,
The truth, the merits of her life to tell,
The muse herself would own the task too hard,
Too great the labour for the happiest bard.
Dress that derives from native beauty grace,
And love that holds with honesty his place;
Action that speaks—and eyes whose piercing ray
Might kindle darkness, or obscure the day!

SONNET CCLXXXIX.

FROM THE SAME. 1765.

FALL'N the fair column, blasted is the bay,
That shaded once my solitary shore!
I've lost what hope can never give me more,
Though fought from Indus to the closing day.
My twofold treasure death has snatch'd away,
My pride, my pleasure left me to deplore:
What fields far-cultur'd, nor imperial sway,
Nor orient gold, nor jewels can restore.
O destiny severe of human kind!
What portion have we unbedew'd with tears?
The downcast visage, and the pensive mind
Through the thin veil of smiling life appears;
And in one moment vanish into wind
The hard-earn'd fruits of long laborious years.

SONNET CCLVII.

FROM THE SAME. 1765.

WHERE is that face, whose slightest air could move
My trembling heart, and strike the springs of love?

That heaven, where two fair stars, with genial
ray,

Shed their kind influence on life's dim way?
Where are that science, sense, and worth confest,
That speech by virtue, by the graces dress'd?
Where are those beauties, where those charms
combin'd,

That caus'd this long captivity of mind?
Where the dear, shade of all that once was fair,
The source, the solace of each amorous care;
My heart's sole sovereign, nature's only boast?
—Lost to the world, to me for ever lost!

SONNET CCXXXVIII.

FROM THE SAME. 1765.

WAIL'D the sweet warbler to the lonely shade;
Trembled the green leaf to the summer gale;
Fell the fair stream in murmurs down the dale,
Its banks, its flowery banks with verdure
spread,

Where, by the charm of pensive fancy led,
All as I fram'd the love-lamenting tale,
Came the dear object whom I still bewail,
Came from the regions of the cheerless dead;
And why, she cry'd, untimely wilt thou die?
Ah why, for pity, shall those mournful fears,
Start in wild sorrow from that languid eye?
Cerith, no more those visionary tears,
For me, who range yon light-invested sky!
For me, who triumph in eternal years!

TRANSLATION FROM CATULLUS. 5.

LESBIA, live to love and pleasure,
Careless what the grave may say:
When each moment is a treasure,
Why should lovers lose a day?

Setting suns shall rise in glory,
But when little life is o'er,
There's an end of all the story:
We shall sleep and wake no more.

Give me then a thousand kisses,
Twice ten thousand more bestow,
Till the sum of boundless blisses
Neither we nor envy know.

MONODY.

SUNG BY A REDBREAST.

THE gentle pair that in these lonely shades,
Wandering, at eve or morn, I oft have seen,
Now all in vain I seek at eve or morn,
With drooping wing, forlorn,
Along the grove, along the daizied green.
For them I've warbled many a summer's day,
'Till the light dews imppearled all the plain,
And the glad shepherd shut his nightly fold;
Stories of love, and high adventures old
Were the dear subjects of my tuneful strain.
Ah! where is now the hope of all my lay?
Now they, perchance, that heard them all are dead!
With them the meed of melody is fled,
And fled with them the listening ear of praise.
Vainly I dreamt, that when the wint'ry sky
Scatter'd the white flood on the wasted plain,
When not one berry, not one leaf was nigh,

To sooth keen hunger's pain,
Vainly I dreamt my songs might not be vain.
That oft within the hospitable hall
Some scatter'd fragments baply I might find,
Some friendly crumb perchance for me design'd,
When seen despairing on the neighbouring wall.
Deluded bird, those hopes are now no more!
Dull time has blasted the despairing year,
And winter frowns severe,
Wrapping his wan limbs in his mantle hoar.
Yet not within the hospitable hall
The cheerful sound of human voice I hear;
No piteous eye is near,
To see me drooping on the lonely wall.

TO A REDBREAST.

LITTLE bird, with bosom red,
Welcome to my humble shed!
Courtly domes of high degree
Have no room for thee and me;
Pride and pleasure's sickle throng
Nothing mind an idle song.
Daily near my table steal,
While I pick my scanty meal.
Doubt not, little though there be,
But I'll cast a crumb to thee;
Well rewarded, if I spy
Pleasure in thy glancing eye:
See thee, when thou'st eat thy fill,
Plume thy breast, and wipe thy bill.
Come, my feather'd friend, again
Well thou knowest the broken pane.
Ask of me thy daily store:
Go not near Avaro's door;
Once within his iron hall,
Woeful end shall thee befall.
Savage!—He would soon divest
Of its rosy plumes thy breast;
Then, with solitary joy,
Eat thee, bones and all, my boy!

A CONTEMPLATION.

O NATURE! grateful for the gifts of mind,
Duteous I bend before thy holy shrine:
To other hands be fortune's goods assign'd,
And thou, more bounteous, grant me only thine.
Bring gentlest love, bring fancy to my breast;
And if wild genius, in his devious way,
Would sometimes deign to be my evening guest,
Or near my lone shade not unkindly stray:
I ask no more! for happier gifts than these,
The sufferer, man, was never born to prove,
But may my soul eternal slumbers seize,
If lost to genius, fancy, and to love!

MENALCAS. A PASTORAL.

Now cease your sweet pipes, shepherds! cease your lays,
Ye warbling train, that fill the echoing groves
With your melodious love-notes! Die, ye winds,
That o'er Arcadian valleys blows! Ye streams,
Ye garrulous old streams, suspend your course,
And listen to Menalcas—

Menalcas.

—Come fairest of the beauteous train that sport
On Ladon's flowery side, my Delia, come!

For thee thy shepherd, silent as he sits
Within the green wood, sighs; for thee prepares
The various wreaths in vain; explores the shade
Where lowly lurks the violet blue, where droops,
In tender beauty, its fair spotted bells
The cowslip: oft with plaintive voice he calls
The waken'd echo—What are streams or flowers,
Or songs of blithe birds? What the blushing rose,
Young health, or music, or the voice of praise,
The smile of vernal suns, the fragrant breath
Of evening gales, when Delia dwells afar?

TO THE REV. MR. LAMB.

LAMB, could the muse that boasts thy forming care
Unfold the grateful feelings of my heart,
Her hand for thee should many a wreath prepare,
And cull the choicest flowers with studious art.
For mark'd by thee was each imperfect ray
That haply wander'd o'er my infant mind;
The dawn of genius brighten'd into day,
As thy skill open'd, as thy lore refin'd.
Each uncouth lay that falter'd from my tongue,
At eve or morn from Eden's murmurs caught;
Whate'er I painted, and whate'er I sung,
Though rude the strain, though artless was the draught.
You wisely prais'd, and fed the sacred fire,
That warms the breast with love and honest fame;
You swell'd to nobler heights my infant lyre,
Rais'd the low thought, and check'd th' exuberant
flame.
O, could the muse in future times obtain
One humble garland from th' Aonian tree!
With joy I'd bind thy favour'd brows again,
With joy I'd form a fairer wreath for thee.

AN ODE.

TO THE GENIUS OF WESTMORELAND.

HAIL hidden power of these wild groves,
These uncouth rocks, and mountains gray!
Where oft, as fades the closing day,
The family of fancy roves.
In what lone cave, what sacred cell,
Coeval with the birth of time,
Wrapt in high cares, and thought sublime,
In awful silence dost thou dwell?
Oft in the depth of winter's reign,
As blew the bleak winds o'er the dale;
Moaning along the distant gale,
Has fancy heard thy voice complain.
Oft in the dark wood's lonely way,
Swift has she seen thee glancing by;
Or down the summer evening sky,
Sporting in clouds of gilded day.
If caught from thee the sacred fire,
That glow'd within my youthful breast;
Those thoughts too high to be express'd,
Genius, if thou did'st once inspire;
O pleas'd accept this votive lay,
That in my native shades retir'd,
And once, once more by thee inspir'd,
In gratitude I pay.

HYMN TO PLUTUS.

Great God of wealth, before whose sacred throne
Truth, honour, genius, fame and worth lie prone!
To thy throng'd temples take our votary mure:
To thee a poet never kneel'd before.

Adieu the gods that caught my early prayer!
Wisdom that frown'd, and knowledge fraught with care!

Friendship that every veering gale could move!
And tantalizing hope, and faithless love!
These, these are slaves that in thy livery shine!
For wisdom, friendship, love himself is thine?

For thee I'll labour down the mine's dark way,
And leave the confines of enlivening day;
For thee Afturia's shining sands explore,
And bear the splendours of Potofi's ore
Scale the high rock, and tempt the raging sea,
And think, and toil, and wish, and wake for thee.

Farewell the scenes that thoughtless youth could
please;

The flowery scenes of indolence and ease.
Where you the way with magic power beguile,
Bassora's deep, or Lybia's deserts smile.

Foes of thy worth, that, insolent and vain,
Deride thy maxims, and reject thy reign,
The frantic tribe of virtue shall depart,
And make no more their ravage in my heart.
Away "The tears that pity taught to flow!"
Away that anguish for a brother's woe!
Adieu to these, and every tiresome guest,
That drain'd my fortunes or destroy'd my rest!

Ah, good Avaro! could I thee despise?
Thee, good Avaro; provident and wise?
Plutus, forgive the bitter things I've said!
I love Avaro; poor Avaro's dead.

Yet, yet I'm thine; for fame's unerring tongue
In thy sooth'd ear thus pours her silver song.

"Immortal Plutus! god of golden ease!
"Form'd every heart, and every eye to please!
"For thee content her downy carpet spreads,
"And rosy pleasure swells her genial beds.
"T's thine to gild the mansions of despair;
"And beam a glory round the brows of care;
"To cheat the lazy pace of sleepless hours,
"With marble fountains, and ambrosial bowers."

O grant me, Plutus, scenes like those I sung,
My youthful lyre when vernal fancy strung.
For me their shades let other Studleys rear,
Though each tree's water'd with a widow's tear!
Detested god!—forgive me! I adore.

Great Plutus, grant me one petition more.
Should Delia, tender, generous, fair and free,
Leave love and truth, and sacrifice to thee,
I charge thee, Plutus, be to Delia kind,
And make her fortunes richer than her mind.
Be hers the wealth all Heav'n's broad eye can view;

Grant her, good god, Don Philip and Peru.

HYMN TO HUMANITY.

PARENT of virtue, if thine ear
Attend not now to sorrow's cry;
If now the pity-streaming tear
Should haply on thy cheeks be dry;
Indulge my votive strain, O sweet humanity.

Come, ever welcome to my breast!
A tender, but a cheerful guest;
Nor always in the gloomy cell,
Of life-consuming sorrow dwell;
For sorrow, long-indu'd and slow,
Is to humanity a foe;
And grief, that makes the heart its prey,
Wears sensibility away.
Then come, sweet nymph, instead of thee,
The gloomy fiend, stupidity.

O may that fiend be banish'd far,
Though passions hold eternal war!
Nor ever let me cease to know
The pulse that throbs at joy or woe.
Nor let my vacant cheek be dry,
When sorrow fills a brother's eye;
Nor may the tear that frequent flows
From private or from social woes,
E'er make this pleasing sense depart.
Ye cares, O harden not my heart.

If the fair star of fortune smile,
Let not its flattering power beguile;
Nor, borne along the fav'ring tide,
My full sails swell with bloating pride.
Let me from wealth but hope content,
Remembering still it was but lent;
To modest merit spread my store,
Unbar my hospitable door;
Nor feed, for pomp, an idle train,
While want unpitied pines in vain.

If Heaven, in every purpose wise,
The envied lot of wealth denies;
If doom'd to drag life's painful load
Through poverty's uneven road,
And, for the due bread of the day,
Destin'd to toil as well as pray;
To thee, humanity, still true,
I'll wish the good I cannot do;
And give the wretch, that passes by,
A soothing word—a tear—a sigh.

Howe'er exalted, or depressed,
Be ever mine the feeling breast.
From me remove the stagnant mind
Of languid indolence, reclin'd;
The soul that one long Sabbath keeps,
And through the sun's whole circle sleeps;
Dull peace, that dwells in folly's eye,
And self-attending vanity.
Alike, the foolish, and the vain
Are strangers to the sense humane.

O for that sympathetic glow
Which taught the holy tear to flow,
When the prophetic eye survey'd
Sion in future ashes laid;
Or, rais'd to Heaven, implor'd the bread
That thousands in the desert fed!
Or, when the heart o'er friendship's grave
Sigh'd;—and forgot its power to save—
O for that sympathetic glow
Which taught the holy tear to flow!

It comes: It fills my labouring breast!
I feel my beating heart oppress.
Oh! hear that lonely widow's wail!
See her dim eye! her aspect pale!

To Heaven she turns in deep despair,
Her infants wonder at her prayer,
And, mingling tears they know not why,
Lift up their little hands, and cry.
O God! their moving sorrows see!
Support them, sweet humanity!

Life, fill'd with grief's distressful train,
For ever asks the tear humane.
Behold in yon unconscious grove
The victims of ill-fated love!
Heard you that agonizing thro' ?
Sure this is not romantic woe!
The golden day of joy is o'er;
And now they part—to meet no more.
Assist them, hearts from anguish free!
Assist them, sweet humanity!

Parent of virtue, if thine ear
Attend not now to sorrow's cry;
If now the pity-streaming tear
Should haply on thy cheek be dry,
Indulge my votive strain, O sweet humanity!

EPISTLE TO MR. —

FROM scenes where fancy no excursion tries,
Nor trusts her wing to smoke-involv'd skies,
Far from the town's detested haunts remov'd,
And nought but thee deserted that I lov'd;
From noise and folly and the world got free,
One truant thought yet only stays for thee.

What is that world which makes the heart its flave?

A restless sea revolving wave on wave:
There rage the storms of each uncertain clime:
There float the wrecks of fortune and of time:
There hope's smooth gales in soft succession blow,
While disappointment hides the rock below.
The siren pleasures tune their fatal breath,
And lull you to the long repose of death.

What is that world? at — 'tis no more
Than the vast ocean while we walk the shore.
Loud roar the winds and swell the wild waves high,
Lash the rude beach, and frighten all the sky;
No longer shall my little bark be rent,
Since hope resign'd her anchor to content.

Like some poor fisher that, escap'd with life,
Will trust no more to elemental strife;
But fits in safety on the green-bank side,
And lives upon the leavings of the tide;
Like him contented you your friend shall see,
As safe, as happy, and as poor as he.

TO A LADY.

ON READING AN ELEGY WRITTEN BY HER,

On the Search of Happiness.

To seek the lovely nymph you sing,
I've wander'd many a weary mile,
From grove to grove, from spring to spring;
If here or there she deign'd to smile.

Nay, what I now must blush to say,
For sure it hap'd in evil hour;
I once so far mistook my way,
To seek her in the haunts of power.

How should success my search betide,
When still so far I wander'd wrong?
For happiness on Arrowe's side,
Was listening to Maria's song.
Delighted thus with you to stay,
What hope have I the nymph to see;
Unless you cease your magic lay,
Or bring her in your arms to me?

A MONODY.

INSCRIBED TO MY WORTHY FRIEND JOHN SCOTT, ESQ.

Being written in his Garden at Amwell, in Hertfordshire, the beginning of the year 1769.

FRIEND of my genius! on whose natal hour,
Shone the same star, but shone with brighter
ray;

Of as amidst thy Amwell's shades I stray,
And mark thy true taste in each winding bower,
From my full eye why falls the tender shower?
While other thoughts than these fair scenes convey, [away.

Bear on my trembling mind, and melt its powers

Ah me! my friend! in happier hours I spread
Like thee the wild walk o'er the varied plain;
The fairest tribes of Flora's painted train,
Each bolder shrub that grac'd her genial bed,
When old Sylvanus, by young wishes led,
Stole to her arms, of such fair offspring vain,
That bore their mother's beauties on their head.

Like thee, inspir'd by love—'twas Delia's charms,
'Twas Delia's taste the new creation gave:
For her my groves in plaintive sighs would wave,
And call her absent to their master's arms.

She comes—Ye flowers your fairest blooms unfold!
Ye waving groves, your plaintive sighs forbear!
Breathe all your fragrance to the amorous air,
Ye smiling shrubs whose heads are cloth'd with gold!

She comes, by truth, by fair affection led,
The long-lov'd mistress of my faithful heart;
The mistress of my soul, no more to part,
And all my hopes, and all my vows are sped.
Vain, vain delusions! dreams for ever fled!
Ere twice the spring had wak'd the genial hour,
The lovely parent bore one beauteous flower,
And droop'd her gentle head,
And sunk, for ever sunk, into her silent bed.

Friend of my genius! partner of my fate!
To equal sense of painful suffering born!
From whose fond breast a lovely parent torn,
Bedew'd thy pale cheek with a tear so late;—
Oh! let us mindful of the short, short date,
That bears the spoil of human hopes away,
Indulge sweet memory of each happier day!
No! close, for ever close the iron-gate
Of cold oblivion on that dreary cell,
Where the pale shades of past enjoyments dwell,
And pointing to their bleeding bosoms say,
On life's disastrous hour what varied woes await!

Let scenes of softer, gentler kind,
Awake to fancy's soothing call,

And milder on the pensive mind,
The shadowed thought of grief shall fall.
Oft as the slowly-closing day
Draws her pale mantle from the dew-star's eye,
What time, the shepherd's cry
Leads from the pastur'd hills his flocks away,
Attentive to the tender lay
That steals from Philomela's breast,
Let us in musing silence stray,
Where Lee beholds in mazes flow
His uncomplaining waters flow, [rest.
And all his whispering shores invite the charm of IMITATIONS OF WALLER.

WALLER TO ST. EVREMOND.

O VALES of Penshurst now so long unseen!
Forgot each secure shade, each winding green;
Those lonely paths what art have I to tread,
Where once young love, the blind enthusiast, led?
Yet if the genius of your conscious groves
His Sidney in my Sacharissa loves;
Let him with pride her cruel power unfold;
By him my pains let Evremond be told.

INSCRIPTIONS ON A BEECH TREE,

IN THE ISLAND OF SICILY.

SWEET land of muses! o'er whose favour'd plains
Ceres and Flora held alternate sway;
By Jove refresh'd with life-diffusing rains,
By Phœbus blest with every kinder ray!

O, with what pride do I those times survey,
When freedom, by her rustic minstrels led,
Danc'd on the green lawn many a summer's day,
While pastoral ease reclin'd her careless head.

In these soft shades; ere yet that shepherd fled,
Whose music pierc'd earth, air, and Heaven and hell,

And call'd the ruthless tyrant of the dead
From the dark slumbers of his iron cell.

His ear unfolding caught the magic spell:
He felt the sounds glide softly through his heart;
The sounds that deign'd of love's sweet power to tell;

And as they told, would point his golden dart.

Fix'd was the god; nor power had he to part,
For the fair daughter of the sheaf-crown'd queen,
Fair without pride, and lovely without art,
Gather'd her wild flowers on the daisied green.

He saw; he sigh'd; and that unmelting breast,
Which arms the hand of death, the power of love confess'd.

THE DUCHESS OF MAZARINE,

ON HER RETIRING INTO A CONVENT.

Ye holy cares that haunt these lonely cells,
These scenes where salutary sadness dwells;
Ye sighs that minute the slow wasting day,
Ye pale regrets that wear my life away;
O bid these passions for the world depart,
These wild desires, and vanities of heart,
Hide every trace of vice, of follies past,
And yield to Heaven the victory at last.

VOL. XI.

To that the poor remains of life are due,
'Tis Heaven that calls, and I the call pursue.
Lord of my life, my future cares are thine,
My love, my duty greet thy holy shrine:
No more my heart to vainer hopes I give,
But live for thee, whose bounty bids me live.

The power that gave these little charms their grace,

His favours bounded, and confin'd their space.
Spite of those charms shall time, with rude essay,
Tear from the cheek the transient rose away.
But the free mind, ten thousand ages past,
Its Maker's form, shall with its Maker last.

Uncertain objects still our hopes employ;
Uncertain all that bears the name of joy!
Of all that feels the injuries of fate
Uncertain is the search, and short the date.
Yet ev'n that boon what thousands wish to gain?
That boon of death, the sad resource of pain!

Once on my path all fortune's glory fell;
Her vain magnificence, and courtly swell:
Love touch'd my soul at least with soft desires,
And vanity there fed her meteor fires.

This truth at last the mighty scenes let fall,
An hour of innocence was worth them all.

Lord of my life! O, let thy sacred ray
Shine o'er my heart, and break its clouds away.
Deluding, flattering, faithless world adieu!
Long hast thou taught me, God is only true!

That God alone I trust, alone adore,
No more deluded, and misled no more. [cease?

Come, sacred hour, when wavering doubts shall Come holy scenes of long repose and peace!
Yet shall my heart, to other interests true,
A moment balance 'twixt the world and you?
Of pensive nights, of long-reflecting days,
Be yours, at last, the triumph and the praise!

Great, gracious Master, whose unbounded sway,
Felt through ten thousand worlds, those worlds
Wilt thou for once thy awful glories shade, [obey;
And deign t' espouse the creature thou hast made?
All other ties indignant I disclaim,
Dishonour'd those, and infamous to name!

O fatal ties, for which such tears I've shed,
For which the pleasures of the world lay dead!
That world's soft pleasures you alone disarm;

That world without you, still might have its charm.
But now those scenes of tempting hope I close,
And seek the peaceful studies of repose;
Look on the past as time that stole away,
And beg the blessings of a happier day.

Ye gay saloons, ye golden-vested halls,
Scenes of high treats and heart-bewitching balls!
Dress, figure, splendour, charms of play, farewell,
And all the toiler's science to excel;
Even love that ambush'd in this beautiful hair,
No more shall lie, like Indian archers, there.

Go, erring love! for nobler objects given!
Go, beautiful hair, a sacrifice to Heaven!

Soon shall the veil these glowing features hide,
At once the period of their power and pride!
The hapless lover shall no more complain
Of vows unheard, or unrewarded pain;
While calmly sleep in each untortur'd breast
My secret sorrow, and his sighs profane.

Go, flattering train! and, slaves to me no more,
With the same sighs some happier fair adore!

Q.

Your alter'd faith, I blame not, nor bewail—
And haply yet, (what woman is not frail?)
Yet, haply, might I calmer minutes prove,
If he that lov'd me knew no other love!

Yet were that ardour, which his breast inspir'd,
By charms of more than mortal beauty fir'd;
What nobler pride! could I to Heaven resign
The zeal, the service that I boasted mine!
O, change your false desires, ye flattering train!
And love me pious, whom ye lov'd profane!
These long adieus with lovers doom'd to go,
Or prove their merit, or my weakness show,
But Heaven, to such soft frailties less severe,
May spare the tribute of a female tear,
May yield one tender moment to deplore
Those gentle hearts that I must hold no more.

THE VICEROY:

ADDRESSED TO THE EARL OF HALIFAX*.

First published in 1762.

'Twas on time's birth-day, when the voice divine
Wak'd sleeping nature, while her infant eye,
Yet trembling, struggl'd with created light;
The Heaven-born muse, sprung from the source
sublime

Of harmony immortal, first receiv'd
Her sacred mandate. "Go, seraphic maid,
" Companion still to nature! from her works
" Derive thy lay melodious, great, like those,
" And elegantly simple. In thy train,
" Glory, and fair renown, and deathless fame
" Attendant ever, each immortal name,
" By thee deem'd sacred, to yon starry vault
" Shall bear, and stamp in characters of gold.
" Be thine the care, alone where truth directs
" The firm heart, where the love of human kind
" Inflames the patriot spirit, there to sooth
" The toils of virtue with melodious praise:
" For those, that smiling seraph bids thee wake
" His golden lyre; for those, the young-ey'd fun
" Gilds this fair-formed world; and genial spring
" Throws many a green wreath, liberal from his
" bosom."

So spake the voice divine, whose last sweet sound
Gave birth to echo, tuneful nymph, that loves
The muse's haunt, dim grove, or lonely dale,
Or high wood old; and, listening while she sings,
Dwells in long rapture on each falling strain.

O Halifax, an humble muse that dwells
In scenes like these, a stranger to the world,
To thee a stranger, late has learn'd thy fame,
Even in this vale of silence; from the voice
Of echo learn'd it, and, like her, delights,
With thy lov'd name, to make these wild woods vocal.

Spirits of ancient time, to high renown
By martial glory rais'd, and deeds august,

* The resolution of the Irish House of Commons respecting the augmentation of the revenue of the Lord Lieutenant, Feb. 26. 1762, and his Excellency's speech in consequence thereof, Feb. 27. will both illustrate this poem, and show the occasion of it.

Atchiev'd for Britain's freedom! patriot hearts,
That, fearless of a tyrant's threatening arm,
Embrac'd your bleeding country! o'er the page,
Where history triumphs in your holy names,
O'er the dim monuments that mark your graves,
Why streams my eye with pleasure! 'tis the joy
The soft delight that through the full breast flows,

From sweet remembrance of departed virtue!
O Britain, parent of illustrious names,
While o'er thy annals memory shoots her eye
How the heart glows, rapt with high-wondering
love.

And emulous esteem! hail, Sydney, hail!
Whether Arcadian blithe, by fountain clear,
Piping thy love-lays wild, or Spartan bold,
In freedom's van distinguish'd, Sydney, hail!
Oft o'er thy laurel'd tomb from hands unseen
Fall flowers; oft in the vales of Penshurst fair
Menalca, stepping from his evening fold,
Listeneth strange music, from the tiny breath
Of fairy minstrels warbled, which of old,
Dancing to thy sweet lays, they learned well.

On Raleigh's grave, O srew the sweetest
flowers,

That on the bosom of the green vale blow!
There hang your vernal wreaths, ye village maids!
Ye mountain nymphs, your crowns of wild thyme
bring

To Raleigh's honour'd grave! there bloom the
The virgin rose, that, blushing to be seen,
Folds its fair leaves; for modest worth was his;
A mind where truth, philosophy's first born,
Held her harmonious reign: A Briton's breast,
That, careful still of freedom's holy pledge,
Disdain'd the mean arts of a tyrant's court,
Disdain'd and died! where was thy spirit then,
Queen of sea-crowning isles, when Raleigh bled?
How well he serv'd thee, let Iberia tell!

Ask prostrate Gales, yet trembling at his name,
How well he serv'd thee; when her vanquish'd
hand

Held forth the base bribe, how he spurn'd it from him,

And cried, I fight for Britain! history rise,
And blast the reigns that redder with the blood
Of those that gave them glory! happier days,
Gilt with a Brunswick's parent smile, await
The honour'd Viceroy. More auspicious hours
Shall Halifax behold, nor grieves to find
A favour'd land ungrateful to his care.

O for the muse of Milton, to record
The honours of that day, when full conven'd
Hibernia's senate with one voice proclaim'd
A nation's high applause; when long oppress
With wealth-consuming war, their eager love
Advanc'd the princely dignity's support,
While Halifax presid'd! O, belov'd
By every muse, grace of the polish'd court,
The peasant's guardian, then what pleasure felt
Thy liberal bosom! not the low delight
Of fortune's added gifts, greatly declin'd;
No; 'twas the supreme bliss that fills the breast,
Of conscious virtue, happy to behold
Her cares successful in a nation's joy.

But O, ye sisters of the sacred spring,
To sweetest accents tune the polish'd lay,

The muse of persuasion! you alone
 Can paint that easy eloquence that flow'd
 In Attic streams, from Halifax that flow'd,
 When all serene listen'd. Albion heard,
 And felt a parent's joy: no more, she cried,
 No more shall Greece the man of Athens boast,
 Whose magic periods smooth'd the listening wave
 Of rapt Ilylus. Rome shall claim no more
 The flowery path of eloquence alone
 To grace her consul's brow; for never spoke
 Himeria's viceroy words of fairer phrase,
 Forgetful of Alpheus' hastening stream,
 When Arethusa stopp'd her golden tide,
 And call'd her nymphs, and call'd her shepherd swains

To leave their sweet pipes silent. Silent lay
 Your pipes, Hibernian shepherds. Liffey smil'd,
 And on his soft hand lean'd his dimply cheek,
 Attentive: "Once so Wharton spoke," he cried,
 "Unhappy Wharton! whose young eloquence
 "Yet vibrates on mine ear." Whatever powers,
 Whatever genii old, of vale or grove
 The high inhabitants, all throng'd to hear
 Sylvanus came, and from his temples gray
 His oaken chaplet flung, lest hap'ly leaf,
 Or interposing bough, should meet the sound,
 And bar its soft approaches to his ear.

Pan ceas'd to pipe—a moment ceas'd—for then
 Suspicion grew, that Phoebus in disguise
 His ancient reign invaded: down he cast,
 In petulance, his reed; but seiz'd it soon,
 And fill'd the woods with clangor. Measures wild
 The wanton satyrs dance'd, then listening stood,
 And gaz'd with uncouth joy.

But hark! wild riots shake the peaceful plain,
 The gathering tumult roars, and faction opens
 Her blood-requesting eye. The frighted wain
 Mourns o'er his waited labours, and implorés
 His country's guardian. Previous to his wish
 That guardian's care he found. The tumult ceas'd,
 And faction clos'd her blood-requesting eye.

Be these thy honours, Halifax! and these,
 The liberal muse, that never stain'd her page
 With flattery, shall record: from each low view,
 Each mean connection free, her praise is fame.
 O, could her hand in future times obtain
 One humble garland from th' Aonian tree,
 With joy she'd bind it on thy favour'd head,
 And greet thy judging ear with sweeter strains!

Meanwhile pursue, in public virtue's path,
 The palm of glory: only there will bloom
 Pietian laurels. Should'st thou deviate thence,
 Perish the blossoms of fair-folding fame!
 Ev'n this poor wreath, that now affects thy brow,
 Would lose its little bloom, the muse repine,
 And blush that Halifax had stole her praise.

HYMN TO THE RISING SUN.

From the red wave rising bright;
 Lift on high thy golden head;
 O'er the misty mountain, spread
 Thy smiling rays of orient light!
 See the golden god appear!
 Flies the fiend of darkness drear;
 Flies, and in her gloomy train,
 Sable grief, and care, and pain!

See the golden god advance!
 On Taurus' heights his couriers prance:
 With him haste the vernal hours,
 Breathing sweets, and drooping flowers
 Laughing Summer at his side,
 Waves her locks in rosy pride;
 And Autumn bland, with aspect kind,
 Bears his golden sheaf behind
 O haste, and spread the purple day
 O'er all the wide ethereal way!
 Nature mourns at thy delay:
 God of glory haste away!
 From the red wave rising bright,
 Lift on high thy golden head
 O'er the misty mountains, spread
 Thy smiling rays of orient light!

A FAREWELL HYMN

TO THE VALLEY OF IRWAN.

FAREWELL the fields of Irwan's vale,
 My infant years where fancy prance;
 And sooth'd me with the western gale,
 Her wild dreams waving round my head,
 While the blithe blackbird told his tale.
 Farewell the fields of Irwan's vale!

The primrose on the valley's side,
 The green thyme on the mountain's head,
 The wanton rose, the daisy pied,
 The widdling's blossom blushing red;
 No longer I their sweets inhale.
 Farewell the fields of Irwan's vale!

How oft, within yon vacant shade,
 Has evening clos'd my careless eye!
 How oft, along those banks, I've stray'd,
 And watch'd the wave that wander'd by!
 Full long their lofs shall I bewail.
 Farewell the fields of Irwan's vale!

Yet still, within yon vacant grove,
 To mark the close of parting day;
 Along yon flow'ry banks to rove,
 And watch the wave that winds away;
 Fair fancy sure shall never fail,
 Though far from these, and Irwan's vale!

THE HAPPY VILLAGER.

VIRTUE dwells in Arden's vale;
 There her hallow'd temples rise;
 There her incense greets the skies,
 Grateful as the morning gale!
 There, with humble peace, and her,
 Lives the happy villager;
 There the golden smiles of morn
 Brighter every field adorn;
 There the sun's declining ray
 Fairer paints the parting day:
 There the woodlark louder sings,
 Zephyr moves on softer wings,
 Groves in greener honours rise,
 Purer azure spreads the skies;
 There the fountains clearer flow,
 Flowers in brighter beauty blow;
 For, with peace and virtue, there
 Lives the happy villager.

Distant still from Arden's vale
 Are the woes the bad bewail;
 Distant fell remorse, and pain,
 And frenzy smiling o'er her chain!
 Grief's quick pang, despair's dead groan,
 Are in Arden's vale unknown:
 For with peace and virtue, there
 Lives the happy villager!
 In his hospitable cell,
 Love, and truth, and freedom dwell;
 And, with aspect mild and free,
 The graceful nymph, simplicity.
 Hail, ye liberal grates, hail!
 Natives all of Arden's vale:
 For, with peace and virtue, there
 Lives the happy villager!

TO ALMENA.

FROM THE BANKS OF THE IRWAN.

WHERE trembling poplars shade their parent vale,
 And tune to melody the mountain gale;
 Where Irwan murmurs musically flow,
 And breathing breezes through his osiers blow;
 Friend of my heart, behold thy poet laid
 In the dear silence of his native shade!
 Ye sacred vales, where oft the muse, unseen,
 Led my light steps along the moon-light green;
 Ye scenes, where peace and fancy held their reign
 For ever lov'd, and once enjoy'd again!
 Ah! where is, now, that nameless bliss refin'd;
 That tranquil hour, that vacancy of mind?
 As sweet the wild rose bears its balmy breast;
 As soon, the breeze with murmurs sooths to rest;
 As smooth, the stream of silver Irwan flows;
 As fair, each flower along his border blows:
 Yet dwells not here that nameless bliss refin'd,
 That tranquil hour, that vacancy of mind.
 Is it that knowledge is allied to woe;
 And are we happy, only e'er we know?
 Is it that hope withholds her golden ray,
 That fancy's fairy visions fade away?
 Or can I, distant far from all that's dear,
 Be happy only when Almena's near?
 That truth, the feelings of my heart disclose:
 Too dear the friendship for the friend's repose.
 Thus mourn'd the muse, when, through his osiers
 wild,
 The hill-born Irwan rais'd his head, and smil'd:
 "Child of my hopes," he fondly cried, "forbear:
 "Nor let thy Irwan witness thy despair.
 "Has peace indeed forsook my flow'ry shore?
 "Shall fame, and hope, and fancy, charm no
 "more?
 "Though fame and hope in kindred air depart,
 "Yet fancy still should hold thee to her heart:
 "For, at thy birth, the village hind has seen
 "Her light wings waving o'er the shadowy green;
 "With rosy wreaths she crown'd the new-born
 "hours,
 "And rival fairies fill'd thy bed with flowers:
 "In vain—if grief shall waste thy blooming years,
 "And life dissolve in solitude and tears——"

THE AMIABLE KING.

The free-born muse her tribute rarely brings,
 Or burns her incense to the power of kings;

But virtue ever shall her voice command,
 Alike a spade or sceptre in her hand.
 Is there a prince untainted with a throne,
 That makes the interest of mankind his own;
 Whose bounty knows no bounds of time or place;
 Who nobly feels for all the human race:
 A prince that acts in reason's steady sphere,
 No slave to passion, and no dupe to fear;
 A breast where mild humanity resides,
 Where virtue dictates, and where wisdom guides;
 A mind that, stretch'd beyond the years of youth,
 Explores the secret springs of taste and truth:
 These, these are virtues which the muse shall sing;
 And plant, for these, her laurels round a king!
 Britannia's monarch! this shall be thy praise;
 For this, be crown'd with never-fading bays!

HYMENEAL

On the Marriage of his present Majesty.

AWAKE, thou everlasting lyre!
 That once the mighty Pindar strung,
 When rapt with more than mortal fire,
 The gods of Greece he sung:
 Awake!

Arrest the rapid foot of time again
 With liquid notes of joy, and pleasure's melting
 strain.

Crown'd with each beauteous flower that blows
 On Acidalia's tuneful side;
 With all Aonia's rosy pride,
 Where numerous Aganippe flows;
 From Thespian groves and fountains wild,
 Come, thou yellow-vested boy,
 Redolent of youth and joy,
 * Fair Urania's favour'd child!
 George to thee devotes the day:
 Io Hymen, haste away!

Daughter of the genial main!
 Queen of youth and rosy smiles,
 Queen of dimple-dwelling wiles;
 Come with all thy Paphian train!

O, give the fair that blooms for Britain's throne,
 Thy melting charms of love, thy soul-enchanting zone!

Daughter of the genial main!
 Bring that heart-dissolving power,
 Which once in Ida's sacred bower
 The soul of Jove oppos'd in vain:
 The fire of gods thy conquering charms confess'd;
 And, vanquish'd, sunk, sunk down on Juno's soltering breast.

She comes, the conscious sea subsides;
 Old ocean curbs his thund'ring tides:
 Smooth the silken surface lies,
 Where Venus' flowery chariots flies:
 Paphian airs in ambush sleep
 On the still bosom of the deep;
 Paphian maids around her move,
 Keen-ey'd hope, and joy, and love:
 Their rosy breasts a thousand Cupids lave;
 And dip their wanton wings, and beat the bux-om wave.

* See Caullus.

But mark, if more than vulgar mien,
 With regal grace and radiant eye,
 A form in youthful majesty!
 Britain, hail thy favour'd queen!
 For her the conscious sea subsides;
 Old ocean curbs his thund'ring tides:
 O'er the glassy bosom'd main
 Venus leads her laughing train:
 The Paphian maids move graceful by her side;
 And o'er the buxom waves the rosy Cupids ride.

Fly, ye fairy-footed hours!
 Fly, with aromatic flowers!
 Such as bath'd in orient dews,
 Beauty's living glow diffuse;
 Such as in Idalia's grove
 Breathe the sweets, the soul of love!

Come, genial god of chaste delight,
 With wreaths of festive roses crown'd,
 And torch that burns with radiance bright,
 And liberal robe that sweeps the ground!
 Bring thy days of golden joy,
 Pleasures pure, that never cloy!
 Bring to Britain's happy pair,
 All that's kind, and good, and fair!
 George to thee devotes the day:
 Io, Hymen, haste away!

Daughters of Jove! ye virgins sage,
 That wait on Camus' hoary age;
 That oft his winding vales along
 Have smooth'd your silver-woven song;
 O wake once more those lays sublime,
 That live beyond the wrecks of time!
 To crown your Albion's boasted pair,
 The never-fading wreath prepare;

While her rocks echo to this grateful strain,
 "The friends of freedom and of Britain reign!"

SONG.

'Tis o'er, the pleasing prospect's o'er!
 My weary heart can hope no more—
 Then welcome, wan despair!
 Approach with all thy dreadful train;
 Wild anguish, discontent, and pain,
 And thorny-pillow'd care!

Gay hope, and ease, and joy, and rest,
 All, all that charms the peaceful breast,
 For ever I resign.

Let pale anxiety instead,
 That has not where to lay her head,
 And lasting woe be mine.

It comes! I feel the painful woe—
 My eyes for Solyman will flow
 In silent grief again;
 Who wand'ring o'er some mountain drear,
 Now hap'ly sheds the pensive tear,
 And calls on me in vain.

Perhaps, along the lonely shores,
 He now the sea's blue breast explores,
 To watch the distant sail;
 Perhaps, on Sundah's hills forlorn,
 He faints, with aching toil o'erborne;
 And life's last spirits fall.

Ah, no!—the cruel thought forbear!
 Avaunt, thou fiend of fell despair,
 That only death canst give!

While Heav'n eternal rules above,
 Almena yet may find her love,
 And Solyman may live!

HYMN TO THE ETHERAL PROVIDENCE.

LIFE of the world, Immortal Mind!
 Father of all the human kind!
 Whose boundless eye that knows no rest,
 Intent on nature's ample breast;
 Explores the space of earth and skies,
 And sees eternal incense rise!
 To thee my humble voice I raise;
 Forgive, while I presume to praise.

Though thou this transient being gave,
 That shortly sinks into the grave;
 Yet 'twas thy goodness, still to give
 A being that can think and live;
 In all thy works thy wisdom see,
 And stretch its tow'ring mind to thee!
 To thee my humble voice I raise;
 Forgive, while I presume to praise.

And still this poor contracted span,
 This life, that bears the name of man;
 From thee derives its vital ray,
 Eternal Source of life and day!
 Thy bounty still the sunshine pours,
 That gilds its morn and evening hours.
 To thee my humble voice I raise;
 Forgive, while I presume to praise.

Through error's maze, through folly's night,
 The lamp of reason lends me light.
 When stern affliction waves her rod,
 My heart confides in thee, my God!
 When nature shrinks, oppress'd with woes,
 Ev'n then she finds in thee repose.
 To thee my humble voice I raise;
 Forgive, while I presume to praise.

Affliction flies, and hope returns;
 Her lamp with brighter splendour burns;
 Gay love with all his smiling train,
 And peace and joy are here again.
 These, these, I know, 'twas thine to give:
 I trusted; and, behold, I live!
 To thee my humble voice I raise;
 Forgive, while I presume to praise.

O may I still thy favour prove!
 Still grant me gratitude and love.
 Let truth and virtue guide my heart;
 Nor peace, nor hope, nor joy depart.
 But yet, whate'er my life may be,
 My heart shall still repose on thee!
 To thee my humble voice I raise;
 Forgive, while I presume to praise.

TO GEORGE COLMAN, ESQ.

Prefixed to the Correspondence of Theodosius and Constantia.

To live beneath the golden star of love,
 With happier fancy, passions more refin'd;
 Each softening charm of tenderness to prove,
 And all the finer movements of the mind—
 From gifts like these, say, what the boasted gain
 Of those who exquisitely feel or know?

The skill from pleasure to extract its pain,
And open all the avenues of woe.

Yet shall we, Colman, at these gifts repine?
Implore cold apathy to steal the heart?
Would you that sensibility resign,
And with those powers of genius would you part?

Ah no, my friend! nor deem the verse divine,
That weakncfs wrote in Petrarch's gentle strain!
When once he own'd at love's unfavouring shrine,
"A thousand pleasures were not worth one
"pain."

The dreams of fancy sooth the pensive heart;
For fancy's urn can new delights dispense:
The powers of genius purer joys impart;
For genius brightens all the springs of sense.

O charm of every muse-ennobled mind,
Far, far above the grovelling crowd to rise!
Leave the low train of trifling cares behind;
Assert its birthright, and affect the skies!

O right divine, the pride of power to scorn;
On fortune's little vanity look down!
With nobler gifts, to fairer honours born,
Than fear, or folly, fancies in a crown!

As far each boon that nature's hand bestows,
The worthless glare of fortune's train exceeds,
As yon fair orb, whose beam eternal glows,
Outshines the transient meteor that it feeds.

To nature, Colman, let thy incense rise,
For, much indebted, much hast thou to pay;
For taste refine'd, for wit correctly wise,
And keen discernment's soul-pervading ray.

To catch the manners from the various face,
To paint the nice diversities of mind,
The living lines of character to trace,
She gave thee powers, and she the task assign'd.

Seize, seize the pen! the sacred hour departs!
Nor led by kindness longer lend thine ear:
The tender tale of two ingenious hearts
Would rob thee of a moment and a tear.

London, Nov. 10. 1764.

WRITTEN IN A COTTAGE-GARDEN,

AT A VILLAGE IN LORRAIN.

Occasioned by a Tradition concerning a Tree of Rosemary.

"Arbustum loquitur."

O thou, whom love and fancy lead
To wander near this woodland hill,
If ever music smooth'd thy quill,
Or pity wak'd thy gentle reed,
Repose beneath my humble tree,
If thou lov'st simplicity.

Stranger, if thy lot has laid
In toilsome scenes of busy life,
Full sorely may'st thou rue the strife
Of weary passions ill repaid.

In a garden live with me,
If thou lov'st simplicity.

Flowers have sprung for many a year
O'er the village maiden's grave,
That, one memorial-sprig to save,
Bore it from a sister's bier;

And homeward walking, wept o'er me—
The true tears of simplicity,

And soon, her cottage window near
With care my slender stem the plac'd;
And fondly thus her grief embrac'd,
And cherish'd sad remembrance dear:
For love sincere, and friendship free
Are children of simplicity.

When past was many a painful day
Slow-pacing o'er the village green,
In white were all its maidens seen,
And bore my guardian friend away.
Ah death! what sacrifice to thee,
The ruins of simplicity.

One generous swain her heart approv'd,
A youth whose fond and faithful breast
With many an artless sigh confess'd,
In nature's language, that he lov'd.
But stranger, 'tis no tale to thee,
Unless thou lov'st simplicity.

He died—and soon her lip was cold,
And soon her rosy cheek was pale;
The village wept to hear the tale,
When for both the slow bell toll'd—
Beneath yon flowery turf they lie,
The lovers of simplicity.

Yet one boon have I to crave;
Stranger if thy pity bleed,
Wilt thou do one tender deed,
And strew my pale flowers o'er their grave?
So lightly lie the turf on thee,
Because thou lov'st simplicity!

THE PASTORAL PART OF

MILTON'S EPITAPHIUM DAMONIS.

O FOR the soft lays of Himeria's maids!
The strains that died in Arethusa's shades;
Tun'd to wild sorrow on her mournful shore,
When Daphnis, Hylas, Eion breath'd no more!
Thame's vocal wave shall every note prolong,
And all his villas learn the Doric song.

How Thyrsis mourn'd his long-liv'd Damon
dead;
What sighs he utter'd, and what tears he shed—
Ye dim retreats, ye wandering fountains know;
Ye desert wilds bore witness to his woe:
Where oft in grief he past the tedious day,
Or lonely languish'd the dull night away.

Twice had the fields their blooming honours
bore;
And Autumn twice resign'd his golden store,
Unconscious of his loss, while Thyrsis staid
To woo the sweet muse in the Tuscan shade.
Crown'd with her favour, when he sought again
His flock forsaken, and his native plain;
When to his old elm's wonted shade return'd—
Then—then, he mis'd his parted friend—and mourn'd.

And go, he cry'd, my tender lambs adieu!
Your wretched master has no time for you.

Yet are there pow'rs divine in earth or sky?
Gods can they be who destin'd thee to die?
And shalt thou mix with shades of vulgar name?
Lost thy fair honours, and forgot thy fame?

Not he, the god whose golden wand refrains
The pale-eyed people of the gloomy plains,
Of Damon's fate shall thus regardless be,
Or suffer vulgar shades to herd with thee.

Then go, he cry'd, &c.

Yet while one strain my trembling tongue may try,

Not unlamented, shepherd, shalt thou die.
Long in these fields thy fame shall flourish fair,
And Daphnis only greater honours share;
To Daphnis only purer vows be paid,
While Pan or Pales loves the village shade.
If truth or science may survive the grave,
Or, what is more, a poet's friendship save.

Then go, &c.

These, these are thine: For me what hopes remain?

Save of long sorrow, and of anguish vain.
For who, still faithful to my side, shall go, [snow?
Like thee, through regions clad with chilling
Like thee, the rage of fiery summers bear,
When fades the wan flower in the burning air?
The lurking dangers of the chafe essay,
Or sooth with fong and various tale the day?

Then go, &c.

To whom shall I my hopes and fears impart?
Or trust the cares and follies of my heart?
Whose gentle counsels put those cares to flight?
Whose cheerful converse cheat the tedious night?
The social hearth when autumn's treasures store,
Chill blow the winds without, and through the bleak elm roar.

Then go, &c.

When the fierce suns of summer noons invade,
And Pan reposes in the green-wood shade,
The shepherds hide, the nymphs plunge down the deep, [sleep.

And waves the hedge-row o'er the ploughman's
Ah! who shall charm with such address refin'd,
Such Attic wit, and elegance of mind?

Then go, &c.

Alas! now lonely round my fields I stray,
And lonely seek the pasture's wonted way.
Or in some dim vale's mournful shade repose—
There pensive wait the weary day's slow close,
While showers descend, the gloomy tempest raves,
And o'er my head the struggling twilight waves.

Then go, &c.

Where once fair harvest cloth'd my cultur'd
plain,
Now weeds obscene and vexing brambles reign;
The groves of myrtle and the clustering vine
Delight no more, for joy no more is mine.
My flocks no longer find a master's care,
Ev'n piteous as they gaze with looks of dumb despair.

Then go, &c.

Thy hazel, Tyt'rus, has no charms for me;
Nor yet thy wild ash, lov'd Alphesibee.
No more shall fancy weave her rural dream,
By Ægon's willow, or Amynta's stream,
The trembling leaves, the fountain's cool serene,
The murmuring zephyr, and the mossy green—
These smile unseen, and those unheeded play,
I cut my shrubs, and careless walk'd away.

Then go, &c.

Mopus; who knows what fates the stars dispense,
And solves the grove's wild warblings into sense,
This Mopus mark'd—what thus thy spleen can move?

Some baleful planet, or some hopeless love?
The star of Saturn oft annoys the swain,
And in the dull cold breast long holds his leaden reign.

Then go, &c.

The nymphs too, piteous of their shepherd's
woe,
Came the sad cause solicitous to know.
Is this the port of jocund youth, they cry,
That look disgusted, and that downcast eye?
Gay smiles and love on that soft season wait;
* He's twice a wretch whom beauty wounds too late.

Then go, &c.

One gentle tear the British Chloris gave,
Chloris the grace of Maldon's purple wave—
In vain—my grief no soothing words disarm,
Nor future hopes, nor present good can charm.
Then go, &c.

The happier flocks one social spirit moves,
The same their sports, their pastures and their loves;
Their hearts to no peculiar object tend,
None knows a favourite, or selects a friend.
So heard the various natives of the main,
And Proteus drives in crowds his scaly train,
The feather'd tribes too find an easier fate;
The meanest sparrow still enjoys his mate;
And when by chance or wearing age he dies,
The transient loss a second choice supplies.

Man, hapless man, for ever doom'd to know
The dire vexations that from discord flow,
In all the countless numbers of his kind,
Can scarcely meet with one congenial mind.
If haply found, death wings the fatal dart,
The tender union breaks, and breaks his heart.

Then go, &c.

Ah me! what error tempted me to go
O'er foreign mountains, and through Alpine snow?
Too great the price to mark in Tyber's gloom
The mournful image of departed Rome!
Nay, yet immortal, could the boast again
The glories of her universal reign.
And all that Maro left his fields to see,
Too great the purchase to abandon thee!
To leave thee in a land no longer seen!—
Bid mountains rise, and oceans roll between!—
Ah! not embrace thee!—not to see thee die!
Meet thy last looks, or close thy languid eye!
Not one fond farewell with thy shade to send,
Nor bid thee think of thy surviving friend!

Then go, &c.

Ye Tuscan shepherds, pardon me this tear!
Dear to the muse, to me for ever dear!

* Milton seems to have borrowed this sentiment from Guarini.

Chè se t'affale a la canuta etate
Amoroso talento,
Havrai doppio tormento,
E di quel, che potendo non volesti,
E di quel, che volendo non potrai.

Q. iiij

The youth I mourn a Tuscan title bore.—
 See * Lydian Lucca for her son deplore!
 O days of ecstacy! when rapt I lay
 Where Arno wanders down his flow'ry way,—
 Pluck'd the pale violet, press'd the velvet mead,
 Or bade the myrtle's balmy fragrance bleed!—
 Delighted, heard amid the rural throng
 Menalcas strive with Lycidas in song.
 † Oft would my voice the mimic strain essay,
 Nor haply all unheeded, was my lay:
 For, shepherds, yet I boast your generous meed,
 The osier basket, and compacted reed.
 Francino crown'd me with a poet's fame,
 And Dati † taught his beechen groves my name.

PRECEPTS OF CONJUGAL HAPPINESS.

ADDRESSED TO A LADY ON HER MARRIAGE.

First published in 1767.

FRIEND, sister, partner of that gentle heart,
 Where my soul lives, and holds her dearest part;
 While love's soft raptures these gay hours employ,
 And time puts on the yellow robe of joy,
 Will you, Maria, mark with patient ear,
 The moral muse, nor deem her song severe?
 Through the long course of life's unclouded
 day,

Where sweet contentment smiles on virtue's way;
 Where fancy opens her ever-varying views,
 And hope strews flowers, and leads you as the strews;

May each fair pleasure court thy favour'd breast,
 By truth protected, and by love caref'd!

So friendship vows, nor shall her vows be vain;
 For every pleasure comes in virtue's train;
 Each charm that tender sympathies impart,
 The glow of soul, the transports of the heart,
 Sweet meanings that in silent truth convey
 Mind into mind, and steal the soul away;
 These gifts, O virtue, these are all thy own;
 Lost to the vicious, to the vain unknown!

Yet blest with these, and happier charms than these,

By nature form'd, by genius taught to please,
 Ev'n' you, to prove that mortal gifts are vain,
 Must yield your human sacrifice to pain;
 The wizard care shall dim those brilliant eyes,
 Smite the fair urns, and bid the waters rise.

With mind unbroke that darker hour can bear,
 Nor once his captive, drag the chains of care,
 Hope's radiant sunshine o'er the scene to pour,
 Not future joys in present ills devour,
 These arts your philosophic friend may show,
 Too well experienc'd in the school of woe.

When sinks the heart, by transient grief oppress'd,
 Seek not reflection, for it wounds the breast,

* The Tuscans were a branch of the Pelasgi that migrated into Europe not many ages after the dispersion. Some of them marched by land as far as Lydia, and from thence detached a colony under the conduct of Tyrsenus to Italy.

† When Milton was in Italy, Carlo Dati was professor of philosophy at Florence.—A liberal friend to men of genius and learning, as well foreigners as his own countrymen.—He wrote a panegyric and some poems on Lewis XIV. besides other tracts.

While memory turns, to happier objects blind,
 Though once the friend, the traitor of the mind,
 Past scenes of pain is studious to explore,
 Forgets its joys, and thinks its suff'rings o'er.

To life's horizon forward turn your eye,
 Pass the dim cloud, and view the height'ning
 sky:

On hope's kind wing more genial climes survey,
 Let fancy join, but reason guide your way,
 For fancy, still to tender woes inclin'd,
 May sooth the heart, but misdirects the mind.

The source of half our anguish, half our tears,
 Is the wrong conduct of our hopes and fears;
 Like ill-train'd children, still their treatment such,
 Refrain'd too rashly, or indulg'd too much.
 Hence hope, projecting more than life can give,
 Would live with angels, or refuse to live;
 Hence spleen-ey'd fear, o'eracting caution's part,
 Betrays those succours reason lends the heart.

Yet these, submitted to fair truth's controul,
 These tyrants are the servants of the soul:
 Through vales of peace the dove-like hope shall stray;

And bear at eve her olive branch away,
 In ev'ry scene some distant charm desire,
 And hold it forward to the bright'ning eye;
 While watchful fear, if fortitude maintain
 Her trembling steps, shall ward the distant pain.

Should crring nature casual faults disclose,
 Wound not the breast that harbours your repose:
 For ev'ry grief that breast from you shall prove,
 Is one link broken in the chain of love.

Soon, with their objects, other woes are past,
 But pains from those we love are pains that last.
 Though faults or follies from reproach may fly,
 Yet in its shade the tender passions die.

Love, like the flower that courts the sun's kind
 ray,

Will flourish only in the smiles of day;
 Distrust's cold air the generous plant annoys,
 And one chill blight of dire contempt destroys.
 O shun, my friend, avoid that dangerous coast,
 Where peace expires, and fair affection's lost;
 By wit, by grief, by anger urg'd, forbear
 The speech contemptuous, and the scornful air.

If heart-felt quiet, thoughts unmix'd with pain,
 While peace weaves flow'rs to Hymen's golden chain,

If tranquil days, if hours of smiling ease,
 The sense of pleasure, and the pow'rs to please,
 If charms like these deserve your serious care,
 Of one dark foe, one dangerous foe beware!
 Like Hecla's mountain, while his heart's in flame,
 His aspect's cold, and jealousy his name.
 His hideous birth his wild disorders prove,
 Begot by hatred on despairing love!

Her throes in rage the frantic mother bore,
 And the fell fire with angry curses tore
 His sable hair—Distrust beholding snail'd,
 And lov'd her image in her future child.

With cruel care, industrious to impart
 Each painful sense, each soul-tormenting art,
 To doubt's dim shrine her hapless charge she led,
 Where never sleep reliev'd the burning head,
 Where never grateful fancy sooth'd the pained
 Or the dear charms of easy confidence.
 Hence fears eternal, ever-restless care,
 And all the dire associates of despair,

Hence all the woes he found that peace destroy,
And dash with pain the sparkling stream of joy.

When love's warm breast, from rapture's trembling height,
Falls to the temp'rate measures of delight;
When calm delight to easy friendship turns,
Grieve not that Hymen's torch more gently burns.
Unerring nature, in each purpose kind,
Forbids long transports to usurp the mind;
For, oft dissolv'd in joy's oppressive ray,
Soon would the finer faculties decay.

True tender love one even tenor keeps;
'Tis reason's flame, and burns when passion sleeps.

The charm connubial, like a stream that glides
Through life's fair vale, with no unequal tides,
With many a plant along its genial side,
With many a flower that blows in beauteous pride,
With many a shade, where peace in rapturous rest
Holds sweet affiance to her fearless breast,
Pure in its source, and temp'rate in its way,
Still flows the same, nor finds its urn decay.

O bliss beyond what lonely life can know,
The soul-felt sympathy of joy and woe!
The magic charm which makes e'en sorrow dear,
And turns to pleasure the partaken tear!

Long, beauteous friend, to you may Heaven
impart

The soft endearments of the social heart!
Long to your lot may ev'ry blessing flow,
That sense, or taste, or virtue can bestow!
And O, forgive the zeal your peace inspires,
Or teach that prudence which itself admires.

VERSES IN MEMORY OF A LADY*.

WRITTEN AT SANDGATE CASTLE, 1768.

"Nec tamen Ingenio, quantum servire dolori."

LET others boast the false and faithless pride,
No nuptial charm to know, and known, to hide,
With vain disguise from nature's dictates part,
For the poor triumph of a vacant heart;
My verse, the god of tender vows inspires,
Dwells on my soul, and wakens all her fires.

Dear silent partner of those happier hours,
That pass'd in Hackthorn's vales, in Blagdon's bowers!

If yet thy gentle spirit wanders here,
Borne by its virtues to no nobler sphere;
If yet that pity which, of life possess't, Fill'd thy fair eye, and lighten'd through thy breast;

If yet that tender thought, that generous care,
The gloomy power of endless night may spare;
Oh! while my soul for thee, for thee complains,
Catch her warm sighs, and kiss her bleeding strains.

Wild, wretched wish! can pray'r, with feeble
breath,

Pierce the pale ear, the statued ear of death?
Let patience pray, let hope aspire to pray'r!
And leave me the strong language of despair!

Hence, ye vain painters of ingenious woe,
Ye Lyttletons, ye shining Petrarchs, go!
I hate the languor of your lenient strain,
Your flow'ry grief, your impotence of pain.

* Wife of the author. She was daughter to Mr. Cracroft of Lincolnshire.

Oh! had ye known, what I have known, to prove
The searching flame, the agonies of love!
Oh! had ye known how souls to souls impart
Their fire, or mix'd the life-drops of the heart!
Not like the stream that down the mountain's side,
Tunefully mourn, and sparkle as they glide;
Not like the breeze, that sighs at evening hour
On the soft bosom of some folding flower;
Your stronger grief, in stronger accents borne,
Had sooth'd the breast with burning anguish torn.

The voice of seas, the winds that rouse the deep,
Far-sounding floods that tear the mountains steep;
Each wild and melancholy blast that raves
Round these dim towers, and smites the beating waves—

This sooths my soul—'tis nature's mournful breath,
'Tis nature struggling in the arms of death!—

See the last aid of her expiring state,
See love, ev'n love, has lent his darts to fate*!
Oh! when beneath his golden shafts I bled,
And vainly bound his trophies on my head;
When, crown'd with flowers, he led the rosy day,
Liv'd to my eye, and drew my soul away—
Could fear, could fancy at that tender hour,
See the dim grave demand the nuptial flower?

There, there his wreaths dejected Hymen strew'd;
And mourn'd their bloom unfaded as he view'd.
There each fair hope, each tenderness of life,
Each nameless charm of soft obliging strife,
Delight, love, fancy, pleasure, genius, fled,
And the best passions of my soul lie dead;
All, all is there in cold oblivion laid,
But pale remembrance bending o'er a shade.

O come! ye softer sorrows to my breast!
Ye lenient sighs, that slumber into rest!
Come, soothing dreams, your friendly pinions wave,
We'll bear the fresh rose to yon honour'd grave;
For once this pain, this frantic pain forego,
And feel at least the luxury of woe!

Ye holy suff'rers that in silence wait
The last sad refuge of relieving fate!
That rest at eve beneath the cypress's gloom,
And sleep familiar on your future tomb;
With you I'll waste the slow departing day,
And wear with you, th' uncolour'd hours away.
Oh lead me to your cells, your lonely ailes,
Where resignation folds her arms, and smiles;
Where holy faith unwearied vigils keeps,
And guards the urn where fair Constantia † sleeps,
There, let me there in sweet oblivion lie,
And calmly feel the tutor'd passions die.

THE ORIGIN OF THE VEIL.

WARM from this heart while flows the faithful
The meanest friend of beauty shall be mine. [line.
What love, or fame, or fortune could bestow,
The charm of praise, the ease of life I owe
To beauty present, or to beauty fled,
To Hertford, living, or Caernervon dead,
To Tweedale's taste, to Edgumbe's sense serene,
And, envy spare this boast, to Britain's queen.
Kind to the lay that all unlabour'd flow'd,
What fancy caught, where nature's pencil glow'd †;

* The lady died in child-bed.

† See Spectator, No. 164.

† The Fables of Flora.

She saw the path to new, though humble fame,
Gave me her praise, and left me fools to blame.

Strong in their weakness are each woman's charms,
Dread that endears, and softness that difarms:
The timorous eye retiring from applause,
And the mild air that fearfully withdraws,
Marks of our power these humble graces prove,
And, dash'd with pride, we deeper drink of love.

Chief of those charms that hold the heart in thrall,
At thy fair shrine, O modesty, we fall.

Not Cynthia rising o'er the wat'ry way,
When on the dim wave falls her friendly ray;
Not the pure ether of Eolian skies,
That drinks the day's first glories as they rise,
Not all the tints from evening-clouds that break,
Burn in the beauties of the virgin's cheek;
When o'er that cheek, undisciplined by art,
The sweet suffusion rushes to the heart.

Yet the soft blush, untutor'd to controul,
The glow that speaks the susceptible soul,
Led by nice honour and by decent pride,
The voice of ancient virtue taught to hide;
Taught beauty's bloom the searching eye to shun,
As early flowers blow fearful of the sun.

Far as the long records of time we trace*,
Still shlowed the veil o'er modesty's fair face:
The guard of beauty, in whose friendly shade,
Safe from each eye the featur'd soul is laid,—
The pensive thought that paler looks betray,
The tender grief that steals in tears away,
The hopeless wish that prompts the frequent sigh,
Bleeds in the blush, or melts upon the eye.

The man of faith through Gerar doom'd to stray,
A nation waiting his eventful way,
His fortune's fair companion at his side,
The world his promise, Providence his guide,
Once, more than virtue dar'd to value life,
And called a sister whom he own'd a wife.

Mistaken father of the faithful race,
Thy fears alone could purchase thy disgrace,
"Go," to the fair, when conscious of the tale,
Said Gerar's prince, "thy husband is thy veil †."

O ancient faith! O virtue mourn'd in vain!
When Hymen's altar never held a stain;
When his pure torch shed undiminish'd rays,
And fires unholy died beneath the blaze!

For faith like this fair Greece was early known,
And claim'd the veil's first honours as her own.

Ere half her sons, o'er Aga's trembling coast,
Arm'd to revenge one woman's virtue lost;
Ere he, whom Circe sought to charm in vain,
Follow'd wild fortune o'er the various main,
In youth's gay bloom he plied th' exulting oar,
From Ithaca's white rocks to Sparta's shore:

* Plato mentions two provinces in Persia, one of which was called Queen's Girde, the other the Queen's Veil, the revenues of which, no doubt, were employed in purchasing those parts of her Majesty's dress. It was about the middle of the third century, that the eastern women, on taking the vow of virginity, assumed that veil which had before been worn by the Pagan Priestesses, and which is used by the religious among the Romanists now.

† "He is the vaile of thine eyes to all that are with thee, and to all others."

Free to Nerician * gales the vessel glides,
And wild Eurotas † smooths his warrior-tides;
For amorous Greece, when love conducts the way,
Beholds her waters, and her winds obey.
No object her's but love's impression knows,
No wave that wanders, and no breeze that blows;
Her groves ‡, her mountains have his power confest,
And Zephyr sigh'd not but for Flora's breast.

'Twas when his sighs in sweetest whispers stray'd,
Far o'er Laconia's plains from Eva's § shade;
When soft-ey'd spring resum'd his mantle gay,
And lean'd luxurious on the breast of May,
Love's genial banners young Ulysses bore
From Ithaca's white rocks to Sparta's shore.

With all that soothes the heart, that wins, or
All princely virtues, and all manly charms, [warms,
All love can urge, or eloquence persuade,
The future hero woo'd his Spartan maid.
Yet long he woo'd—In Sparta, slow to yield,
Beauty, like valour, long maintain'd the field.

"No bloom so fair Messene's banks disclose;
"No breath so pure o'er Tempe's bosom blows;
"No smile so radiant throws the genial ray
"Through the fair eye-lids of the opening day;
"But deaf to vows with fondest passion prest,
"Cold is the wave of Hebrus' wint'ry breast,
"Penelope regards no lover's pain,
"And owns Ulysses eloquent in vain.

"To vows that vainly waste their warmth in "Insidious hopes that lead but to despair, [air,
"Affections lost, desires the heart mult rue,
"And love, and Sparta's joyless plains adieu!
"Yet still this bosom shall one passion share,
"Still shall my country find a father there.
"Ev'n now the children of my little reign
"Demand that father, of the faithless main;
"Ev'n now, their prince solicitous to save,
"Climb the tall cliff, and watch the changeful
"wave.

"But not for him their hopes, or fears alone!
"They seek the promis'd partner of his throne;
"For her their incense breathes, their altars blaze,
"For her to Heaven the suppliant eye they raise.
"Ah! shall they know their prince implor'd in "vain?

"Can my heart live beneath a nation's pain?"
There spoke the virtue that her soul admir'd,
The Spartan soul, with patriot ardour fir'd.
"Enough!" she cried—"be mine to boast a part
"In him, who holds his country to his heart.
"Worth, honour, faith, that fair affection gives,
"And with that virtue, every virtue lives."
Pleas'd that the nobler principles could move
His daughter's heart, and soften it to love,
Icarius own'd the auspices divine,
Wove the fair crown ¶, and bless'd the holy shrine.

* From the mountain Neritos in Ithaca, now called Nericia.

† The Spartan river.

‡ "E mentre d'Alberghe Amore." TASSO.

§ A mountain in Peloponnesus.

¶ "Omnes omnium Caritates," &c. CIC.

¶ The women of ancient Greece at the marriage ceremony wore garlands of flowers, probably as emblems of purity, fertility and beauty. Thus Euripides.

But ah! the dreaded parting hour to brave!
Then strong affection griev'd for what it gave.
Should he the comfort of his life's decline,
His life's last charm to Ithaca resign?

Or, wand'ring with her to a distant shore,
Behold Eurotas' long-lov'd banks no more?
Expose his gray hairs to an alien sky,
Nor on his country's parent bosom die?*

"No, prince," he cried; "for Sparta's happier
plain,

"Leave the lov'd honours of thy little reign,
The grateful change shall equal honours bring;
—Lord of himself, a Spartan is a king."

When thus the prince, with obvious grief op-
press'd,

"Canst thou not force the father from thy breast?
Not without pain behold one child depart,

"Yet bid me tear a nation from my heart?
—Not for all Sparta's, all Eubœa's plains"---

He said, and to his couriers gave the reins.

Still the fond fire purstues with suppliant voice,
Till mov'd, the monarch yields her to her choice.

"Thou mine by vows, by fair affection mine,
And holy truth, and auspices divine;

"This suit let fair Penelope decide,
Remain the daughter, or proceed the bride."

O'er the quick blush her friendly mantle fell,
And told him all that modesty could tell.

No longer now the father's fondness strove
With patriot virtue, or acknowledg'd love,

But on the scene that parting sighs endear'd,
Fair modesty's † first honour'd fane he rear'd.

The daughter's form the pictur'd goddess wore,
The daughter's veil † before her blushes bore,
And taught the maids of Greece this sovereign law---

She most shall conquer, who shall most withdraw.

— αλλ' ἔμας

Σοι καταστῆσαι ἔγωγε νυ ἤγορε, ὡς γλυκομυμνη.

IPH. IN AUL.

The modern Greek ladies wear these garland in various forms, whenever they appear dressed; and frequently adorn themselves thus for their own amusement, and when they do not expect to be seen by any but their domestics.

Voyage Litteraire de la Greece.

* The ancients esteem'd this one of the greatest misfortunes that could befall them. The Trojans thought it the most lamentable circumstance attending the loss of their pilot Palinurus, that his body should lie in a foreign country.

— Ignorâ Palinure jacebis Arenâ. VIRG.

† Pausanias, who has recorded the story on which this little poem is founded, tells us, that this was the first temple erected to modesty in Greece.

‡ See the Veil of Modesty in the Museum Capitolinum, vol. iii. and for further proofs of its high antiquity, see Hom. Odyss. l. 6.

Claud. Epithal. Honor. where he says,

Et crines festina ligat Peplumque flantem
Allevat---

IPHIG. in Taur. act 4. and Colut. Rapt. Helen. v.
381. l. 1. where Hermione tears her gold-embroidered veil on the disappearance of Helen:

— Aureum quoque rupit capitis tegmen.

THE COUNTRY JUSTICE.

A POEM IN THREE PARTS.

To Richard Burn, LL. D. one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the Counties of Westmoreland and Cumberland.

DEAR SIR,

A POEM written professedly at your request, naturally addresses itself to you. The distinction you have acquired on the subject, and your taste for the arts, give that address every kind of propriety. If I have any particular satisfaction in this publication, beside what arises from my compliance with your commands, it must be in the idea of that testimony it bears to our friendship. If you believe, that I am more concerned for the duration of that than of the poem itself, you will not be mistaken;
for I am,

Dear Sir,

Your truly affectionate brother,
And faithful humble servant,

Somersetshire, April 25. 1774. THE AUTHOR.

PART I.

IN Richard's days, when lost his pastur'd plain,
The wand'ring Briton fought the wild woods
reign,

With great disdain beheld the feudal hord
Poor life-let vassals of a Norman lord;
And, what no brave man ever lost, possess'd
Himself— for freedom bound him to her breast—

Lov'st thou that freedom? by her holy shrine,
If yet one drop of British blood be thine,
See, I conjure thee, in the desert shade,
His bow unstrung, his little household laid,
Some brave forefather; while his fields they share,
By Saxon, Dane, or Norman, banish'd there I
And think he tells thee, as his soul withdraws,
As his heart swells against a tyrant's laws,
The war with fate though fruitless to maintain,
To guard that liberty he lov'd in vain.

Were thoughts like these the dream of ancient time?

Peculiar only to some age, or clime?
And does not nature thoughts like these impart,
Breathe in the soul, and write upon the heart?

Ask on their mountains yon deserted band,
That point to Paoli with no plausive hand;
Despising still, their freeborn souls unbroke,
Alike the Gallic and Ligurian yoke!

Yet while the patriot's gen'rous rage we share,
Still civil safety calls us back to care;
To Britain lost in either Henry's day,
Her woods, her mountains one wild scene of prey!
Fair peace from all her bounteous vallies fled,
And law beneath the barbed arrows led.

In happier days, with more auspicious fate,
The far-fam'd Edward heal'd his wounded state;
Dread of his foes, but to his subjects dear,
These learn'd to love, as those are taught to fear,
Their laurel'd prince with British pride obey,
His glory shone their discontent away.

With care the tender flow'r of love to save,
And plant the olive on disorder's grave,
For civil storms fresh barriers to provide,
He caught the sav'ring calm and falling tide.

The social laws from insult to protect,
 To cherish peace, to cultivate respect;
 The rich from wanton cruelty refrain;
 To smoothe the bed of penury and pain;
 The hapless vagrant to his rest restore;
 The maze of fraud, the haunts of theft explore;
 The thoughtless maiden, when subdu'd by art,
 To aid, and bring her rover to her heart;
 Wild riot's voice with dignity to quell,
 Forbid unpeaceful passions to rebel,
 Wrest from revenge the meditated harm,
 For this fair justice rais'd her sacred arm;
 For this the rural magistrate, of yore,
 Thy honours, Edward, to his mansion bore.
 Oft, where old Air in conscious glory fails,
 On silver waves that flow through smiling vales;
 In Harewood's groves, where long my youth was laid,

Unseen beneath their ancient world of shade;
 With many a group of antique columns crown'd,
 In Gothic guise such mansion have oft found.

Nor lightly deem, ye apes of modern race,
 Ye cits that fore bedizen nature's face,
 Of the more manly structures here ye view;
 They rose for greatness that ye never knew!
 Ye reptile cits, that oft have mov'd my spleen
 With Venus and the graces on your green!
 Let Plutus, growling o'er his ill-got wealth,
 Let Mercury, the thriving god of stealth,
 The shop-man, Janus, with his double looks,
 Rise on your mounts, and perch upon your books!
 But spare my Venus, spare each sister grace,
 Ye cits, that fore bedizen nature's face!

Ye royal architects, whose antic taste,
 Would lay the realms of sense and nature waste;
 Forgot, whenever from her steps ye stray,
 That folly only points each other way;
 Here, though your eye no courtly creature sees,
 Snakes on the ground, or monkeys in the trees;
 Yet let not too severe a censure fall,
 On the plain precincts of the ancient hall.

For though no sight your childish fancy meets,
 Of Thibet's dogs, or China's perroquets;
 Though apes, asps, lizards, things without a tail,
 And all the tribes of foreign monsters fail;
 Here shall ye sigh to see, with rust o'ergrown,
 The iron griffin and the sphinx of stone;
 And mourn, neglected in their waste abodes,
 Fire-breathing drakes, and water-spouting gods.

Long have these mighty monsters known dis-
 grace,
 Yet still some trophies hold their ancient place;
 Where, round the hall, the oaks high surbase rear

The field-day triumphs of two hundred years.
 Th' enormous antlers here recal the day
 That saw the forest monarch forc'd away;
 Who, many a flood, and many a mountain past,
 Not finding those, nor deeming these the lair,
 O'er floods, o'er mountains yet prepar'd to fly,
 Long ere the death-drop fill'd his failing eye!

Here fam'd for cunning, and in crimes grown old,
 Hangs his gray brush, the felon of the fold.
 Oft as the rent-feast swells the midnight cheer,
 The maudlin farmer kens him o'er his beer,
 And tells his old, tradit'ary tale,
 Though known to ev'ry tenant of the vale.

Here, where of old the festal ox has fed,
 Mark'd with his weight, the mighty horns are spread!

Some ox, O Marshall, for a board like thine,
 Where the vast master with the vast furloon
 Vied in round magnitude.--Respect I bear
 To thee, though oft the ruin of the chair.

These, and such antique tokens that record
 The manly spirit, and the bounteous board,
 Me more delight than all the gew-gaw train,
 The whims and zigzags of a modern brain,
 More than all Asia's marmosets to view,
 Grin, frisk, and water in the walks of Kew.

Through these fair vallies, stranger, hast thou stray'd,

By any chance, to visit Harewood's shade,
 And seen with honest, antiquated air,
 In the plain hall the magistratral chair?
 There Herbert sat!--The love of human kind,
 Pure light of truth, and temperance of mind,
 In the free eye the featur'd soul display'd,
 Honour's strong beam, and mercy's melting shade:
 Justice that, in the rigid paths of law,
 Would still some drops from pity's fountain draw,
 Bend o'er her urn with many a gen'rous fear,
 Ere his firm seal should force one orphan's tear;
 Fair equity, and reason scorning art,
 And all the sober virtues of the heart!--
 These sat with Herbert, these shall best avail
 Where statutes order, or where statutes fail.

Be this, ye rural magistrates, your plan:
 Firm be your justice, but be friends to man.

He whom the mighty master of this ball
 We fondly deem, or farcically call,
 To own the patriarch's truth, however loth,
 Holds but a mansion crush'd before the moth.
 Frail in his genius, in his heart too frail,
 Born but to err, and erring to bewail,
 Shalt thou his faults with eye severe explore,
 And give to life one human weakness more?

Still mark if vice or nature prompts the deed;
 Still mark the strong temptation and the need:
 On pressing want, on famine's powerful call,
 At least more lenient let thy justice fall.

For him, who, lost to ev'ry hope of life,
 Has long with fortune held unequal strife,
 Known to no human love, no human care,
 The friendless, homeless object of despair;
 For the poor vagrant feel, while he complains,
 Nor from sad freedom send to sadder chains.
 Alike, if folly or misfortune brought
 Those last of woes his evil days have wrought;
 Believe with social mercy and with me,
 Folly's misfortune in the first degree.

Perhaps on some inhospitable shore
 The houseless wretch a widow'd parent bore;
 Who then, no more by golden prospects led,
 Of the poor Indian begg'd a leafy bed.
 Gold on Canadian hills, or Minden's plain,
 Perhaps that parent mourn'd her soldier slain;
 Bent o'er her babe, her eye dissolv'd in dew,
 The big drops mingling with the milk he drew,
 Gave the sad preface of his future years,
 The child of misery, baptiz'd in tears!

O Edward, here thy fairest laurels fade!
 And thy long glories darken into shade!

While yet the palms thy hardy veterans won,
 The deeds of valour that for thee were done,

While yet the wreaths for which they bravely bled,
 Fir'd thy high soul, and flourish'd on thy head,
 Those veterans to their native shores return'd,
 Like exiles wander'd, and like exiles mourn'd;
 Or, left at large no longer to bewail,
 Were vagrants deem'd, and destin'd to a jail!
 Were there no royal, yet unculur'd lands,
 No wastes that wanted such subduing hands?
 Were Cressly's heroes such abandon'd things?
 O fate of war! and gratitude of kings!

The gipsy-race my pity rarely move;
 Yet their strong thirst of liberty I love.
 Not Wilkes, our freedom's holy martyr, more;
 Nor his firm phalanx of the common shore.

For this in Norwood's patrimonial groves
 The tawny father with his offspring roves;
 When summer suns lead slow the sultry day,
 In mossy caves, where welling waters play,
 Fann'd by each gale that cools the fervid sky,
 With this in ragged luxury they lie.
 Oft at the sun the dusky Elfin strain
 The fable eye, then snuggling, sleep again;
 Oft as the dews of cooler evening fall,
 For their prophetic mother's mantle call.

Far other cares that wand'ring mother wait,
 The mouth, and oft the minister of fate!
 From her to hear, in ev'ning's friendly shade,
 Of future fortune, flies the village-maid,
 Draws her long-hoarded copper from its hold;
 And rusty halfpence purchase hopes of gold.

But, ah! ye maids, beware the gipsy's lures!
 She opens not the womb of time, but yours.
 Oft has her hands the hapless Marian wrung,
 Marian, whom Gay in sweetest strains has sung!
 The parson's maid—fore cause had she to rue
 The gipsy's tongue; the parson's daughter too.
 Long had that anxious daughter sigh'd to know
 What Vellum's spruce clerk, the valley's beau,
 Meant by those glances which at church he stole,
 Her father nodding to the psalm's slow drawl;
 Long had she sigh'd; at length a prophet came,
 By many a sure prediction known to fame,
 To Marian known, and all she told, for true:
 She knew the future, for the past she knew.

Where, in the darkling shed, the moon's dim rays
 Beam'd on the ruins of a one-horse chaise,
 Villaria sat, while faithful Marian brought
 The wayward prophet of the woe she sought.
 Twice did her hands, the income of the week,
 On either side the crooked fixence seek;
 Twice were those hands withdrawn from either side,

To stop the titt'ring laugh, the blush to hide.
 The wayward prophet made no long delay,
 No novice she in fortune's devious way!
 "Ere yet," she cry'd, "ten rolling months are o'er,
 Must ye be mothers; maids, at least, no more.
 "With you shall soon, O lady fair, prevail
 "A gentle youth, the flower of this fair vale.
 "To Marian, once of Colin Clout the scorn,
 "Shall bumpkin come, and bumpkinets be born."
 Smote to the heart, the maidens marvell'd fore,
 That ten short months had such events in store;
 But holding firm what village-maids believe,
 That strife with fate is milking in a sieve;
 To prove their prophet true, though to their cost,
 They justly thought no time was to be lost.

These foes to youth, that seek, with dang'rous
 To aid the native weakness of the heart; [art,
 These miscreants from thy harmless village drive,
 As wasps felonious from the lab'ring hive.

THE COUNTRY JUSTICE.

A POEM.

To Robert Wilson Cracroft, Esq.

BORN with a gentle heart, and born to please
 With native goodness, of no fortune vain,
 The social aspect of inviting ease,
 The kind opinion, and the sense humane;
 To thee, my Cracroft, whom, in early youth,
 With leuiant hand and anxious love I led Through paths where science points to manly truth,
 And glory gilds the mansions of the dead.

To thee this offering of maturer thought,
 That, since wild fancy flung the lyre aside,
 With heedful hand the moral muse hath wrought,
 That muse devotes, and bears with honest pride.

Yet not that period of the human year,
 When fancy reign'd, shall we with pain review,
 All nature's seasons different aspects wear,
 And now her flowers, and now her fruits are due.

Not that in youth we rang'd the smiling meads,
 On Effex' shores the trembling angle play'd,
 Urging at noon the slow boat in the reeds,
 That wav'd their green uncertainty of shade:

Nor yet the days consum'd in Hackthorn's vale,
 That lonely on the heath's wild bosom lies,
 Should we with stern severity bewail,
 And all the lighter hours of life despise.

For nature's seasons different aspects wear,
 And now her flowers, and now her fruits are
 due;

Awlike the freed us from the scourge of care,
 But told us then—for social ends we grew.

To find some virtue trac'd on life's short page,
 Some mark of service paid to human kind,
 Alone can cheer the wintry paths of age,
 Alone support the far-reflecting mind.

Oh! often thought—when Smith's discerning care
 To further days prolong'd this failing frame!
 To die was little—But what heart could bear
 To die, and leave an undistinguish'd name?

Blaydon-House, Feb. 22. 1775.

PART II.

* YET, while thy rod restrains the needy crew,
 Remember that thou art their monarch too.
 King of the beggars!—Lov'st thou not the name?
 O, great from Ganges to the golden Thame!
 Far-ruling sovereign of this begging ball,
 Low at thy footstool other thrones shall fall.
 His arms to thee the whicker'd Moor convey †,
 And Prussia's sturdy beggar own thy sway;

* Refers to the conclusion of the first part.

† The Mahometan princes seem to have a regular system of begging. Nothing so common as to hear that

Courts, senates—all to Baal that bend the knee,
King of the beggars, these are siefs to thee!

But still, forgot the grandeur of thy reign,
Descend to duties meager crowns disdain;
That worst excrefcency of power forego,
That pride of kings, humanity's first foe.

Let age no longer toil with feeble strife,
Worn by long service in the war of life;
Nor leave the head that time hath whiten'd, bare
To the rude insults of the searching air;
Nor bid the knee, by labour harden'd, bend,
O thou, the poor man's hope, the poor man's friend!

If, when from Heav'n severer seasons fall,
Fled from the frozen roof and mouldering wall,
Each face the picture of a winter day, [tray;
More strong than Teniers' pencil could portray them to thee resort the shivering train,
Of cruel days, and cruel man complain,
Say to thy heart (remembering him who said)
"These people come from far, and have no bread."

Nor leave thy venal clerk empower'd to hear;
The voice of want is sacred to thy ear.

He where no fees his fordid pen invite,
Sports with their tears, too indolent to write;
Like the fed monkey in the fable; vain
To hear more helpless animals complain.

But chief thy notice shall one monster claim;
A monster furnish'd with a human frame,
The parish-officer!—though verse disdain
Terms that deform the splendour of the strain;
It stoops to bid thee bend the brow severe
On the fly, pilfering, cruel overseer;
The shuffling farmer, faithful to no trust,
Ruthless as rocks, insatiate as the dust!

When the poor hind, with length of years decay'd,

Leans feebly on his once subduing spade,
Forgot the service of his abler days,
His profitable toil, and honest praise,
Shall this low wretch abridge his scanty bread,
This slave, whose board his former labours spread?

When harvest's burning suns and sickening air
From labour's unbrac'd hand the grasp'd hook tear,

Where shall the helpless family be fed,
That vainly languish for a father's bread?
See the pale mother, sunk with grief and care,
To the proud farmer fearfully repair;
Soon to be sent with infolence away,
Referr'd to vestries, and a distant day!
Referr'd—to perish!—Is my verse severe?
Unfriendly to the human character?

Ah! to this sigh of sad experience truft:
The truth is rigid, but the tale is just.

If in thy courts this caftiff wretch appear,
Think not that patience were a virtue here.
His low-born pride with honest rage controul;
Smite his hard heart, and shake his reptile soul.

But, hapless! oft through fear of future woe,
And certain vengeance of th' insulting foe,

the Dey of Algiers, &c. &c. are dissatisfied with their presents. It must be owned, it would be for the welfare of the world, if princes in general would adhere to the maxim, that it is better to beg than to steal.

* "— Tu pofcis vilia rerum,
"Quamvis fers te nullus egentem." HES.

Oft, ere to thee the poor prefer their pray'r,
The last extremes of penury they bear.

Wouldst thou then raise thy patriot office higher,
To something more than magistrate aspire?
And, left each poorer, pettier chafe behind,
Step nobly forth, the friend of humankind?
The game I start courageously pursue!

Adieu to fear! to infolence adieu!
And first we'll range this mountain's stormy side,
Where the rude winds the shepherd's roof de-rice,

As meet no more the wint'ry blast to bear,
And all the wild hostilities of air.

—That roof have I remember'd many a year;
It once gave refuge to a hunted deer—
Here, in those days, we found an aged pair;—
But time untenants—hah! what seest thou there?
"Horror!—by Heav'n, extended on a bed
"Of naked fear, two human creatures dead!
"Embracing as alive!—ah, no!—no life!
"Cold, breathless!"

'Tis the shepherd and his wife.
I knew the scene, and brought thee to behold
What speaks more strongly than the story told.
They died through want—

"By every power I swear,
"If the wretch treads the earth, or breathes the
"air,

"Through whose default of duty, or design,
"These victims fell, he dies."

"They fell by thine,
"Infernal!—Mine!—by—"

Swear on no pretence:
A swearing justice wants both grace and sense.

When thy good father held this wide domain,
The voice of sorrow never mourn'd in vain.
Sooth'd by his pity, by his bounty fed,
The sick found medicine, and the aged bread.
He left their interest to no parish-care,
No bailiff urg'd his little empire there:
No village-tyrant starv'd them, or oppress'd;
He learn'd their wants, and he those wants redress'd.

Ev'n these, unhappy! who, beheld too late,
Sinoth thy young heart with horror at their fate;
His bounty found, and destin'd here to keep
A small detachment of his mountain-sheep.
Still pleas'd to see them from the annual fair
Th' unwritten history of their profits bear;
More nobly pleas'd those profits to restore,
And, if their fortune fail'd them, make it more.

When nature gave her precept to remove
His kindred spirit to the realms of love,
Afar their anguish from thy distant ear,
No arm to save, and no protection near,
Led by the lure of unaccounted gold,
Thy bailiff seiz'd their little flock, and fold.

Their want contending parishes survey'd,
And this disown'd, and that refus'd to aid:
A while, who should not succour them, they tri'd,
And in that while the wretched victims died.

"I'll scalp that bailiff—sacrifice."

In vain
To rave at mischief, if the cause remain!

O days long lost to man in each degree!
The golden days of hospitality!
When liberal fortunes vied with liberal strife,
To fill the noblest offices of life;

When wealth was virtue's handmaid, and her gate

Gave a free refuge from the wrongs of fate;
The poor at hand their natural patrons saw,
And lawgivers were supplements of law!

Lost are those days, and fashion's boundless sway
Has borne the guardian magistrate away.
Save in Augusta's streets, or Gallia's shore,
The rural patron is beheld no more.

No more the poor his kind protection share,
Unknown their wants, and unreceiv'd their prayer.

Yet has that fashion, long so light and vain,
Reform'd at last, and led the moral train,
Have her gay vot'ries nobler worth to boast
For nature's love, for nature's virtue lost?
No—flod from these, the sons of fortune find
What poor respect to wealth remains behind.
The mock regard alone of menial slaves,
The worshipp'd calves of their outwitting knaves!

Foregone the social, hospitable days,
When wide vales echoed with their owner's praise,
Of all that ancient consequence bereft,
What has the modern man of fashion left?

Does he, perchance, to rural scenes repair,
And "waste his sweetness" on the essenc'd air?
Ah! gently lave the feeble frame he brings,
Ye scouring seas! and ye sulphurous springs!

And thou, Brighthelmstone, where no cits annoy,

(All borne to Margate, in the Margate-hoy)

Where, if the hasty creditor advance,
Lies the light skiff, and ever-bailing France,
Do thou defend him in the dog-day-suns!
Secure in winter from the rage of duns!

While the grim catchpole, the grim porter swear,

One that he is, and one, he is not there,
The tortur'd us'rer, as he murmurs by,
Eyes the Venetian blinds, and heaves a sigh.

O, from each title folly ever took,
Blood! Maccarone! Cicisbeo! or Rook!
From each low passion, from each low resort,
The thieving alley, nay, the righteous court,
From Bertie's, Almack's, Arthur's, and the nest
Where Judah's ferrets earth with Charles unblest;

From these and all the garbage of the great,
At honour's, freedom's, virtue's call—retreat!

Has the fair vale, where rest, conceal'd in flowers,

Lies in sweet ambush for thy careless hours,
The breeze, that, balmy fragrance to infuse,
Bathes its soft wing in aromatic dews,
The stream to sooth thine ear, to cool thy breast,
That mildly murmurs from its crystal rest;—
Have these less charms to win, less power to please,

Than haunts of rapine, harbours of disease?

Will no kind slumbers o'er thine eyelids creep,
Save where the sullen watchman growls at sleep?
Does morn no sweeter, purer breath diffuse
Thau steams through alleys from the lungs of Jews?

And is thy water, pent in putrid wood,
Bethesda-like, when troubled only good?

Is it thy passion Linley's voice to hear,
And has no mountain-lark detain'd thine ear?

Song marks alone the tribes of airy wing;
For, trust me, man was never meant to sing:
And all his mimic organs e'er express,
Was but an imitative howl at best.

Is it on Garrick's attitude you doat?

See on the pointed cliff yon lordly goat!
Like Lear's, his beard descends in graceful snow,
And wild he looks upon the world below.

Superior here the scene in every part!
Here reigns great nature, and there little art!
Here let thy life assume a nobler plan,
To nature faithful, and the friend of man!

Unnumber'd objects ask thy honest care,
Beside the orphan's tear, the widow's prayer,
Far as thy power can save, thy bounty bless,
Unnumber'd evils call for thy redress.

Seest thou afar yon solitary thorn,
Whose aged limbs the heath's wild winds have torn?

While yet to cheer the homeward shepherd's eye,
A few feem straggling in the evening sky!
Not many suns have hastened down the day,
Or blushing moonsimmers'd in clouds their way,
Since there, a scene that stain'd their sacred light,
With horror stopp'd a felon in his flight;
A bade just born that signs of life express,
Lay naked o'er the mother's lifeless breast.

The pitying robber, conscious that, pursu'd,
He had no time to waste, yet stood and view'd;
To the, next cot the trembling infant bore,
And gave a part of what he stole before;
Nor known to him the wretches were, nor dear;
He felt as man, and dropp'd a human tear.

Far other treatment he who breathless lay,
Found from a viler animal of prey.

Worn with long toil on many a painful road,
That toil increas'd by nature's growing load,
When evening brought the friendly hour of rest,
And all the mother throng'd about her breast,
The ruffian officer oppos'd her stay,
And, cruel, bore her in her pangs away,
So far beyond the town's last limits drove,
That to return were hopeless, had she strove.
Abandon'd there—with famine, pain and cold,
And anguish, she expir'd—the rest I've told.

"Now let me swear—For by my soul's last sigh,

"That thief shall live, that overfeer shall die."

Too late!—his life the generous robber paid,
Lost by that pity which his steps delay'd!
No soul-discerning Mansfield sat to hear,
No Hertford bore his prayer to mercy's ear;
No liberal justice first assign'd the gaol,
Or urg'd, as Camplin would have urg'd his tale.

The living object of thy honest rage,
Old in parochial crimes, and steel'd with age,
The grave church-warden!—unabash'd he bears
Weekly to church his book of wicked prayers;
And pours, with all the blasphemy of praise,
His creeping soul in Sternhold's creeping lays!

PART III.

O, no! Sir John—the muse's gentle art
Lives not to blemish, but to mend the heart.
While Gay's brave robber grieves us for his fate,
We hold the harpies of his life in hate.

Ingenuous youth, by nature's voice address,
Finds not the harden'd, but the feeling breast;
Can form no with the dire effects to prove
Of lawless valour, or of venal love,
Approves the fondness of the faithful maid,
And mourns a generous passion unrepaid.

Yet would I praise the pious zeal that saves
Imperial London from her world of knaves;
Yet would I count it no inglorious strife
To scourge the pests of property and life.

Come then, long skill'd in theft's illusive ways,
Lord of the clue that thrids her mighty maze!
Together let us beat all Giles's fields,
Try what the night-house, what the round-house

Hang when we must, be candid when we please,
But leave no bawd, unlicens'd, at her ease.

Say first, of thieves above, or thieves below,
What can we order till their haunts we know?

Far from St James's let your Nimrods stray,
But stop and call at Stephen's in their way.
That ancient victualler, we've been told, of late,

Has kept bad hours, encourag'd high debate;
That those without still pelting those within,
Have stunn'd the peaceful neighbours with their din;

That if you close his private walls invest,
'Tis odds, you meet with some unruly guest—
Good Lord, Sir John, how would the people stare,

To see the present and the late Lord-mayor*
Bow to the majesty of Bow-street chair!

Illustrious chiefs! can I your haunts pass by,
Nor give my long-lov'd liberty a sigh!
That heavenly plant which long unblemish'd
blew,

Dishonour'd only, only hurt by you!
Dishonour'd, when with harden'd front you
claim

To deeds of darkness her diviner name!
For you grim licence strove with Hydra breath
To spread the blasts of pestilence and death:
Here for poor vice, for dark ambition there
She scatter'd poison through the social air.

Yet here, in vain—Oh, had her toil been vain,
When with black-wing she swept the western
main!

When with low labour, and insidious art,
She tore a daughter from her parent's heart!

Oh, patriots, ever patriots out of place,
Fair honour's foil, and liberty's disgrace!
With spleen I see your wild illusions spread
Through the long region of a land misled;
See commerce sink, see cultivation's charms
Lost in the rage of anarchy and arms!

And thou, O Ch—m, once a nation's pride,
Borne on the brightest wave of glory's tide!
Hast thou the parent spurn'd, the erring child
With prospects vain to ruin's arms beguil'd?
Hast thou the plans of dire defection prais'd
For the poor pleasure of a statue rais'd?

Oh, patriots, ever patriots out of place,
From Charles quite graceless, up to Grafton's
grace!

Where forty-five once mark'd the dirty door,
And the chain'd knife* invites the paltry whore;
Though far, methinks, the choicest guests are fled,
And Wilkes and Humphrey number'd with the dead,

Wilkes, who in death would friendship's vows fulfil,

True to his cause, and dines with Humphrey still—Where skulks each dark, where roams each desperate wight,

Owls of the day, and vultures of the night—
Shall we, O Knight! with cruel pains explore,
Clear these low walks, and think the business o'er?
No—much, alas! for you, for me remains,
Where justice sleeps, and depredation reigns.

Wrapt in kind darkness, you no spleen betray,
When the gilt nabob lacqueys all the way:
Harmless to you his towers, his forests rise,
That swell with anguish my indignant eyes;
While in those towers raz'd villages I see,
And tears of orphans watering every tree.
Are these mock-ruins that invade my view?
These are the entrails of the poor Gentoo.

That column's trophied base his bones supply;
That lake the tears that swell'd his fable eye!
Let here, O Knight! their steps terrific steer Thy hue and cry, and loose thy bloodhounds
here.

Oh mercy! thron'd on his eternal breast,
Who breath'd the savage waters into rest;
By each soft pleasure that thy bosom smote,
When first creation started from his thought;
By each warm tear that melted o'er thine eye;
When on his works was written—These must die!
If secret slaughter yet, nor cruel war
Have from these mortal regions forc'd thee far,
Still to our follies, to our frailties blind,
Oh, stretch thy healing wings o'er human kind!
—For them I ask not, hostile to thy sway,
Who calmly on a brother's vitals prey:
For them I plead not, who, in blood embrued,
Have every softer sentiment subdued.

Yet, gentle power, thy absence I bewail,
When seen the dark, dark regions of a gaol;
When found alike in chains and night enclos'd,
The thief detect'd, and the thief suppos'd!
Sure, the fair light, and the salubrious air,
Each yet-suspected prisoner might share.

—To lie, to languish in some dreary cell,
Some lothed hold, where guilt and horror dwell,
Ere yet the truth of seeming facts be tried,
Ere yet their country's sacred voice decide,
Britain, behold thy citizens expos'd,
And blush to think the Gothic age unclose'd!

Oh, more than Goths, who yet decline to raze
That pest of James's puritanic days,
The savage law † that barb'rously ordains,
For female virtue lost a felon's pains!—
Dooms the poor maiden, as her fate severe,
To toil and chains a long-enduring year.

Th' unnatural monarch, to the sex unkind,
An owl obscene, in learning's sunshine blind!
Councils of pathics, cabinets of tools,
Benches of knaves, and parliaments of fools!

* Chained to the table, to prevent depredations.
† 7. Jac. C. 4.

* This was written during the mayoralty of 1776.

Fanatic fools, that, in those twilight times,
With wild religion cloak'd the worst of crimes!—
Hope we from such a crew, in such a reign,
For equal laws, or policy humane?

Here then, O Justice, thy own power forbear;
The sole protector of th' unpitied fair.
Though long entreat the ruthless overbear;
Though the loud veftry teaze thy tortur'd ear;
Though all to acts, to precedents appeal,
Mute be thy pen, and vacant rest thy seal.

Yet shalt thou know, nor is the difference nice,
The casual fall, from impudence of vice.
Abandon'd guilt by active laws restrain,
But pause — if virtue's slightest spark remain.
Left to the shameless lash, the hard'ning goal,
The fairest thoughts of modesty would fail.

The downcast eye, the tear that flows amain,
As if to ask her innocence again;
The plaintive babe, that slumb'ring seem'd to lie
On her soft breast, and wakes at the heav'd sigh;
The cheek that wears the beauteous robe of shame;
How loth they leave a gentle breast to blame!

Hear then, O Justice! thy own power forbear;—
The sole protector of th' unpitied fair!

MILTON'S ITALIAN POEMS,

TRANSLATED;

And Addressed to a Gentleman of Italy.

ADDRESS:

TO SIG. MOZZI, OF MACERATA.

To thee, the child of classic plains,
The happier hand of nature gave
Each grace of fancy's finer strains,
— Each muse that mourn'd o'er Maro's grave.

Nor yet the harp that Horace strung,
With many a charm of easy art;
Nor yet what sweet Tibullus sung,
When beauty bound him to her heart;

Nor all the gentle Provence knew,
Where each breeze bore a lover's sigh,
When Petrarch's sweet persuasion drew
The tender woe from Laura's eye;

Nor aught that nobler science seeks,
What truth, what virtue must avoid;
Nor aught the voice of nature speaks,
To thee unknown, or unenjoy'd.

O wife beyond each weaker aim,
That weds the soul to this low sphere,
Fond to indulge the feeble frame,
That holds a while her prisoner here!

Trust me, my friend, that soul survives
(If e'er had muse prophetic skill),
And when the fated hour arrives,
That all her faculties shall fill,

Fit for some nobler frame she flies,
Afar to find a second birth;
And, flourishing in fairer skies,
Forfakes her nursery of earth.

Oh! there, my Mozzi, to behold
The man that mourn'd his country's wrong,
VOL. XI.

When the poor exile left his fold,
* And feebly dragg'd his goat along!

On Plato's hallow'd breast to lean,
And catch that ray of heavenly fire,
Which smoooth'd a tyrant's fullen mien,
And bade the cruel thought retire!

Amid those fairy-fields to dwell,
Where Taffio's favour'd spirit saw
What—numbers none but his could tell,
What—pencils none but his could draw!

And oft at eve, if eve can be
Beneath the source of glory's smile,
To range Elysian groves, and see
That nightly visitant—ere while,

Who, when he left immortal choirs,
To mix with Milton's kindred soul,
The labours of their golden lyres
Would steal, and whisper whence he stole.

Ausonian bard, from my fond ear
By seas and mountains sever'd long,
If, chance, these humble strains to hear,
You leave your more melodious song.

Whether, advent'rous, you explore
The wilds of Apenninus' brow,
Or, musing near Loreto's † shore,
Smile piteous on the pilgrim's vow;

The muses' gentle offering still
Your ear shall win, your love shall woo,
And these spring-flowers of Milton fill
The favour'd vales where first they grew.

For me, depriv'd of all that's dear,
Each fair, fond part'ner of my life,
Left with a lonely oar to steer,
Through the rude storms of mortal strife;—

When care, the felon of my days,
Expands his cold and gloomy wing,
His load when strong affliction lays
On hope, the heart's elastic spring.

For me what solace yet remains,
Save the sweet muse's tender lyre;
Sooth'd by the magic of her strains,
If, chance, the felon, care, retiré?

Save the sweet muse's tender lyre,
For me no solace now remains!
Yet shall the felon, care, retire;
Sooth'd by the magic of her strains.

Blagdon-house, June 26. 1776.

SONNET I.

O LADY fair, whose honour'd name is borne
By that soft vale, where Rhyne so loves to stray,
And sees the tall arch crown his wat'ry way!
Sure happy he, though much the muse's scorn,
Too dull to die beneath thy beauty's ray,
Who never felt that spirit's charmed sway,
Which gentle smiles, and gentle deeds adorn,
Though in those smiles are all love's arrows worn,
Each radiant virtue though those deeds display!
Sure happy he, who that sweet voice should hear

* Hanc etiam vix Titire duce. VIRG.

† Within a few miles of Macerata.

R.

Mould the soft speech, or swell the tuneful strain,
 And, conscious that his humble vows were vain,
 Shut fond attention from his closed ear;
 Who, piteous of himself, should timely part,
 Ere love had held long empire in his heart!

SONNET II.

As o'er yon wild hill, when the browner light
 Of evening falls, the village maiden hies
 To foster some fair plant with kind supplies;
 Some stranger plant, that yet in tender plight,
 But feebly buds, ere spring has open'd quite
 The soft affections of serene skies:
 So I, with such like gentle thought devise
 This stranger tongue to cultivate with care,
 All for the sake of lovely lady fair,
 And tune my lays, in language little tried
 By such as went to Tamis' banks repair,
 Tamis forsook for Arno's flowery side,
 So wrought love's will that ever ruleth wide!

SONNET III.

CHARLES, must I say, what strange it seems to say,
 This rebel heart that love hath held as naught,
 Or, hap'ly, in his cunning mazes caught,
 Would laugh, and let his captive steal away;
 This simple heart hath now become his prey.
 Yet hath no golden tress this lesson taught,
 Nor vermeil cheek that shames the rising day:
 Oh no!—'twas beauty's most celestial ray,
 With charms divine of sovereign sweetness fraught!
 The noble mien, the soul-dissolving air,
 The bright arch bending o'er the lucid eye,
 The voice, that breathing melody so rare,
 Might lead the toil'd moon from the middle sky!
 Charles, when such mischief arm'd this foreign fair, [fly.
 Small chance had I to hope this simple heart should

SONNET IV.

IN truth, I feel my sun in those fair eyes,
 So strongly strike they, like that powerful ray,
 Which falls with all the violence of day
 On Lybia's sands—and oft, as there arise
 Hot wafting vapours from the source where lies
 My secret pain; yet, hap'ly, those may say,
 Who talk love's language, these are only sighs,
 That the soft ardours of the soul betray*.

SONNET V.

AN artless youth, who, simple in his love,
 Scem'd little hopeful from his heart to fly,
 To thee that heart, O lady! nor deny
 The voue gift he brings; since that shall prove
 All change, and fear, and falsity above;

* The Concetti of the Italian, in the conclusion of this sonnet, were so obstinate, that it seemed scarce possible to reduce them into any reputable form of translation. Such trifling liberties as the translator shall appear to have taken with these poems, must be imputed to a desire of getting over blemishes of the same kind.

Of manners that to gentle deeds comply,
 And courteous will, that never asketh why.
 Yet, mild as is the never-wrathful dove,
 Firmness it hath, and fortitude to bear
 The wrecks of nature, or the wrongs of fate;
 From envy far, and low-designing care,
 And hopes and fears that vulgar minds await;
 With the sweet muse, and sounding lyre elate,
 And only weak, when love had entrance there.

CANZON.

GAY youths and frolic damsels round me throng,
 And, smiling, say, why, shepherd, wilt thou write
 Thy lays of love advent'rous to recite
 In unknown numbers and a foreign tongue?
 Shepherd, if hope hath ever wrought thee wrong,
 Afar from her and fancy's fairy light
 Retire—so they to sport with me delight;
 And other shores, they say, and other streams
 Thy presence wait; and sweetest flowers that blow,
 Their ripening blooms reserve for thy fair brow,
 Where glory soon shall bear her brightest beams;
 Thus they, and yet their soothing little seems;
 If she, for whom I breathe the tender vow,
 Sing these soft lays, and ask the mutual song,
 This is thy language, love and I to thee belong!

THE FABLES OF FLORA.

" Sylvas, saltusque sequamur,
 " Intactos— VIRG.

To the Countess of Hertford.

MADAM,
 THERE is a tax upon the name of the Countess of Hertford, an hereditary obligation to patronise the muses; and in times like these, when their influence, I will not say their reputation, is on the decline, they can by no means dispense with so essential a privilege. I entreat you, Madam, to take the following poems under your protection. They were written with an unaffected wish to promote the love of nature and the interests of humanity. On the credit of such motives, I lay them at your feet, and beg to be esteemed,
 Madam, your most devoted and most obedient servant,
 JOHN LANGHORNE.

ADVERTISEMENT.

IN the following poems, the plan of fable is somewhat enlarged, and the province so far extended, that the original narrative and moral may be accompanied with imagery, description, and sentiment. The scenery is formed in a department of nature adapted to the genius and disposition of poetry; where she finds new objects, interests, and connections, to exercise her fancy and her powers. If the execution, therefore, be unsuccessful, it is not the fault of the plan, but of the poet.

FABLE I.

THE SUN-FLOWER AND THE IVY.

As duteous to the place of prayer,
 Within the convent's lonely walls,

The holy sisters still repair,
 What time the rosy morning calls:
 So fair each morn, so full of grace,
 Within their little garden rear'd,
 The flower of Phœbus turn'd her face
 To meet the power she lov'd and fear'd.

And where, along the rising sky,
 Her god in brighter glory rear'd,
 Still there her fond observant eye,
 And there her golden breast she turn'd.

When calling from their weary height
 On western waves his beams to rest,
 Still there she fought the parting fight,
 And there she turn'd her golden breast.

But soon as night's invidious shade
 Afar his lovely looks had borne,
 With folded leaves, and drooping head;
 Full fore she griev'd, as one forlorn.

Such duty in a flower display'd,
 The holy sisters smil'd to see,
 Forgave the pagan rites it paid,
 And lov'd its fond idolatry.

But painful still, though meant for kind,
 The praise that falls on envy's ear!
 O'er the dim window's arch entwin'd,
 The canker'd ivy chanc'd to hear.

And "See," she cry'd, "that specious flower,
 "Whose flattering bosom courts the sun,
 "The pageant of a gilded hour,
 "The convent's simple hearts hath won!

"Obsequious meannefs! ever prone
 "To watch the patron's turning eye;
 "No will, no motion of its own!
 "'Tis this they love, for this they sigh:

"Go, splendid sycophant! no more
 "Display thy soft seductive arts!
 "The flattering clime of courts explore,
 "Nor spoil the convent's simple hearts.

"To me their praise more justly due,
 "Of longer bloom and happier grace!
 "Whom changing months unalter'd view,
 "And find them in my fond embrace."

"How well," the modest flower reply'd,
 "Can envy's wrested eye elude
 "The obvious bounds that still divide
 "Foul flattery from fair gratitude.

"My duteous praise each hour I pay,
 "For few the hours that I must live;
 "And give to him my little day,
 "Whose grace another day may give.

"When low this golden form shall fall,
 "And spread with dust its parent plain,
 "That dust shall hear his genial call,
 "And rise, to glory rise, again.

"To thee, my gracious pow'r, to thee
 "My love, my heart, my life, are due!
 "Thy goodness gave that life to be,
 "Thy goodness shall that life renew.

"Ah me! one moment from thy sight
 "That thus my truant-eye should stray!

"The God of glory sets in night;
 "His faithless flower has lost a day."

Sore griev'd the flower, and droop'd her head;
 And sudden tears her breast bedew'd:
 Consenting tears the sisters shed,
 And, wrapp'd in holy wonder, view'd.

With joy, with pious pride elate,
 "Behold," the aged abbess cries,
 "An emblem of that happier fate,
 "Which Heav'n to all but us denies.

"Our hearts no fears but duteous fears,
 "No charm but duty's charm can move;
 "We shed no tears but holy tears
 "Of tender penitence and love.

"See there the envious world pourtray'd
 "In that dark look, that creeping pace!
 "No flower can bear the ivy's shade,
 "No tree support its cold embrace.

"The oak that rears it from the ground,
 "And bears its tendrils to the skies,
 "Feels at his heart the rankling wound,
 "And in its pois'nous arms he dies."

Her moral thus the matron read,
 Studious to teach her children dear,
 And they, by love or duty led,
 With pleasure heard, or seem'd to hear.

Yet one less duteous, not less fair,
 (In convents still the tale is known),
 The fable heard with silent care,
 But found a moral of her own.

The flower that smil'd along the day,
 And droop'd in tears at ev'ning's fall,
 Too well she found her life display,
 Too well her fatal lot recal.

The treacherous ivy's gloomy strain,
 That murder'd what it most embrac'd,
 Too well that cruel scene convey'd,
 Which all her fairer hopes effac'd.

Her heart with silent horror shook,
 With sighs she fought her lonely cell;
 To the dim light she cast one look,
 And bade once more the world farewell.

FABLE II.

THE EVENING PRIMROSE.

THERE are that love the shades of life,
 And shun the splendid walks of fame;
 There are that hold it rueful strife
 To risk ambition's losing game:

That, far from envy's lurid eye,
 The fairest fruits of genius rear,
 Content to see them bloom and die
 In friendship's small, but kindly sphere.

Than vainer flowers though sweeter far,
 The evening primrose shuns the day;
 Blooms only to the western star,
 And loves its solitary ray.

In Eden's vale an aged hind,
 At the dim twilight's closing hour,
 B. ij

On his time-smoothed staff reclin'd,
With wonder view'd the opening flower.

"Ill-fated flower, at eve to blow,"
In pity's simple thought he cries,
"Thy bosom must not feel the glow
"Of splendid funs, or smiling skies.

"Nor thee, the vagrants of the field,
"The hamlet's little train behold;
"Their eyes to sweet oppression yield,
"When thine the falling shades unfold.

"Nor thee the basty shepherd heeds,
"When love has fill'd his heart with cares,
"For flowers he rifles all the meads,
"For waking flowers—but thine forbears.

"Ah! waste no more that beautiful bloom
"On night's chill shade, that fragrant breath,
"Let smiling funs those gems illumine!
"Fair flower, to live unseen is death."

Soft as the voice of vernal gales,
That o'er the bending meadow blow,
Or streams that steal through even vales,
And murmur that they move so flow:

Deep in her unfrequented bower,
Sweet Philomela pour'd her strain;
The bird of eve approv'd her flower,
And answer'd thus the anxious swain:

Live unseen!

By moon-light shades, in valleys green,
Lovely flower, we'll live unseen.
Of our pleasures deem not lightly,
Laughing day may look more sprightly,
But I love the modest mien,
Still I love the modest mien.

Of gentle evening fair, and her star-trained queen.

Didst thou, shepherd, never find
Pleasure is of pensive kind?
Has thy cottage never known
That she loves to live alone?
Dost thou not at evening hour
Feel some soft and secret power,
Gliding o'er thy yielding mind,
Leave sweet serenity behind;
While, all disarm'd, the cares of day
Steal through the falling gloom away?
Love to think thy lot was laid
In this undistinguish'd shade.
Far from the world's infectious view,
Thy little virtues safely blew.
Go, and in day's more dangerous hour
Guard thy emblematic flower.

FABLE III.

THE LAUREL AND THE REED.

THE * reed that once the shepherd blew
On cold Cephissus' hallow'd side,
To Sylla's cruel bow apply'd,
Its offensive master flew.

* The reeds on the banks of the Cephissus, of which the shepherds made their pipes, Sylla's soldiers used for arrows.

Stay, bloody foldier, stay thy hand,
Nor take the shepherd's gentle breath:
Thy rage let innocence withstand;
Let music soothe the thirst of death.

He frown'd—he bade the arrow fly—
The arrow smote the tuneful swain;
No more its tone his lip shall try,
Nor wake its vocal soul again.

Cephissus, from his seditious urn,
With woe beheld the sanguine deed:
He mourn'd, and as they heard him mourn,
Assenting, sigh'd each trembling reed.

"Fair offspring of my waves," he cry'd,
"That bind my brows, my banks adorn;
"Pride of the plains, the rivers' pride,
"For music, peace, and beauty born!

"Ah, what unheedful have we done?
"What demons here in death delight?
"What fiends that curse the social fun?
"What furies of infernal night?

"See, see my peaceful shepherds bleed!
"Each heart in harmony that vy'd,
"Smote by its own melodious reed,
"Lies cold along my blushing side.

"Back to your urn, my waters, fly,
"Or find in earth some secret way;
"For horror dims yon conscious sky,
"And hell has issued into day."

Through Delphi's holy depth of shade
The sympathetic sorrows ran;
While in his dim and mournful glade
The genius of her groves began.

"In vain Cephissus sighs to save
"The swain that loves his wat'ry mead,
"And weeps to see his reddening wave,
"And mourns for his perverted reed:

"In vain my violated groves
"Must I with equal grief bewail,
"While desolation sternly roves,
"And bids the sanguine hand assail.

"God of the genial stream, behold
"My laurel shades of leaves so bare!
"Those leaves no poet's brows unfold,
"Nor bind Apollo's golden hair.

"Like thy fair offspring, misapply'd,
"Far other purpose they supply;
"The murderer's burning cheek to hide,
"And on his frowful temples die.

"Yet deem not these of Pluto's race,
"Whom wounded nature sues in vain;
"Pluto disclaims the dire disgrace,
"And cries, indignant,—"They are men."

FABLE IV.

THE GARDEN ROSE AND THE WILD ROSE.

As Dee, whose current, free from stain,
Glides fair o'er Merioneth's plain,
By mountains forc'd his way to steer
Along the lake of Pimble Mere,

Darts swiftly through the fragrant mafs,
His waters trembling as they pafs,
And leads his lucid waves below,
Unmix'd, unfull'd as they flow—
So clear through life's tumultuous tide,
So free could thought and fancy glide;
Could hope as sprightly hold her course,
As first she left her native source,
Unfought in her romantic cell
The keeper of her dreams might dwell.

But ah; they will not, will not last—
When life's first fairy stage is past,
The glowing hand of hope is cold;
And fancy lives not to be old,
Darker, and darker all before,
We turn the former prospect o'er;
And find in men's eyes the faithful eye
Our little stock of pleasures lie.

Come then, thy kind recesses ope!
Fair keeper of the dreams of hope!
Come with thy visionary train;
And bring my morning scenes again!

To Enon's wild and silent shade,
Where oft my lonely youth was laid;
What time the woodland genius came,
And touch'd me with his holy flame.—

Or, where the hermit, Belā, leads
Her waves through solitary meads;
And only feeds the desert flower,
Where once she sooth'd my slumbering hour;
Or rous'd by Stainmore's wint'ry sky,
She wearies Echo with her cry;
And oft, what storms her bosom tear,
Her deeply-wounded banks declare—

Where Eden's fairer waters flow,
By Milton's bower, or Ofty's brow,
Or Brokley's alder-shaded cave,
Or winding round the druid's grave,
Silently glide with pious fear,
To found his holy slumbers near.—

To these fair scenes of fancy's reign,
O memory! bear me once again:
For, when life's varied scenes are past,
'Tis simple nature charms at last,
'Twas thus of old a poet pray'd;
Th' indulgent pow'r his prayer approv'd,
And, ere the gather'd rose could fade,
Restor'd him to the scenes he lov'd.

A rose, the poet's fav'rite flower,
From Flora's cultur'd walks he bore;
No fairer bloom in Esher's bower,
Nor Prior's charming Chloe wore.

No fairer flowers could fancy twine
To hide Anacreon's snowy hair:
For there Almeria's bloom divine,
And Elliot's sweetest blush was there.

When she, the pride of courts, retires,
And leaves for shades, a nation's love,
With awe the village maid admires,
How Waldegrave looks, how Waldegrave moves.

So marvell'd much in Enon's shade
The flowers that all uncultur'd grew,
When there the splendid rose display'd
Her swelling breast, and shining hue.

Yet one, that oft adorn'd the place
Where now her gaudy rival reign'd,
Of simpler bloom, but kindred race,
The pensive Eglantine complain'd.—

"Mistaken youth," with sighs she said,
"From nature and from me to stray!
"The bard, by splendid forms betray'd,
"No more shall frame the purer ray.

"Luxuriant, like the flaunting rose,
"And gay the brilliant strains may be,
"But far in beauty, far from those,
"That flow'd to nature and to me."

The poet felt, with fond surprise,
The truths the sylvan critic told;
And "though this courtly rose," he cries,
"Is gay, is beauteous to behold;

"Yet, lovely flower, I find in thee
"Wild sweetness which no words express,
"And charms in thy simplicity,
"That dwell not in the pride of dress."

FABLE V.

THE VIOLET AND THE PANSY.

SHEPHERD, if near thy artless breast
The god of fond desires repair;
Implore him for a gentle guest,
Implore him with unwearied prayer.

Should beauty's soul-enchanting smile,
Love-kindling looks, and features gay,
Should these thy wand'ring eye beguile,
And steal thy wareless heart away;

That heart shall soon with sorrow swell,
And soon the erring eye deplore,
If in the beauteous bosom dwell
No gentle virtue's genial store.

Far from his hive one Summer day,
A young and yet unpractis'd bee,
Borne on his tender wings away,
Went forth the flowery world to see.

The morn, the noon in play he pass'd,
But when the shades of ev'ning came,
No parent brought the due repast,
And faintness seiz'd his little frame.

By nature urg'd, by instinct led,
The bosom of a flower he sought,
Where streams mourn'd round a mossy bed,
And violets all the bank enwrought.

Of kindred race, but brighter dyes,
On that fair bank a pansy grew,
That borrow'd from indulgent skies
A velvet shade and purple hue.

The tints that stream'd with glossy gold,
The velvet shade, the purple hue,
e stranger wonder'd to behold,
And to its beauteous bosom flew.

Not fonder haste the lover speeds,
At evening's fall, his fair to meet,
When o'er the hardly-bending meads
He springs on more than mortal feet:

Nor glows his eye with brighter glee,
When stealing near her orient breast;
Thou felt the fond enamour'd bee,
When first the golden bloom he prest.

Ah! pity much his youth untried,
His heart in beauty's magic spell!
So never passion thee betide,
But where the genial virtues dwell.

In vain he seeks those virtues there;
No soul-sustaining charms abound;
No honey'd sweetness to repair
The languid waste of life is found.

An aged bee, whose labours led
Through those fair springs, and meads of gold,
His feeble wing, his drooping head
Beheld, and pity'd to behold.

"Fly, fond adventurer, fly the art
That courts thine eye with fair attire;
Who smiles to win the heedless heart,
Will smile to see that heart expire.

"This modest flower of humbler hue,
That boasts no depth of glowing dyes,
Array'd in unbespangled blue,
The simple clothing of the skies—

"This flower, with balmy sweetness blest,
May yet thy languid life renew;"
He said, and to the violet's breast
The little vagrant faintly flew.

FABLE VI.

THE QUEEN OF THE MEADOW AND THE CROWN IMPERIAL.

FROM Bactria's vales, where beauty blows
Luxuriant in the genial day:
Where flowers a bolder gem disclose,
And deeper drink the golden ray:

From Bactria's vales to Britain's shore
What time the crown imperial came,
Full high the stately stranger bore
The honours of his birth and name.

In all the pomp of eastern state,
In all the eastern glory gay,
He bade, with native pride elate,
Each flower of humbler birth obey.

O, that the child unborn might hear,
Nor hold it strange in distant time,
That freedom even to flowers was dear,
To flowers that bloom'd in Britain's clime!

Through purple meads, and spicy gales,
Where Strymon's* silver waters play,
While far from hence their godless dwells,
She rules with delegated sway.

That sway the crown imperial sought,
With high demand and haughty mien:
But equal claim a rival brought,
A rival, call'd the meadow's queen.

"In climes of orient glory born,
"Where beauty first and empire grew;
"Where first unfolds the golden morn,
"Where richer falls the fragrant dew:

"In light's ethereal beauty drest,
"Behold," he cried, "the favour'd flower,
"Which Flora's high commands invest
"With ensigns of imperial power!

"Where prostrate vales, and blushing meads,
"And bending mountains own his sway,
"While Persia's lord his empire leads,
"And bids the trembling world obey;

"While blood bedews the straining bow,
"And conquest rends the scatter'd air,
"Tis mine to bind the victor's brow,
"And reign in envied glory there:

"Then lowly bow, ye British flowers!
"Confess your monarch's mighty sway,
"And own the only glory yours,
"When fear flies trembling to obey."

He said, and sudden o'er the plain,
From flower to flower a murmur ran;
With modest air, and milder strain,
When thus the meadow's queen began.

"If vain of birth, of glory vain,
"Or fond to bear a regal name,
"The pride of folly brings disdain,
"And bids me urge a tyrant's claim:

"If war my peaceful realms assail,
"And then, unmov'd by pity's call,
"I smile to see the bleeding vale,
"Or feel one joy in nature's fall:

"Then may each justly vengeful flower
"Pursue her queen with generous strife,
"Nor leave the hand of lawless power
"Such compass on the scale of life.

"One simple virtue all my pride!
"The wish that flies to misery's aid;
"The balm that stops the crimson tide†
"And heals the wound that war has made."

Their free consent by zephyrs borne,
The flowers their meadow's queen obey;
And fairer blushes crown'd the morn,
And sweeter fragrance fill'd the day.

FABLE VII.

THE WALL-FLOWER.

"Why loves my flower, the sweetest flower
"That swells the golden breast of May,
"Thrown rudely o'er this ruin'd tower,
"To waste her solitary day?

"Why, when the mead, the spicy vale,
"The grove and genial garden call,
"Will she her fragrant soul exhale,
"Unheeded on the lonely wall?

* The Ionian Strymon.† The property of that flower.

“ For never sure was beauty born
 “ To live in death’s deserted shade !
 “ Come, lovely flower, my banks adorn,
 “ My banks for life and beauty made.”

Thus pity wak’d the tender thought,
 And by her sweet persuasion led,
 To seize the hermit-flower I fought,
 And bear her from her stony bed.

I fought—but sudden on mine ear
 A voice in hollow murmurs broke,
 And smote my heart with holy fear—
 The genius of the ruin spoke.

“ From thee be far th’ ungentle deed,
 “ The honours of the dead to spoil,
 “ Or take the sole remaining meed.
 “ The flower that crowns thy former toil!

“ Nor deem that flower the garden’s foe,
 “ Or fond to grace this barren shade ;
 “ ’Tis nature tells her to bestow
 “ Her honours on the lovely dead.

“ For this obedient zephyrs bear
 “ Her light seeds round yon turret’s mold,
 “ And undispers’d by tempests there,
 “ They rise in vegetable gold.

“ Nor shall thy wonder wake to see
 “ Such desert scenes distinction crave ;
 “ Oft have they been, and oft shall be “ Truth’s, honour’s, valour’s, beauty’s grave.

“ Where longs to fall that rifted spire,
 “ As weary of th’ insulting air ;
 “ The poet’s thought, the warrior’s fire,
 “ The lover’s sighs are sleeping there.

“ When that too shakes the trembling ground,
 “ Borne down by some tempestuous sky,
 “ And many a slumbering cottage round
 “ Startles—how still their hearts will lie !

“ Of them who, wrapt in earth so cold,
 “ No more the smiling day shall view,
 “ Should many a tender tale be told ;
 “ For many a tender thought is due.

“ Hast thou not seen some lover pale,
 “ When evening brought the pensive hour,
 “ Step slowly o’er the shadowy vale,
 “ And stop to pluck the frequent flower ?

“ Those flowers he surely meant to strew
 “ On lost affection’s lowly cell ;
 “ Though there, as fond remembrance grew,
 “ Forgotten, from his hand they fell.

“ Has not for thee the fragrant thorn
 “ Been taught her first rose to resign ?
 “ With vain but pious fondness borne
 “ To deck thy Nancy’s honour’d shrine !

“ ’Tis nature pleading in the breast,
 “ Fair memory of her works to find ;
 “ And when to fate she yields the rest,
 “ She claims the monumental mind.

“ Why, else, the o’ergrown paths of time
 “ Would thus the letter’d sage explore,
 “ With pain these crumbling ruins clumb,
 “ And on the doubtful scripture pore ?

“ Why seeks he with unwearied toil
 “ Through death’s dim walks to urge his way,
 “ Reclaim his long-afferted spoil,
 “ And lead oblivion into day ?

“ ’Tis nature prompts, by toil or fear
 “ Unmov’d, to range through death’s domain :
 “ The tender parent loves to hear
 “ Her childrens’ story told again.

“ Treat not with scorn his thoughtful hours,
 “ If haply near these haunts he frays ;
 “ Nor take the fair enlivening flowers
 “ That bloom to cheer his lonely way.”

FABLE VIII.

THE TULIP AND THE MYRTLE *.

’T WAS on the border of a stream
 A gaily-painted tulip stood,
 And, gilded by the morning beam,
 Survey’d her beauties in the flood.

And sure, more lovely to behold,
 Might nothing meet the wistful eye,
 Than crimson fading into gold,
 In streaks of fairer symmetry.

The beautiful flower, with pride elate,
 Ah me! that pride with beauty dwells !
 Vainly affects superior state,
 And thus in empty fancy swells.

“ O lustre of unrival’d bloom !
 “ Fair painting of a hand divine !
 “ Superior far to mortal doom,
 “ The hues of heaven alone are mine !

“ Away, ye worthless, formless race !
 “ Ye weeds, that boast the name of flowers
 “ No more my native bed disgrace,
 “ Unmeet for tribes so mean as yours !

“ Shall the bright daughter of the sun
 “ Associate with the shrubs of earth ?
 “ Ye slaves, your sovereign’s presence shun !
 “ Respect her beauties and her birth.

“ And thou, dull, fallen evergreen !
 “ Shalt thou, my shining sphere invade,
 “ My noon-day beauties beam unseen,
 “ Obscur’d beneath thy dusky shade !”

“ Deluded flower !” the myrtle cries,
 “ Shall we thy moment’s bloom adore ?
 “ The meanest shrub that you despise,
 “ The meanest flower has merit more.

“ That daisy, in its simple bloom,
 “ Shall last along the changing year ;
 “ Blush on the snow of winter’s gloom,
 “ And bid the smiling spring appear.

“ The violet that, those banks beneath,
 “ Hides from thy scorn its modest head,
 “ Shall fill the air with fragrant breath,
 “ When thou art in thy dusty bed.

* This fable was first published in a Collection of Letters, supposed to have passed betwixt St. Evremond and Wake.

" Ev'n I, who boast no golden shade,
 " Am of no shining tints possess'd,
 " When low thy lucid form is laid,
 " Shall bloom on many a lovely breast.
 " And he, whose kind and fostering care
 " To thee, to me, our beings gave,
 " Shall near his breast my flowrets wear,
 " And walk regardless o'er thy grave.
 " Deluded flower, the friendly screen
 " That hides thee from the noon-tide ray,
 " And mocks thy passion to be seen,
 " Prolongs the transitory day.
 " But kindly deeds with scorn repaid,
 " No more by virtue need be done;
 " I now withdraw my dusky shade,
 " And yield thee to thy darling son."
 Fierce on the flower the scorching beam
 With all its weight of glory fell;
 The flower exulting caught the gleam,
 And lent its leaves a bolder smell.
 Expanded by the searching fire,
 The curling leaves the breast disclos'd:
 The mantling bloom was painted higher,
 And every latent charm expos'd.
 But when the sun was sliding low,
 And evening came, with dews so cold;
 The wanton beauty ceas'd to blow,
 And sought her bending leaves to fold.
 Those leaves, alas! no more would close;
 Relax'd, exhausted, sickening, pale;
 They left her to a parent's woes,
 And fled before the rising gale.

FABLE IX.

THE BEE-FLOWER*.

COME, let us leave this painted plain;
 This waste of flowers that palls the eye:
 The walks of nature's wilder reign
 Shall please in plainer majesty.
 Through those fair scenes, where yet she owes Superior charms to Brockman's art,
 Where, crown'd with elegant repose,
 He cherishes the social heart ---
 Through those fair scenes we'll wander wild,
 And on yon pasture mountains rest;
 Come, brother dear! come, nature's child!
 With all her simple virtues blest.

* This is a species of the Orchis, which is found in the barren and mountainous parts of Lincolnshire, Worcestershire, Kent, and Hertfordshire. Nature has formed a bee apparently feeding on the breast of the flower with so much exactness, that it is impossible at a very small distance to distinguish the imposition. For this purpose, she has observed an economy different from what is found in most other flowers, and has laid the petals horizontally. The genius of the Orchis, or Satyrion, she seems professedly to have made use of for her paintings, and on the different species has drawn the perfect forms of different insects, such as bees, flies, butterflies, &c.

The sun far-seen on distant towers,
 And clouding groves and peopled seas,
 And ruins pale of princely bowers
 On Beachborough's airy heights shall please.
 Nor lifeless there the lonely scene;
 The little labourer of the hive,
 From flower to flower, from green to green,
 Murmurs, and makes the wild alive.
 See, on that flowret's velvet breast
 How close the busy vagrant lies!
 His thin-wrought plume, his downy breast,
 The ambrosial gold that swells his thighs!
 Regardless, whilst we wander near,
 Thrifty of time, his task he plies;
 Or sees he no intruder near,
 And rests in sleep his weary eyes.
 Perhaps his fragrant load may bind
 His limbs;---we'll fet the captive free---
 I fought the living bee to find,
 And found the picture of a bee.
 Attentive to our trifling selves,
 From thence we plan the rule of all;
 Thus nature with the fabled elves
 We rank, and these her sports we call.
 Be far, my friends, from you, from me,
 Th' unhallow'd term, the thought profane,
 That life's majestic source may be
 In idle fancy's trifling vein.
 Remember still, 'tis nature's plan
 Religion in your love to find;
 And know, for this, the first in man
 Inspir'd the imitative mind.
 As conscious that affection grows,
 Pleas'd with the pencil's mimic power*;
 That power with leading hand she shows,
 And paints a bee upon a flower.
 Mark, how that rooted mandrake wears
 His human feet his human hands!
 Oft, as his shapely form he tears,
 Aghast the frighted ploughman stands.
 See where, in yonder orient stone,
 She seems ev'n with herself at strife,
 While fairer from her hand is shown
 The pictur'd, than the native life.
 Helvetia's rocks, Sabrina's waves,
 Still many a shining pebble bear,
 Where oft her studious hand engraves
 The perfect form and leaves it there.
 O long, my Paxton †, boast her art;
 And long her love of laws fulfil:
 To thee she gave her hand and heart,
 To thee, her kindness and her skill!

FABLE X.

THE WILDING AND THE BROOM.

In yonder green wood blows the broom;
 Shepherds, we'll trust our flocks to stray,

* The well known Fables of the Painter and Statuary that fell in love with objects of their own creation, plainly arose from the idea of that attachment, which follows the imitation of agreeable objects, to the objects imitated.

† An ingenious Portrait Painter in Rathbone Place.

Court nature in her sweetest bloom,
 And steal from care one summer-day.
 From him * whose gay and graceful brow
 Fair-handed Hume with roses binds,
 We'll learn to breathe the tender vow,
 Where flow the fairy Fortha winds.
 And oh! that he † whose gentle breath
 In nature's softest mould was made,
 Who left her smiling works imprest
 In characters that cannot fade;
 That he might leave his lowly shrine,
 Though softer there the seasons fall—
 They come, the sons of verse divine,
 They come to fancy's magic cell.

————— "What airy sounds invite
 " My steps not unreluctant, from the depth
 " Of Shene's delightful groves? Reposing there,
 " No more I hear the busy voice of men
 " Far-toiling o'er the globe—save to the call
 " Of soul-exalting poetry, the ear
 " Of death denies attention. Rous'd by her,
 " The genius of sepulchral silence opes
 " His drowly cells, and yields us to the day.
 " For thee, whose hand, whatever paints the " Spring,
 " Or swells on Summer's breast, or loads the lap
 " Of Autumn, gathers heedful—Thee whose rites
 " At nature's shrine with holy care are paid
 " Daily and nightly; boughs of brightest green,
 " And every fairest rose, the god of groves,
 " The queen of flowers, shall sweeter save for thee,
 " Yet not if beauty only claim thy lay,
 " Tunefully trifling. Fair philosophy,
 " And nature's love, and every moral charm
 " That leads in sweet captivity the mind
 " To virtue—ever in thy nearest cares
 " Be these, and animate thy living page
 " With truth resistless, beaming from the source
 " Of perfect light immortal—Vainly boasts
 " That golden broom its funny robe of flowers:
 " Fair are the funny flowers; but, fading soon
 " And fruitless, yield the forester's regard
 " To the well-loaded wilding—Shepherd, there
 " Behold the fate of song, and lightly deem
 " Of all but moral beauty."
 "—————"Not in vain"——

I hear my Hamilton reply
 (The torch of fancy in his eye),
 " 'Tis not in vain," I hear him say,
 " That nature paints her works so gay;
 " For, fruitless though that fairy broom,
 " Yet still we love her lavish bloom.
 " Cheer'd with that bloom, yon desert wild
 " Its native horrors lost, and smil'd.
 " And oft we mark her golden ray
 " Along the dark wood scatter day.
 " Of moral uses take the strife;
 " Leave me the elegance of life.
 " Whatever charms the ear or eye,
 " All beauty and all harmony;
 " If sweet sensations they produce,
 " I know they have their moral use.
 " I know that nature's charms can move
 " The springs that strike to virtue's love."

* William Hamilton of Bangour.

† Thomson.

FABLE XI.

THE MISLETOE AND THE PASSION-FLOWER.

IN this dim cave a druid sleeps,
 Where stops the passing gale to moan;
 The rock he hollow'd, o'er him weeps,
 And cold drops wear the fretted stone.

IN this dim cave, of different creed,
 An hermit's holy ashes rest:
 The school-boy finds the frequent bead,
 Which many a formal matin blest.

That truant-time full well I know,
 When here I brought, in stolen hour,
 The druid's magic misletoe,
 The holy hermit's passion-flower.

The offerings on the mystic stone
 Pensive I laid, in thought profound,
 When from the cave a deep'ning groan
 Issued, and froze me to the ground.

I hear it still—Dost thou not hear?
 Does not thy haunted fancy start?
 The sound still vibrates through mine ear—
 The horror rushes on my heart.

Unlike to living sounds it came,
 Unmix'd, unmelodiz'd with breath;
 But, grinding through some scranell frame,
 Creak'd from the bony lungs of death.

I hear it still—"Depart," it cries:
 "No tribute bear to shades unblest:
 "Know, here a bloody druid lies,
 "Who was not nurs'd at nature's breast.

"Associate he with demons dire,
 "O'er human victims held the knife,
 "And pleas'd to see the babe expire,
 "Smil'd grimly o'er its quivering life.

"Behold his crimson-streaming hand
 "Erect!—his dark, fix'd, murd'rous eye!"
 In the dim cave I saw him stand;
 And my heart died—I felt it die.

I see him still—Dost thou not see
 The haggard eyeball's hollow glare?
 And gleams of wild ferocity
 Dart through the sable shade of hair?

What meagre form behind him moves,
 With eye that rues th' invading day;
 And wrinkled aspect wan, that proves
 The mind to pale remorse a prey?

What wretched—Hark!—the voice replies,
 "Boy, bear these idle honours hence!
 "For, here a guilty hermit lies
 "Untrue to nature, virtue, sense.

"Though nature lent him powers to aid
 "The moral cause, the mutual weal;
 "Those powers he sunk in this dim shade,
 "The desperate suicide of zeal.

"Go, teach the drone of saintly haunts,
 "Whose cell's the sepulchre of time;
 "Though many a holy hymn he chaunts,
 "His life is one continued crime.

"And bear them hence, the plant, the flower;
 "No symbols those of systems vain!

" They have the duties of their hour ;
 " Some bird, some insect, to sustain."

[In Kirkby-Stephen church-yard is the following monumental inscription, which, from the strain of modesty, filial piety, and unaffected simplicity, with which it is adorned, may be thought not unworthy of reprinting from Burn's " History of Westmorland, &c."]]

1762.

To the Memory of the REV. JOSEPH LANGHORNE of Winton, and ISABEL his Wife.

HER, who to teach this trembling hand to write,
 Toil'd the long day, and watch'd the tedious
 night,

I mourn, though number'd with the heavenly host ;
 With her the means of gratitude are lost.

JOHN LANGHORNE.

OWEN OF CARRON:

I.

ON Carron's side the primrose pale,
 Why does it wear a purple hue ?
 Ye maidens fair of Marlivalé,
 Why stream your eyes with pity's dew ?

'Tis all with gentle Owen's blood
 That purple grows the primrose pale ;
 That pity pours the tender flood
 From each fair eye in Marlivalé.

The evening star sat in his eye,
 The sun his golden tresses gave,
 The north's pure morn her orient dye,
 To him who rests in yonder grave!

Beneath no high, historic stone,
 Though nobly born, is Owen laid,
 Stretch'd on the green wood's lap alone,
 He sleeps beneath the waving shade.

There many a flowery race hath sprung,
 And fled before the mountain gale,
 Since first his simple dirge he sung ;
 Ye maidens fair of Marlivalé!

Yet still, when May with fragrant feet
 Hath wander'd o'er your meads of gold,
 That dirge I hear so simply sweet
 Far echo'd from each evening fold.

II.

'Twas in the pride of William's * day,
 When Scotland's honours flourish'd still,
 That Moray's earl, with mighty sway,
 Bare rule o'er many a Highland hill.

And far for him their fruitful store
 The fairer plains of Carron spread ;
 In fortune rich, in offspring poor,
 An only daughter crown'd his bed.

Oh! write not poor—the wealth that flows
 In waves of gold round India's throne,
 All in her shining breast that glows,
 To Ellen's † charms, were earth and stone.

* William the Lyon, king of Scotland.

† The Lady Ellen, only daughter of John Earl of Moray, betrothed to the Earl of Nithisdale, and afterwards to the Earl Barnard, was esteemed one

For her the youth of Scotland sigh'd,
 The Frenchman gay, the Spaniard grave,
 And smoother Italy apply'd,
 And many an English baron brave.

In vain by foreign arts assail'd,
 No foreign loves her breast beguile,
 And England's honest valour fail'd,
 Paid with a cold, but courteous smile.

" Ah! woe to thee, young Nithisdale,
 " That o'er thy cheek those roses stray'd,
 " Thy breath, the violet of the vale,
 " Thy voice, the music of the shade!

" Ah! woe to thee, that Ellen's love
 " Alone to thy soft tale would yield?
 " For soon those gentle arms shall prove
 " The conflict of a ruder field."

'Twas thus a wayward sister spoke,
 And cast a rueful glance behind,
 As from her dim wood-glen she broke,
 And mounted on the moaning wind.

She spoke and vanish'd—more unmov'd
 Than Moray's rocks, when storms invest,
 The valiant youth by Ellen lov'd;
 With aught that fear, or fate suggestt.

For love, methinks, hath power to raise
 The soul beyond a vulgar state ;
 Th' unconquer'd banners he displays,
 Control our fears and fix our fate.

II.

'Twas when, on summer's softest eve,
 Of clouds that wander'd west away,
 Twilight with gentle hand did weave
 Her fairy robe of night and day.

When all the mountain gales were still,
 And the waves slept against the shore,
 And the sun, sunk beneath the hill,
 Left his last smile on Lammernore*.

Led by those waking dreams of thought
 That warm the young unpractic'd breast,
 Her wonted bower sweet Ellen sought,
 And Carron murmur'd near, and sooth'd her into rest.

IV.

There is some kind and courtly sprite
 That o'er the realm of fancy reigns,
 Throws sunshine on the mask of night,
 And smiles at slumber's powerless chains ;

'Tis told, and I believe the tale,
 At this soft hour that sprite was there,
 And spread with fairer flowers the vale,
 And fill'd with sweeter sounds the air.

'A bower he fram'd (for he could frame
 What long might weary mortal wight :
 Swift as the lightning's rapid flame
 Darts on the unsuspecting sight.)

Such bower he fram'd with magic hand,
 As well that wizard bard hath wove,

of the finest women in Europe, insomuch that she had several suitors and admirers in foreign courts.

* A chain of mountains running through Scotland, from east to west.

In scenes where fair Armida's wand
Wav'd all the witcheries of love.

Yet was it wrought in simple show;
Nor Indian mines nor orient shores
Had lent their glories here to glow,
Or yielded here their shining stores.

All round a poplar's trembling arms,
The wild rose wound her damask flower;
The woodbine lent her spicy charms,
That loves to weave the lover's bower.

The ash, that courts the mountain-air,
In all her painted blooms array'd,
The wilding's blossom blushing fair,
Combin'd to form the flowery shade.

With thyme that loves the brown hill's breast,
The cowslip's sweet, reclining head,
The violet of sky-woven vest,
Was all the fairy ground bespread.

But, who is he, whose locks so fair
Adown his manly shoulders flow?
Beside him lies the hunter's spear,
Beside him sleeps the warrior's bow.

He bends to Ellen—(gentle sprite,
Thy sweet seductive arts forbear)
He courts her arms with fond delight,
And instant vanishes in air.

Hast thou not found at early dawn
Some soft ideas melt away,
If o'er sweet vale, or flow'ry lawn,
The sprite of dreams hath bid thee stray?

Hast thou not some fair object seen,
And, when the fleeting form was past,
Still on thy memory found its mien,
And felt the fond idea last?

Thou hast—and oft the pictur'd view,
Seen in some vision count'ing vain,
Has struck thy wond'ring eye anew,
And brought the long-lost dream again.

With warrior-bow, with hunter's spear,
With locks adown his shoulder spread,
Young Nithisdale is ranging near—
He's ranging near yon mountain's head.

Scarce had one pale moon pass'd away,
And fill'd her silver urn again,
When in the devious chase to stray,
Afar from all his woodland train.

To Carron's banks his fate consign'd;
And, all to shun the fervid hour,
He fought some friendly shade to find,
And found the visionary bower.

VI.

Led by the golden star of love,
Sweet Ellen took her wonted way,
And in the deep defending grove
Sought refuge from the fervid day—

Oh!—Who is he whose ringlets fair,
Disorder'd o'er his green vest flow,
Reclin'd to rest—whose sunny hair
Half hides the fair cheek's ardent glow?

'Tis he, that sprite's illusive guest,
(Ah! nee! that sprites can fate controul!)

That lives still imag'd on her breast,
That lives still pictur'd in her soul.

As when some gentle spirit fled
From earth to breathe Elysian air,
And in the train whom we call dead,
Perceives its long-lov'd partner there;

Soft sudden pleasure rushes o'er
Resistless, o'er its airy frame,
To find its future fate restore
The object of its former flame.

So Ellen stood—less power to move
Had he, who, bound in slumber's chain,
Seem'd hap'ly, o'er his hills to rove,
And wind his woodland chase again.

She stood, but trembled—mingled fear,
And fond delight and melting love
Seiz'd all her soul; she came not near,
She came not near that fated grove.

She strives to fly—from wizard's wand
As well might powerless captive fly—
The new-cropt flower falls from her hand—
Ah! fall not with that flower to die!

VII.

Hast thou not seen some azure gleam
Smile in the morning's orient eye,
And skirt the reddening cloud's soft beam
What time the sun was halting nigh?

Thou hast—and thou canst fancy well
As any muse that meets thine ear,
The soul-fet eye of Nithisdale,
When wak'd, it fix'd on Ellen near.

Silent they gaz'd—that silence broke;
“Hail goddess of these groves (he cry'd),
“O let me wear thy gentle yoke!
“O let me in thy service bide!

“For thee I'll climb the mountains steep,
“Unwearied chase the destin'd prey,
“For thee I'll pierce the wild wood deep,
“And part the sprays that vex thy way.”

For thee—“O stranger, cease,” she said,
And swift away, like Daphne, flew,
But Daphne's flight was not delay'd
By aught that to her bosom grew.

VIII.

'Twas Atalanta's golden fruit,
The fond idea that confin'd
Fair Ellen's steps, and bless'd his suit,
Who was not far, not far behind.

O love! within those golden vales,
Those genial airs where thou wast born,
Where nature, listening thy soft tales,
Leans on the rosy breast of morn.

Where the sweet smiles, the graces dwell,
And tender sighs the heart remove,
In silent eloquence to tell
Thy tale, O soul-subduing love!

Ah! wherefore should grim rage be nigh,
And dark distrust, with changeful face,
And jealousy's reverted eye
Be near thy fair, thy favour'd place?

IX.

Earl Barnard was of high degree,
And lord of many a lowland hind;

And long for Ellen love had he,
Had love, but not of gentle kind.

From Moray's halls her absent hour
He watch'd with all a miser's care;
The wide domain, the princely dower
Made Ellen more than Ellen fair.

Ah wretch! to think the liberal soul
May thus with fair affection part!
Though Lothian's vales thy sway controul,
Know, Lothian is not worth one heart.

Studious he marks her absent hour,
And, winding far where Carron flows,
Sudden he sees the fated bower,
And red rage on his dark brow glows.

For who is he?—"Tis Nithisdale!
And that fair form with arm reclin'd
On his?—"Tis Ellen of the vale,
"Tis she (O powers of vengeance!) kind.

Should be that vengeance swift pursue?
No—that would all his hopes destroy;
Moray would vanish from his view,
And rob him of a miser's joy.

Unseen to Moray's halls he hies—
He calls his slaves, his ruffian band,
"And haste to yonder groves," he cries,
"And ambush'd lie by Carron's strand:

"What time ye mark from bower or glen
"A gentle lady take her way,
"To distance due, and far from ken,
"Allow her length of time to stray.

"Then ranfack fraight that range of groves—
"With hunter's spear, and vest of green;
"If chance a rofy stripling roves,—
"Ye well can aim your arrows keen."

And now the ruffian slaves are nigh,
And Ellen takes her homeward way;
Though stay'd by many a tender sigh,
She can no longer, longer stay.

Pensive, against yon poplar pale
The lover leans his gentle heart,
Revolving many a tender tale,
And wond'ring still how they could part.

Three arrows pierc'd the desert air,
Ere yet his tender dreams depart;
And one struck deep his forehead fair,
And one went through his gentle heart.

Love's waking dream is lost in sleep—
He lies beneath yon poplar pale!
Ah! could we marvel ye should weep;
Ye maidens fair of Marivale!

X.

When all the mountain gales were still,
And the wave slept against the shore,
And the sun sunk beneath the hill,
Left his last smile on Lammermore,

Sweet Ellen takes her wonted way
Along the fairy-featur'd vale:
Bright o'er his wave does Carron play,
And soon she'll meet her Nithisdale,

She'll meet him soon—for, at her sight,
Swift as the mountain deer he sped;

The evening shades will sink in night—
Where art thou, loitering lover, fled?

O! she will chide thy trifling stay,
E'en now the soft reproach she frames:
"Can lovers brook such long delay?
"Lovers that boast of ardent flames!"

He comes not—weary with the chase,
Soft slumber o'er his eyelids throws
Her veil—we'll steal one dear embrace,
We'll gently steal on his repose.

This is the bower—we'll softly tread—
He sleeps beneath yon poplar pale—
Lover, if e'er thy heart has bled,
Thy heart will far forego my tale!

XI.

Ellen is not in princely bower,
She's not in Moray's splendid train;
Their mistress dear, at midnight hour,
Her weeping maidens seek in vain.

Her pillow swells not deep with down;
For her no balms their sweets exhale;
Her limbs are on the pale turf thrown,
Pres'd by her lovely cheek as pale:

On that fair cheek, that flowing hair,
The brown its yellow leaf hath shed,
And the chill mountain's early air
Blows wildly o'er her beauteous head.

As the soft star of orient day,
When clouds involve his rosy light,
Darts through the gloom a transient ray,
And leaves the world once more to night;

Returning life illumines her eye,
And slow its languid orb unfolds,—
What, are those bloody arrows nigh?
Sure, bloody arrows she beholds!

What was that form so ghastly pale,
That low beneath the poplar lay!
'Twas some poor youth—"Ah Nithisdale!"
She said, and silent sunk away:

XII.

The morn in the mountains spread,
The woodlark trills his liquid strain—
Can morn's sweet music rouse the dead?
Give the set eye its soul again?

A shepherd of that gentler mind
Which nature not profusely yields,
Seeks in these lonely shades to find
Some wanderer from his little fields.

Aghast he stands—and and simple fear
O'er all his paly visage glides—
"Ah me! what means this misery here?
"What fate this lady fair betides!"

He bears her to his friendly home,
When life he finds has but retir'd:—
With haste he frames the lover's tomb,
For his is quite, is quite expir'd!

XIII.

"O hide me in thy humble bower,"
Returning late to life she said;
"I'll bind thy crook with many a flower;
"With many a rofy wreath thy head.

"Good shepherd, haste to yonder grove,
"And, if my love asleep is laid,

" Oh! wake him not; but softly move
 " Some pillow to that gentle head.
 " Sure, thou wilt know him, shepherd swain,
 " Thou know'st the sun rife o'er the sea—
 " But oh! no lamb in all thy train
 " Was e'er so mild, so mild as he."
 " His head is on the wood-moss laid;
 " I did not wake his slumber deep—
 " Sweet sing the redbreast o'er the shade—
 " Why, gentle lady, would you weep?"

As flowers that fade in burning day,
 At evening find the dew-drop dear,
 But fiercer feel the noontide ray,
 When soften'd by the nightly tear;

Returning in the flowing tear,
 This lovely flower, more sweet than they,
 Found her fair soul, and wand'ring near,
 The stranger, reason, cross'd her way.

Found her fair soul,—Ah! so to find
 Was but more dreadful grief to know!
 Ah! sure, the privilege of mind
 Cannot be worth the wish of woe!

XIV.

On melancholy's silent urn
 A softer shade of sorrow falls,
 But Ellen can no more return,
 No more return to Moray's halls.

Beneath the low and lonely shade
 The slow-consuming hour she'll weep,
 Till nature seeks her last left aid.
 In the sad sombrous arms of sleep.

" These jewels, all unmeet for me,
 " Shalt thou," she said, " good shepherd, take;
 " These gems will purchase gold for thee,
 " And these be thine for Ellen's sake.

" So sail thou not, at eve or morn,
 " The rosemary's pale bough to bring—
 " Thou know'st where I was found forlorn—
 " Where thou hast heard the redbreast sing.

" Heedful I'll tend thy flocks the while,
 " Or aid thy shepherdess's care,
 " For I will share her humble toil,
 " And I her friendly roof will share."

XV.

And now two longsome years are past
 In luxury of lonely pain—
 The lovely mourner, found at last,
 To Moray's halls is borne again.

Yet has she left one object dear,
 That wears love's funny eye of joy—
 Is Nithisdale reviving here?
 Or is it but a shepherd's boy?

By Carron's side a shepherd's boy,
 He binds his vale-flowers with the reed:
 He wears love's funny eye of joy,
 And birth he little seems to heed.

XVI.

But ah! no more his infant sleep
 Closes beneath a mother's smile,
 Who, only when it clos'd, would weep,
 And yield to tender woe the while.

No more with fond attention dear,
 She seeks th' unspoken wish to find;
 No more shall she, with pleasure's tear,
 See the soul waxing into mind.

XVII.

Does nature bear a tyrant's breast?
 Is she the friend of stern controul?
 Wears she the despot's purple vest?
 Or fetters she the free-born soul?

Where, worst of tyrants, is thy claim
 In chains thy children's breasts to bind?
 Gav'st thou the Promethean flame?
 The incommunicable mind?

Thy offspring are great nature's—free,
 And of her fair dominion heirs;
 Each privilege she gives to thee;
 Know, that each privilege is theirs.

They have thy feature, wear thine eye,
 Perhaps some feelings of thy heart;
 And wilt thou their lov'd hearts deny
 To act their fair, their proper part?

XVIII.

The lord of Lothian's fertile vale,
 Ill-fated Ellen, claims thy hand;
 Thou know'st not that thy Nithisdale
 Was low laid by his ruffian band,

And Moray, with unfather'd eyes,
 Fix'd on fair Lothian's fertile dale,
 Attends his human sacrifice,
 Without the Grecian painter's veil.

O married love! thy bard shall own,
 Where two congenial souls unite,
 Thy golden chain inlaid with down,
 Thy lamp with heaven's own splendour bright.

But if no radiant star of love,
 O Hymen! smile on thy fair rite,
 Thy chain a wretched weight shall prove,
 Thy lamp a sad sepulchral light.

XIX.

And now has time's slow wandering wing,
 Borne many a year unmark'd with speed—
 Where is the boy by Carron's spring,
 Who bound his vale-flowers with the reed?

Ah me! those flowers he binds no more;
 No early charm returns again;
 The parent nature keeps in store
 Her best joys for her little train.

No longer heed the sun-beam bright
 That plays on Carron's breast he can,
 Reason has lent her quiv'ring light,
 And shown the chequer'd field of man.

XX.

As the first human heir of earth
 With pensive eye himself survey'd,
 And all unconscious of his birth,
 Sat thoughtful oft in Eden's shade.

In pensive thought so Owen stray'd
 Wild Carron's lonely woods among,
 And once, within their greenest glade,
 He fondly fram'd this simple song.

XXI.

Why is this crook adorn'd with gold?
 Why am I tales of ladies told?

Why does no labour me employ,
If I am but a shepherd's boy?

A filken vest like mine so green
In shepherd's hut I have not seen—
Why should I in such vesture joy,
If I am but a shepherd's boy?

I know it is no shepherd's art
His written meaning to impart—
They teach me sure an idle toy,
If I am but a shepherd's boy.

This bracelet bright that binds my arm—
It could not come from shepherd's farm;
It only would that arm annoy,
If I were but a shepherd's boy.

And, O thou silent picture fair,
That lov'st to smile upon me there,
O say, and fill my heart with joy,
That I am not a shepherd's boy.

XXII.

Ah lovely youth! thy tender lay
May not thy gentle life prolong:
Seest thou yon nightingale a prey?
The fierce hawk hov'ring o'er his song?

His little heart is large with love:
He sweetly hails his ev'ning star;
And fate's more pointed arrows move
Insidious from his eye afar.

XXIII.

The shepherdess whose kindly care
Had watch'd o'er Owen's infant breath,
Must now their silent mansion share,
Whom time leads calmly down to death.

"O tell me, parent, if thou art,
"What is this lovely picture dear?
"Why wounds its mournful eye my heart,
"Why flows from mine th' unbidden tear?"

"Ah, youth! to leave thee loth am I,
"Though I be not thy parent dear;
"And would'st thou wish, or ere I die,
"The story of thy birth to hear?"

"But it will make thee much bewail,
"And it will make thy fair eye swell—"
She said, and told the woesome tale,
As sooth as shepherdess might tell.

XXIV.

The heart that sorrow doom'd to share
Has worn the frequent seal of woe,
Its sad impressions learns to bear,
And finds full oft its ruin flow.

But when that seal is first impress'd,
When the young heart its pain shall try,
From the soft, yielding, trembling breast,
Oft seems the startled soul to fly.

Yet fled not Owen's—wild amaze
In paleness cloth'd, and lifted hands,
And horror's dread unmeaning gaze,
Mark the poor statue as it stands.

The simple guardian of his life
Look'd wistful for the tear to glide;
But, when she saw his tearless strife,
Silent, she lent him one—and dy'd.

XXV.

"No I am not a shepherd's boy,"
Awaking from his dream, he said,
"Ah, where is now the promis'd joy
"Of this!—for ever, ever fled!

"O picture dear!—for her lov'd fake
"How fondly could my heart bewail!
"My friendly shepherdess, O wake,
"And tell me more of this sad tale.

"O tell me more of this sad tale—
"No; thou enjoy thy gentle sleep!
"And I will go to Lothian's vale,
"And more than all her waters weep."

XXVI.

Owen to Lothian's vale is fled—
Earl Barnard's lofty towers appear—
"O! art thou there," the full heart said,
"O! art thou there, my parent dear?"

Yes, she is there: from idle state
Oft has she stole her hour to weep;
Think how she "by thy cradle sat,"
And how she "fondly saw thee sleep."

Now tries his trembling hand to frame
Full many a tender line of love;
And still he blots the parent's name,
For that he fears might fatal prove.

XXVII.

O'er a fair fountain's smiling side
Reclin'd a dim tower, clad with moss,
Where every bird was wont to bide,
That languish'd for its partner's loss.

This scene he chose, this scene assign'd
A parent's first embrace to wait,
And many a soft fear fill'd his mind,
Anxious for his fond letter's fate.

The hand that bore those lines of love,
The well-informing bracelet bore—
Ah! may they not unprosperous prove!
Ah! safely pass yon dangerous door!

XXVIII.

"She comes not;—can she then delay?"
Cried the fair youth, and dropt a tear—
"Whatever filial love could say,
"To her I said, and call'd her dear.

"She comes—Oh! No—encircled round,
"Tis some rude chief with many a spear.
"My hapless tale that earl has found—
"Ah me! my heart!—for her I fear."

His tender tale that earl had read,
Or ere it reach'd his lady's eye,
His dark brow wears a cloud of red,
In rage he deems a rival night.

XXIX.

'Tis o'er those locks that wav'd in gold,
That wav'd adown those cheeks so fair,
Wreath'd in the gloomy tyrant's hold,
Hang from the sever'd head in air.

That streaming head he joys to bear
In horrid guise to Lothian's halls;
Bids his grim ruffians place it there,
Erect upon the frowning walls.

The fatal tokens forth he drew—
"Know'st thou these—Ellen of the vale?"
The pictur'd bracelet soon she knew,
And soon her lovely cheek grew pale—

The trembling victim straight he led,
Ere yet her soul's first fear was o'er
He pointed to the ghastly head—
She saw—and sunk to rise no more.

* See the ancient Scottish ballad called Gil Morrice.

THE POETICAL WORKS
OF MICHAEL BRUCE.

Containing

LOCHLEVEN,
DAPHNIS,
THE MOUSIAD,

ELEGIES,
PASTORALS,
ODES,

℥. ℥. ℥.

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

Thus fung the youth, amid unfertile wilds
And nameless deserts, unpoetic ground !
Far from his friends he stray'd, recording thus
The dear remembrance of his native fields,
To cheer the tedious night ; while slow disease
Prey'd on his pining vitals, and the blasts
Of dark December shook his humble cot.

LOCHLEVEN.

EDINBURGH:

PRINTED BY MUNDELL AND SON, ROYAL BANK CLOSE.

Anno 1795.

PHYSICAL WORLD

THE HISTORY OF THE

THE HISTORY OF THE PHYSICAL WORLD
BY
J. H. VAN DIJK
AMSTERDAM
1880

THE HISTORY OF THE
PHYSICAL WORLD
BY
J. H. VAN DIJK
AMSTERDAM
1880

THE LIFE OF BRUCE.

THE few melancholy particulars which form the slender history of the life of BRUCE, were first given to the world by Logan, the editor of his works; and have since received every possible recommendation and embellishment from the elegant pen of Lord Craig, one of the judges of the Court of Session, in the 36th number of the "Mirror."

A short life past in obscurity, and in the silent acquisition of knowledge, cannot be expected to abound in vicissitudes or occurrences interesting to curiosity; but particular circumstances may exist, to render the life of a young man of genius, depressed by situation, and aspiring to literature and to poetry under the pressure of indigence, peculiarly interesting to benevolence and to learning.

The affecting and well-written paper in the "Mirror," attributed to Lord Craig, has been distinguished by the most respectable literary journalists of our nation, with particular marks of attention; a circumstance to which, besides the attraction between good writing and competent judges, it is natural to suppose, the gratification of a sensibility and a curiosity common to the liberal and inquisitive, arising from the benevolent attempt, to rescue from oblivion the name and writings of an ingenious and amiable young poet, contributed in no inconsiderable degree.

The facts stated in the present account, are partly taken from the brief narrative of Logan, and partly from information furnished by his relations, and collected from the perishing remains of his epistolary correspondence, communicated to the present writer, by the kindness of the Rev. Dr. George Baird, Principal of the University of Edinburgh.

The intelligence which he has obtained is general and scanty; but he has this gratification from producing it, that it gives him, at once, an opportunity of reflecting on the liberal and friendly assistance of Dr. Baird, and of recording his esteem and veneration for the talents and virtues of the unfortunate poet, and his humane and benevolent exertions to lessen the wants, and alleviate the afflictions of his aged mother, which deserve a more ample encomium than this brief memorial can bestow.

Michael Bruce was born at Kinneswood, in the parish of Portmoak, in Kinrossshire, March 27. 1746. He was descended of a family, in no respect illustrious, but in bearing a name that is renowned by the valour and patriotism of King Robert I, and distinguished by the taste and science of the House of Kinross. His father, Alexander Bruce, was by trade a weaver, who inherited nothing from his parents but their piety, industry, and integrity, for which he was distinguished among his neighbours. His mother, Anne Bruce, was of a family of the same rank in that neighbourhood, and remarkable for nothing but her exemplary prudence and frugality, and the innocence and simplicity of her manners. They had eight children, of whom the poet was the fifth. Of these eight only two survive; James, a weaver in Kinneswood, a man of respectable character, and though uneducated, not unacquainted with books, nor without a taste for metrical composition; and Mary, married to one Arnot in that neighbourhood. Both parents were Seceders, of the class called Burghers.

The first years of his life did not pass without distinction. He very early discovered a genius superior to the common, which his parents had the penetration to discern, and the merit to improve, by giving him a polite and liberal education.

The delicacy of his constitution, which was remarkable from his earliest years, and the uncommon proficiency which he made in the learning taught at the school of the village, probably determined them to educate him for the clerical profession; an object of common ambition among persons of inferior rank in North Britain, and for which, it may be supposed, their peculiar impressions of religion gave them a strong predilection.

After passing through the usual course of school education at Portmoak, and the neighbouring town of Kinross, he was sent, in 1762, to the University of Edinburgh, where he applied himself, during the four succeeding years, to the several branches of literature and philosophy, with remarkable assiduity and success. Of the Latin and Greek languages he acquired a masterly knowledge; and he made eminent progress in metaphysics, mathematics, and moral and natural philosophy. But the Belles Lettres was his favourite pursuit, and poetry his darling study. The poets were his perpetual companions. He read their works with avidity, and with a congenial enthusiasm. He caught their spirit as well as their manner, and though he sometimes imitated their style, he was a poet from inspiration. Nature had tuned his ear to harmony, and sown the seeds of poetical enthusiasm in his mind.

Before he left school, he gave evident signs of a propensity to the study of poetry, in which he was greatly encouraged, from an acquaintance which he had contracted, when very young, with Mr. David Arnot of Portmoak, the patron and director of his youthful studies.

Mr. Arnot cultivated a small farm, on the banks of Lochleven, which he inherited from his parents, and is now possessed by his son. He was a man of excellent sense and piety, and had a cultivated taste, and an acquaintance with classical learning, moral philosophy, poetry, and criticism, much superior to his opportunities of improvement, and his rank in life. He gave his young friend the first perception of good poetry, by putting into his hands the "Paradise Lost" of Milton, the "Seasons" of Thomson, the poems of Pope, and the dramas of Shakspeare.

Besides the advantage of so intelligent and sincere an adviser as Mr. Arnot, he had formed an acquaintance with Mr. David Pearson, of Easter Balgownie, a village adjoining to Kinnefswood, a man of strong parts, and of a serious, contemplative, and inquisitive turn, who had improved his mind by a diligent and solitary perusal of such books as came within his reach; and, having a peculiar predilection for that branch of study which soon became the favourite object of his pursuit, contributed not a little to lead him to the love of reading and the study of poetry. This worthy and respectable man is now living at Easter-Balgownie.

In the company of Arnot and Pearson, he passed much of his time in the country, and to them, from time to time, he imparted the occasional sallies of his genius, receiving from them such advice as tended greatly to ripen his judgment, and improve his natural taste for metrical composition.

Among the companions of his youthful and classical studies, he lived in habits of the most familiar intimacy with Mr. George Henderson, and a Mr. Dryburgh; young men of ingenuity and ability, whose kindness supplied him with books, and whose conversation improved his powers, that were now gradually expanding. Mr. Dryburgh went before him in November 1766. Mr. Henderson became afterwards a clergyman, of the Burgher denomination, at Glasgow, and died in 1793.

Soon after his coming to Edinburgh, he contracted an acquaintance with Logan, then a student at the University. A similarity of taste, and of pursuits, soon brought on an intimacy between these two poets, which continued without abatement till the death of Bruce.

While he was prosecuting his favourite studies, and improving his taste, he seems to have felt in common with those who possess a genius, of which imagination and feeling are the strongest characteristics, that pensive melancholy, which is ever attendant upon poetical enthusiasm, and frequently the concomitant of the best disposition and principles, and the certain test of a generous and susceptible heart, conscious of rectitude of conduct and unmerited adversity.

His letters from Edinburgh to Mr. Arnot, in 1763, written chiefly as exercises in the composition of Latin, contain several reflections of a solemn and serious cast. In a letter to him, dated Nov. 27. 1764, he thus indulges a train of thought, produced by adverse circumstances, but tempered by a rational piety. "I daily meet with proofs, that money is a necessary evil. When in an auction I often say to myself, how happy should I be if I had money to purchase such a book! How well should my library be furnished, nisi obstat res angusta domi!

My lot forbid;—nor circumscribes alone
My growing virtues, but my crimes confines.

"Whether any virtues should have accompanied me in a more elevated station is uncertain; but that a number of vices, of which my sphere is incapable, would have been its attendants, is unquestionable. The Supreme Wisdom has seen this meet, and the Supreme Wisdom cannot err." In the same letter he writes him, "I am entered to the Hebrew and Natural Philosophy. The Hebrew seems to be a very dry and dull study, as well as difficult." Of the study of Natural Philosophy, he speaks more favourably; but complains, with the eagerness of youthful curiosity, of the disproportionate length of the preliminary lectures.

In Dec. 12. 1764, he writes him, "I am in health, excepting a kind of settled melancholy (for which I cannot account), which has seized on my spirits."

During the same session of the College, he writes him, March 27. dies natalis, 1765, "I am in great concern just now for a school. When I was over last, there was a proposal made by some people of these parts to keep one at Gairny-Bridge. What it may turn out to, I cannot tell." The postscript to this letter is remarkable, as it shows his extreme delicacy in avoiding any occasion of offending the religious prejudices of his parents. "I ask your pardon for the trouble I have put you to by these books I have sent. The fear of a discovery made me choose this method. I have sent Shakspeare's Works, 8 vols, Pope's Works, 4 vols, and Fontenelle's "Plurality of Worlds."

In March 1765, he wrote an Elegy on the Death of Mr. M'Erwen, a respectable Burgher clergyman, author of a "Treatise on the Scripture Types," and "Essays on Various Subjects," well known in the religious world. At the end of the session, the scheme of provision, that was planned for him, was accomplished; and, during the summer, he taught the school at Gairny-Bridge, near Kinross, kept for the education of the children of some farmers in the neighbourhood, who allowed him his board and a small salary.

At this place he wrote his beautiful Monody to the Memory of William Arnot, son of his friend Mr. Arnot, a boy of an amiable disposition, and of very promising abilities. The original manuscript, now lying before the present writer, is prefaced by the following manly letter to Mr. Arnot, dated Gairny-Bridge, May 29. 1765. "Walking lately by the church-yard at your town, which inspires a kind of veneration for our ancestors, I was struck with these beautiful lines of Mr. Gray, in his "Elegy written in a Country Church-yard."

Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid
Some heart once pregnant with celestial fire.

"And immediately I called to mind your son, whose memory will be ever dear unto me; and with respect to that place, put the supposition out of doubt. I wrote the most part of this poem the same day; which I should be very sorry if you look upon as a piece of flattery. I know you are above flattery; and if I know any thing of my own mind, I am so too. It is the language of the heart. I think a lie in verse and prose the same. The verification is irregular, in imitation of Milton's Lycidas."

About this time, he probably wrote his Alexis, a pastoral; in which he celebrates, under the name of Eumelia, an amiable young woman, the daughter of the person with whom he resided at Gairny-Bridge, whose modest beauty, and artless simplicity, had made an impression on his susceptible heart. She is likewise celebrated under the name of Peggy, in a Pastoral Song, to the tune of "The Yellow-Hair'd Laddie," and a song called Lochleven no more, in imitation of "Lochaber no more," printed in the "Edinburgh Magazine." She had been for some time his scholar; and is now living.

In the beginning of the session of the College, 1765-1766, he became a Student of Divinity, as appears by Mr. Arnot's letter to him, dated Portmoak, Nov. 21. 1766, in which he "congratulates him on his undertaking a second degree of probation, and wishes him the best success, as you have," he says, "one of the best subjects for exercising your genius, and giving proof of your talents." And adds, "I hope, if opportunity be given, to have an octavo leaf of any remarkables I can collect on it, 'twixt this and your return. You'll undoubtedly know the form of such exercises, and accordingly you'll be doing your best." The success of his theological exercises is not known.

In the Summer 1766, he quitted the school at Gairny-Bridge, for one at a place called Forrest-Mill, near Alloa, in Clackmannanshire, in which he appears to have met with less encouragement than he expected.

"What I enjoyed of any thing," he writes Mr. Arnot, July 28. 1766, "was always in the hope of it. I expected to be happy here, but I am not; and my sanguine hopes are the reason of my disappointment. The easiest part of my life is past, and I was never happy—Things are not very well in this world; but they are pretty well; they might have been worse, and as they are, may please us, who have but a few short days to use them. This scene of affairs, though a very perplexed, is a very short one; and in a little all will be cleared up. Let us endeavour to please God, our fellow creatures, and ourselves. In such a course of life, we shall be as happy as we can be in such a world as this. Thus you, who cultivate your farm with your own hands, and I, who teach a dozen blockheads for bread, may be happier than he, who, having more than he can use, tortures his brain to invent new methods of killing himself with the superfluity."

At this place, he began and finished his poem called Lochleven; of which he gives the following humorous account to Mr. Arnot, in the letter above quoted. "I have wrote a few lines of a descriptive poem, cui titulus est, Lochleven; you may remember you hinted such a thing to me; so I have set about it, and you may expect a dedication. I hope it will soon be finished, as I every week add two lines, blot out six, and alter eight. You shall hear the plan when I know it myself."

Of some part of the scenery of Lochleven, he gives the following account in a letter to Mr. Pearson, Dec. 7. 1766. "On the day before St. Luke's fair in Kinross, I made a voyage to the Inch of Lochleven, that being the time, you know, at which they bring the cattle out of it. The middle and highest part of it, is covered with ruins. The foundations are visible enough, and it seems to have been a very large building. The whole is divided into a great many little squares, from which it appears not an un plausible conjecture, that not only a church, as they tell us, but a monastery had stood in it. To the westward of this, and in the lower ground, a deep dyke, in the form of a trench, is cut on the north and east sides of a plain piece of ground, not unlike a bowling-green. I can give no guess at the use of this, though it evidently appears to be the work of art. I sought among the ruins, and on the stone of the little house which stands in it, for some marks or inscriptions, but to no purpose. I could find nothing farther to assist my conjectures. I would have examined [a word is wanting here, in the MS.], had not the fishers been in such a hurry to be gone. They who consider it in no other view, than as capable of feeding a dozen or fourteen cattle, when their work was over, would not stay a minute longer, had it been to discover the great toe of St. Moak, who is buried there. My description of it, in the poem Lochleven (which by the by is now finished), runs thus:

Fronting where Gairny pours his silent stream
Into the lake, an island lifts its head,
Grassy and wild, &c.

The poem is addressed to Mr. Arnot, whose character he has drawn to great advantage, under the name of Agricola,

—————The wise, the good,
By nature formed for the calm retreat;
The silent path of life, learn'd, but not fraught
With self-importance—————
Enamour'd of the shade, but not morose.
Politeuess, rais'd in courts by frugal rules,
With him spontaneous grows. Not books alone,
But man his study, and the better part;
To tread the ways of virtue, and to act
The various scenes of life with God's applause.

He is supposed to have commemorated his friend Henderson in the following lines, under the name of Laelius.

Nor shall the muse forget thy friendly heart,
O Laelius! partner of my youthful hours:
How often, rising from the bed of peace,
We would walk forth to meet the summer morn,
Inhaling health, and harmony of mind;
Philosophers and friends—————

He alludes, very pathetically, to the unfavourable circumstances in which it was written, in the following lines, at the conclusion:

Thus sung the youth, amid' unfertile wilds,
And nameless deserts, unpoetic ground!

Far from his friends he stray'd, recording thus
 The dear remembrance of his native fields,
 To cheer the tedious night; while slow disease
 Prey'd on his pining vitals, and the blasts
 Of dark December shook his humble cot.

In November 1766, he lost his friend Dryburgh. In the conclusion of a letter to Mr. Pearson, Nov. 20. accompanied by some lines to Dr. Millar, written for him in testimony of his gratitude, and his recovery from sickness; he expresses his feelings on this mournful event in a strain of exquisite tenderness, and sublime piety: "I have not many friends, but I love them well. Scarce one enjoys the smiles of this world in every respect; and in every friend I suffer. Death has been among the few I have. Poor Dryburgh! but he's happy. I expected to have been his companion through life, and that we should have stepped into the grave together. But Heaven has seen meet to dispose of him otherwise.—What think you of this world? I think it is very little worth. You and I have not a great deal to make us fond of it. And yet I would not change my condition with the most wealthy unfeeling fool in the universe, if I were to have his dull hard heart into the bargain.—Farewell, my rival in immortal hope! my companion (I trust) for eternity. Though far distant, I take thee to my heart. Souls suffer no separation from the obstruction of matter or distance of place. Oceans may roll between us, and climates interpose in vain. The whole material creation is no bar to the winged mind. Farewell, through boundless ages, fare thou well. May'st thou shine when the sun is darkened. May'st thou live and triumph when time expires. It is at least possible we may meet no more in this foreign land, this gloomy apartment of the universe of God. But there is a better world in which we may meet to part no more. Adieu!"

In a letter to Mr. Pearson, dated December 24, he laments his seclusion from the world, and reflects on the hardships which poverty laid on his delicate frame, and too susceptible mind, in a strain of tender melancholy, which cannot fail to awaken the sympathy of every reader of sensibility. "It is more than probable, the next you receive from me (if ever you receive another), will bear date 1767. I can remember, I could write (or at least scratch) my name with the year 1752. In that year I learnt the elements of penmanship; and it is now fourteen years since; a goodly term for one to be a scholar all that time. And what have I learned? Much that I need to unlearn; and I have need that one should teach me this—that I know nothing.—I lead a melancholy kind of life in this place. I am not fond of company. But it is not good that a man be still alone. And here I can have no company, but what is worse than solitude. If I had not a lively imagination, I believe I should fall into a state of stupidity and delirium. I have some evening scholars; the attending on whom, though few, so fatigues me, that the rest of the night I am quite dull and low-spirited. Yet I have some lucid intervals, in the time of which I can study pretty well."

In the autumn 1766, his constitution, which was ill calculated to encounter the austerities of his native climate, the exertions of daily labour, and the rigid frugality of humble life, began visibly to decline. Towards the end of the year, his ill health, aggravated by the indigence of his situation, and the want of those comforts and conveniences which might have fostered a delicate frame, to maturity and length of days, terminated in a deep consumption.

During the winter, he quitted his employment at Forrest-Mill, and with it all hopes of life, and returned to his native village, to receive those attentions and consolations which his situation required, from the anxiety of parental affection, and the sympathy of friendship. Convinced of the hopeless nature of his disease, and feeling himself every day declining, he contemplated the approaches of death with calmness and resignation, and continued at intervals to compose verses, and to correspond with his friends.

His last letter to Mr. Pearson (a copy of which is preserved in the hand-writing of Mr. Birrel), concludes with an Allegorical Description of Human Life, at once so beautiful and so interesting, that it is impossible to avoid transcribing it. It strongly reminds us of Addison's "Vision of Mirza."

"If morning dreams preface approaching fate,
 And morning dreams, as poets tell, are true;
 Led by pale ghosts, I enter death's dark gate,
 And bid this life, and all the world, adieu!

"A few mornings ago, as I was taking my walk on an eminence, which commands a view of the Forth, with the vessels sailing along, I sat down, and taking out my Latin Bible, opened by accident at a place in the book of Job, ix. 25. "Now my days are passed away as the swift ships." Shutting the book, I fell a musing on this affecting comparison. Whether the following happened to me in a dream or waking reverie, I cannot tell—But, I fancied myself on the bank of a river, or sea, the opposite side of which was hid from view, being involved in clouds of mist. On the shore stood a multitude, which no man could number, waiting for passage. I saw a great many ships taking in passengers, and several persons going about in the garb of pilots offering their service. Being ignorant and curious to know what all these things meant, I applied to a grave old man who stood by, giving instructions to the departing passengers. His name, I remember, was the Genius of Human Life. "My son," said he, "you stand on the banks of the stream of Time; all these people are bound for Eternity; that undiscovered country from whence no traveller ever returns. The country is very large, and divided into two parts; the one is called the Land of Glory, the other the Kingdom of Darkness. The names of these in the garb of pilots, are, Religion, Virtue, Pleasure. They who are so wise as to choose Religion for their guide, have a safe, though frequently a rough passage; they are at last landed in the happy climes, where sighing and sorrow for ever fly away; they have likewise a secondary director, Virtue; but there is a spurious Virtue who pretends to govern by himself; but the wretches who trust to him, as well as these who have Pleasure for their pilot, are either shipwrecked, or cast away on the Kingdom of Darkness. But the vessel in which you must embark, approaches; you must be gone; remember what depends upon your conduct."—No sooner had he left me, than I found myself surrounded by those pilots I mentioned before; immediately I forgot all that the old man said to me; and, seduced by the fair promises of Pleasure, chose him for my director; we weighed anchor with a fair gale, the sky serene, the sea calm; innumerable little isles lifted their green heads around us, covered with trees in full blossom; dissolved in stupid mirth, we were carried on, regardless of the past, of the future unmindful. On a sudden, the sky was darkened, the winds roared, the seas raged, red rose the sand from the bottom of the troubled deep, the angel of the waters lifted up his voice. At that instant a strong ship passed by; I saw Religion at the helm; "Come out from among them," he cried. I and a few others threw ourselves out into his ship. The wretches we left were now tossed on the swelling deep, the waters on every side poured through the riven vessel; they cursed the Lord;—when lo! a fiend rose from the deep, and in a voice like distant thunder, thus spoke, "I am Abaddon, the first-born of Death, ye are my prey, open thou abyss to receive them." As he thus spoke, they sunk, and the waves closed over their heads. The storm was turned into a calm, and we heard a voice saying, "Fear not, I am with you; when you pass through the waters, they shall not overflow you." Our hearts were filled with joy; I was engaged in discourse with one of my new companions, when one from the top of the mast, cried out, "Courage, my friends, I see the fair haven, the land that is yet afar off." Looking up, I found it was a certain friend, who had mounted up for the benefit of contemplating the country before him; upon seeing you, I was so affected, I started and awaked. Farewell! my friend, farewell!

He lingered through the winter; and in the spring, he wrote an Elegy on his own approaching death, in which he inserted the stanza above quoted, with some alterations. This was the last composition he lived to finish. By degrees his weakness increased, till he was worn gradually away; and he expired July 6. 1767, in the 21st year of his age. His life was innocent, and his end pious. His father survived him several years. His mother is now living in the 86th year of her age. Weighed down by accumulated distresses, she still cherishes his memory with tenderness, and derives a kind of mournful consolation from the occasional bounty of some gentlemen, who were warm admirers of his merit.

Soon after his death, his poems were subjected to the revision and correction of his friend Logan, who gave them to the world in a small duodecimo volume, intitled, Poems on Several Occasions, by Michael Bruce, printed at Edinburgh in 1770, probably by subscription, as it was not advertised for sale, with a preface, containing a short account of his life and character.

It is remarkable, that no account is given in the preface, of the state in which the poems came into the editor's possession, nor of the process which he observed in preparing them for publication.

As the practice of making one writer speak by the sense of another, has a tendency to confound the claims of individual merit, it is to be regretted, that Logan withheld from the public an account of the share which he had in the publication.

According to the information of Dr. Baird, the ballad of Sir James the Rest, and the story of Lomond and Lewina, in the poem Lochleven, are supposed to have received considerable additions and embellishments from the pen of Logan; and it must not be concealed, that in a MS. copy of Lochleven, in Dr. Baird's possession, this fictitious incident, as it now stands, appears to have received an addition of about 200 lines. If this copy received the last revision of Bruce, the evidence of the supposed interpolation might be admissible; but, as it is not said to be the identical copy given to Logan, and as the additions are so consonant to the style of the poem, it is probable that the supplemental lines might be the result of a subsequent revision. Sir James the Rest was printed in a newspaper in Bruce's life-time; and, according to the information of a friend who saw it some years ago, in the possession of a lady, it is not remarkably different from the ballad as it stands in Logan's edition.

"To make up a miscellany," says the preface, "some poems wrote by different authors, are inserted; all of them originals, and none of them destitute of merit. The reader of taste will easily distinguish them from those of Mr. Bruce, without their being particularised by any mark."

The propriety of uniting the poems of Bruce, and the "poems of different authors," in the same publication, may be reasonably doubted; especially as they have no apparent resemblance or poetical relation; but, undoubtedly, the pieces belonging to Bruce ought to have been distinguished by some particular mark; for the internal evidence, as the present writer has experienced in several instances, is a fallacious and uncertain distinction.

Of this poetical miscellany; The Eagle, Crow, and Shepherd, a fable; Alexis, a pastoral; Daphnis, a monody; Anacreontic to a Wasp; The Mousiad; Lochleven, and the Elegy written in Spring,—are the only pieces which Dr. Baird assigns to Bruce. The present writer has ventured to give him A Pastoral Song, and Sir James the Rest, upon evidence which Dr. Baird admits, with some exceptions in favour of Logan; and he is unwilling to deprive him of the Danish Odes, which have exceeding merit, and have not been claimed by Logan. The "Ode to a Cuckoo," and the "Chorus of Elyfian Bards," were contributed by Logan. The "Vernal Ode" is attributed to the late Sir James Foulis, Bart. of Colington. Of the remaining pieces the authors are unknown.

The attention of the public having been called to this collection, by Lord Craig, in the "Mirror" 1779, it was reprinted in 12mo, 1784. A new edition, including several of his unpublished pieces, which had not been submitted to the inspection of Logan, A Poem on the Immortality of the Soul, Philocles, an elegy, The Vanity of our Desire of Immortality, A Story in the Eastern Manner, &c. is now printing at Edinburgh, for the benefit of his mother, under the superintendance of Dr. Baird. A subscription has been opened for that purpose; and there seems little doubt, from the zeal with which individuals, prompted at once by benevolence, and the admiration of genius, have come forward, that a sum will be raised equal to the old woman's comfortable maintenance during the latter days of her life.

His poems, reprinted from the edition 1770, together with Lochleven no more, reprinted from the "Edinburgh Magazine," the Elegy on Mr. M'Erwen, and Verses to Dr. Millar, selected by the present writer from his MS. letters, are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry. Copies of his unpublished pieces, revised by a friend of Dr. Baird, have been promised by the learned editor, and, it is hoped, will be communicated in due time for the use of this edition. Some anonymous Elegiac Verses on the Death of Michael Bruce are reprinted from the fourth volume of the "Asylum for Fugitive Pieces," 1793.

His character may be easily collected from this account of his life. It was truly amiable and respectable. In his manners, he was modest, gentle, and mild; in his disposition, he was friendly, affectionate, and ingenuous. He united an ardent and enlightened sense of religion, with a lively imagination and a feeling heart. Tenderness, in every sense of the word, and piety, equally remote from enthusiasm and superstition, were his peculiar characteristics.

"Michael Bruce lives now no more," says Logan, who knew him well, "but in the remembrance of his friends. No less amiable as a man, than valuable as a writer; endowed with good nature and good sense, humane, friendly, benevolent; he loved his friends, and was beloved by them with a degree of ardour that is only experienced in the era of youth and innocence."

"Nothing, methinks," says Lord Craig, "has more the power of awakening benevolence, than the consideration of genius, thus depressed by situation, suffered to pine in obscurity, and sometimes, as in the case of this unfortunate young man, to perish, it may be, for want of those comforts and conveniencies which might have fostered a delicacy of frame, or of mind, ill calculated to bear the hardships which poverty lays on both. For my own part, I never pass the place (a little hamlet, skirted with a circle of old oak trees, about three miles on this side of Kinross) where Michael Bruce resided; I never look on his dwelling, a small thatched house, distinguished from the cottages of the other inhabitants only by a shaded window at the end, instead of a lattice, fringed with a honey-suckle plant, which the poor youth had trained around it; I never find myself in that spot, but I stop my horse involuntarily; and looking on the window, which the honey-suckle has now almost covered, in the dream of the moment, I picture out a figure for the gentle tenant of the mansion; I wish, and my heart swells while I do so, that he were alive, and that I were a great man, to have the luxury of visiting him there, and bidding him be happy."

As a poet, he is characterized by elegance, simplicity, and tenderness, more than sublimity, invention, or enthusiasm. He has more judgment and feeling, than genius or imagination. He is an elegant and pleasing, though not a very animated or original writer. His compositions are the production of a tender fancy, a cultivated taste, and a benevolent mind; and are distinguished by an amiable delicacy, and simplicity of sentiment, and a graceful plainness of expression, free from the affectation of an inflated diction, and a profusion of imagery, so common in juvenile productions. His thoughts are often striking, sometimes new, and always just; and his versification, though not exquisitely polished, is commonly easy and harmonious.

His Lochleven is the longest and most elaborate of his poetical compositions. It is a descriptive poem, written in blank verse, the structure of which he seems to have particularly studied, as it exhibits a specimen of considerable strength and harmony in that measure. Though the nature of the subject approaches nearly to that of Thomson, of whom he was a great admirer, his style is very different, being wholly free from that unatural swell and pomp of words, which too often disfigure the beautiful descriptions of Thomson. It represents an extensive and beautiful prospect in an animated and pleasing manner. It has much appropriate description and picturesque imagery; and it is rendered interesting by poetical fictions, historical allusions, and moral reflections. But it is not without defects; there is a redundancy of thought in some instances, and a carelessness of language in others. He has, however, availed himself of every circumstance that could with propriety be introduced to decorate his poem. The story of Lomond and Levina is happily introduced, and simply and pleasingly related. It is said to have been enlarged by Logan, and is perhaps too long. The picture of the man of sorrows now risen from the bed of pain is natural and striking. Lochleven Castle, the Inch, the Limestone Quarries, the rivers Po, Queeich, Leven, and Gairny, "on whose banks he first tuned the Doric reed," are graphically and poetically described. The compliment to Laelius is a pleasing digression, and the description of the character and dwelling of Agricola, towards the conclusion, has great merit. The poem is local; and though local description is far more adapted to the pencil than the pen, yet it will be perused with delight by poetical lovers of rural imagery; and must be peculiarly pleasing to those who are familiar with the picturesque scenery of Lochleven.

His Daphnis is an elegy on a deceased friend, written in the pastoral form, and, in general, well preserves the rural character. It has, however, but little of the bucolic cant, now so fashionable. If any trite rural topics occur, they are heightened and adorned with the graces of sentiment, and the most delicate touches of picturesque beauty. It may be considered as an effusion of mellowed sorrow, which can recapitulate past pleasures, in all their minutiae of circumstance and situation, and select such images as are proper to the kind of composition in which it chooses to convey itself. It is a professed imitation of Milton's "Lycidas," in which there is perhaps more poetry than sorrow; but the poetry is in such an exquisite strain, that he who desires to know, whether he has a true taste for poetry or not, should consider whether he is highly delighted or not with the perusal of "Lycidas." Whether it should be considered as a model of composition, has been doubted. Some have supposed that the arbitrary disposition of the rhymes produces a wild melody, adapted to the expression of sorrow; and others have thought the couplet and tetra-stich, with their stated returns of rhyme, preferable. To decide the point might be difficult; but if the enthusiasm and beauty of the poetry could not reconcile Dr. Johnson to the "uncertain rhymes" of "Lycidas," the common readers of poetry will probably incline to favour the regular form. With Milton in view, Bruce is not a servile imitator. He has an original manner of his own. Milton is his model for versification, and he sometimes copies his thoughts and his language. But his poem is not a perpetual tissue of the obsolete phraseology, Gothic combinations, remote allusions, obscure opinions, and mythological personages of "Lycidas." The poem, as it now stands, has several lines which are not in the copy sent to Mr. Arnot; the result, probably, of a subsequent emendation.

Of his Alexis, the principal merit consists in the simplicity of the language, and the harmony of the versification. The images are not new, and the descriptions and sentiments are trite and common.

His Sir James the Ross is probably "the poem in "the Journal," which was wrote," he tells Mr. Pearson, "in one afternoon, begun about four, and finished before I went to bed. I never tried any thing which fell in with my inclination so. The Historical Ballad is a species of writing by itself. The common people confound it with the Song, but in truth they are widely different. A Song should never be historical. It is founded generally on some one thought, which must be prosecuted and exhibited in every light, with a quickness and turn of expression peculiar to itself. The Ballad, again, is founded on some passage of history, or (what suits its nature better) of tradition. Here the poet may use his liberty, and cut and carve as he has a mind. I think it a kind of writing remarkably adapted to the Scottish language." The distinction is just, and beautifully exemplified. The historical ballad demands the nicest execution, and the most artful management. The simplicity that suits it is even unattainable by genius, without that chastised taste which seldom appears in poets of the highest class. It admits of magnificence of ideas, and of the sublime; but should be careful not to deviate from nature. The marvellous air, and the supernatural actors, which figure and please in the grandeur of the epic, would here be extravagant and disproportioned. The incidents should be striking, the situations important, and tending to forward the action, the design without perplexity, the parts in proper relation to it, and to each other, the sentiments delicate and noble. To these requisites, Sir James the Ross is, in general, conformable. Whether we consider the beautiful simplicity of the story, the delicacy of its situations, the pathos of its discoveries, the exact delineation of the manners of the times to which it refers, the genuine strokes of nature and of passion, or the unremitting animation of the whole, we cannot but highly admire the mixture it exhibits of genius and of art. The story on which it is founded, though romantic, is interesting, and the more so, as there is reason to believe it is in some measure authentic. It is a tale of tenderness and distress; and challenges a place with the "Hardyknot" of his countryman, Sir John Bruce of Kinross, the "Owen of Carron" of Langhorne, and other successful imitations of the ancient historical ballad. This exquisite ballad is said to have received some embellishments from Logan.

His Danish Odes are compositions of a superior order. They possess, in an uncommon degree, the true fire of poetry, and harmony of versification. They appear to be modelled upon the "Norwegian Odes" of Gray, and, in their contexture and tone, are much in the wild and wizard strains of his Runic lyric. He probably thought this kind of minstrelsy best adapted to express the magic mysteries and romantic enthusiasm of the Gothic mythology. Assuming the fire and enthusiasm of the old Runic bards, he gives full scope to the wildness of a glowing imagination, and the energy of forcible conception. But his ideas of Scandinavian poetry seem to have risen no higher than the imitations of Gray, which are in all probability such as he alone was capable of making them. They are inspired with fire and poetical enthusiasm. They are in perfection the enthusiastic words—the words that burn—of the muses. In sublimity of conception, grandeur of imagery, and magnificence of phraseology, he is inferior to Gray; but he has more simplicity, perspicuity, and elegance. His first Ode, in particular, breathes the high spirit of lyric enthusiasm. It is truly Runic, and truly Grayan.

His Elegy, written in Spring, is characterized by energy, simplicity, pathos, and melody, in the highest degree. From the circumstances in which it was written, the nature of its subject, and the merit of its execution, it has obtained an uncommon share of popularity. The influences and effects of Spring are expressed by a selection of such imagery as are adapted to strike the imagination by lively pictures. The manner in which he describes its effects upon himself, is so pathetically circumstantial, and so universally interesting, that it powerfully awakens all our tenderness.

—————but not to me returns
The vernal joy my better years have known;
Dim in my breast life's dying taper burns,
And all the joys of life, with health are flown.

"A young man of genius," says Lord Craig, "in a deep consumption, at the age of twenty-one, feeling himself every moment going faster to decline, is an object sufficiently interesting; but how much must every feeling on the occasion be heightened, when we know, that this person possessed so much dignity and composure of mind, as not only to contemplate his approaching fate, but even to write a poem on the subject :

“ In the French language, there is a much admired poem of the Abbé de Chaulieu, written in expectation of his own death, to the Marquis de la Farre, lamenting his approaching separation from his friend. Michael Bruce, who, it is probable, never heard of the Abbé de Chaulieu, has also written a poem on his own approaching death, which cannot fail of touching the heart of every one who reads it.”

Several poets of our nation, in similar circumstances, have left compositions on the same subject; and more than one poet has been ambitious of the fame of poetic composition, a few hours before the perils of an engagement, when the attention of most men would be naturally occupied by more important concerns, than the adjustment of syllables, or the modulation of a period.

Dorset, “ the grace of courts, the muse’s pride,” on the day before the memorable sea-fight in 1665, is said to have composed the celebrated song, “ To all you Ladies now at Land,” with equal tranquillity of mind, and promptitude of wit.

The tender, the sentimental Abbé de Chaulieu, has left a poem on his approaching death, equally remarkable for elegance and feeling. Bruce must have heard of Dorset, and, it may be, of the Abbé de Chaulieu, as he was no stranger to the language in which he wrote; but he is purely original in his thoughts. Nor can we deny to him the praise of collectedness and strength of mind in a superior degree. He views, without dismay, the insidious approaches of an incurable disease, which generally selects, for its prey, the fairest and most amiable victims; and without pretending to that apathy, surely unnatural to man in such circumstances, he feels and acknowledges the gloominess of his prospects; but turns his eyes in search of comfort to a world beyond the grave.

There let me sleep, forgotten in the clay,
 When death shall shut these weary aching eyes;
 Rest in the hopes of an eternal day;
 Till the long night is gone, and the last morn arise.

His ludicrous pieces, the Moufard, and Anacreontic to a Wasp, evince the versatility of his genius. They are not void of humour and pleasantry, but add little to his reputation. His Songs are tender and easy; and well preserve the turn of the popular ballads which he imitates. His Verses to Dr. Mil-lar, and Elegy on Mr. M’Ewen, have some effusions of sentiment and delineations of character that are not without merit; but they require no distinct examination or particular criticism.

“ If images of nature,” says Logan, “ that are beautiful and new; if sentiments, warm from the heart, interesting and pathetic; if a style, chaste with ornament, and elegant with simplicity; if these, and many other beauties of nature and art, are allowed to constitute true poetic merit, the following poems will stand high in the judgment of men of taste.”

THE WORKS OF BRUCE.

P O E M S.

LOCHLEVEN. 766

HAIL, native land! where on the flow'ry banks
Of Leven, beauty ever-blooming dwells;
A wreath of roses, dropping with the dew
Of morning, circles her ambrosial locks
Loose waving o'er her shoulders; where she treads,
Attendant on her steps, the blushing Spring
And Summer wait, to raise the various flow'rs
Beneath her footsteps; while the cheerful birds
Carol their joy, and hail her as she comes Inspiring vernal love and vernal joy.

Attend, Agricola! who to the noife
Of public life, preferr'd the calmer scenes
Of solitude, and sweet domestic bliss,
Joys all thine own! attend thy poet's strain,
Who triumphs in thy friendship, while he paints
The past'ral mountains, the poetic streams,
Where raptur'd contemplation leads thy walk,
While silent evening on the plain descends.

Between two mountains, whose o'erwhelming
tops,

In their swift course, arrest the belying clouds,
A pleasant valley lies. Upon the south,
A narrow op'ning parts the craggy hills;
Through which the lake, that beautifies the vale,
Pours out its ample waters. Spreading on,
And wid'ning by degrees, it stretches north
To the high Ochil, from whose snowy top
The streams that feed the lake flow thund'ring down.

The twilight trembles o'er the misty hills,
Twinkling with dew; and whilst the bird of day

Tunes his ethereal note, and wakes the wood,
Bright from the crimson curtains of the morn,
The sun appearing in his glory, throws
New robes of beauty over heaven and earth.

O now, while nature smiles on all her works,
Oft let me trace thy cowslip-cover'd banks,
O Leven! and the landscape measure round.
From gay Kinross, whose stately tufted groves
Nod o'er the lake, transported let mine eye
Wander o'er all the various chequer'd scene,
Of wilds, and fertile fields, and glittering streams,
To ruin'd Arnot; or ascend the height
Of rocky Lomond, where a riv'let pure
Bursts from the ground, and through the crumbled crags

Tinkles amusive: From the mountain's top,

Around me spread, I see the goodly scene!
Enclosures green, that promise to the swain
The future harvest; many colour'd meads;
Irriguous vales, where cattle low, and sheep
That whiten half the hills; sweet rural farms
Oft interspers'd, the seats of past'ral love
And innocence, with many a spiry dome
Sacred to Heav'n, around whose hallow'd walls
Our fathers slumber in the narrow house.
Gay, beautiful villas, bosom'd in the woods,
Like constellations in the starry sky,
Complete the scene. The vales, the vocal hills,
The woods, the waters, and the heart of man,
Send out a gen'ral song; 'tis beauty all
To poet's eye, and music to his ear.

Nor is the shepherd silent on his hill,
His flocks around; nor school-boys, as they creep,
Slow-pac'd, tow'rd's school; intent, with caten pipe

They wake by turns wild music on the way.

Behold the man of sorrows hail the light!
New risen from the bed of pain, where late,
Toss'd to and fro upon a couch of thorns,
He wak'd the long dark night, and wish'd for morn.

Soon as he feels the quick'ning beam of Heav'n,
And balmy breath of May, among the fields
And flow'rs he takes his morning walk: his heart
Beats with new life; his eye is bright and blithe;
Health strews her roses o'er his cheek; renew'd
In youth and beauty, his unbidden tongue
Pours native harmony, and sings to Heaven.

In ancient times, as ancient bards have sung,
This was a forest. Here the mountain-oak
Hung o'er the craggy cliff, while from its top
The eagle mark'd his prey; the stately ash
Rear'd high his nervous stature, while below
The twining alders darken'd all the scene.
Safe in the shade, the tenants of the wood
Assembled, bird and beast. The turtle-dove
Coo'd, amorous, all the live-long summer's day.
Lover of men, the piteous redbreast plain'd,
Sole-sitting on the bough. Blithe on the bush,
The blackbird, sweetest of the woodland choir,
Warbled his liquid lay; to shepherd swain
Mellifluous music, as his master's flock,
With his fair mistress and his faithful dog,
He tended in the vale: while leverets round,
In sportive races, through the forest flew
With feet of wind; and vent'ring from the rock,

The snow-white coney fought his ev'ning meal.
 Here too the poet, as inspir'd at eve
 He roam'd the dusky wood, or fabled brook
 That piecemeal printed ruins in the rock,
 Beheld the blue-eyed sisters of the stream,
 And heard the wild note of the fairy throng
 That charm'd the queen of heav'n, as round the tree

Time-hallow'd, hand in hand they led the dance,
 With sky-blue mantles glitt'ring in her beam.

Low by the lake, as yet without a name,
 Fair bosom'd in the bottom of the vale,
 Arose a cottage green with ancient turf,
 Half-hid in hoary trees, and from the north
 Fenc'd by a wood, but open to the sun.
 Here dwelt a peasant, rev'rend with the locks
 Of age, yet youth was ruddy on his cheek;
 His farm his only care; his sole delight
 To tend his daughter beautiful and young,
 To watch her paths, to fill her lap with flow'rs,
 To see her spread into the bloom of years,
 The perfect picture of her mother's youth.
 His age's hope, the apple of his eye,
 Belov'd of Heav'n, his fair Levina grew
 In youth and grace, the naiad of the vale.
 Fresh as the flow'r amid the sunny show'rs
 Of May, and blither than the bird of dawn,
 Both roses' bloom gave beauty to her cheek,
 Soft-temper'd with a smile. The light of Heav'n,
 And innocence, illum'd her virgin eye,
 Lucid and lovely as the morning star.
 Her breast was fairer than the vernal bloom
 Of valley lily, op'ning in a show'r;
 Fair as the morn, and beautiful as May,
 The glory of the year, when first she comes
 Array'd, all-beauteous, with the robes of heav'n,
 And breathing summer breezes, from her locks
 Shakes genial dews, and from her lap the flow'rs.
 Thus beautiful the look'd; yet something more,
 And better far than beauty, in her looks
 Appear'd; the maiden blush of modesty;
 The smile of cheerfulnefs, and sweet content;
 Health's freshest rose, the sunshine of the soul;
 Each height'ning each, effus'd o'er all her form
 A nameless grace, the beauty of the mind.

Thus finish'd fair above her peers, she drew
 The eyes of all the village, and inflam'd
 The rival shepherds of the neighb'ring dale
 Who laid the spoils of summer at her feet,
 And made the woods enamour'd of her name.
 But pure as buds before they blow, and still
 A virgin in her heart, she knew not love;
 But all alone, amid her garden fair,
 From morn to noon, from noon to dewy eve;
 She spent her days; her pleasing task to tend
 The flowers; to lave them from the water-spring;
 To open the buds with her enamour'd breath,
 Rank the gay tribes, and rear them in the sun.
 In youth the index of maturer years,
 Left by her school-companions at their play,
 She'd often wander in the wood, or roam
 The wilderness, in quest of curious flow'r,
 Or nest of bird unknown, till eve approach'd,
 And hemm'd her in the shade. To obvious swain,
 Or woodman chanting in the greenwood glin,
 She'd bring the beauteous spoils, and ask their names.

Thus ply'd assiduous her delightful task,

Day after day, till ev'ry herb she nam'd
 That paints the robe of Spring, and knew the voice
 Of every warbler in the vernal wood.

Her garden stretch'd along the river side,
 High up a sunny bank: on either side,
 A hedge forbade the vagrant foot; above,
 An ancient forest screen'd the green recess.
 Transplanted here by her creative hand,
 Each herb of nature, full of fragrant sweets,
 That scents the breath of Summer; every flow'r,
 Pride of the plain, that blooms on festal days
 In shepherds garland, and adorns the year,
 In beauteous clusters flourish'd; nature's work,
 And order, finish'd by the hand of art.
 Here gowans, natives of the village green,
 To daisies grew. The lilies of the field
 Put on the robe they neither sow'd nor spun.
 Sweet-smelling shrubs and cheerful spreading trees,
 Unfrequent scatter'd, as by nature's hand,
 Shaded the flow'rs, and to her Eden drew
 The earliest concerts of the Spring, and all
 The various music of the vocal year:
 Retreat romantic! Thus from early youth
 Her life she led; one summer's day, serene
 And fair without a cloud; like poet's dream
 Of vernal landscapes, of Elysian vales,
 And islands of the blest; where, hand in hand,
 Eternal Spring and Autumn rule the year,
 And love and joy lead on immortal youth.

'Twas on a Summer's day, when early show'rs
 Had wak'd the various vegetable race
 To life and beauty, fair Levina stray'd
 Far in the blooming wilderness the fray'd,
 To gather herbs, and the fair race of flow'rs,
 That nature's hand creative pours at will.
 Beauty unbounded! over earth's green lap,
 Gay without number, in the day of rain.
 O'er valleys gay, o'er hillocks green the walk'd,
 Sweet as the season, and at times awak'd
 The echoes of the vale, with native notes
 Of heart-felt joy, in numbers heav'nly sweet;
 Sweet as th' hosannahs of a form of light,
 A sweet-tongu'd seraph in the bow'rs of bliss.

Her, as she halted on a green hill top,
 A quiver'd hunter spied. Her flowing locks,
 In golden ringlets, glitt'ring to the sun,
 Upon her bosom play'd: her mantle green,
 Like thine, O nature! to her rosy cheek
 Lent beauty new; as from the verdant leaf
 The rose-bud blushes with a deeper bloom,
 Amid the walks of May. The stranger's eye
 Was caught as with ethereal presence. Oft
 He look'd to heav'n, and oft he met her eye
 In all the silent eloquence of love;
 Then, wak'd from wonder, with a smile began.
 "Fair wanderer of the wood! what heav'nly pow'r
 Or providence, conducts thy wand'ring steps
 To this wild forest, from thy native seat
 And parents, happy in a child so fair?
 A shepherdess, or virgin of the vale,
 Thy dress bespeaks; but in majestic mien,
 And eye, bright as the morning star, confests
 Superior birth and beauty, born to rule:
 As from the stormy cloud of night, that veils
 Her virgin-orb, appears the queen of heav'n,
 And with full beauty gilds the face of night.
 Whom shall I call the fairest of her sex
 And charmer of my soul? In yonder vale,

Come, let us crop the roses of the brook,
 And windings of the wood : soft under shade,
 Let us recline by mossy fountain side,
 While the wood suffers in the beam of noon.
 I'll bring my love the choice of all the shades ;
 First fruits ; the apple ruddy from the rock ;
 And clust'ring nuts that burnish in the beam.
 O wilt thou bless my dwelling, and become
 The owner of these fields ? I'll give thee all
 That I possess, and all thou seest is mine."

This spoke the youth, with rapture in his eye,
 And thus the maiden with a blush began :
 " Beyond the shadow of these mountains green,
 Deep-bosom'd in the vale, a cottage stands,
 The dwelling of my sire, a peaceful swain ;
 Yet at his frugal board health fits a guest,
 And fair contentment crowns his hoary hairs,
 The patriarch of the plains : ne'er by his door
 The needy pass'd or the way-faring man.
 His only daughter, and his only joy,
 I feed my father's flock ; and, while they rest,
 At times retiring, lose me in the wood,
 Skill'd in the virtues of each secret herb
 That opes its virgin bosom to the moon.
 No flow'r amid the garden fairer grows
 Than the sweet lily of the lowly vale,
 The queen of flowers.—But sooner might the weed
 That blooms and dies, the being of a day,
 Presume to match with yonder mountain oak,
 That stands the tempest and the bolt of heav'n,
 From age to age the monarch of the wood—
 O ! had you been a shepherd of the dale,
 To feed your flock beside me, and to rest
 With me at noon in these delightful shades,
 I might have listen'd to the voice of love,
 Nothing reluctant ; might with you have walk'd
 Whole summer suns away. At even-tide,
 When heaven and earth in all their glory shine
 With the last smiles of the departing sun ;
 When the sweet breath of Summer least the sense,
 And secret pleasure thrills the heart of man ;
 We might have walk'd alone, in converse sweet,
 Along the quiet vale, and woo'd the moon
 To hear the music of true lover's vows.
 But fate forbids, and fortune's potent frown,
 And honour, inmate of the noblest breast,
 Ne'er can this hand in wedlock join with thine.
 Cease, beauteous stranger ! cease, beloved youth !
 To vex a heart that never can be yours."

Thus spoke the maid, deceitful : but her eyes,
 Beyond the partial purpose of her tongue,
 Persuasion gain'd. The deep enamour'd youth
 Stood gazing on her charms, and all his soul
 Was lost in love. He grasp'd her trembling hand,
 And breath'd the softest, the sincerest vows
 Of love ; " O virgin ! fairest of the fair !
 My one beloved ! Were the Scottish throne
 To me transmitted through a scepter'd line
 Of ancestors, thou, thou should'st be my queen,
 And Caledonia's diadems adorn
 A fairer head than ever wore a crown."

She redd'n'd like the morning, under veil
 Of her own golden hair. The woods among,
 They wander'd up and down with fond delay,
 Nor mark'd the fall of ev'ning ; parted then,
 The happiest pair on whom the sun declin'd.

Next day he found her on a flow'ry bank ;
 Half under shade of willows, by a spring,

The mirror of the swains, that o'er the meads,
 Slow-winding, scatter'd flow'rets in its way.
 Through many a winding walk and alley green,
 She led him to her garden. Wonder-struck,
 He gaz'd, all eye, o'er th' enchanting scene :
 And much he prais'd the walks, the groves, the flow'rs,

Her beautiful creation ; much he prais'd
 The beautiful creatress ; and awak'd
 The echo in her praise. Like the first pair,
 Adam and Eve, in Eden's blissful bow'rs,
 When newly come from their Creator's hand,
 Our lovers liv'd in joy. Here, day by day,
 In fond endearments, in embraces sweet,
 That lovers only know, they liv'd, they lov'd,
 And found the Paradise that Adam lost.
 Nor did the virgin, with false modest pride,
 Retard the nuptial morn : she fix'd the day
 That bless'd the youth, and open'd to his eyes
 An age of gold, the heav'n of happiness
 That lovers in their lucid moments dream.

And now the morning, like a rosy bride,
 Adorned on her day, put on her robes,
 Her beauteous robes of light : the naiad streams,
 Sweet as the cadence of a poet's song,
 Flow'd down the dale : the voices of the grove,
 And ev'ry winged warbler of the air,
 Sung over head, and there was joy in heaven.
 Ris'n with the dawn, the bride, and bridal-maids, Stray'd through the woods, and o'er the vales, in quest

Of flow'rs, and garlands, and sweet-smelling herbs,
 To strew the bridegroom's way, and deck his bed.

Fair in the bosom of the level lake
 Rose a green island, cover'd with a spring
 Of flow'rs perpetual, goodly to the eye,
 And blooming from afar. High in the midst,
 Between two fountains, an enchanted tree
 Grew ever green, and every month renew'd
 Its blooms and apples of Hesperian gold,
 Here ev'ry bride, as ancient poets sing,
 Two golden apples gather'd from the bough ;
 To give the bridegroom in the bed of love,
 The pledge of nuptial concord and delight
 For many a coming year. Levina now
 Had reach'd the isle with an attendant maid,
 And pull'd the mystic apples, pull'd the fruit ;
 But wish'd and long'd for the enchanted tree.
 Not fondly sought the first created fair
 The fruit forbidden of the mortal tree,
 The source of human wo. Two plants arose
 Fair by the mother's side, with fruits and flow'rs
 In miniature. One, with audacious hand,
 In evil hour she rooted from the ground.
 At once the island shook, and shrieks of wo
 At times were heard, amid the troubled air.
 Her whole frame shook, the blood forsook her face,
 Her knees knock'd, and her heart within her dy'd.
 Trembling, and pale, and boding woes to come,
 They seiz'd the boat, and hurried from the isle.

And now they gain'd the middle of the lake,
 And saw th' approaching land : now, wild with joy,

They row'd, they flew. When lo ! at once effus'd,
 Sent by the angry demon of the isle,
 A whirlwind rose : it lash'd the furious lake
 To tempest, overturn'd the boat, and sunk
 The fair Levina to a watery tomb.

Her sad companions, bending from a rock,
 Thrice saw her head, and supplicating hands
 Held up to heav'n, and heard the shriek of death:
 Then over head the parting billow clos'd,
 And op'd no more. Her fate in mournful lays,
 The muse relates; and sure each tender maid
 For her shall heave the sympathetic sigh,
 And hap'ly my Eumelia (for her soul
 Is pity's self), as, void of household cares,
 Her ev'ning walk she bends beside the lake,
 Which yet retains her name, shall sadly drop
 A tear, in mem'ry of the hapless maid,
 And mourn with me the sorrows of the youth,
 Whom from his mistress death did not divide.
 Robb'd of the calm possession of his mind,
 All night he wander'd by the founding shore,
 Long looking o'er the lake, and saw at times
 The dear, the dreary ghost of her he lov'd;
 Till love and grief subdu'd his manly prime,
 And brought his youth with sorrow to the grave.

I knew an aged swain, whose hoary head
 Was bent with years, the village chronicle,
 Who much had seen, and from the former times
 Much had receiv'd. He, hanging o'er the hearth
 In winter ev'nings, to the gaping swains,
 And children circling round the fire, would tell
 Stories of old, and tales of other times.
 Of Lomond and Levina he would talk;
 And how of old, in Britain's evil days,
 When brothers against brothers drew the sword
 Of civil rage, the hostile hand of war
 Ravag'd the land, gave cities to the sword,
 And all the country to devouring fire.
 Then these fair forests and Elysian scenes,
 In one great conflagration, flam'd to heav'n.
 Barren and black, by swift degrees arose
 A murrish fen; and hence the lab'ring hind,
 Digging for fuel, meets the mould'ring trunks
 Of oaks, and branchy antlers of the deer.

Now sober industry, illustrious power!
 Hath rais'd the peaceful cottage, calm abode
 Of innocence and joy; now, sweating, glides
 The shining ploughshare; tames the stubborn soil;
 Leads the long drain along th' infertile marsh;
 Bids the bleak hill with vernal verdure bloom,
 The haunt of flocks; and clothes the barren heath
 With waving harvests, and the golden grain.

Fair from his hand, behold the village rise,
 In rural pride, 'mong intermingled trees!
 Above whose aged tops, the joyful swains
 At even-tide, descending from the hill,
 With eye enamour'd, mark the many wreaths
 Of pillar'd smoke, high-curling to the clouds.
 The street resounds with labour's various voice,
 Who whistles at his work. Gay on the green,
 Young blooming boys, and girls with golden hair,
 Trip nimble-footed, wanton in their play,
 The village hope. All in a rev'rend row,
 Their gray-hair'd grandfathers, sitting in the sun,
 Before the gate, and leaning on the staff,
 The well-remember'd stories of their youth
 Recount, and shake their aged locks with joy.

How fair a prospect rises to the eye,
 Where beauty vies in all her vernal forms,
 For ever pleasant, and for ever new!
 Swells th' exulting thought, expands the soul,
 Drowning each ruder care: a blooming train
 Of bright ideas rushes on the mind.

Imagination rouses at the scene,
 And backward, through the gloom of ages past,
 Beholds Arcadia, like a rural queen,
 Encircled with her swains and rosy nymphs,
 The mazy dance conducting on the green.
 Nor yield to old Arcadia's blissful vales
 Thine, gentle Leven! green on either hand
 Thy meadows spread, unbroken of the plough,
 With beauty all their own. Thy fields rejoice
 With all the riches of the golden year.
 Fat on the plain, and mountain's sunny side,
 Large droves of oxen, and the fleecy flocks
 Feed undisturb'd, and fill the echoing air
 With music, grateful to the master's ear.
 The traveller stops, and gazes round and round
 O'er all the scenes, that animate his heart
 With mirth and music. Even the mendicant,
 Bowbent with age, that on the old gray stone,
 Sole sitting, suns him in the public way,
 Feels his heart leap, and to himself he sings.

How beautiful around the lake outspreads
 Its wealth of waters, the surrounding vales
 Renews, and holds a mirror to the sky,
 Perpetual fed by many sister-streams,
 Haunts of the angler! First, the gulfy Po,
 That through the quacking marsh and waving reeds
 Creeps slow and silent on. The rapid Queech,
 Whose foaming torrents o'er the broken steep
 Burst down impetuous, with the placid wave
 Of slow'ry Leven, for the canine pike
 And silver eel renown'd. But chief thy stream,
 O Gairny! sweetly winding, claims the song.
 First on thy banks the Doric reed I tun'd,
 Stretch'd on the verdant grass; while twilight
 meek,
 Enrob'd in mist, slow-falling through the air,
 Silent and still, on ev'ry closed flow'r
 Shed drops nectareous; and around the fields
 No noise was heard, save where the whisp'ring reeds

Wav'd to the breeze, or in the ddsty air
 The slow-wing'd crane mov'd heav'ly o'er the lee,
 And shrilly clamour'd as he sought his nest.
 There would I sit, and tune some youthful lay,
 Or watch the motion of the living fires,
 That day and night their never-ceasing course
 Wheel round th' eternal poles, and bend the knee
 To him the Maker of yon starry sky,
 Omnipotent! who, thron'd above all heav'ns,
 Yet ever present through the peopl'd space
 Of vast creation's infinite extent,
 Pours life, and bliss, and beauty, pours himself,
 His own essential goodness, o'er the minds
 Of happy beings, through ten thousand worlds.

Nor shall the muse forget thy friendly heart,
 O Lelius! partner of my youthful hours;
 How often, rising from the bed of peace,
 We would walk forth to meet the summer morn,
 Inhaling health and harmony of mind;
 Philosophers and friends; while science beam'd,
 With ray divine as lovely on our minds
 As yonder orient sun, whose welcome light
 Reveal'd the vernal landscape to the view.
 Yet oft, unbending from more serious thought,
 Much of the looser follies of mankind, [laugh;
 Hum'rous and gay, we'd talk, and much would
 While, ever and anon, their foibles vain
 Imagination offer'd to our view.

Fronting where Gairny pours his silent urn
 Into the lake, an island lifts its head,
 Grass and wild, with ancient ruin heap'd
 Of cells; where from the noisy world retir'd
 Of old, as fame reports, religion dwelt
 Safe from the insults of the darken'd crowd
 That bow'd the knee to Odin; and in times
 Of ignorance, when Caledonia's sons
 (Before the triple-crowned giant fell)
 Exchang'd their simple faith for Rome's deceits.
 Here superstition for her cloister'd ions
 A dwelling rear'd, with many an arched vault;
 Where her pale vot'ries at the midnight-hour,
 In many a mournful strain of melancholy,
 Chanted their orisons to the cold moon.
 It now resounds with the wild-shrieking gull,
 The crested lapwing, and the clamorous mew,
 The patient heron, and the bittern dull,
 Deep-sounding in the bafe, with all the tribe
 That by the water seek th' appointed-meal.
 From hence the shepherd in the fenced feld, 'Tis said, has heard strange sounds, and music
 wild;

Such as in Selma, by the burning oak
 Of hero fallen, or of battle lost,
 Warn'd Fingal's mighty son, from trembling chords
 Of untouch'd harp, self-sounding in the night.
 Perhaps th' afflicted genius of the lake,
 That leaves the wat'ry grot, each night to mourn
 The waste of time, his desolated isles
 And temples in the dust: his plaintive voice
 Is heard resounding through the dreary courts
 Of high Lochleven castle, famous once,
 Th' abode of heroes of the Bruce's line;
 Gothic the pile, and high the solid walls,
 With warlike ramparts, and the strong defence
 Of jutting battlements, an age's toil!
 No more its arches echo to the noise
 Of joy and festive mirth. No more the glance
 Of blazing taper through its windows beams,
 And quivers on the undulating wave:
 But naked stand the melancholy walls,
 Lash'd by th' wint'ry tempests, cold and bleak,
 That whistle mournful through the empty halls,
 And piecemeal crumble down the tow'rs to dust.
 Perhaps in some lone, dreary, desert tower,
 That time has spar'd, forth from the window looks,
 Half hid in grass, the solitary fox;
 While from above the owl, musician dire!
 Screams hideous, harsh, and grating to the ear.

Equal in age, and sharers of its fate,
 A row of moss-grown trees around it stand.
 Scarce here and there, upon their blasted tops,
 A shrivell'd leaf distinguishes the year;
 Emblem of hoary age, the eve of life,
 When man draws nigh his everlasting home,
 Within a step of the devouring grave;
 When all his views and tow'ring hopes are gone,
 And ev'ry appetite before him dead.

Bright shines the morn, while in the ruddy east
 The sun hangs hov'ring o'er th' Atlantic wave.
 Apart on yonder green hill's funny side,
 Seren'd with all the music of the morn,
 Attentive let me sit; while from the rock,
 The swains, laborious, roll the limestone huge,
 Bounding elastic from th' indented grass,
 At every fall it springs, and thund'ring shoots,
 O'er rocks and precipices, to the plain.

And let the shepherd careful tend his flock
 Far from the dang'rous steep; nor, O ye swains!
 Stray heedless of its rage. Behold the tears
 Yon wretched widow o'er the mangled corpse
 Of her dead husband pours, who, hapless man!
 Cheerful and strong went forth at rising morn
 To usual toil; but, ere the evening hour,
 His sad companions bare him lifeless home.
 Urg'd from the hill's high top, with progress swift,
 A weighty stone, resistless, rapid came,
 Seen by the fated wretch, who stood unmov'd,
 Nor turn'd to fly, till flight had been in vain;
 When now arriv'd the instrument of death,
 And fell'd him to the ground. The thirsty land
 Drank up his blood: such was the will of Heav'n.

How wide the landscape opens to the view!
 Still as I mount, the less'ning hills decline,
 Till high above them northern Grampius lifts
 His hoary head, bending beneath a load
 Of everlasting snow. O'er southern fields
 I see the Cheviot hills, the ancient bounds
 Of two contending kingdoms. There in fight
 Brave Piercy and the gallant Douglas bled,
 The house of heroes, and the death of hosts!
 Wat'ring the fertile fields, majestic Forth,
 Full, deep, and wide, rolls placid to the sea,
 With many a vessel trim, and oared bark,
 In rich profusion cover'd, wafting o'er
 The wealth and product of far distant lands.

But chief mine eye on the subjected vale
 Of Leven-pleas'd looks down; while o'er the trees,
 That shield the hamlet with the shade of years,
 The tow'ring smoke of early fire ascends,
 And the shrill cock proclaims th' advanced morn.

How blest the man! who, in these peaceful
 plains,

Ploughs his paternal field; far from the noise,
 The care, and bustle of a busy world.
 All in the sacred, sweet, sequester'd vale
 Of solitude, the secret primrose-path
 Of rural life, he dwells; and with him dwells
 Peace and content, twins of the Sylvan shade,
 And all the graces of the golden age.
 Such is Agricola, the wife, the good,
 By nature formed for the calm retreat,
 The silent path of life. Learn'd, but not fraught
 With self-importance, as the starched fool;
 Who challenges respect by solemn face,
 By studied accent, and high-sounding phrase.
 Enamour'd of the shade, but not morose.
 Politeness, rais'd in courts by frigid rules,
 With him spontaneous grows. Not books alone,
 But man his study, and the better part;
 To tread the ways of virtue, and to act
 The various scenes of life with God's applause.
 Deep in the bottom of the flow'ry vale,
 With blooming fallows and the leafy twine
 Of verdant alders fenc'd, his dwelling stands
 Complete in rural elegance. The door,
 By which the poor or pilgrim never pass'd,
 Still open, speaks the master's bounteous heart.
 There, O how sweet! amid the fragrant shrubs
 At ev'ning cool to sit; while, on their boughs,
 The nest'd songsters twitter o'er their young,
 And the hoarse low of folded cattle breaks
 The silence, wafted o'er the sleeping lake,
 Whose waters glow beneath the purple tinge
 Of western cloud; while converse sweet deceives

The stealing foot of time. Or where the ground,
Mounded irregular, points out the graves
Of our forefathers, and the hallow'd fane,
Where swains assembling worship, let us walk,
In softly-foothing melauncholy thought,
As night's seraphic bard, immortal Young!
Or sweet-complaining Gray; there see the goal
Of human life, where drooping, faint, and tir'd,
Off mis'd the prize, the weary racer rests.

Thus sung the youth, amid infertile wilds
And nameless deserts, unpoetic ground!
Far from his friends he stray'd, recording thus
The dear remembrance of his native fields,
To cheer the tedious night; while slow disease
Prey'd on his pining vitals, and the blasts
Of dark December shook his humble cot.

DAPHNIS:

A MONODY.

To the Memory of Mr. William Arnot.

No more of youthful joys, or love's fond dreams,
No more of morning fair, or evening mild,
While Daphnis lies among the silent dead
Unsung; though long ago he trod the path,
The dreary road of death—

Which soon or late each human foot must tread:
He trod the dark uncomfortable wild, [beams,
By faith's pure light, by hope's heav'n-op'n'd
By love, whose image gladdens mortal eyes,
And keeps the golden key that opens all the skies.

Assist, ye muses!—and ye will assist;
For Daphnis, whom I sing, to you was dear:
Ye lov'd the boy, and on his youthful head
Your kindest influence shed.—
So may I match his lays, who to the lyre
Wail'd his lost Lycidas by wood and rill:
So may the muse my grow'ning mind inspire
To sing a farewell to thy ashes blest;
To bid fair peace to be thy gentle shade;
To scatter flow'rets, cropt by fancy's hand,
In sad assemblage round thy tomb,
If water'd by the muse, to latest time to bloom.

Oft by the side of Leven's crystal lake,
Trembling beneath the closing lids of light,
With flow short-measur'd steps we took our walk:
Then he would talk
Of argument far, far above his years;
Then he would reason high,
Till from the east the silver queen of night
Her journey up heav'n's steep began to make,
And silence reign'd attentive in the sky.

O happy days! for ever, ever gone!
When o'er the flow'ry green we ran, we play'd
With blooms bedrop'd by youthful summer's hand;
Or, in the willow-shade,
We mimic castles built among the sand,
Soon by the founding surge to be beat down,
Or sweeping winds; when, by the sedge marsh,
We heard the heron, and the wild duck harsh,
And sweeter lark, tune his melodious lay
At highest noon of day.
Among the antic moss-grown stones we'd roam,
With ancient hieroglyphic figures grac'd,

 Son of Mr. David Arnot of Partmoak, near Kinross.*

Winged hour-glasses, bones, and skulls, and spades,
And obsolete inscriptions by the hands
Of other ages; ah, I little thought
That we then play'd o'er his untimely tomb!

Where were ye, muses! when the leaden hand
Of death, remorseless, clos'd your Daphnis' eyes?
For sure ye heard the weeping mother's cries;
But the dread pow'r of fate what can withstand?
Young Daphnis smil'd at death; the tyrant's darts
As stubble counted. What was his support?
His conscience, and firm trust in him whose ways
Are truth; in him who sways
His potent sceptre o'er the dark domains
Of death and hell; who holds his strait'n'd reins
Their banded legions: "Through the darksome
" vale
" He'll guide my trembling steps with heav'nly
" I see the dawning of immortal day,"
He smiling said, and died!—

Hail and farewell, blest youth! soon hast thou left

This evil world! Fair was thy thread of life,
But quickly by the envious sisters shorn:
Thus have I seen a rose with rising morn
Unfold its glowing bloom, sweet to the smell,
And lovely to the eye; when a keen wind
Hath tore its blushing leaves, and laid it low,
Stripp'd of its sweets.—Ah, so,
So Daphnis fell! long ere his prime he fell!
Nor left he on these plains his peer behind;
These plains, that mourn their loss, of him bereft,
No more look gay, but desert and forlorn.

Now cease your lamentations, shepherds, cease!
Though Daphnis died below, he lives above;
A better life, and in a fairer clime,
He lives; no sorrow enters that blest place,
But ceaseless songs of love and joy resound;
And fragrance floats around,
By fanning zephyrs from the spicy groves,
And flow'rs immortal wafed; aphodel
And amaranth, unfading, deck the ground,
With fairer colours than, ere Adam fell,
In Eden bloom'd: there happily he may hear
This artless song. Ye pow'rs of verse, improve,
And make it worthy of your darling's ear,
And make it equal to the shepherd's love!

Thus, in the shadow of a frowning rock,
Beneath a mountain's side, shaggy and hoar,
A homely swain, tending his little flock,
Rude, yet a lover of the muse's lore,
Chanted his Doric strain till close of day,
Then rose, and homeward slowly bent his way.

ALEXIS:

A PASTORAL.

UPON a bank with cowslips cover'd o'er,
Where Leven's waters break against the shore;
What time the village fires in circles talk,
And youths and maidens take their evening walk;
Among the yellow broom Alexis lay,
And view'd the beauties of the setting day.

Full well you might observe some inward smart,
Some secret grief hung heavy at his heart.
While round the field his sporting lambkins play'd,
He rais'd his plaintive voice, and thus he said:

Begin, my pipe, a softly mournful strain:
The parting sun shines yellow on the plain;
The balmy west-wind breathes along the ground:
Their evening sweets the flow'rs dispense around;
The flocks stray bleating o'er the mountain's brow,
And from the plain th' ans'w'ring cattle low;
Sweet chant the feather'd tribes on every tree,
And all things feel the joys of love, but me.

Begin, my pipe, begin the mournful strain;
Eumelia meets my kindness with disdain.
Oft have I try'd her stubborn heart to move,
And in her icy bosom kindle love:
But all in vain—cre. I my love declar'd,
With other youths her company I shar'd;
But now she shuns me, hopeless and forlorn,
And pays my constant passion with her scorn.

Begin, my pipe, the sadly-soothing strain,
And bring the days of innocence again.
Well I remember in the sunny scene
We ran, we play'd together on the green,
Fair in our youth, and wanton in our play,
We toy'd, we sported the long summer's day.
For her I spoil'd the gardens of the spring,
And taught the goldfinch on her hand to sing.
We sat and sung beneath the lover's tree;
One was her look and it was fix'd on me.

Begin, my pipe a melancholy strain:
A holiday was kept on yonder plain;
The feast was spread upon the flow'ry mead,
And skillful Thyrsis tun'd his vocal reed;
Each for the dance selects the nymph he loves,
And every nymph with smiles her swain approves:
The setting sun beheld their mirthful glee,
And left all happy in their love, but me.

Begin, my pipe, a softly mournful strain:
O cruel nymph! O most unhappy swain!
To climb the steepy rock's tremendous height,
And crop its herbage is the goat's delight;
The flow'ry thyme delights the humming bees,
And blooming wilds the bleating lambskins please;
Daphnis courts Chloe under every tree:
Eumelia, you alone have joys for me!

Now cease, my pipe, now cease the mournful strain:

Lo, yonder comes Eumelia o'er the plain!
Till she approach I'll lurk behind the shade,
Then try, with all my art, the stubborn maid:
Though to her lover cruel and unkind,
Yet time may change the purpose of her mind.
But vain these pleasing hopes! already see,
She hath observ'd, and now she flies from me!

Then cease, my pipe, the unavailing strain:
Apollo aids, the nine inspire in vain:
You, cruel maid! refuse to lend an ear;
No more I sing, since you disdain to hear.
This pipe Amyntas gave, on which he play'd:
"Be thou its second lord," the dying shepherd said.

No more I play: now silent let it be;
Nor pipe, nor song, can e'er give joy to me.

THE EAGLE, CROW, AND SHEPHERD.

A FABLE.

BENEATH the horror of a rock,
A shepherd careless fed his flock.
Soufe from its top an eagle came,
And seiz'd upon a sporting lamb:

VOL. XI.

Its tender sides his talons tear,
And bear it bleating through the air.

This was discover'd by a crow,
Who hopp'd upon the plain below.
"You ram," says he, "becomes my prey;"
And, mounting, hastens to the fray,
Lights on his back—when lo, ill luck!
He in the fleece entangled stuck;
He spreads his wings, but can't get free,
Struggling, in vain, for liberty.

The shepherd soon the captive spies,
And soon he seizes on the prize.
His children, curious, crowd around,
And ask what strange fowl he has found.
"My sons," said he, "warn'd by this wretch,
"Attempt no deed above your reach:
"An eagle not an hour ago,
"He's now content to be a crow."

PASTORAL SONG.

To the Tune of—The Yellow-Hair'd Laddie.

IN May, when the gowans appear on the green,
And flow'rs in the field and the forest are seen;
Where lillies bloom'd bonny, and hawthorns up
sprung,
The yellow-hair'd laddie oft whistled and sung.

But neither the shades, nor the sweets of the flow'rs, [bow'rs,
Nor the blackbirds that warbled on blossoming
Could pleasur'd his eye, or his ear entertain;
For love was his pleasure, and love was his pain.

The shepherd thus sung, while his flocks all around
Drew nearer and nearer, and sigh'd to the sound:
Around, as in chains, lay the beasts of the wood,
With pity disarm'd, with music subdu'd.

Young Jeffy is fair as the spring's early flower,
And Mary sings sweet as the bird in her bower:
But Peggy is fairer and sweeter than they;
With looks like the morning, with smiles like the day.

In the flower of her youth, in the bloom of eighteen,
Of virtue the goddess, of beauty the queen:
One hour in her presence an era excels,
Amid courts, where ambition with misery dwells.

Fair to the shepherd the new-springing flow'rs,
When May and when morning lead on the gay
hours:

But Peggy is brighter and fairer than they;
She's fair as the morning, and lovely as May.

Sweet to the shepherd the wild woodland found,
When larks sing above him, and lambs bleat around:

But Peggy far sweeter can speak and can sing,
Than the notes of the warblers that welcome the spring.

When in beauty she moves by the brook of the plain, [main:
You would call her a Venus new sprung from the
When she sings, and the woods with their echoes reply [high.
You would think that an angel was warbling ou

Ye pow'rs, that preside over mortal estate!
 Whose nod ruleth nature, whose pleasure is fate,
 O grant me, O grant me the heav'n of her charms!
 May I live in her presence, and die in her arms!

SIR JAMES THE ROSS.

AN HISTORICAL BALLAD.

OF all the Scottish northern chiefs,
 Of high and mighty name,
 The bravest was Sir James the Ross,
 A knight of meikle fame.

His growth was like a youthful oak,
 That crowns the mountain's brow;
 And, waving o'er his shoulders broad,
 His locks of yellow flew.

Wide were his fields, his herds were large,
 And large his flocks of sheep,
 And num'rous were his goats and deer
 Upon the mountains steep.

The chieftain of the good Clan Ross,
 A firm and warlike band;
 Five hundred warriors drew the sword
 Beneath his high command.

In bloody fight thrice had he stood
 Against the English keen,
 Ere two and twenty opening springs
 The blooming youth had seen.

The fair Matilda dear he lov'd,
 A maid of beauty rare:
 Even Marg'ret on the Scottish throne
 Was never half so fair.

Long had he woo'd, long she refus'd
 With seeming scorn and pride;
 Yet oft her eyes confess'd the love
 Her fearful words deny'd.

At length she bless'd his well-try'd love,
 Allow'd his tender claim;
 She vow'd to him her virgin-heart,
 And own'd an equal flame.

Her brother, Buchan's cruel lord,
 Their passion disapprov'd;
 He bade her wed Sir John the Græme,
 And leave the youth she lov'd.

One night they met, as they were wont,
 Deep in a shady-wood;
 Where on the bank, beside the burn,
 A blooming saugh-tree stood.

Conceal'd among the underwood
 The crafty Donald lay,
 The brother of Sir John the Græme,
 To watch what they might say.

When thus the maid began: "My sire
 " Our passion disapproves;
 " He bids me wed Sir John the Græme,
 " So here must end our loves.

" My father's will must be obey'd,
 " Nought hoots me to withstand;
 " Some fairer maid in beauty's bloom
 " Shall bless thee with her hand.

" Soon will Matilda be forgot,
 " And from thy mind effac'd;
 " But may that happiness be thine,
 " Which I can never taste!"

" What do I hear? is this thy vow?"
 Sir James the Ross replied;
 " And will Matilda wed the Græme,
 " Though sworn to be my bride?"

" His sword shall sooner pierce my heart,
 " Than reave me of thy charms"—
 And clasp'd her to his throbbing breast,
 Fast lock'd within her arms.

" I spoke to try thy love," she said,
 " I'll ne'er wed man but thee:
 " The grave shall be my bridal bed,
 " If Græme my husband be.

" Take then, dear youth! this faithful kiss,
 " In witness of my troth;
 " And every plague become my lot,
 " That day I break my oath."

They parted thus—the sun was set:
 Up hasty Donald flies;
 And, " Turn thee, turn thee, beardless youth!
 He loud insulting cries,

Soon turn'd about the fearless chief,
 And soon his sword he drew;
 For Donald's blade before his breast
 Had pierc'd his tartans through.

" This for my brother's slighted love;
 " His wrongs sit on my arm."—
 Three paces back the youth retir'd,
 And sav'd himself from harm.

Returning swift, his sword he rear'd
 Fierce Donald's head above;
 And through the brain, and crashing bone,
 The furious weapon drove.

Life issued at the wound; he fell,
 A lump of lifeless clay:
 " So fall my foes," quoth valiant Ross,
 And stately strode away.

Through the green-wood in haste he pass'd
 Unto Lord Buchan's hall,
 Beneath Matilda's windows stood,
 And thus on her did call:

" Art thou asleep, Matilda fair?
 " Awake, my love, awake!
 " Behold thy lover waits without,
 " A long farewell to take.

" For I have slain fierce Donald Græme,
 " His blood is on my sword;
 " And far, far distant are my men,
 " Nor can defend their lord.

" To Sky I will direct my flight,
 " Where my brave brothers bide,
 " And raise the mighty of the isles
 " To combat on my side."

" O do not so," the maid replied,
 " With me till morning stay;
 " For dark and dreary is the night,
 " And dang'rous is the way.

" All night I'll watch thee in the park ;
 " My faithful page I'll send,
 " In haste to raise the brave Clan Rofs,
 " Their master to defend."

He laid him down beneath a bush,
 And wrapp'd him in his plaid ;
 While, trembling for her lover's fate,
 At distance stood the maid.

Swift ran the page, o'er hill and dale,
 Till, in a lowly glen,
 He met the furious Sir John Græme
 With twenty of his men.

" Where goest thou, little page ?" he said,
 " So late who did thee send ?"
 " I go to raise the brave Clan Rofs,
 " Their master to defend.

" For he has slain fierce Donald Græme,
 " His blood is on his sword ;
 " And far, far distant are his men,
 " Nor can assist their lord."

" And has he slain my brother dear ?"
 The furious chief replies :
 " Dishonour blast my name, but he
 " By me ere morning dies.

" Say, page, where is Sir James the Rofs ?
 " I will thee well reward."
 " He sleeps into Lord Buchan's park ;
 " Matilda is his guard."

They spurr'd their steeds, and furious flew,
 Like light'ning o'er the sea :
 They reach'd Lord Buchan's lofty tow'rs
 By dawning of the day.

Matilda stood without the gate,
 Upon a rising ground,
 And watch'd each object in the dawn,
 All ear to every sound.

" Where sleeps the Rofs ?" began the Græme,
 " Or has the felon fled ?
 " This hand shall lay the wretch on earth,
 " By whom my brother bled."

And now the valiant knight awoke,
 The virgin shrieking heard :
 Straight up he rose, and drew his sword,
 When the fierce band appear'd.

" Your sword last night my brother slew,
 " His blood yet dims its shine ;
 " And, ere the sun shall gild the morn,
 " Your blood shall reck on mine."

" Your words are brave," the chief return'd ;
 " But deeds approve the man.
 " Set by your men, and, hand to hand,
 " We'll try what valour can."

With dauntless step he forward strode,
 And dar'd him to the fight :
 The Græme gave back, and fear'd his arm,
 For well he knew his might.

Four of his men, the bravest four,
 Sunk down beneath his sword ;

But still he scorn'd the poor revenge,
 And fought their haughty lord.

Behind him basely came the Græme,
 And wounded in the side :
 Out spouting came the purple-stream,
 And all his tartans dy'd.

But yet his hand not dropp'd the sword,
 Nor sunk he to the ground,
 Till through his en'my's heart his sword
 Had forc'd a mortal wound.

Græme, like a tree by winds o'erthrown,
 Fell breathless on the clay ;
 And down beside him sunk the Rofs,
 And faint and dying lay.

Matilda saw, and fast she ran :
 " O spare his life," she cried ;
 " Lord Buchan's daughter begs his life ;
 " Let her not be denied."

Her well-known voice the hero heard ;
 He rais'd his death-clos'd eyes ;
 He fix'd them on the weeping maid,
 And weakly thus replies :

" In vain Matilda begs the life
 " By death's arrest deny'd ;
 " My race is run—adieu, my love !"—
 " Then close'd his eyes, and dy'd.

The sword, yet warm from his left side,
 With frantic hand she drew :
 " I come, Sir James the Rofs," she cry'd,
 " I come to follow you."

The hilt she lean'd against the ground,
 And bar'd her snowy breast,
 Then fell upon her lover's face,
 And sunk to endless rest.

ANACREONTIC.

TO A WASP.

The following is a Ludicrous Imitation of the usual Anacreontics; the Spirit of composing which was raging, a few years ago, among all the Sweet Singers of Great Britain.

WINGED wand'rer of the sky !
 Inhabitant of heav'n high !
 Dreadful with thy dragon tail,
 Hydra-head, and coat of mail !
 Why dost thou my peace molest ?
 Why dost thou disturb my rest ?
 When in May the meads are seen,
 Sweet enamel, white and green !
 And the gardens, and the bow'rs,
 And the forests, and the flow'rs,
 Don their robes of curious dye,
 Fine confusion to the eye !
 Did I—chafe thee in thy flight ?
 Did I—put thee in a fright ?
 Did I—spoil thy treasure hid ?
 Never—never—never did.
 Envious nothing, pray beware ;
 Tempt mine anger, if you dare ;
 Trust not in thy strength of wing ;
 Trust not in thy length of sting.

Heav'n nor earth shall thee defend;
 I thy buzzing foon will end.
 Take my counsel, while you may;
 Devil take you, if you stay.
 Wilt---thou---dare---my---to---wound?---
 Thus, I fell thee to the ground.
 Down among the dead men, now
 Thou shalt forget thou ere wast thou.
 Anacreontic bards beneath,
 Thus shall wail thee after death.

*Chorus of Elysiac Bards.

" A wisp for a wonder,
 " To Paradise under
 " Descends: see, he wanders
 " By Styx's meanders!
 " Behold, how he glows;
 " Amidst Rhodope's snows!
 " He sweats in a trice,
 " In the regions of ice!
 " Lo! he cools, by God's ire,
 " Amidst brimstone and fire!
 " He goes to our king,
 " And he shows him his sting.
 " (God Pluto loves satire,
 " As women love attire);
 " Our king sets him free,
 " Like faun'd Euridice.
 " Thus a wasp could prevail
 " O'er the devil and hell,
 " A conquest both hard and laborious!
 " Though hell had fast bound him,
 " And the devil did confound him,
 " Yet his sting and his wing were victorious."

THE MOUSIAD.

A MINOR EPIC POEM.

In the Manner of Homer.

A FRAGMENT.

In ancient times, ere traps were fram'd,
 Or cats in Britain's isle were known;
 A mouse, for pow'r and valour fam'd,
 Possess'd in peace the regal throne.

A farmer's house he nightly storm'd
 (In vain were bolts, in vain were keys);
 The milk's fair surface he deform'd,
 And digg'd entrenchments in the cheese.

In vain the farmer watch'd by night,
 In vain he spread the poison'd bacon;
 The mouse was wise as well as wight,
 Nor could by force or fraud be taken.

His subjects follow'd where he led,
 And dealt destruction all around;
 His people, shepherd-like, he fed:
 Such mice art rarely to be found!

But evil fortune had decreed
 (The foe of mice as well as men),
 The royal mouse at last should bleed,
 Should fall---he'er to arise again.

* The Chorus is said to be the production of Logan.

Upon a night, as authors say,
 A luckless scent our hero drew,
 Upon forbidden ground to stray,
 And pass a narrow cranny through.

That night a feast the farmer made,
 And joy unbounded fill'd the house;
 The fragments in the pantry spread,
 Afforded bus'ness to the mouse.

He eat his fill, and back again
 Return'd; but access was deny'd.
 He search'd each corner, but in vain;
 He found it close on every side.

Let none our hero's fears deride;
 He roar'd (ten mice of modern days,
 As mice are dwindl'd and decay'd,
 So great a voice could scarcely raise).

Rous'd at the voice, the farmer ran,
 And seiz'd upon his hapless prey.
 With entreaties the mouse began,
 And pray'rs, his anger to allay.

" O spare my life," he trembling cries;
 " My subjects will a ransom give,
 " Large as thy wishes can devise;
 " Soon as it shall be heard I live."

" No, wretch!" the farmer says in wrath,
 " Thou dy'st; no ransom I'll receive."
 " My subjects will revenge my death,"
 He said---" this dying charge I leave."

The farmer lifts his armed hand,
 And on the mouse inflicts an wound;
 What mouse could such a blow withstand!
 He fell, and, dying, bit the ground.

Thus Lambris fell, who flourish'd long,
 (I half forgot to tell his name);
 But his renown lives in the song,
 And future times shall speak his fame.

A mouse, who walk'd about at large
 In safety, heard his mournful cries;
 He heard him give his dying charge,
 And to the rest he frantic flies.

Thrice he essay'd to speak, and thrice
 Tears, such as mice may shed, fell down.
 " Revenge your monarch's death," he cries;
 His voice half stiff'd with a groan.

But having reassum'd his senses,
 And reason, such as mice may have,
 He told out all the circumstances,
 With many a strain and broken heave.

Chill'd with sad grief, th' assembly heard;
 Each dropp'd a tear, and bow'd the head:
 But symptoms soon of rage appear'd,
 And vengeance, for the royal dead.

Long sat they mute: at last arose
 The great Hypenor, blameless sage!
 A hero born to many woes;
 His head was silver'd o'er with age.

His bulk so large, his joints so strong,
 Though worn with grief, and past his prime

Few rats could equal him, 'tis sung,
As rats are in these dreags of time.

Two sons, in battle brave, he had,
Sprung from fair Lalage's embrace;
Short time they grac'd his nuptial bed,
By dogs destroy'd in cruel chafe.

Their timelefs fate the mother wail'd,
And pin'd with heart-corroding grief:
O'er every comfort it prevail'd,
Till death, advancing, brought relief.

Now he's the last of all his race,
A prey to woe: he inly pin'd;
Grief pictur'd fat upon his face;
Upon his breast his head reclin'd.

"And, O my fellow mice!" he said,
"These eyes ne'er saw a day so dire,
Save when my gallant children bled.
"O wretched sons! O wretched fire!"

"But now a gen'ral cause demands
Our grief, and claims our tears alone,
Our monarch, slain by wicked hands,
No issue left to fill the throne.

"Yet, though by hostile man much wrong'd,
My counsel is, from arms forbear,
That so your days may be prolong'd;
For man is Heav'n's peculiar care."

ELEGY.

WRITTEN IN SPRING.

'Tis past: the iron north has spent his rage;
Stern winter now resigns the length'ning day;
The stormy howlings of the winds assuage,
And warm o'er ether western breezes play.

Of genial heat and cheerful light the source,
From southern climes, beneath another sky,
The sun, returning, wheels his golden course;
Before his beams all noxious vapours fly.

Far to the north grim winter draws his train
To his own clime, to Zembla's frozen shore;
Where, thron'd on ice, he holds eternal reign;
Where whirlwinds madden, and where tempests roar.

Loos'd from the bands of frost, the verdant ground
Again puts on her robe of cheerful green,
Again puts forth her flow'rs; and all around,
Smiling, the cheerful face of spring is seen.

Ebhold! the trees new-deck their wither'd boughs;
Their ample leaves the hospitable plane,
The taper elm, and lofty ash disclose:
The blooming hawthorn variegates the scene.

The lily of the vale, of flow'rs the queen,
Puts on the robe she neither fev'd nor spun:
The birds on ground, or on the branches green,
Hop to and fro, and glitter in the sun.

Soon as o'er eastern hills the morning peers,
From her low nest she tufted lark up springs;
And, cheerful singing, up the air she steers;
Still high she mounts, still loud and sweet she sings.

On the green furzè, cloth'd o'er with golden
blooms,

That fill the air with fragrance all around,
The linnet sits, and tricks his glossy plumes,
While o'er the wild his broken notes resound.

While the sun journeys down the western sky,
Along the greenward, mark'd with Roman mound,

Beneath the blithesome shepherd's watchful eye,
The cheerful lambkins dance and frisk around.

Now is the time for those who wisdom love,
Who love to walk in virtue's flow'ry road,
Along the lovely paths of spring to rove,
And follow Nature up to Nature's God.

Thus Zoroaster studied Nature's laws;
Thus Socrates, the wisest of mankind;
Thus Heav'n-taught Plato trac'd th' Almighty cause,
And left the wond'ring multitude behind.

Thus Ashley gather'd academic bays;
Thus gentle Thomson, as the seasons roll,
Taught them to sing the great Creator's praise,
And bear their poet's name from pole to pole.

Thus have I walk'd along the dewy lawn;
My frequent foot the blooming wild hath worn;
Before the lark I've sung the beauteous dawn,
And gather'd health from all the gales of morn.

And, even when winter chill'd the aged year,
I wander'd lonely o'er the hoary plain;
Though frosty Boreas warn'd me to forbear,
Boreas, with all his tempests, warn'd in vain.

Then sleep my nights, and quiet blefs'd my days;
I fear'd no loss, my mind was all my store;
No anxious wishes e'er disturb'd my ease; [more.
Heav'n gave content and health—I ask'd no

Now spring returns: but not to me returns
The vernal joy my better years have known;
Dim in my breast life's dying taper burns,
And all the joys of life with health are flown.

Starting and shiv'ring in th' inconstant wind,
Meagre and pale, the ghost of what I was,
Beneath some blasted tree I lie reclin'd,
And count the silent moments as they pass:

The winged moments, whose unslaying speed
No art can stop, or in their course arrest;
Whose flight shall shortly count me with the dead,
And lay me down in peace with them that rest:

Oft morning dreams preface approaching fate;
And morning dreams, as poet's tell, are true.
Led by pale ghosts, I enter death's dark gate,
And bid the realms of light and life adieu.

I hear the helpless wail, the shriek of woe;
I see the muddy wave, the dreary shore,
The sluggish streams that slowly creep below,
Which mortals visit, and return no more.

Farewell, ye blooming fields! ye cheerful plains!
Enough for me the church-yard's lonely mound,
Where melancholy with still silence reigns,
And the rank grass waves o'er the cheerless
ground.

There let me wander at the close of eve,
When sleep sits dowy on the labourer's eyes.

The world and all its busy follies leave,
And talk with wisdom where my Daphnis lies.

There let me sleep forgotten in the clay,
When death shall shut these weary aching eyes,
Rest in the hopes of an eternal day, [arise:
Till the long night is gone, and the last morn

TO JOHN MILLAR, M. D.

ON RECOVERY FROM A DANGEROUS FIT OF ILL-NESS.

(Written in the name of Mr. David Pearson.)

A RUSTIC youth (he seeks no better name),
Alike unknown to fortune and to fame,
Acknowledging a debt he ne'er can pay,
For thee, O Millar! frames the artless lay.
That yet he lives, that vital warmth remains,
And life's red tide bounds briskly through his veins;

To thee he owes.—His grateful heart believe,
And take his thanks sincere, 'tis all he has to give.
Let traders brave the flood in quest of gain,
Kept with' disquietude, as got with pain;
Let heroes, tempted by a founding name,
Pursue bright honour in the fields of fame.
Can wealth or fame a moment's ease command
To him who sinks beneath affliction's hand?

Upon the wither'd limbs fresh beauty shed;
Or cheer the dark, dark mansions of the dead?

VERSES ON THE DEATH OF THE REV.
MR. MACEWEN*.

MACEWEN gone! and shall the mournful muse,
A tear unto his memory refuse!
Forbid it all ye powers that guard the just,
Your care his actions, and his life your trust.
The righteous perish!—is Macewen dead!
In him religion, virtue's friend, is fled.
Modest in strife, bold in religion's cause,
He fought true honour in his God's applause.
What manly beauties in his works appear,
Close without straining, and concise though clear.
Though short his life, not so his deathless fame,
Succeeding ages shall revere his name.
Hail, blest immortal, hail! while we are tost,
Thy happy soul is landed on the coast,
That land of bliss, where, on the peaceful shore,
Thou view'st, with pleasure, all the dangers o'er;
Laid in the silent grave, thy honour'd dust
Expects the resurrection of the just.

* Author of a Treatise on the Scriptures, Types and Figures, and "Essays on Various Subjects."

THE POETICAL WORKS
OF
THOMAS CHATTERTON.

Containing

ELGA, GODDWIN,
BATTLE OF HASTINGS,
BALLADE OF CHARITIE,
ELINOURE AND JUGA,
BETHE OF SIR CHARLES RAW-
DIN,

THE TOURNAMENT,
ENGLISH METAMORPHOSIS, ECLOGUES, ELEGIES,
SONGS,
EPISTLES, EPITAPHS,

W. W. W.

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

Behold yon shade, he bears an antique roll;
With many a 'scutcheon clad, and many a scroll;
'Tis he, the wond'rous youth of Brisfow's plain,
That pour'd in Rowley's garb his solemn strain.
A stripling scarcely, and y^et more than man,
His race was ended, ere it well began.
Th' indignant spirit tower'd o'er little men,
He look'd through nature with an angel's ken,
And scorn'd, with conscious pride, this petty stage,
The tardy homage of a thankless age.
The furies wrung his agonizing soul,
And desperation mix'd the Stygian bowl.

PRESTON'S EPISTLE TO A YOUNG GENTLEMAN.

EDINBURGH:

PRINTED BY MUNDALL AND SON, ROYAL BANK CLOSE.

Anno 1795.

THE POLITICAL WORKS
OF
THOMAS CHATFIELD

THE
POLITICAL WORKS
OF
THOMAS CHATFIELD

THE
POLITICAL WORKS
OF
THOMAS CHATFIELD

THE
POLITICAL WORKS
OF
THOMAS CHATFIELD

THE
POLITICAL WORKS
OF
THOMAS CHATFIELD

THE LIFE OF CHATTERTON.

FOR the personal and literary history of CHATTERTON, "the boy of Bristol," the world is obliged to Mr. Tyrwhitt, the original editor of the "Poems supposed to be written by Rowley," 1777; Lord Oxford, author of "Two Letters to the Editor of Chatterton's Miscellanies," 1779; Mr. Herbert Croft, author of "Love and Madness," 1780; Dr. Milles, editor of "Rowley's Poems," in 4to, 1782; Mr. Bryant, author of "Observations on Rowley's Poems," 1782; Mr. Warton, author of "An Inquiry into the Authenticity of the Poems attributed to Rowley;" Mr. Malone, author of "Cursory Observations on the Poems attributed to Rowley," 1782; Mr. Badcock, writer of the articles on the Rowleian Controversy, in the "Monthly Review," 1782; and Dr. George Gregory, writer of the article CHATTERTON, in the fourth volume of the "Biographia Britannica," printed separately in 1789.

The elegant and accurate narrative of Mr. Croft derives an additional value and importance, from being the vehicle of Chatterton's letters to his mother, and an interesting letter from his sister, Mrs. Newton. The laboured narratives of Dr. Milles and Mr. Bryant exhibit strong proofs of the temerity and credulity of the learned writers; but they contain something to amuse curiosity, and something to afford information; particularly the anecdotes furnished by his patrons Mr. Catcott and Mr. Barret; and the intelligence communicated by his companions, Mr. Thistlewaite, Mr. Smith, Mr. Ruddal, Mr. Carey, &c. The candid and comprehensive narrative of Dr. Gregory, "contains all the particulars which are known concerning that extraordinary character, collected in one view," and form a valuable addition to the stock of biographical narratives, already in the possession of the public.

The facts stated in the present account, are chiefly taken from the narratives of Mr. Croft and Dr. Gregory, with the addition of such particulars, as subsequent communications in that valuable miscellany, the "Gentleman's Magazine," and other publications, have supplied.

Thomas Chatterton was born at Bristol, November 20. 1752. The office of sexton of St. Mary Redcliffe, in Bristol, had continued in different branches of his family for more than 150 years. John Chatterton, the last of the name who enjoyed that office, died in 1748. His father, Thomas Chatterton, was the nephew of the sexton. In the early part of life, he had been in the station of a writing-usher to a classical school, was afterwards engaged as a singing man of the Cathedral of Bristol; and latterly, was master of the free school in Pyle-street, in that city. He died in August 1752, about three months before the birth of his son.

By the premature loss of his father, he was deprived of that careful attention which would probably have conducted his early years through all the difficulties that circumstances or disposition might oppose to the attainment of knowledge.

At the age of five years, he was committed to the care of Mr. Love, who had succeeded his father in the school in Pyle-street; but either his faculties were not yet opened, or the waywardness of genius incapacitated him from receiving instruction in the ordinary methods, and he was remanded to his mother, as a dull boy, and incapable of improvement.

She was rendered extremely unhappy by the unpromising aspect of his infant faculties, till he fell in love, as she expressed herself, with the illuminated capitals of an old musical manuscript in French, which enabled her to initiate him in the alphabet. She afterwards taught him to read, from an old black-lettered Testament or Bible; and it is not unreasonable to suppose, that his peculiar attachment to antiquities, may, in a considerable degree, have resulted from this circumstance.

On the 3d of August 1760, when he wanted a few months of eight years of age, he was admitted into Colston's charity-school, in St. Augustin's Back, in Bristol. In this institution, the boys are boarded in the house, clothed, and taught reading, writing, and arithmetic. The school hours, in summer, are from seven o'clock till twelve in the morning, and from one till five in the afternoon; and in winter, from eight to twelve, and from one to four. The boys are obliged to be in bed every night in the year at eight o'clock, and are never permitted to be absent from school, except on Saturdays and saint-days, and then only from between one and two in the afternoon, till between seven and eight in the evening.

The first years of his residence at this seminary passed without notice, and, perhaps, without effort. His sister, indeed, in her letter to Mr. Croft, remarks, that he very early discovered a thirst for pre-eminence, and that even before he was five years old, he was accustomed to preside over his play-mates. To the same purpose, it is said, that when very young, a manufacturer promised to make the family a present of some earthen ware, and that on asking him what device he would have painted on his;—"paint me," said he, "an angel with wings and a trumpet, to trumpet my name over the world."

It appears from Mr. Thistlewaite's letter, published by Dr. Milles, that he formed a connection with Chatterton, towards the latter end of 1763, by means of his intimacy with Mr. Thomas Phillips, the assistant master of the charity school, who possessed a taste for history and poetry; and by his attempts in verse, excited a degree of literary emulation among the elder boys. It is very remarkable, that Chatterton is said to have appeared altogether an idle spectator of those poetical contests; he apparently possessed neither inclination nor ability for literary pursuits, nor does Mr. Thistlewaite believe, that he attempted a single couplet during the first three years of his acquaintance with him. Whatever grounds Mr. Thistlewaite might have for his opinion, Chatterton, doubtless, at that period was possessed of a vigour of understanding, of a quickness of penetration, a boldness of imagination, far superior to the talents of his companions.

If he produced any compositions, his exquisite taste led him to suppress them. In the mean time, he was laying in stores of information, and improving both his imagination and his judgment.

About his tenth year, his sister informs us, he acquired a taste for reading, and began to hire books from a circulating library, with the trifle allowed him for pocket-money.

As his taste was different from children of his own age, his dispositions were also different. Instead of the thoughtless levity of childhood, he possessed the gravity, pensiveness, and melancholy of maturer life. "His spirits," his sister says, "were rather uneven; sometimes so gloomed, that for many days together, he would say very little, and that by constraint; at other times exceedingly cheerful." His intimates in the school were few, and those of the most serious cast.

In the hours allotted him for play, he generally retired to read; and he was particularly solicitous to borrow books. Between his eleventh and twelfth year, he wrote a catalogue of the books he had read, to the number of seventy, consisting chiefly of history and divinity.

The earliest existing specimen of his composition, is a poem called the Apostate Will, printed in "Love and Madness," which appears by the date, April 14. 1764, to have been written at the age of eleven years and a half, and was probably transcribed from the remains of a pocket-book, which his sister had made him a present of, as a new-year's gift, and which he returned at the end of the year, filled with writing, chiefly poetry.

This fact is a strong contradiction to Mr. Thistlewaite's assertion; but Chatterton might, at that time, exercise himself in composition, without being under any necessity of imparting his compositions to Mr. Thistlewaite or Mr. Phillips.

At twelve years old, he was confirmed by the Bishop. His sister adds, that he made very sensible and serious remarks on the awfulness of the ceremony, and on his own feelings preparatory to it.

He soon after, during the week in which he was door-keeper, made some verses on the Last Day, and paraphrased the ninth chapter of Job, and some chapters of Isaiab.

The bent of his genius, however, more strongly inclined him to satire, of which he was tolerably lavish on his school-fellows; nor did the upper master, Mr. Warner, escape the rod of his reprehension.

From what has been related, it is probable, that he was no favourite with Mr. Warner; he, however, found a friend in the under master, Mr. Haynes, who conceived for him a strong and affectionate attachment.

Mr. Thistlethwaite, in the letter already quoted, says, that Chatterton informed him, that he was in possession of certain old MSS. which had been found, deposited in a chest, in Redcliffe church, and that he had lent one to Philips, which he showed him, and which he is confident was Elenore and Ju- ga, afterwards published in the "Town and Country Magazine for May 1769." "I endeavoured," says he, "to assist Philips in investigating the meaning of the lines; but, from an almost total ignorance of the characters, manners, language, and orthography in which they were written, all our efforts were unprofitably exerted." There appears good reason for suspecting some mistake in Mr. Thistlethwaite's narrative, either as to the date, or some other circumstance; since both his mother and sister affirm, that he knew nothing of the parchments brought from Redcliffe church, till after he had left school.

Under all the disadvantages of education, the acquisitions of Chatterton were surprising. Besides the variety of reading which he had gone through, Mr. Croft remarks, he had some knowledge of music; had acquired a taste for drawing, which afterwards he greatly improved; and the usher of the school asserted, he had made a rapid progress in arithmetic.

An extraordinary effect of his discovering an employment adapted to his genius, is remarked in his sister's letter. He had been gloomy from the time he began to learn; but, it was observed, that he became more cheerful after he began to write poetry.

On the 1st of July 1767, he left the charity school, and was bound apprentice to Mr. John Lambert, attorney, of Bristol, for seven years; the apprentice-fee was ten pounds; the master was to find him in meat, drink, clothes, and lodging; the mother in washing, and mending. He slept in the same room with the foot-boy, and went every morning at eight o'clock to the office, which was at some distance; and except the usual time for dinner, continued there till eight o'clock at night, after which he was at liberty till ten, when he was always expected to be at home.

Mr. Lambert affords the most honourable testimony in Chatterton's favour, with respect to the regularity of his attendance, as he never exceeded the limited hours but once, when he had leave to spend the evening with his mother and some friends. Once, and but once, he thought himself under the necessity of correcting him; and that was for sending a very abusive anonymous letter to his old schoolmaster, a short time after he was bound to him. He, however, accuses him of a fullen and gloomy temper, which particularly displayed itself among the servants. Chatterton's superior abilities, and superior information, with the pride which usually accompanies these qualities, doubtless rendered him an unfit inhabitant of the kitchen, where his ignorant associates would naturally be inclined to envy, and would affect to despise those accomplishments which he held in the highest estimation; and even the familiarity of vulgar and illiterate persons, must undoubtedly be rather disgusting than agreeable to a mind like his.

Mr. Lambert's was a situation not unfavourable to the cultivation of his genius. Though much confined, he had much leisure. His master's business consumed a very small portion of his time; frequently, his sister says, it did not engage him above two hours in a day.

While Mr. Lambert was from home, and no particular business interfered, his stated employment was to copy precedents, a book of which, containing 344 folio pages, closely written by Chatterton, is still in possession of Mr. Lambert, as well as another of about thirty pages. The office library contained nothing but law books, except an old edition of Cambden's "Britannia."

He seems to have had a very early predilection for old words and black-letter lore. His sister relates, that soon after his apprenticeship, and some months before he was fifteen, he "wrote a letter to an old school-mate (then at New-York), consisting of a collection of all the hard words in the English language," and "requested him to answer it." He that could collect hard words for a letter, might collect old ones for a poem.

He had continued this course of life for upwards of a year; not, however, without some symptoms of an aversion to his profession, before he began to attract the notice of the literary world.

In the beginning of October 1763, the new bridge at Bristol was finished. At that time, there appeared in Felix Farley's "Bristol Journal," an account of the ceremonies on opening the old bridge, introduced by a letter to the printer, intimating, that "the following description of The Friars first Passing over the Old Bridge, was taken from an ancient manuscript," and signed Dunbelmus Bristolensis. The paper demonstrates strong powers of invention, and uncommon knowledge of ancient customs.

Mr. Ruddal informed Mr. Croft that he assisted Chatterton in disguising several pieces of parchment with the appearance of age, just before The Account of Passing the Bridge appeared in Farley's "Journal;" that after they had made several experiments, Chatterton said, "this will do, now I will black the parchment;" and that Chatterton told him, after the Account appeared in the newspaper, that the parchment which he had blacked and disguised after their experiments, was what he had sent to the printer, containing the Account.

So singular a memoir could not fail to excite curiosity, and many persons became anxious to see the original. After much inquiry, it was found that the manuscript was brought to the printer by Chatterton. "To the threats of those," says Mr. Croft, "who treated him (agreeably to his appearance) as a child, he returned nothing but haughtiness, and a refusal to give any account." He at first alleged that he was employed to transcribe the contents of certain manuscripts by a gentleman, who also had engaged him to furnish complimentary verses, inscribed to a lady, with whom that gentleman was in love. On being farther pressed, he at last declared, that he had received the paper, together with many other manuscripts, from his father, who had found them in a large chest, in the upper room, over the chapel, on the north side of Redcliffe church.

When rents were received, and kept in specie, it was usual for corporate bodies to keep the writings and rents of estates, left for particular purposes, in chests appropriated to each particular benefactor, and called by the benefactor's name.

Over the north porch of Redcliffe church, which was founded or rebuilt, in the reign of Edward IV. by Mr. William Canynge, a merchant of Bristol, there is a kind of muniment room, in which were deposited six or seven chests, one of which in particular was called Mr. Canynge's cofre. This chest, it is said, was secured by six keys, intrusted to the minister, procurator of the church, mayor, and church wardens, which, in process of time, were lost.

In 1727, a notion prevailed, that some title-deeds and other writings of value were contained in Mr. Canynge's cofre: in consequence of which, an order of vestry was made that the chest should be opened under the inspection of an attorney, and that these writings which appeared of consequence should be removed to the south porch of the church. The locks were therefore forced, and not only the principle chest, but the others, which were also supposed to contain writings, were broken open. The deeds immediately relating to the church were kept, and the other manuscripts were left exposed, as of no value.

Chatterton's father, having free access to the church, by means of his uncle, the sexton, carried off, from time to time, parcels of the parchments for covering copy-books and Bibles.

At his death, his widow being under the necessity of removing, carried the remainder to her own habitation; where, according to her account, they continued neglected, or were converted into thread papers, till her son took notice of them and carried them away, telling her, "that he had found a treasure."

The account which he thought proper to give of them, and which he wished to be believed, was, that they were poetical, and other compositions, by Mr. Canynge, and a particular friend of his, Thomas Rowley, whom he at first called a monk, and afterwards a secular priest of the fifteenth century.

Mr. Catcott, a pewterer in Bristol, having heard of Chatterton's pretended discovery, was introduced to him, and soon after obtained from him, very readily, without any reward, The Briffow Tragedy, and Rowley's Epitaph upon Mr. Canynge's Ancestor. In a few days he brought some more, among which was the Yellow Roll.

These pieces were immediately communicated to Mr. Barret, a respectable surgeon in Bristol, then engaged in writing the history of that city, whose friendship and patronage, by these means, Chatterton was fortunate enough to secure.

During the first conversations which Mr. Catcott had with him, he heard him mention the names of most of the poems, since printed, as being in his possession.

He afterwards grew more suspicious and reserved; and it was but rarely, and with difficulty, that any more originals could be obtained from him.

He confessed to Mr. Catcott that he had destroyed several, and some which he owned to have been in his possession, were never afterwards seen. One of these was the Tragedy of the Apostate, &c.

which only a small part has been preserved by Mr. Barret. The subject of it was the apostacy of a person from the Christian to the Jewish faith.

Mr. Barret, however, obtained from him, at different times, several fragments in verse and prose, written upon vellum; and he asserted them to be a part of Rowley's manuscripts. A fac simile of one of these fragments, the Account of William Canynge's Feast, engraved by Mr. Strutt, is published in Mr. Tyrwhitt's and Dr. Milles's edition of Rowley's Poems. The hand-writing is not the record hand used in the fifteenth century. The Arabian numerals, 63, are perfectly modern, and exactly such as Chatterton himself was accustomed to make.

The friendship of Mr. Barret and Mr. Catcott was of considerable advantage to Chatterton: He spent many agreeable hours in their company. His sister says, that after he was introduced to their acquaintance, his ambition daily and perceptibly increased, and he would frequently speak in raptures of the undoubted success of his plan for future life. "When in spirits, he would enjoy his rising fame; and, confident of advancement, he would promise his mother and I should be partakers of his success."

Mr. Barret lent him several medical books, and, at his request, gave him some instructions in surgery.

His taste was versatile, and his studies various. In 1768 and 1769, Mr. Thistlethwaite frequently saw him, and describes in a lively manner, the employment of his leisure hours. "One day he might be found busily employed in the study of heraldry and English antiquities, both of which are numbered among the most favourite of his pursuits; he next discovered him deeply engaged, confounded, and perplexed, amidst the subtilities of metaphysical disquisitions, or lost and bewildered in the abstruse labyrinths of mathematical researches; and these again neglected and thrown aside, to make room for music and astronomy, of both of which sciences, his knowledge was entirely confined to theory. Even physic was not without a charm to allure his imagination, and he would talk of Galen and Hippocrates with all the confidence and familiarity of a modern empiric."

With a view of perfecting himself in the study of English antiquities, he borrowed Skinner's "Etymologicon," and Benson's "Saxon Vocabulary," of Mr. Barret, which he soon returned as useless, most of the interpretations being in Latin.

He was furnished by Mr. Green, a bookseller in Bristol, with "Kersey's Dictionary," and "Speght's Chaucer," the "Glossary" to which he carefully transcribed. These books, together with "Bailey's Dictionary," which he studied very closely, supplied him with the language of Rowley's Poems. Whatever plan he adopted, he entered upon with an earnestness and fervour almost unexampled. Like Milton, he believed he was more capable of writing well at some particular times than at others; and the full of the moon was the season when he imagined his genius to be in perfection; at which time he generally devoted a considerable portion of the night to composition.

His Sundays were continually spent in walking alone into the country about Bristol; and from these excursions, he never failed to bring home drawings of churches, or other objects which had impressed his romantic imagination.

His attention was not confined to the supposed poems of Rowley; he wrote a variety of pieces, chiefly satirical, both in prose and verse, which he sent to the "Town and Country Magazine."

One of the first of his pieces which appeared, was a letter on the tinctures of the Saxon heralds, dated Bristol, February 4. 1769, and signed Dunhelmus Bristolienfis; and in the same Magazine, a poem was inserted on Mr. Alcock of Bristol, signed Aphidius, attributed to him, which has been claimed by one Lockstone, a linen-draper in Bristol.

In the same Magazine for March, are some pretended extracts from Rowley's manuscripts; and in different numbers for the succeeding months, some pieces, called Saxon Poems, written in the style of Ossian.

In March 1769, he wrote to the Hon. Horace Walpole, the present Earl of Orford, offering to furnish him with some account of a series of great painters and engravers, who had flourished at Bristol, which, he said, had been lately discovered, with some old poems, in that city. His letter was left at Bathurst's, Mr. Walpole's bookfeller, with an Ode or Sonnet, of two or three stanzas, in alternate rhyme, on the death of Richard I. (the era of which he first fixed upon for his forgeries), as a specimen of the poems which were found.

“ Richard of Lyon's heart to fight is gone.”

Mr. Walpole had just before been made the instrument of introducing into the world Macpherson's “Osian.” A similar application, therefore, served at once to awaken his suspicion. He, however, answered Chatterton's letter, desiring further information; and in reply was informed, that “ he was the son of a poor widow, who supported him with great difficulty; that he was apprentice to an attorney, but had a taste for more elegant studies;” and hinted a wish, that Mr. Walpole would assist him in emerging from so dull a profession, by procuring him some place, in which he might pursue the natural bias of his genius. He affirmed, that great treasures of ancient poetry had been discovered at Bristol, and were in the hands of a person, who had lent him the specimen already transmitted, as well as the pieces which accompanied this letter, among which was Elinour and Fuga, “ an absolute modern pastoral,” as Mr. Walpole terms it, “ thinly sprinkled with old words.”

In the mean time, the poems were communicated by Mr. Walpole to Gray and Mason; and these excellent and impartial judges, at first sight, pronounced them forgeries; “ the language and metres being totally unlike any thing ancient.”

Mr. Walpole, though convinced of his intention to impose upon him, could not help admiring the spirit of poetry which animated these compositions. His reply was cold and discouraging. He hinted his suspicions of the authenticity of the supposed MSS., and complained, in general terms, of his want of power to be a patron, and advised him to pursue the line of business in which he was placed, as most likely to secure a decent maintenance for himself, and enable him to assist his mother.

This frigid reception, extracted immediately from Chatterton “ a peevish answer,” as Mr. Walpole terms it; demanding to have the MSS. returned, as they were the property of another gentleman; and Mr. Walpole, either offended at his warm and independent spirit, or pleased to be disengaged from the business in so easy a manner, proceeded on a journey to Paris, without taking any farther notice of him.

On his return, he found a letter from Chatterton, in a style, as he terms it, “ singularly impertinent,” expressive of much resentment on account of the detention of his poems, roughly demanding them back again, and adding, “ that Mr. Walpole would not have dared to use him so ill, had he not been acquainted with the narrowness of his circumstances.”

“ My heart,” says Mr. Walpole, in his “Letters” to the editor of Chatterton's Miscellanies, “ did not accuse me of insolence to him. I wrote an answer to him, expostulating with him on his injustice, and renewing good advice; but, upon second thoughts, reflecting that he might be absurd enough to print my letter, I flung it into the fire, and wrapping up both his poems and letters, without taking a copy of either, for which I am now sorry, I returned all to him;” and never afterwards heard from him, or of him, during his life.

The affront was poignantly felt by Chatterton, though it is perhaps more than repaid by the ridiculous portrait which he has exhibited of Mr. Walpole, in the Memoirs of a Sad Dog, under the character of “ the redoubted Baron Otranto, who has spent his whole life in conjectures.” He has however, paid him a compliment, in his Verses to Miss M. R. printed in the “Town and Country Magazine,” for January 1770.

To keep one lover's flame alive,
Requires the genius of a Clive,
With Walpole's mental taste.

Mr. Walpole has incurred much censure for his rejection of Chatterton, “ as if his rejection had driven him to despair.” But to ascribe to his neglect the dreadful catastrophe, which happened nearly two years after, would be the highest degree of injustice and absurdity. It appears from his elegant and spirited narrative of these transactions, that he afterwards regretted that he had not seen this extraordinary youth, and that he did not pay a more favourable attention to his correspondence. But, to be neglected in life, and regretted and admired, when these passions can be no longer of service, has been the usual fate of genius and learning.

Chatterton, however, in part adopted Mr. Walpole's advice, by continuing with his master a full twelvemonth after this transaction; but without applying himself to the duties of his profession, as more certain means of attaining the independence and leisure of which he was desirous.

He past his hours of leisure in respectable company; and his sister says, that "he visited his mother regularly most evenings before nine o'clock, and they were seldom two evenings together without seeing him."

"He would frequently," she says, "walk the College Green with the young girls, that stately paraded there to show their finery;" but she is persuaded that the reports which charged him with libertinism, are ill-founded. She could not perhaps have added a better proof of it, than his inclination to form an acquaintance with Miss Rumsby, a young female in the neighbourhood, apprehending that it might soften that austerity of temper, which had resulted from solitary study. He addressed a poem to her, and they commenced, Mrs. Newton adds, a corresponding acquaintance.

Early in 1769, it appears from a poem on Happiness, addressed to Mr. Carcott, that he had imbibed the principles of infidelity; one of the effects of which was, to render the idea of suicide familiar, and to dispose him to think lightly of the most sacred deposit with which man is intrusted by his Creator.

The progress, however, from speculative to practical irreligion, is not so rapid as is commonly supposed. The greatest advantage of a strict and orderly education, is the resistance which virtuous habits, early acquired, oppose to the allurements of vice.

The editor of his Miscellanies has asserted, that his "profligacy was at least as conspicuous as his abilities;" but he has rather grounded his assertion on the apparently profane and immoral tendency of some of his productions, than on personal knowledge, or a correct review of his conduct.

Of few young men in his situation it can be said, that during a course of nearly three years, he seldom encroached upon the strict limits which were assigned him, with respect to his hours of liberty; that his master could never accuse him of improper behaviour; and that he had the utmost reason to be satisfied he never spent his hours in any but respectable company.

Mrs. Newton, with that unaffected simplicity which so eminently characterises her letter, most powerfully controverts the obloquy which had been thrown upon her brother's memory.

The testimony of Mr. Thistlethwaite is not less explicit or less honourable to Chatterton. "The opportunities," says he, "which a long acquaintance with him afforded me, justify me in saying, that while he lived at Bristol, he was not the debauched character he has been represented. Temperate in his living, moderate in his pleasures, and regular in his exercises, he was undeserving of the aspersions. I admit, that among his papers may be found many passages, not only immoral, but bordering upon a libertinism gross and unpardonable. It is not my intention to attempt a vindication of these passages, which, for the regard I bear his memory, I wish he had never written; but which I nevertheless believe to have originated, rather from a warmth of imagination, aided by a vain affectation of singularity, than from any natural depravity, or from a heart vitiated by evil example."

But though it may not be the effect of infidel principles to plunge the person who becomes unfortunately infected with them into an immediate course of flagrant and shameless depravity, they seldom fail to unhinge the mind, and render it the sport of some passion unfriendly to our happiness and prosperity.

On the 14th of April 1770, he wrote a paper, intitled, The Last Will and Testament of Thomas Chatterton, in which he indicated his design of committing suicide on the following day. The paper was probably rather the result of temporary uneasiness, than of that fixed aversion to his situation, which he constantly manifested; but Mr. Lambert considered it as no longer prudent, after so decisive a proof, to continue him in the house; he accordingly dismissed him immediately from his service, in which he had continued two years, nine months, and thirteen days.

The activity of his mind during this short period is almost unparalleled. The greatest part of his compositions, both under the name of Rowley and his own, was written before April 1770, he being then aged seventeen years and five months; and of the former, they were almost all produced a twelvemonth earlier, before April 1769. But our surprise must decrease, when we consider that he slept but little, and that his whole attention was directed to literary pursuits.

Encouraged by the most liberal promises of assistance and employment from several booksellers and printers in London, he now resolved to try his fortune in the metropolis, which he flattered himself would afford him a more enlarged field for the successful exercise and display of his abilities; and he entered on his new plan of life with his usual enthusiasm.

"I interrogated him," says Mr. Thistlethwaite, "as to the object of his views and expectations, and what mode of life he intended to pursue on his arrival in London." His answer was remarkable. "My first attempt," said he, "shall be in the literary way; the promises I have received are sufficient to dispel doubt; but should I, contrary to my expectation, find myself deceived, I will, in that case, turn Methodist preacher. Credulity is as potent a deity as ever; and a new sect may easily be devised. But if that too should fail me, my last and final resource is a pistol."

Before he quitted Bristol, he had entered deeply into politics, and had embraced the patriotic party. In March 1770, he wrote a satirical poem, called Kew Gardens, consisting of 1300 lines, against the Princess of Wales, Lord Bute, and their friends in London and Bristol; which has not been printed. He wrote also another political satire, called The Whore of Babylon, consisting of near 600 lines, which is in the possession of a friend of Mr. Catcott; an invective in prose against Bishop Newton, signed Decimus; and an indecent satirical poem, called The Exhibition, occasioned by the improper behaviour of a person in Bristol. Most of the surgeons in Bristol are delineated in it. Some of the descriptive passages in this poem have great merit. Thus speaking of a favourite organist, he says,

He keeps the passions with the found in play,
And the soul trembles with the trembling key.

In the latter end of April 1770, he bade his native city a final adieu. In a letter to his mother, dated April 20th, he describes, in a lively style, the little adventures of his journey, and his reception from his patrons, the bookellers and printers, with whom he had corresponded, Mr. Edmunds, Mr. Fell, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Doddsley, &c. From all of them he professes to have received great encouragement, that all approved of his design, and that he should probably be soon settled. He desires his mother to call upon Mr. Lambert. "Show him this," says he, with uncommon dignity and spirit, "or tell him, if I deserve a recommendation, he would oblige me to give me one; if I do not, it would be beneath him to take notice of me."

His first habitation, after his arrival in London, was at Mr. Walmsley's, a plasterer in Shore-ditch, to whom he was introduced by a relation of his, a Mrs. Ballance, who resided in the same house.

Of his first establishment his report is favourable. "I am settled," says he, in a letter to his mother, dated May 6. "and in such a settlement as I could desire. I get four guineas a month by one magazine, and shall engage to write a History of England, and other pieces, which will more than double that sum. Occasional Essays for the daily papers will more than support me. What a glorious prospect!"

In consequence of his engagements with the different magazines, we find him, about the same time, soliciting communications from his poetical and literary friends at Bristol, and desiring them to read the "Freeholder's Magazine."

In a letter dated May 14, he writes in the same high flow of spirits. He speaks of the great encouragement which genius meets with in London; adding with exultation, "If Rowley had been a Londoner, instead of a Bristolian, I might have lived by copying his works;" yet it does not appear that any of Rowley's pieces, except the Balade of Charity, were exhibited after he left Bristol. He exhorts his sister to "improve in copying music, drawing, and every thing which requires genius," observing, that although in Bristol's mercantile style those things may be useless, if not a detriment to her, here they are very profitable."

His engagements at that period appear to have been numerous; for, besides his employment in the magazines, he speaks of a connection he had formed with a doctor in music, to write songs for Ranelagh, Vauxhall, &c.; and, in a letter of the 30th to his sister, he mentions another with a book-feller, "the brother of a lord," (a Scotch one indeed,) to compile a voluminous history of London, to appear in numbers, for which he was to have his board at the bookfeller's house, and a handsome premium. "Assure yourself," he adds, "every month shall end to your advantage. I will send you two silks this summer. My mother shall not be forgotten."

Party-writing, however, seems to have been one of his favourite employments. It was agreeable to the satirical turn of his disposition, and it gratified his vanity, by the prospect of elevating him into immediate notice. When Mrs. Ballance recommended it to him to endeavour to get into some office, he told her, "he hoped, with the blessing of God, very soon to be sent prisoner to the Tower, which would make his fortune."

In his letter to his mother, May 6, he says, "Mr. Wilkes knew me by my writings since I first corresponded with the bookfellers here. I shall visit him next week. He affirmed that what Mr.

Fell had of mine could not be the writings of a youth, and expressed a desire to know the author. By means of another bookseller, I shall be introduced to Townsend and Sawbridge. I am quite familiar at the Chapter coffehoufe, and know all the genfuses there. A character is now unnecessary; an author carries his character in his pen."

He informs his sister, that if money flowed as fast upon him as honours, he would give her a portion of five thousand pounds. This extraordinary elevation of spirits arose from an introduction to the celebrated patriotic Lord Mayor, Beckford.

Chatterton had, it seems, addressed an essay to him, which was so well received, that it encouraged him to wait upon his Lordship, in order to obtain his approbation, to address a second letter to him, on the subject of the City Remonstrance. "His Lordship," adds he, "received me as politely as a citizen could, and warmly invited me to call upon him again. The rest is a secret."

His inclination, doubtless, led him to espouse the party of Opposition; but he complains that "no money is to be got on that side of the question; interest is on the other side; but he is a poor author who cannot write on both sides. I believe I may be introduced (or if I am not, I'll introduce myself) to a ruling power in the Court party."

When Beckford died, he is said to have been almost frantic, and to have exclaimed that he was ruined. He soled his grief, by writing an Elegy on his death, which contains more of frigid praise than ardent feeling.

Indeed, that he was serious in his intention of writing on both sides, and that he "alternately flattered and satirized all ranks and parties," is evident from the following list of pieces, written by him, but never published, which Lord Orford has preserved.

"The Flight: addressed to Lord Bute. In forty stanzas of six lines each. Thus indorsed: 'Too long for the Political Register—Curtailed in the digressions—Given to Mr. Mortimer.' Kew Gardens—A satirical rhapsody of some hundred lines in Churchill's manner, against persons in power. The Dowager, a Tragedy.—Unfinished—only two scenes. Verses addressed to the Rev. Mr. Catcott, on his Book on the Deluge: ridiculing his system and notions.---[inserted in the supplement to Chatterton's Miscellanies.] To a great Lady. A very scandalous address, signed Decimus. On the back of this is written, '(Jeremiah Dyson, Esq. by the Whisperer, 10s. 6d. a column).' To C. Jenkinson, Esq. an abusive letter, signed Decimus (or Probus, as it should seem from the indorsement): beginning thus: 'Sir, As the nation has been long in the dark in conjecturing the ministerial agent, &c.' To Lord Mansfield. A very abusive letter, signed Decimus (or Aeneas, as it should seem from the indorsement): beginning thus:—'My Lord, I am not going to accuse you of pusillanimity,' &c. In this piece many paragraphs are cancelled, with this remark on the margin: 'Prosecution will lie upon this.' An Introductory Essay to a political paper, set up by him, called the Moderator, in favour of administration: thus beginning, 'To enter into a detail of the reasons which induced me to take up the title of this paper,' &c. To Lord North; a letter signed the Moderator, and dated May 26. 1770: beginning thus:—'My Lord, It gives me a painful pleasure,' &c. This is an encomium on administration for rejecting the Lord Mayor Beckford's Remonstrance. A Letter to the Lord Mayor Beckford, signed Probus; dated May 26. 1770.—This is a violent abuse of government for rejecting the Remonstrance, and begins thus: 'When the endeavours of a spirited people to free themselves from an unsupportable slavery.'—On the back of this essay, which is directed to Cary, [a particular friend of Chatterton in Bristol,] is this indorsement: 'Accepted by Bingley, set for and thrown out of the North Briton, 21st June, on account of the Lord Mayor's death.

' Lost by his death, on this essay,	£. I II 6
' Gained in Elegies,	2 2 0
' ——— in Essays,	3 3 0
' Am glad he is dead by	3 13, 6

"Essays," he says to his sister, "on the patriotic side, fetch no more than what the copy is sold for. On the other hand, unpopular essays will not even be accepted, and you must pay to have them printed, but then you seldom lose by it. Courtiers are so sensible of their deficiency in merit, that they generally reward all who know how to daub them with an appearance of it."

On this sandy foundation of party writing, Chatterton erected a visionary fabric of future greatness. It was a common assertion with him, "that he would settle the world before he had done."

In a letter to his sister, July 20. he tells her, "My company is courted every where; and could I humble myself to go into a Compter, could have had twenty places before now; but I must be among the great; state matters suit me much better than commercial."

His taste for dissipation seems to have kept pace with the increase of his vanity. To frequent places of public amusement, he accounts as necessary to him as food. "I employ my money," says he, "now, in fitting myself fashionably, and getting into good company; this last article always brings me in interest."

In the letter to his mother, May 14. he says, "a gentleman who knows me at the Chapter, as an author, would have introduced me as a companion to the young Duke of Northumberland, in his intended general tour; but alas! I speak no language but my own." It is not very credible that he was likely to be accepted on so slender a ground of recommendation.

But his splendid visions of promotion and consequence soon vanished. Not long after his arrival in London, he writes to his mother, "The poverty of authors is a common observation, but not always a true one. No author can be poor who understands the arts of bookfellers; without this necessary knowledge, the greatest genius may starve, and with it the greatest dunce may live in splendor. This knowledge I have pretty much dipped into."

This knowledge, however, instead of conducting to opulence and independence, proved a delusive guide; and though he boasts of having pieces in the month of June 1770, in the "Gospel Magazine," the "Town and Country," the "Court and City," the "London," the "Political Register," &c., and that almost the whole "Town and Country" for July was his; yet it appears, so scanty is the remuneration for those periodical labours, that even these uncommon exertions of industry and genius were insufficient to ward off the approach of poverty; and he seems to have sunk at once from the highest elevation of hope and illusion, to the depths of despair.

Early in June, he removed his lodgings from Shore-ditch, to Mrs. Angel's, sackmaker in Brook-street, Holborn. Mr. Croft attributes the change to the necessity he was under, from the nature of his employments, of frequenting public places. It is probable that he might remove, lest Mr. Walmley's family, who had heard his frequent boasts, and observed his dreams of greatness, should be the spectators of his approaching indigence. Pride was the ruling passion of Chatterton; and a too acute sense of shame, is ever found to accompany literary pride.

But however desirous he might be of preserving appearances to the world, he was sufficiently lowered in his own expectations; when we find his towering ambition reduced to the miserable hope of securing the very ineleagible appointment of a surgeon's mate to Africa.

His resolution was announced in a poem to Miss Bubb. Probably, indeed, when he wrote the African Eclogues, which was just before, he might not be without a distant contemplation of a similar design; and perhaps we are to attribute a part of the exulting expressions which occur in the letter to his mother and sister, to the kind and laudable intention of making them happy, with respect to his prospects in life, since we find him, almost at the very crisis of his distress, sending a number of little unnecessary presents to them and his grandmother, while, perhaps, he was himself almost in want of the necessaries of life.

He applied, in his distress, to Mr. Barrett, for a recommendation to this unpromising station. On the score of incapacity probably, Mr. Barrett refused him the necessary recommendation, and his last hope was blasted.

Of Mrs. Angel, with whom he last resided, no inquiries have afforded any satisfactory intelligence; but there can be little doubt that his death was preceded by extreme indigence.

Mr. Croft, an apothecary in Brook-street, informed Mr. Warton, that when Chatterton lived in the neighbourhood, he frequently called at the shop, and was repeatedly pressed by Mr. Croft to dine or sup with him, in vain. One evening, however, human frailty so far prevailed over his dignity, as to tempt him to partake of the regale of a barrel of oysters, when he was observed to eat most voraciously.

Mrs. Wolfe, a barber's wife, within a few doors of the house where Mrs. Angel lived, has also afforded ample testimony, both to his poverty and his pride. She says, "that Mrs. Angel told her after his death, that on the 24th of August, as she knew he had not eaten any thing for two or three days, she begged he would take some dinner with her; but he was offended at her expressions, which seemed to hint that he was in want, and assured her he was not hungry."

"Over his death, for the sake of humanity," says Mr. Croft, "I would willingly draw a veil. But this must not be. They who are in a condition to patronise merit, and they who feel a conscientiousness of merit which is not patronised, may form their own resolutions from the catastrophe of his tale;—those to lose no opportunity of befriending genius; these to seize every opportunity of befriending themselves, and upon no account to harbour the most distant idea of quitting this world, however it may be unworthy of them, lest dependency should at last deceive them into so unpardonable a step."²

Chatterton, as appears by the Coroner's inquest, swallowed arsenic in water, on the 24th of August 1770, and died in consequence thereof, the next day, at the age of seventeen years and nine months. He was buried in a shell in the burying-ground of Shoe-lane work-house.

Whatever unfinished pieces he might have, he cautiously destroyed them before his death; and his room, when broken open, was found covered with little scraps of paper.

What must increase our regret for this hasty and unhappy step, is the information that the late Dr. Fry, head of St. John's College, Oxford, went to Bristol, to search into the history of Rowley and Chatterton, and to patronise the latter, if he appeared to deserve assistance. When, alas! all the intelligence he could procure, was, that Chatterton had, within a few days, destroyed himself.

The poems produced by Chatterton, at different times, under the names of Rowley, Canynge, &c. were purchased from Mr. Catcott and Mr. Barrett, and published by Thomas Tyrwhitt, Esq. the learned editor of Chaucer, in an octavo volume, 1777, with "a Preface, Introduction, and Glossary." Mr. Tyrwhitt added to the edition 1778, an "Appendix, containing some Observations upon the Language of the Poems, tending to prove, that they were written, not by any ancient author, but entirely by Chatterton." A very splendid edition was published in quarto, 1782, by Jeremiah Milles, D. D. Dean of Exeter, and President of the Society of Antiquaries, with "a Preliminary Dissertation and Commentary," tending to prove, that the poems were really written by Rowley and others, in the fifteenth century. His Miscellanies in Prose and Verse, collected from the Magazines, &c. with a sketch for Beckford's statue, a specimen of his abilities in the arts of drawing and design, were published in octavo, 1778, with a preface, signed J. B. dated Bristol, June 20.; and this publication was followed by a Supplement to the Miscellanies of Chatterton, 8vo, 1786. Besides these, there are many unpublished poems in the hands of his friends, and seventeen historical prose compositions and drawings, in the possession of Mr. Barrett. His poems, reprinted from Tyrwhitt's edition, 1777, the Miscellanies, 1778 and 1786, Croft's "Love and Madness," 1780, are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry.

The celebrated "Archæological Epistle to Dr. Milles," 4to, 1782, supposed to be written by Mason; a beautiful "Monody to the Memory of Chatterton," written by Mrs. Cowley; a "Sonnet to Expression," from the polished and pathetic pen of Miss Helen Maria Williams; an irregular "Ode," from "Rowley and Chatterton in the Shades," 8vo, 1782; and an elegant offering to the genius of Chatterton, from the "Gentleman's Magazine," 1782;—are inserted in this edition, with the double view of adorning the collection, and of gratifying the reader.

His character, compounded of good qualities and defects, may be easily collected from this account of his life. A few of his peculiarities remain to be mentioned. His person, like his genius, was premature: he had a manliness and dignity beyond his years, and there was something about him uncommonly prepossessing. His most remarkable feature was his eyes, which, though gray, were uncommonly piercing. When he was warmed in argument, or otherwise, they sparkled with fire; and one eye, it is said, was still more remarkable than the other. He had an uncommon ardour in the pursuit of knowledge, and uncommon facility in the attainment of it. It was a favourite maxim with him, that "man is equal to any thing, and that every thing might be achieved by diligence and abstinence." If any uncommon character was mentioned in his hearing, "all boy as he was," says Mr. Croft, "he would only observe, that the person in question merited praise; but that God had sent his creatures into the world with arms long enough to reach any thing, if they would be a the trouble of extending them." "He had read," he himself tells us, "more than Magliabechi, though he spoke no tongue but his own." He probably might have acquired some knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and French languages; but it cannot be supposed to have been very extensive.

When we consider the variety of his engagements while at Bristol, his extensive reading, and the great knowledge he had acquired of the ancient language of his native country, we cannot wonder that he had not time to occupy himself in the study of other languages; and after his arrival in London, he had a new and necessary science to learn, the world; and that he made the most advantageous use of his time, is evident from the extensive knowledge of mankind, displayed in the different essays which he produced in the periodical publications. His lively and vigorous imagination contributed, doubtless, to animate him with that spirit of enterprise, which led him to form so many impracticable and visionary schemes, for the acquisition of fame and fortune. His ambition was evident from his earliest youth; and perhaps the inequality of his spirits might, in a great measure, depend upon the fairness of his views, or the dissipation of his projects. Mr. Catcott left him one evening totally depressed; but he returned the next morning with unusual spirits. He said, "he had sprung a mine," and produced the Spryter, a poem, in the possession of Mr. Barrett. His natural melancholy was not corrected by the irreligious principles which he had so unfortunately imbibed. But he is not convicted of any immoral or dishonest act in consequence of his speculative opinions. The preservatives of which he was possessed against the contagion of vice, and the criminal excesses of the passions, were the pride of genius, the enthusiasm of literature, and that delicacy of sentiment which taste and reading inspire. To the regularity of his conduct during his residence at Bristol, some respectable testimonies have been already exhibited. After his arrival in London, there are some proofs in his favour, which ought not to be disregarded. During a residence of nine weeks at Mr. Walmley's, he never staid out beyond the family hours, except one night, when Mrs. Ballance knew that he lodged in the house of a relation.

The list of his virtues appears to exceed the catalogue of his faults. His temperance was in some respects exemplary. He seldom eat animal food, and never tasted any strong or spiritous liquors. He lived chiefly on a morsel of bread or a tart, with a draught of water. His high sense of dignity has been already noticed. But the most amiable feature in his character, was his generosity and attachment to his mother and relations. Every fortunate project for his advancement in life was accompanied with promises and encouragement to them: while in London he continued to send them presents, at a time when he was known himself to be in want: and indeed the unremitting attention, kindness, and respect, which appear in the whole of his conduct towards them, are deserving the imitation of persons in more fortunate circumstances. It can never be sufficiently lamented that this amiable principle was not more uniform in Chatterton. A real love for his relations ought to have arrested the hand of suicide; but when religion is lost, all uniformity of principle is lost.

He had a number of friends; and, notwithstanding his disposition to satire, is scarcely known to have had any enemies. By the accounts of all who were acquainted with him, there was something uncommonly insinuating in his manner and conversation. Mr. Cross informed Mr. Warton, that in Chatterton's frequent visits, while he resided in Brook-street, he found his conversation, a little infidelity excepted, most captivating. His extensive, though in many instances, superficial knowledge, united with his genius, wit, and fluency, must have admirably accomplished him for the pleasures of society. His pride, which perhaps should rather be termed the strong consciousness of intellectual excellence, did not destroy his affability. He was always accessible, and rather forward to make acquaintance, than apt to decline the advances of others. There is reason, however, to believe, that the inequality of his spirits affected greatly his behaviour in company. His fits of absence were frequent and long. He would often look stedfastly in a person's face without speaking, or seeming to see the person for a quarter of an hour, or more. Mr. Walmley's nephew (Chatterton's bedfellow during the last six weeks he lodged there) told Mr. Cross, that, notwithstanding his pride and haughtiness, it was impossible to help liking him;—that, to his knowledge, he never slept while they lay together; that he never came to bed till very late, sometimes three or four o'clock and was always awake when he (the nephew) awaked, and got up at the same time, about five six; and that almost every morning the floor was covered with pieces of paper, not so big as pences, into which he had torn what he had been writing before he came to bed.

He had one ruling passion which governed his whole conduct, and that was his desire of literary fame; this passion intruded itself on every occasion, and absorbed his whole attention. Whether he would have continued to improve, or the contrary, must have depended, in some measure, on the circumstances of his future life. Had he fallen into profligate habits and connections, he would probably have lost a great part of his ardour for study, and his maturer-age would only have diminished the admiration, which the efforts of his childhood have so justly excited.

As a poet, his genius will be most completely estimated by his writings. His imagination was more fertile than correct; and he seems to have erred, rather through haste and negligence than through any deficiency of taste. He was above that puerile affectation which pretends to borrow nothing. He knew that original genius consists in forming new and happy combinations, rather than in searching after thoughts and ideas which never had occurred before. He possessed the strongest marks of a vigorous imagination, and a sound judgment in forming great, consistent, and ingenious plots, and in making choice of the most interesting subjects. His genius, like Dryden's, was universal. It will be difficult to say, whether he excelled most in the sublime, the pathetic, the descriptive, or the satirical. Whatever subject is treated by him, is marked with the hand of a master, with the enthusiasm of the poet, and the judgment of the critic.

His poems abound with luxuriant description, vivid imagery, and striking metaphors. Through the veil of ancient language, a happy adaptation of words is still apparent, and a style both energetic and expressive. They are equally conspicuous for the harmony and elegance of the verse; and some passages are inferior, in none of the essentials of poetry, to the most finished productions in our language.

It must not, however, be dissembled, that some part of the charm of his compositions may probably result from the Gothic sublimity of the style. We gaze with wonder on an antique fabric; and, when novelty of thought is not to be obtained, the novelty of the language, to which we are unaccustomed, is frequently accepted as a substitute. Even Shakspeare and Milton have derived advantages from the antique structure of some of their most admired passages. The facility of composition is also greatly increased, where full latitude is permitted in the use of an obsolete dialect, since an author is indulged in the occasional use of both the old and the modern phraseology; and if the one does not supply him with the word for which he has immediate occasion, the other, in all probability, will not disappoint him. Thus, in the Song to Ælla, the poet had in one line written,

Beefprengedd all the mees with gore.

In a subsequent stanza he writes,

Orr seest the hatchedd stede
Yprauuceyng oer the mead.

Mees being the ancient word, and mead the modern English one, he thought himself at liberty to write modern English whenever rhyme required him to do so. The use of the Anglo-Saxon prefix y, as yprauuceyng, for prauuceyng, enables him to write a smooth line in any given number of syllables. The imagery and metaphors in this style of poetry, are frequently very common-place, and it is possible to labour through several stanzas, without finding any striking beauty, when the attention of the reader is kept alive by the subject alone. Many defects of style, and many passages of rant and bombast, are concealed or excused by the appearance of antiquity.

The piece of most conspicuous merit among the compositions of Chatterton, is Ælla, a Tragycal Enterlude; which is a most complete and well-written tragedy, upon the model of Mason's "Elfrida" and "Caractacus." The plot is both interesting and full of variety, though the dialogue is in some places tedious. The character of Celmonde reminds us of Glenalvon in "Douglas," but is better drawn. His soliloquy is beautiful and characteristic. The first chorus, or Mynstrelles Song, is a perfect pastoral. It contains a complete plot or fable, and abounds in poetical and tender sentiments, and apposite imagery. Thomson's Masque of "Alfred" probably suggested the idea of a Danish story. For converting Hubba into Hurra, he might have his reasons. The raven standard of the Danes, to which he alludes, is poetically described by Thomson.

The imperfect tragedy of Goddwyn, as well as Ælla, is indebted to the Grecian school, revived in the eighteenth century. Both are the effusions of a young mind, warm from studying "Elfrida" and "Caractacus." The beauties of poetry are scattered through them with no sparing hand. The fine ode or chorus in Goddwyn, rivals, if not exceeds any thing of that kind we have in Mason, or even in Gray or Collins. In the animated portrait of Freedom, and the group of her attendants, Affright, Power, War, Envy, &c. both Sackville and Spenser must yield the palm of allegoric poetry.

When Freedom dreſte in blodde-ſteyned veſte,
 To every knyghte her warre ſonge ſunge;
 Uponne her hedde wyldc wedes were ſprede;
 A gorie anlaſe bye her hunge,
 She daunced onne the heathe,
 She heard the voice of deathie;
 Pale-cyned affryghte, his harte of ſylver huc,
 In vayne aſſayled her boſomme to acale;
 She heardc onſtemed the ſhrieking voice of woc,
 And ſadneſſe in the owlette ſhake the dale.
 She ſhooke the burlcd ſpeere,
 On hie ſhe jeſte her ſheelde,
 Her foemen all appere,
 And ſiizze along the ſeelde, &c.

The Fiſt part of the Battle of Haſtings, which he confeſſed he had written himſelf, when he was taken by ſurpriſe, though at other times he preſerved a degree of conſiſtence in his falſehood, contains an unvaried recital of wounds and deaths, with little of intereſt curioſity, or engage the tender paſſions, and but few of the beauties of poetry to relieve the mind from the diſgultiſt ſubject. In the Second Part, with the ſame faults, there is more of poetical deſcription, more of nature, more of character. The imagery is more animated; the incidents more varied. The character of Tancarville is well drawn; and the ſpirit of candour and humanity which pervades it, is unparalleled in any writer before the age of Shakspeare. The whole epiſode of Girtba is well conducted; and the altercation between him and his brother Harold is intereſting. The following deſcription of morning is exquisitely beautiful, and the verſification muſical and pleaſing. The eight line is a ſtriking imitation of a line of Milton's; "Scatters the rear of darkneſs thin."

And now the greic-eyd morne with v'lets dreſt,
 Shaking the dewdrops on the ſlourie meedes,
 Flede with her roſie radiance to the weſt:
 Forth from the eaſterne gatte the fierie ſteedes
 Of the bright ſunne awaytynge ſpirits leede:
 The ſunne, in fierie pompe enthroned on hie,
 Swyfter than thoughte alonge hys jerne gledes,
 And ſcatters nyghtes remaynes from oute the ſkie;
 He ſawe the armies make for bloudie fraie,
 And ſtopt his driving ſteedes, and hid his lyghtſome raye,

The deſcription of Salisbury Plain is picturesque and animated. In that part of it which relates to the worſhip of the ancient Brutens, Mr. Tyrwhitt propoſes to ſubſtitute eyctimes for eyctualle, an ingenious, but perhaps unneceſſary emendation. The ſtanza of Prior was his model for verſification, in this poem, as well as the Tournament, &c. The origin and uſe of Stoneenge, he might find in modern works. Though he could have no acceſs to Malmesbury, and other Latin chroniclers, he might take many particulars from Hollinſhed, who has tranſlated them. The names of the Norman warriors he might find in Fuller's "Church Hiſtory." He had but few Saxon names to which he might refer; of the Normans, he had a liſt of eight hundred. He borrowed his Homeric images from the verſions of Chapman and Pope, in the latter of which he found theſe alluſions dreſſed out in all the ſplendid ornaments of the eighteenth century. The prolix circumſtantial compariſon, which did not exiſt in the ſixteenth century, but was imported into our poetry by Spenser, affords a proof, excluding all impoſition, that the Battle of Haſtings is the forgery of Chatterton.

The interlude of the Tournament has ſome beautiful and nervous lines; particularly the deſcription of Battayle and Pleaſure, in the chorus of Minſtrelles, that opens with—When Battayle, meſtbynge, &c. Compare this with Collins's "Ode to Mercy," and the marks of imitation will be ſufficiently evident.

The Briſtove Tragedy, or the Deſte of Syr Charles Barudin, has little but its pathetic ſimplicity to recommend it. It has nothing ingenious in the plot, or ſtriking in the execution. It is, however, clear and intelligible; and ranks with the beſt imitations of the ancient tragic ballad.

The Eclagues are not inferior to the beſt compositions of that kind, either ancient or modern. The fiſt paſtoral bears a remote reſemblance to the fiſt eclogue of Virgil, and contains a beautiful and pathetic picture of the ſtate of England during the civil wars between the houſes of York and Lancaſter. The thoughts and images are all truly paſtoral; and it is impoſſible to read it without experiencing those lively, yet melancholy feelings, which a true delineation of nature alone can inspire. The second pastoral is an eulogium on the actions of Richard I. in the Holy Land. It is supposed to be sung by a young shepherd, whose father is absent in the Holy War; and the burden is happily imagined.

Sprytes of the blest, and every seyncte ydedde,
Pour out your pleasaunce on my fadre's hedde.

Before he has concluded his song, he is cheered by the sight of the vessel, in which his father returns victorious. The third pastoral is chiefly to be admired for its excellent morality. It is, however, enlivened by a variety of appropriate imagery, and many of the ornaments of true poetry. The last of these pastorals, called Elinoure and Juga, is one of the finest pathetic tales in our language. The complaint of two young females lamenting their lovers slain in the wars of York and Lancaster, was one of the happiest subjects that could be chosen for a tragic pastoral. The beautiful stanza beginning No moe the misthynette shall wake the morne, seems to be an imitation of a stanza in Gray's "Elegy."

The Songe to Ælla is an admirable specimen of his abilities in lyric composition. The following stanza is eminently beautiful.

O thou, where'er (thie bones att reste)
Thye spryte to haunte delyghteth beste,
Whether uponne the blood embrewed pleyne,
Orr whare thou kennst from farre
The dyfmal crye of warre,
Orr feest sonne mountain made of corfe of sleyne.

Those who can suppose that this stanza was written in the fifteenth century, must be very little acquainted with the style and manner of our poetry in that period. Only change the orthography, and it is perfectly modern.

O thou, where'er (thy bones at rest)
Thy sprite to haunt delighteth best,
Whether upon the blood embrued plain,
Or where thou kenn'st from far
The dismal cry of war,
Or feest some mountain made of corpse of slain.

The original MS. is written in long lines, like a prose composition, as was usual three hundred years ago, when parchment was scarce; but it was surely less difficult to write it on parchment, in "lines not kept distinct in the manner of prose," than to be the author of it.

The Balade of Charitie is an imitation of the most beautiful and affecting of our Saviour's parables, the good Samaritan. The poetical descriptions are truly picturesque. We feel the horror of the dark cold night; we see the big drops fall, and the full flocks driving o'er the plain; the welkin opens, and the yellow lightning flies; the thunder's rattling sound moves slowly on, and, swelling, bursts into a violent crash, shakes the high spire, &c. The note which accompanied this pastoral to the publisher of the "Town and Country Magazine," is dated Bristol, July 4. 1770, only a month before his death. "If the glossary annexed to the following piece will make the language intelligible, the sentiment, description, and versification, are highly deserving the attention of the literati." In addition to the internal proofs that it was a composition of the day, the following stanza, in which he alludes to his own deserted situation, carries melancholy conviction to the mind that it was the composition of Chatterton.

Look in his glommed face, his sprighte there scanne;
Howe woe-be-gone, how withered, forwynd, deade!
Haste to thie church-glebe-houfe, afshrewed manne!
Haste to thie kiste, thie onlie dortoure bedde.
Calc, as the claie whiche will gre on thie hedde,
Is charitie and love aminge highe elves;
Knightis and Barons live for pleasure and themselves.

The smaller pieces are not without merit. There is much elegant satire in the two Epistles to Canynge prefixed to Ælla; and some strokes of pleasantry in the Storie of Canynge.

The poems contained in the Miscellanies and Supplement, acknowledged by Chatterton to be his own composition, have been thought inferior to those which he produced as written by Rowley. If there is any inequality, at least the same hand appears in both. Imagination in a young mind is not always just. Rowley has his faults as well as Chatterton; but both collections contain an imagery of the same sort. If some of Chatterton's avowed pieces are scarcely to be inspected with all the severity of criticism, it should be remembered, that the poems attributed to Rowley are by no means uniformly excellent. It should also be remembered, that Chatterton lavished all his powers on the counterfeit Rowley, with whom he intended to astonish or deceive the world; that the pieces he produced as written by him, were composed with one uniform object in view, and in a state of leisure and repose. "In his own character," says Mr. Croft, "he painted for booksellers' and bread, in Rowley's for fame and eternity." Considerable allowance ought to be made for the exercises of his infantine years; for the incorrect effusions of momentary resentment; for a few lines thrown together in a playful mood to please an illiterate female, or to amuse a schoolfellow, and perhaps not less for the hasty and involuntary productions of indigence and necessity, constructed for a magazine, and calculated for the sole purpose of procuring a subsistence.

His Miscellanies contain the same even and flowing versification as the others, the same strokes of uncommon spirit and imagination, and, in general, display the same premature abilities. "Nothing in Chatterton," says Lord Orford, "can be separated from Chatterton. His noblest flights, his sweetest strains, his grossest ribaldry, and his most common-place imitations of the productions of magazines, were all the effluences of the same ungovernable impulse, which,ameleon-like, imbibed the colours of all it looked on. It was Ossian, or a Saxon monk, or Gray, or Smollett, or Junius; and if it failed most in what it affected most, to be a poet of the fifteenth century, it was because it could not imitate what had not existed."

In the Elegy on Thomas Philips, of Fairford, probably his old master, there are some descriptive stanzas not unworthy of the author of Ellis, and the incomparable chorus of Goddwyn.

Pale rugged winter bending o'er his tread,
His grizzled hair bedropt with icy dew;
His eyes, a dusky light, congeal'd and dead;
His robe, a tinge of bright ethereal blue:

His train, a motley'd, sanguine, sable cloud,
He limps along the ruffet dreary moor;
Whilst rising whirlwinds, blasting, keen, and loud,
Roll the white surges to the sounding shore.

Fancy, whose various figure-tinctur'd vest,
Was ever changing to a different hue;
Her head, with varied bays and flow'rets dress'd,
Her eyes, two spangles of the morning dew, &c.

That he was capable of writing on a religious subject, with great appearance of devotion, is evident from his Ode on Resignation, first published in "Love and Madness," in which we scarcely know, whether most to admire the piety of the sentiments, or the beauty of the poetry. The last stanza is eminently beautiful.

His African Eclogues, though unconnected and unequal, contain some excellent lines; the following occur almost at the beginning of the first, and are animated, expressive, and harmonious:

High from the ground the youthful warriors sprung,
Loud on the concave shell the lances rung;
In all the mystic mazes of the dance,
The youths of Banny's burning sands advance;
Whilst the soft virgin panting looks behind,
And rides upon the pinions of the wind.

The simile in the second eclogue, beginning, So when arriv'd at Gaigra's highest steep, &c., is not perfectly correct; but the liveliness of the description evinces a most vigorous imagination.

Of the poem On Happiness, inserted in "Love and Madness," Mr. Croft tells us, "that Catcott, talking one day with Chatterton about happiness, Chatterton said, he had never yet thought on the subject; but that he would. The next day he brought Catcott these lines, and told him they contained his creed of happiness." The poem, consisting of upwards of a hundred lines, is undoubtedly irreligious; but it bears the strongest marks of genius, sagacity, and acuteness, and convinces us of the great extent and variety of his abilities.

The poem, called Apollate Will, written when he was eleven years and almost five months old, appears to have been aimed at somebody who had formerly been a Methodist, and was lately promoted in the Established Church. It shows the early turn and bent of his genius to satire, which was his fort, if any thing can be called his fort, who excelled in every thing he undertook; and that he was then no stranger to the works of Bingham, Young, and Stillingfleet, which were probably among the books of divinity, mentioned in his sister's letter.

The Confusiad, a political piece, written at Bristol, and in the highest strain of party scurrility, has some strokes of satire in a superior style. The introductory lines are animated and poetical. The Prophecy, written apparently a short time after, is in the best style of Swift, and appears to be the genuine effusion of that enthusiastic love of liberty, which generally takes possession of young and sanguine dispositions.

The satire of Chatterton has the poignancy and sometimes the coarseness of Churchill. Dryden and Pope seem to have been his models for versification; but he has more of the luxuriance, fluency, and negligence of Dryden, than of the terseness and refinement of Pope.

In his Saxon Poems, written in the style of Ossian, he has not improved upon an indifferent model. They are full of wild imagery and inconsistent metaphor, with little either of plot or of character to recommend them.

Of the prose compositions of Chatterton, the Adventures of a Star, the Memoirs of a Sad Dog, the Hunter of Oddities, Tony Selwood's Letter, &c. display considerable knowledge of what is called the town, and demonstrate the keenness of his observation, and his quickness in acquiring any branch of knowledge, or in adapting himself to any situation. A considerable fund of reading in Magazines, Reviews, &c. which Mr. Warton observes, "form the school of the people," had prepared him well to exercise the profession of a periodical writer.

Antiquities, however, constituted his favourite study, and in them his genius always appears to the greatest advantage; even the most humorous of his pieces, Tony Selwood's Letter, derives its principal excellence from his knowledge of ancient customs. In the Christmas Games, which are acknowledged to be his own, and in his Essay on Sculpture, there is much of that peculiar learning in British antiquities, which was necessary to lay the foundation of Rowley's poems. His Will, written before he left Bristol, throws much light on his real character, his acquaintance with old English writers, and his capability of understanding and imitating old French and Latin inscriptions, not indeed grammatically, but sufficient to answer the purposes to which he often applied this knowledge. From this writing, it appears, that he would not allow David to have been a holy man, from the strains of piety and devotion in his Psalms, because a great genius can affect any thing, that is, assume any character and mode of writing he pleases. This is an answer from Chatterton himself, to one argument, and a very powerful one, in support of the authenticity of Rowley's poems. The pieces signed Asaphides, do not appear to be Chatterton's. He almost always signed himself D. B., the initials of his first Latin signature, Dunhelmus Bristolensis. The story of Maria Friendless, which Chatterton himself sent to the "Town and Country Magazine," probably for the sake of obtaining an immediate and necessary supply of money, is almost a literal transcript of the Letter of Misella in the "Rambler."

So versatile, so extensive, so commanding was his genius, that he forged history, architecture, and heraldry. He wrote also a Manks Tragedy, which, if his forgeries had met with a more favourable reception than they did, he would doubtless have produced as an ancient composition. With the ardour of true genius, he aspired

————— petere inde coronam,
Unde prius nulli velarint tempora muse.

The reputation of Chatterton does not rest solely on those works which he acknowledged as his own. His fairest claim to immortality is founded on the poems attributed to Rowley, which it seems now to be generally acknowledged were really of his own composition. The controversy which their publication excited is brought to an issue. The generality of the learned, since they were put in the plain track of inquiry, have acquiesced in the decision of the advocates for Chatterton's title. The conscious silence of the defenders of their antiquity sufficiently shows that little can be opposed to the proofs brought in support of his title to them.

A state of the controversy, which, both on account of its novelty and its merit, is the most curious and extraordinary, which, since the days of Bentley and Boyle, has divided the literary world, claims a place in the life of Chatterton; and the reader will not be inclined to consider it as unimportant, nor deem it unworthy of such particular and elaborate discussion, when he peruses a list of the publications on both sides, and perceives that it has been honoured with the attention of gentlemen of the first erudition in the republic of letters, and reflects, that its determination affects not only the reputation of Chatterton, but "the great lines of the history of English poetry."

On the side of the question which asserts the authenticity of the poems, are the names of Langhorne (Monthly Review, 1777), Milles (Commentary, &c. 1782), Bryant (Observations, &c. 1782), Greene (Strictures on Malone, Warton, &c. 1782), Matthias (Essay on the Evidence, &c. 1783), and the author of "Observations on Rowley, and Remarks on Tyrwhitt's Appendix" (1782). The "Gentleman's Magazine" (1777) was on the same side. The "Critical Review" (1777) gave extracts, but no opinion. Dr. Gregory (Life of Chatterton, 1789) gives an abstract of the arguments on both sides, but no verdict of his own. He leans to the same side; but his candour and modesty exempt him from being considered as a partizan.

The publications of Dr. Milles and Mr. Bryant have been justly considered, not only as the most voluminous, but as the first, in point of learning and ingenuity, on this side of the question. Langhorne himself, a poet, "on first opening the poems," concluded "that they were mock ruins." Upon the testimony of Mr. Catcott, &c. he pronounced them "the original productions of Rowley, with many alterations and interpolations by Chatterton." Mr. Matthias has delineated the leading objects of the controversy with great accuracy, perspicuity, and elegance. Though he himself espouses the authenticity of the poems, yet his book, having so strongly and faithfully represented the arguments on the other side of the question, is more calculated to overthrow than to confirm his own opinion. The objection is too forcible for the answer.

The arguments which the advocates of Rowley advance, are the asseverations of Chatterton, whom they themselves calumniate as "unprincipled," and who indeed contradicted himself in the very outset of his adventure; the testimonies of his friends, who thought him incapable of writing the poems; partial quotations from the poems, for a display of antiquated words and obscure expressions; quotations still more partial, from one or two old English poets, in order to show how possible it was for them to produce, now and then, an harmonious coincidence of words; and the incompetency of Chatterton, both as to his genius and acquired knowledge, to this literary fraud.

"They who are willing," says Dr. Milles, "to think Chatterton's time and abilities equal to all that is attributed to him, must consider the great compass and variety of knowledge necessary to qualify him for so extensive a forgery. He must have been conversant, to a certain degree, with the language of our ancient poets, with the meaning and inflexion of their words, and with the rules of grammar which they observed. He must have formed a vocabulary from their books, which must have been previously read and understood by him, as the groundwork of his imitation, and undoubtedly the most difficult part of the undertaking."

To the truth of these observations, an advocate for Chatterton may in a great degree subscribe, without being convinced that he was unequal to the task in question. Chatterton was an extraordinary instance of prematurity of abilities, such as Wotton, Barretier, Pfalmanazar, Crichton, Servin, &c. Common glossaries and dictionaries, Speght, Kersey, Bailey, &c. furnished him with most of the obsolete terms which he has introduced, and common histories, Geoffry of Monmouth, Hollinshed, Fox, Fuller, Camden, &c. with most of the facts he has alluded to.

The leading object of Mr. Bryant's work is to prove, that Chatterton could not have been the author of the poems; because, in a variety of instances, he appeared not to understand them. There is something specious in this plea; but the learned writer has egregiously failed in his proofs. He has invented "meanings never meant," and discovered allusions never intended; and, deluded by his own fancy, has made the most whimsical hypotheses the ground of his argument; so that, because Chatterton did not anticipate his conjectures, he must be ignorant of Rowley's meaning! This is to make the error, in order to correct it. Chatterton undoubtedly mistook the meaning of several words; but the mistake equally concerns the poet and the glossarist. Mr. Bryant would confine every mistake, both as to words and things, to the last; and produces a list of upwards of fifty terms to "demonstrate" his proposition; but his reasonings, in almost every instance, are futile, and his inferences forced and unnatural. Speght, Kersey, and Bailey, in whom Chatterton confided, will explain the whole.

The observations of Mr. Matthias on the power of genius, and what he calls the capability of the English language, carry little force or conviction with them. His example is Homer. The case of Rowley and Homer is exceedingly different. We have real ground to proceed on when we speak of the poetry of Rowley's age; but nothing better than imaginary, when speaking of the age of Homer. The ancients were convinced that Homer had some models to guide him; and it is highly reasonable to suppose it. But the point in dispute is not, whether Rowley might not have been superior to every other poet of his day, but whether there is any ground in reason to suppose, or whether experience will warrant the supposition, that he should be essentially and almost totally different in language, in mode of composition, in harmony, in metre, in allusions, in references, in observations, in sentiment, and in every thing that falls within the compass of what is called taste, from not only a few, but from all the writers of his own and of every preceding age? The defenders of Rowley must assent to this proposition in its fullest extent; a proposition to which the mind almost instinctively revolts, and which the experience of mankind universally contradicts.

Among the advocates of Chatterton, are the names of Tyrwhitt (Appendix to the octavo edition of Rowley, 1777, and Vindication of the Appendix, 1782), Croft (Love and Madness, 1780), Scott (Gentleman's Magazine, 1777, and Poetical Works, 1782), the Earl of Orford (Two Letters printed at Strawberry-hill, 1779), Badcock (Monthly Review, 1782), Warton (Hist. of English Poetry, vol. 2. and Inquiry, &c. 1782). Malone (Curfory Observations, 1782); Gray, Mason, Hayley, Pye, Preston, Percy, Mickle, Headley, Johnson, Knox, Dyer, &c. The "Critical Review" (1782), and "Gentleman's Magazine" (1782), joined the party, which denies the authenticity of the poems.

The publications of Mr. Warton, Mr. Tyrwhitt, Mr. Malone, and the masterly critique of Mr. Badcock, have deservedly been considered as the first, in point of consequence, on this side of the question, and indeed decisive of the controversy.

"Insignificant as it may seem," says Mr. Warton, "the determination of this question AFFECTS THE GREAT LINES OF THE HISTORY OF POETRY, AND EVEN OF GENERAL LITERATURE." If it should at last be decided, that these poems were really written so early as the reign of King Edward IV., the entire system that hath been framed concerning the prepossession of poetical composition, and every theory that has been established on the gradual improvement of taste, style, and language, will be shaken and disarranged."

The first serious objection which occurs, against the authenticity of the poems, is, that Chatterton never could be prevailed upon to produce more than four of the originals, the Challenge to Lydgate, the Song to Ælla, and Lydgate's Answer, contained in one parchment, and the account of W. Canynge's Feast, the Epitaph on Robert Canynge, and part of the Story of W. Canynge; the whole not containing more than 124 verses. If he had been in possession of the original MSS. of Ælla, Battle of Hastings, &c. what should have hindered his producing them? If he wished to give credit to his pretensions, how could he better have effected his purpose than by showing his originals? What could have been his motive for destroying them, upon the supposition of his having possessed them? This question was never answered. The fact was, Chatterton confined his attempts at forging MSS. to smaller pieces; but in these he failed. How much more would he have failed in poems of any considerable length? The attempt was too daring even for his adventurous pen.

The first parchment, containing 66 verses, has since been lost; but there can be no difficulty in pronouncing it a forgery, as the correspondence itself, between Lydgate and the supposed Rowley, is plainly fictitious. Dr. Milles says, "that the hand in which the story of Canynge is written, is somewhat different from the Account of Canynge's Feast;" and Mr. Tyrwhitt adds, "that the hand in which the Epitaph on Robert Canynge is written, differs entirely from both." They could not both, therefore, have been written by Rowley. The archetype of the fac simile of Canynge's Feast is evidently a forgery. It contains no species of handwriting that ever existed in any age, and could only have been read by the person who wrote it.

The very existence of any such person as Rowley is questioned, and upon good grounds. He is not so much as noticed by William of Wycestre, who lived about the supposed time of Rowley, was himself of Bristol, and makes frequent mention of Canynge. "Bale," says Lord Orford, "who lived near two hundred years nearer to Rowley than we, and who, by unwearied industry, dug a thousand bad authors out of obscurity," has never taken the least notice of such a person; nor yet Leland, Pitts, or Tanner, nor indeed any other literary biographer. That no copies of any of his works should exist, but those deposited in Redcliffe church, is also an unaccountable circumstance not easy to be surmounted. The manner in which they are said to have been preserved is improbable. That title deeds, relating to the church, or even historical records, might be lodged in the munitment room of Redcliffe church, is sufficiently probable; but that poems should have been consigned to a chest with six keys, kept in a private room, with title deeds and conveyances, and that these keys should be intrusted, not to the heads of a college or any literary society, but to aldermen and churchwardens, is a supposition replete with absurdity; and the improbability is increased, when we consider, that these very papers passed through the hands of persons of some literature, of Chatterton's father in particular, who had a taste for poetry, and yet without the least discovery of their intrinsic value. No writings, or chest, deposited in Redcliffe church, are mentioned in Mr. Canynge's will, which has been carefully inspected; nor any books, except two, called "Ligers cum integra legenda," which he leaves to be used occasionally in the choir, by the two chaplains established by him.

To account for Chatterton's extensive acquaintance with old books, out of the line of common reading, Mr. Warton observes, that the Old Library at Bristol, was, during his lifetime, of universal access, and Chatterton was actually introduced to it by the Rev. Mr. Catcott, who wrote on the "Deluge," the brother of Mr. George Catcott the pewterer. He adds, that Mr. Catcott, the clergyman, always looked on Chatterton's pretensions with suspicion, and regarded the poems, which he attributed to Rowley, as the spurious productions of his own pen.

Chatterton's account of Canynge, &c. as far as it is countenanced by William of Wyrcestre (that is, as far as it respects his taking orders, and paying a fine to the king;), may be found in the epitaph on Master Canynge, still remaining to be read by every person, both in Latin and English, in Redcliffe Church, which indeed appears to be the authority that William of Wyrcestre himself has followed.

Chatterton's account also of Redcliffe steeple, is to be found at the bottom of a print of that church, published in 1746, by one John Halfpenny, "in which," says Mr. Tyrwhitt, "was recounted the ruin of the steeple in 1446, by a tempest and fire."

As to the old vellum, or parchment on which Chatterton transcribed his fragments, Mr. Malone observes, that "at the bottom of each sheet of old deeds (of which there were many in the Bristol chest), there is usually a blank space of about four or five inches in breadth;" and this exactly agrees with the shape and size of the longest fragment which he has exhibited, viz. eight and a half inches long, and four and a half broad. Mr. Ruddall attests that Chatterton practised experiments to give the ink and parchments which he produced the colour and the stain of antiquity.

In point of style, composition, sentiment, and versification, the poems of Rowley are infinitely superior to every other production of the century which is said to have produced them.

It was easy for Chatterton to copy ancient words, but it was by no means so easy for him to copy ancient style. Here lies the mean defect in the imposition; and by this, and this alone, the controversy may be fairly decided to the satisfaction of every person of taste and judgment. The old words thickly laid on, form an antique crust on the language, which at first view imposes on the view; but which, on examination, appears not to belong originally to it. It was put on the better to cover the imposition; but like most impositions, it is overloaded with disguise, and discovers itself by the very means which were designed to hide it. The language is too ancient for the date of the poems. It is only necessary to refer the reader to the "Palton Letters," published by Sir John Fenn, to the "Nut-brown Maid," to the "Prophecies," printed at London in 1533, all works coeval with the supposed Rowley, to convince him that the language was at that time completely different from Chatterton's forgery. The papers of state in the reign of Henry VI. are as modern and good English as those of Henry VIII. It is not the language of any particular period, or particular province. The words are Saxon and Anglo-Saxon, and Scottish and English. We have provincial terms of the north and of the south; we have Chaucer, and Pope, and Skelton, and Gray, and that frequently within the short compass of a single verse. The diction and versification are at perpetual variance. He borrowed his ancient language, not from the usage of common life, but from lexicographers, and copied their mistakes. He has even introduced words which never made a part of the English language, and which are evidently the coinage of fancy, analogy, or mistake.

The style is evidently modern. Our old English poets are minute and particular; they do not deal in abstraction and general exhibition, but even in the course of narration or description dwell on realities. But the counterfeit Rowley adopts ideal terms and artificial modes of telling a fact, and too frequently falls into metaphor, metaphysical imagery, and incidental personification. The poets of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries abound in unnatural conceptions, strange imaginations, capricious extravagancies, and even the most ridiculous inconsistencies. But Rowley's poems present us with no incongruous combinations, no mixture of manners, constitutions, usages, and characters. They contain no violent or gross improprieties. One of the striking characteristics of old English poetry is a continued tenor of disparity. In Gower, Chaucer, and Lydgate, elegant descriptions, ornamental images, &c. bear no proportion to pages of languour and mediocrity, affected conceits of expression, dull and frite reflections, or tedious and unadorned narratives. The poems of Rowley are uniformly good. They are the productions, not only of genius but of taste; a taste which could not possibly have been acquired on a sudden, or by any spontaneous efforts, or by a penetration or feeling which anticipated the improvements of a polished age, but by an intimate acquaintance with the manners and sentiments of the present times, and a diligent study of the best productions of our modern poets.

"These poems exhibit," says Mr. Warton, "both in connection of words and sentences, a facility of combination, a quickness of transition, a rapidity of apostrophe, a frequent variation of force and phrase, and a firmness of texture, which must have been the result of a long establishment of the arts and habits of writing. The versification is equally vigorous and harmonious, and is formed on a general elegance and stability of expression. It is remarkable, that whole stanzas sparkle with that brilliancy which did not appear in our poetry, till towards the middle of the present century. The lines have all the tricks and trappings, all the sophistications of poetical style belonging to those models, which were popular when Chatterton began to write verses."

"If a modern corrector," he adds, "has been at work, he has apparently been so very busy, as to leave but little or none of the original. His file has worn what it polished. If the poetry before us should have been only corrected or interpolated by parts, I believe there will be no difficulty in drawing the line of distinction between the respective property of Rowley and Chatterton; for such corrections and interpolations appear to consist, not only in words and hemistichs, but in a suite of stanzas, in pages of considerable length, and such as have been the favourite of the public, and have been distinguished for their poetical beauties."

There appears in these poems none of that learning which peculiarly marks all the compositions of the fifteenth century. Our old poets are perpetually confounding Gothic and classical allusions, knight-errantry and ancient history, sculpture, and romance, religion, and chivalry. Ovid and St. Austin are sometimes cited in the same line. A studious ecclesiastic of that period would give us a variety of useless authorities from Aristotle, from Boethius, and from the fathers; and the whole would have been interspersed with allusions to the old romances: The round table, with Sir Launcelot, and Sir Tristram, and Charlemagne would have been constantly cited. Poems from such an author would have occasionally exhibited "prolix devotional episodes, mingled with texts of scripture, and address to the saints and Blessed Virgin, instead of apostrophes to such allegorical divinities, as Truth, and Content, and others of Pagan original."

The metre of the old English poetry is totally different from that of Rowley. The stanza in which the majority of these poems are written, consists of ten lines, the two first quatrains of which rhyme alternately, and it closes with an Alexandrine; no example of which occurs in Chaucer, Lydgate, or Gower. Spenser extended the octava rima of Chaucer to nine lines, closing with an Alexandrine, to which Prior added a tenth. This last, of which examples have been multiplied, was Chatterton's model. Mr. Warton observes, that the unvaried and habitual exactness of the modulation of the final Alexandrine, in the poems of Rowley, excludes their claim to antiquity. "Had the supposed Rowley," he adds, "written Alexandrines, he would not have exceeded Spenser and equalled Dryden in the music of versification."

Notwithstanding the affectation of ancient language, the tinsel of modern phraseology may, in too many instances, be detected. Such phrases as puerilitie; before his optics; blameless tongue; the authour of the piece; vessel wreckt upon the tragic sand; proto-sneyne, &c. could not be the language of the fifteenth century. We find also a number of modern formularies and combinations, "systers in forrow;" "Ah, what availle," "Oh, thou, whate'er thie name," &c. with a number of compound epithets, such as, guile-depeyned; nome-depeyned, blodde-sneynd; swift-berved: gore-red; super-ballie, &c. and other terms of expression and allusions evidently modern.

To these may be added some anachronisms, such as the art of knitting stockings, alluded to in the tragedy of Zella, which was utterly unknown in the reign of Edward IV. and a great variety of particular and appropriate imitations of modern poets. Such coincidences as the following are so palpable, that it seems to be out of the power of prejudice itself to evade the inference, which arises from them.

O for a muse of fire! Sbak. Hen. V.

O forr a spryte al feere! Ælla.

His beard all white as snow,
All flaxen was his pole. Hamlet.

Blacke his cryne as the wyntere nyghte,
Whyte his rode as the sommer snowe. Ælla.

And tears began to flow. Dryd. Alex. Feast.

And teares beganne to flowe. Syr C. Bowdin.

No, no he is dead,
Gone to his death-bed. Hamlet.

Mic love is dedde,
Gone to his deathe-bedde. Ælla.

Unhoufell'd, unanointed, unaknell'd. Hamlet, Pope's Edit

Unburled, undelyvre, unespryte. Goddwyn.

Their souls from corpes unaknell'd depart. Bat. of Hast. p. 1.

The gray goose wing that was thereon,
In his heart's blood was wet. Chevy Chase.

The gray-goose pyneon that thereon was sett,
Estfoons wyth smoking crynson bloud was wett. Bat. of Hast.

With such a force and vehement might,
He did his body gore,
The spear went through the other side,
A large cloth yard and more. Chevy Chase.

With thilk a force it did his body gore,
That in his tender guts it entered,
In veritie a full cloth-yard or more. Bat. of Hast.

Clos'd his eyes in endlefs night. Gray's Bard.

He clos'd his cyne in everlastyng nyghte. Bat. of Hast.

Of the forms of composition adopted by the supposed Rowley, such as Odes, Eclogues, Discourfing Tragedies, &c. not one example could be found in England in the fifteenth century. Plays, if any existed, were nothing more than a ballad, or solitary recital, without plot or dialogue, and incapable of representation.

The similarity of manner, language, versification, &c. in the poems said to have been written by Canyngc, Sir Thybbot Gorges, Jobn Ifcam, and Jobn, Abbot of St. Augustine, who is said to have died in 1215, is an objection to their authenticity. If Rowley possessed a talent of writing melodiously, unknown to his contemporaries, it is not easy to conceive how he could communicate to his friends the same miraculous endowment. All Rowley's friends write with his spirit; their lines are equally harmonious, and the versification has the same suspicious cast of modern manufacture. Sir Thybbot Gorges sings with the ease and airiness of a poet, who has only antiquity in the spelling of his name.

Mic husbände, Lord Thomas, a forrefter boulde,
As ever clove pyne or the baskette, &c.

Dynge Maifre Canyngc is a poet so much like the gode priestle, that Dr. Milles, like a true commentator, supposes, that "Rowley might give his friend and patron the credit of the performance." The same pen undoubtedly produced what is called Canyngc's, &c. as well as what is called Rowley's; but that pen was Chatterton's.

Such is the conclusion which the present writer has formed, from an examination of the arguments on both sides of this curious literary question. He hesitates not to declare, that his opinion respecting the authenticity of the poems is on the side of those who support the title of Chatterton. Mr. Warton and Mr. Tyrwhitt have convicted them of being spurious, by technical criterions. He esteemed it, therefore, a part of his duty to arrange them with the compositions of a modern era. But, though he cannot entertain a doubt but that they were written by Chatterton, yet he means not to dictate to others. He has expressed his dissent from the opinion of those who defend their authenticity, without being influenced by the authority of names. He has stated his observations as they rose in his mind, from a consideration of the facts, without being influenced by the force of ridicule. He has expressed his feelings as those of a reader, who, though he respects the study of antiquities, dislikes the blind prejudices of the mere antiquary. It was impossible for him to peruse a state of this controversy, without smiling at the delusion and gravity of those learned gentlemen, who have all their lives dealt in uncouth lore, and not in our classic authors, nor have perceived that taste had not developed itself in the reign of Edward IV. The question, in his opinion, is as much a matter of taste as it is of learning, and is more to be decided by internal evidence than by external facts. The man of taste, who has a moderate at least, if not a critical knowledge of the compositions of our poets from Chaucer to Pope, feels every argument on this head to be decisive, by an emotion which is superior to all laboured reasonings, but which, nevertheless, every reason and every examination, still more strongly serve to support. It is the taste in the poems of the supposed Rowley that will for ever exclude them from belonging to the period in which, it is said, they were written. Superiority of genius could not possibly have produced any thing so perfect and refined, in language, structure, and sentiment, as those poems, by any native effort of its own, unassisted by preceding improvements, and independent of all models; for poetry, like other branches of literature and science, has its gradual accretions, is influenced by the condition of society, assumes accidental and arbitrary forms, and is subject to new and peculiar modifications.

"It is not," says Dr. Warton, "from the complexion of ink or of parchment, from the information of contemporaries, the tales of relations, the recollection of apprentices, and the prejudices of friends, nor even from Doomsday Book, pedigrees in the heralds office, armorial bearings, parliamentary rolls, inquisitions, indentures, episcopal registers, epitaphs, tomb-stones, and brass-plates, that this controversy is to be finally and effectually adjusted. Our argument should be drawn from principles of taste, from analogical experiments, from a familiarity with ancient poetry, and from the gradations of composition. Such a proof, excluding all imposition, liable to no deception, and proceeding upon abstracted truth, will be the surest demonstration. A man furnished with a just portion of critical discernment, and in the mean time totally unacquainted with the history of these poems, is sufficiently, perhaps most properly, qualified to judge of their authenticity. To such a person, unprepared and unprejudiced as he is by any previous intelligence, and a stranger to facts, let the poems be shown. I can easily conceive to which side of the question he will incline. Nor will he afterwards suffer his opinion to be influenced by reports. External arguments, such at least as have hitherto appeared, may be useful, but they are not necessary. They will hang out lights sometimes false, and frequently feeble. In the present case, external arguments have seldom served to any other purpose than to embarrass our reasoning, to mislead the inquisitive, and to amuse the ignorant."

At the shrine of Chatterton some grateful incense has been offered by the most elegant and pathetic poets of our nation. Mr. Pye, the present poet laureat, thus speaks of Chatterton, in his elegant and classical poem on the "Progress of Refinement."

Yet as with streaming eye the forrowing muse
Pale Chatterton's untimely urn bedews,
Her accents shall arraign the partial care
That shielded not her son from cold despair.

Mr. Preston, an elegant poet of a neighbouring kingdom, has distinguished Chatterton among the "martyrs of the lyre," in his pathetic "Epistle to a Young Gentleman, on his having addicted himself to the Study of Poetry."

Behold yon shade! he bears an antique roll,
With many a scutcheon clad and many a scroll!
'Tis he, the wondrous youth of Bristowe's plain,
Who pour'd in Rowley's garb his solemn strain;
A stripling scarcely, and yet more than man;
His race was ended ere it well began.
Th' indignant spirit tower'd o'er little men;
He look'd through nature with an angel's ken,
And scorn'd with conscious pride this petty stage,
The tardy homage of a thankless age.
The furies wrung his agonizing soul,
And desperation mix'd the Stygian bowl.

The following lines in Mr. Hayley's excellent "Essay on Epic Poetry" are uncommonly animated and poetical:

If changing times suggest the pleasing hope
That bards no more with adverse fortune cope;
That in this alter'd clime, where arts increase,
And make our polish'd isle a second Greece;
That now, if poesy proclaims her son,
And challenges the wreath by fancy won;
Both fame and wealth adopt him as their heir,
And liberal grandeur makes his life her care;
From such vain thoughts thy erring mind defend,
And look on Chatterton's disastrous end.
Oh, ill-starr'd youth, whom nature form'd in vain,
With powers on Pindus' splendid height to reign!
O dread example of what pangs await
Young genius struggling with malignant fate!
What could the muse, who fir'd thy infant frame,
With the rich promise of poetic fame;
Who taught thy hand its magic art to hide,
And mock the infolence of critic pride;
What could her unavailing cares oppose,
To save her darling from his desperate foes;
From pressing want's calamitous controul,
And pride, the fever of the ardent soul?
Ah, see, too conscious of her failing power,
She quits her nursing in his deathful hour!
In a chill room, within whose wretched wall
No cheering voice replies to misery's call;
Near a vile bed, too crazy to sustain
Misfortune's wasted limbs, convuls'd with pain,
On the bare floor, with heaven-directed eyes,
The hapless youth in Ipechless horror lies!
The poisonous vial, by distraction drain'd,
Rolls from his hand, in wild contortion strain'd:
Pale with life-wasting pangs, its dire effect,
And stung to madness by the world's neglect,
He, in abhorrence of the dangerous art,
Once the dear idol of his glowing heart,
Tears from his harp the vain detested wires,
And in the frenzy of despair expires!

Nor have the critical writers been backward in commendation of Chatterton. Mr. Warton speaks of him as "a prodigy of genius," as "a singular instance of prematurity of abilities." He adds, that "he possessed a comprehension of mind, and an activity of understanding, which predominated over his situation in life, and his opportunities of instruction." And Mr. Malone "believes him to have been the greatest genius that England has produced since the days of Shakspeare." Dr. Gregory, to whom, in the course of this narrative, the present writer has had many obligations, says, "he must rank, as an universal genius, above Dryden, and perhaps only second to Shakspeare." Mr. Croft is still more unqualified in his praises. He asserts, that "no such human being, at any period of life, has ever been known, or possibly ever will be known." He runs a parallel between Chatterton and Milton; and asserts, "an army of Macedonian and Swedish mad butchers indeed fly before him; nor does my memory supply me with any human being, who at such an age, with such disadvantages, has produced such compositions. Under the Heathen mythology, superstition and admiration would have explained all, by bringing Apollo on earth; nor would the god ever have descended with more credit to himself."

The testimony of Dr. Knox ("Essay" 144), does equal credit to the classical taste and amiable benevolence of the writer, and the genius and reputation of Chatterton.

"When I read the researches of those learned antiquaries who have endeavoured to prove that the poems attributed to Rowley were really written by him, I observe many ingenious remarks in confirmation of their opinion, which it would be tedious, if not difficult, to controvert; but I no sooner turn to the poems, than the labour of the antiquaries appears only waste of time, and I am involuntarily forced to join in placing that laurel, which he seems so well to have deserved, on the brow of Chatterton.

“The poems bear so many marks of superior genius, that they have deservedly excited the general attention of polite scholars, and are considered as the most remarkable productions in modern poetry. We have many instances of poetical eminence at an early age; but neither Cowley, Milton, nor Pope, ever produced any thing while they were boys, which can justly be compared to the poems of Chatterton. The learned antiquaries do not indeed dispute their excellence. They extol it in the highest terms of applause. They raise their favourite Rowley to a rivalry with Homer; but they make the very merit of the works an argument against the real author. Is it possible, say they, that a boy could produce compositions so beautiful and so masterly? That a common boy should produce them is not possible; but that they should be produced by a boy of an extraordinary genius, such a genius as was that of Homer and Shakspeare; such a genius as appears not above once in many centuries; though a prodigy, is such an one as by no means exceeds the bounds of rational credibility.

“That Chatterton was such a genius, his manners and his life in some degree evince. He had all the tremulous sensibility of genius, all its eccentricities, all its pride, and all its spirit. Even his death, unfortunate and wicked as it was, displayed a haughtiness of soul, which urged him to spurn a world, where even his exalted genius could not vindicate him from contempt, indigence, and contumely.

“Unfortunate boy! short and evil were thy days, but thy fame shall be immortal. Hadst thou been known to the munificent patrons of genius—“Unfortunate boy! poorly wast thou accommodated during thy short sojourning among us;—rudely wast thou treated,—forely did thy feeling soul suffer from the scorn of the unworthy; and there are, at last, those who wish to rob thee of thy only meed, thy posthumous glory. Severe too are the censures of thy morals. In the gloomy moments of despondency, I fear thou hast uttered impious and blasphemous thoughts, which none can defend, and which neither thy youth, nor thy fiery spirit, nor thy situation, can excuse. But let thy more rigid censors reflect, that thou wast literally and strictly but a boy. Let many of thy bitterest enemies reflect what were their own religious principles, and whether they had any, at the age of fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen. Surely it is a severe and an unjust surmise, that thou wouldst probably have ended thy life as a victim of the laws, if thou hadst not finished it as thou didst; since the very act by which thou durst put an end to thy painful existence, proves that thou thoughtest it better to die, than to support life by theft or violence.

“The speculative errors of a boy who wrote from the sudden suggestions of passion or despondency, who is not convicted of any immoral or dishonest act in consequence of his speculations, ought to be consigned to oblivion. But there seems to be a general and inveterate dislike to the boy, exclusively of the poet; a dislike which many will be ready to impute, and, indeed, not without the appearance of reason, to that insolence and envy of the little great, which cannot bear to acknowledge so transcendent and commanding a superiority in the humble child of want and obscurity.

“Malice, if there was any, may surely now be at rest; for “Cold he lies in the grave below.” But where were ye, O ye friends to genius, when, stung with disappointment, distressed for food and raiment, with every frightful form of human misery painted on his fine imagination, poor Chatterton sunk in despair? Alas! ye knew him not then, and now it is too late,—

For now he is dead,
Gone to his death-bed,
All under the willow tree.

So sang the sweet youth, in as tender an elegy as ever flowed from a feeling heart.

“In return for the pleasure I have received from thy poems, I pay thee, poor boy, the trifling tribute of my praise. Thyself thou hast emblazoned; thine own monument thou hast erected. But they whom thou hast delighted, feel a pleasure in vindicating thine honours from the rude attacks of detraction. Thy sentiments, thy verse, thy rhyme, all are modern, all are thine. By the help of glossaries and dictionaries, and the perusal of many old English writers, thou hast been able to translate the language of the present time into that of former centuries. Thou hast built an artificial ruin. The stones are mossy and old, the whole fabric appears really antique to the distant and the careless spectator; even the connoisseur, who pores with spectacles on the single stones, and inspects the mossy concretions with an antiquarian eye, boldly authenticates its antiquity; but they who examine without prejudice, and by the criterion of common sense, clearly discover the cement and the workmanship of a modern mason."

"O! Genius," elegantly apostrophizes Mr. Dyer, in his humane and sensible "Dissertation on Benevolence," 1795, "art thou to be envied or pitied? Doomed to form expectations the most sanguine, and to meet with disappointments the most mortifying? To indulge towards others the most generous wishes, to receive thyself the most illiberal treatment? To be applauded, admired, and neglected? To be a friend to all, befriended often by none? Oh, thou creative, discriminating power, source of inexpressible delights, and nurse of unknown sensibilities, that perpetrate distress. Fancy shall embody thy form, and often visit the grave of Chatterton, to drop the tear of sympathy over that ingenious, unfriended, and unfortunate youth!"

PREFACE,

TO THE

First Edition, 8vo, 1777, published by THOMAS TYRWHITT, Esq.

THE poems which make the principal part of this collection, have for some time excited much curiosity, as the supposed productions of Thomas Rowley, a priest of Bristol, in the reigns of Henry VI. and Edward IV. They are here faithfully printed from the most authentic MSS. that could be procured; of which a particular description is given, in the introductory account of the several pieces contained in this volume, subjoined to this preface. Nothing more, therefore, seems necessary at present, than to inform the reader shortly of the manner in which these poems were first brought to light, and of the authority upon which they are ascribed to the persons whose names they bear.

This cannot be done so satisfactorily as in the words of Mr. George Catcott of Bristol, to whose very laudable zeal the public is indebted for the most considerable part of the following collection. His account of the matter is this: "The first discovery of certain MSS. having been deposited in Redcliff church, above three centuries ago, was made in the year 1768; at the time of opening the new bridge at Bristol, and was owing to a publication in Farley's Weekly Journal, 1st October 1768, containing an account of the ceremonies observed at the opening of the old bridge, taken, as it was said, from a very ancient MS. This excited the curiosity of some persons to inquire after the original. The printer, Mr. Farley, could give no account of it, or of the person who brought the copy; but, after much inquiry, it was discovered, that the person who brought the copy was a youth between fifteen and sixteen years of age, whose name was Thomas Chatterton, and whose family had been sextons of Redcliff church for near 150 years. His father, who was now dead, had also been master of the free-school in Pile-street. The young man was at first very unwilling to discover from whence he had the original; but, after many promises made to him, he was at last prevailed on to acknowledge that he had received this, together with many other MSS. from his father, who had found them in a large chest in an upper room over the chapel on the north side of Redcliff church."

Soon after this, Mr. Catcott commenced his acquaintance with young Chatterton; and, partly as presents, partly as purchases, procured from him copies of many of his MSS. in prose and verse. Other copies were disposed of, in the same way, to Mr. William Barrett, an eminent surgeon at Bristol, who has long been engaged in writing the history of that city. Mr. Barrett also procured from him several fragments, some of a considerable length, written upon vellum, which he asserted to be part of his original MSS. In short, in the space of about eighteen months, from October 1768 to April 1770, besides the poems now published, he produced as many compositions, in prose and verse, under the names of Rowley, Canynge, &c. as would nearly fill such another volume.

In April 1770, Chatterton went to London, and died there in the August following; so that the whole history of this very extraordinary transaction cannot now probably be known with any certainty. Whatever may have been his part in it; whether he was the author, or only the copier (as he constantly asserted), of all these productions, he appears to have kept the secret entirely to himself, and not to have put it in the power of any other person to bear certain testimony either to his fraud, or to his veracity:

The question, therefore, concerning the authenticity of these poems, must now be decided by an examination of the fragments upon vellum, which Mr. Barrett received from Chatterton as part of his original MSS. and by the internal evidence which the several pieces afford. If the fragments shall be judged to be genuine, it will still remain to be determined, how far their genuineness should serve to authenticate the rest of the collection, of which no copies, older than those made by Chatterton, have ever been produced. On the other hand, if the writing of the fragments shall be judged to be counterfeit, and forged by Chatterton, it will not of necessity follow, that the matter of them was also forged by him, and still less that all the other compositions, which he professed to have copied from ancient MSS. were merely inventions of his own. In either case, the decision must finally depend upon the internal evidence.

It may be expected, perhaps, that the editor should give an opinion upon this important question; but he rather chooses, for many reasons, to leave it to the determination of the unprejudiced and intelligent reader. He had long been desirous that these poems should be printed; and therefore readily undertook the charge of superintending the edition. This he has executed in the manner which seemed to him best suited to such a publication; and here he means that his task should end. Whether the poems be really ancient or modern, the compositions of Rowley, or the forgeries of Chatterton, they must always be considered as a most singular literary curiosity.

INTRODUCTORY ACCOUNT OF THE SEVERAL PIECES.

ECLOGUE THE FIRST.
ECLOGUE THE SECOND.
ECLOGUE THE THIRD.

These three eclogues are printed from a MS. furnished by Mr. Catcott, in the hand-writing of Thomas Chatterton. It is a thin copy-book in 4to, with the following title in the first page. "Eclogues, and other poems, by Thomas Rowley, with a Glossary and Annotations, by Thomas Chatterton."

There is only one other poem in this book, viz. the fragment of "Goddwyn, a Tragedie."

ELINOURE AND JUGA.

This poem is reprinted from the Town and Country Magazine for May 1769, p. 273. It is there intitled, "Elinoure and Juga. Written three hundred years ago by T. Rowley, Secular Priest." And it has the following subscription: "D. B. Bristol, May 1769." Chatterton soon after told Mr. Catcott, that he (Chatterton) inserted it in the magazine.

The present editor has taken the liberty to supply (between hooks) the names of the speakers, at ver. 22. and 29, which had probably been omitted by some accident in the first publication, as the nature of the composition seems to require that the dialogue should proceed by alternate intanzas.

VERSES TO LYDGATE.
SONGE TO ÆLLA,
LYDGATE'S ANSWER.

These three small poems are printed from a copy in Mr. Catcott's hand-writing. Since they were printed off, the editor has had an opportunity of comparing them with a copy made by Mr. Barrett from the piece of vellum, which Chatterton formerly gave to him as the original MS. The variations of importance (exclusive of many in the spelling), are set down below *

- * Verses to Lydgate.
In the title for Ladgate, r. Lydgate.
Ver. 2. r. That, and thee.
3. for bee, r. goe.
7. for fyghte, r. wryte.

Songe to Ælla.

The title in the vellum MS. was simply "Songe to Ælle," with a small mark of reference to a note below, containing the following words-- "Lorde of the castelle of Brystowe ynn daies of yore." It may be proper also to take notice, that the whole song was there written like prose, without any breaks, or divisions into verses.

- Ver. 6. for brastyng, r. burfyng.
11. for valyante, r. burlic.
23. for dyfmal, r. honore.

Lydgate's answer.

No title in the vellum MS.

THE TOURNAMENT.

This poem is printed from a copy made by Mr. Catcott, from one in Chatterton's hand-writing.

Sir Simon de Bourton, the hero of this poem, is supposed to have been the first founder of a church dedicated to our Ladie, in the place where the church of St. Mary Ratcliffe now stands. Mr. Barrett has a small leaf of vellum (given to him by Chatterton, as one of Rowley's original MSS.), intitled, "Vita de Simon de Bourton;" in which Sir Simon is said, as in the poem, to have begun his foundation, in consequence of a vow made at a tournament.

THE DETHE OF SYR CHARLES BAWDIN.

This poem is reprinted from the copy printed at London: in 1772, with a few corrections from a copy made by Mr. Catcott, from one in Chatterton's hand-writing.

The person here celebrated under the name of Syr Charles Bawdin, was probably Sir Baldewyn Fulford, Knt. a zealous Lancastrian, who was executed at Bristol in the latter end of 1461, the first year of Edward the Fourth. He was attained, with many others, in the general act of attainder, 1 Edw. IV.; but he seems to have been executed under a special commission for the trial of treasons, &c. within the town of Bristol. The fragment of the old Chronicle, published by Hearne at the end of Sprotti Chronica, p. 289, says, "Item the same yere (1 Edw. IV.), was taken Sir Baldewine Fulford, and beheldid at Bristow."

ÆLLA, a Tragycal Enterlude.

This poem, with the epistle, letter, and introduction, is printed from a folio MS, furnished by Mr. Catcott; in the beginning of which he has written "Chatterton's Transcript, 1769." The whole transcript is of Chatterton's hand-writing.

- Ver. 3. for vayfes, r. penz.
Antep. for Lendes, r. Sendes.
Ult. for lyne, r. thyng.

Mr. Barrett had also a copy of these poems by Chatterton, which differed from that which Chatterton afterwards produced as the original; in the following particulars, among others.

In the title of the Verses to Lydgate.

- | | |
|---------------------------------|-----------------------------|
| Orig. Lydgate . | Chat. Ladgate . |
| Ver. 3. Orig. goe . | Chat. doe . |
| 7. Orig. wryte . | Chat. fyghte . |
| Songe to Ælla. | |
| Ver. 5. Orig. Dacyane . | Chat. Dacy's . |
| 11. Orig. whose lockes . | Chat. whose bayres . |
| 11. Orig. burlic . | Chat. brouded . |
| 22. Orig. kennf . | Chat. beardf . |
| 23. Orig. honore . | Chat. dyfmal . |
| 26. Orig. Yprancyng . | Chat. frayning . |
| 30. Orig. gloue . | Chat. glare . |

GODDWYN, a Tragedie.

This fragment is printed from the MS. mentioned above, in Chatterton's hand-writing.

ENGLISH METAMORPHOSIS.

This poem is printed from a single sheet in Chatterton's hand-writing, communicated by Mr. Barrett, who received it from Chatterton.

BALADE OF CHARITIE.

This poem is also printed from a single sheet in Chatterton's hand-writing. It was lent to the printer of the Town and Country Magazine, with the following letter prefixed.

To the printer of the Town and Country Magazine.

" SIR,
" IF the glossary annexed to the following piece will make the language intelligible, the sentiment, description, and versification, are highly deserving the attention of the literati."

July 4. 1770. D. B.

BATTLE OF HASTINGS, No. 1.

BATTLE OF HASTINGS, No. 2.

In printing the first of these poems, two copies have been made use of, both taken from copies of Chatterton's hand-writing; the one by Mr. Catcott, and the other by Mr. Barrett. The principal difference between them is at the end, where the latter has fourteen lines from ver. 550, which are wanting in the former. The second poem is printed from a single copy, made by Mr. Barrett from one in Chatterton's hand-writing.

It should be observed, that the poem marked No. 1. was given to Mr. Barrett by Chatterton, with the following title: " Battle of Hastings, wrote by Turgot the Monk, a Saxon, in the Tenth Century; and Translated by Thomas Rowley, Parish-Preeble of St. John's, in the City of Bristol, in the year 1465.—The remainder of the Poem I have not been happy enough to meet with." Being afterwards prest by Mr. Barrett to produce any part of this poem in the original hand-writing, he at last said, that he wrote this poem himself for a friend; but that he had another, the copy of an original by Rowley; and being then desired to produce that other poem, he, after a considerable interval of time, brought to Mr. Barrett the poem marked No. 2, as far as ver. 530. inclusive, with the following title: " Battle of Hastings, by Turgotus, translated by Roulic for W. Canynge, Esq. The lines from ver. 531. inclusive, were brought some time after, in consequence of Mr. Barrett's repeated solicitations for the conclusion of the poem."

ONN OURE LADIES CHYRCH.

ON THE SAME.
The first of these poems is printed from a copy made by Mr. Catcott; from one in Chatterton's hand-writing.

The other is taken from a MS. in Chatterton's hand-writing; furnished by Mr. Catcott, intitled, " A Discorde on Bristowe, by Thomas Rowley."

EPITAPH ON ROBERT CANYNGE.

This is one of the fragments of vellum, given by Chatterton to Mr. Barrett, as part of his original MSS.

THE STORIE OF WILLIAM CANYNGE.

The thirty-four first lines of this poem are extant upon another of the vellum fragments, given by Chatterton to Mr. Barrett. The remainder is printed from a copy furnished by Mr. Catcott, with some corrections from another copy, made by Mr. Barrett from one in Chatterton's hand-writing. This poem makes part of a prose work attributed to Rowley; giving an account of painters; carvers, poets, and other eminent natives of Bristol, from the earliest times to his own. The reader may see several particulars relating to him in Cambden's Britannia, Somerset. Col. 95. Rymer's Fœdera, &c. ann. 1449. and 1450. Tanner's Not. Monast. Art. Bristol and Westbury. Dugdale's Warwickshire, p. 634.

It may be proper just to remark here, that Mr. Canynge's brother, mentioned in ver. 129, who was Lord Mayor of London in 1456, is called Thomas by Stowe, in his List of Mayors, &c.

The transaction alluded to in the last stanza, is related at large in some prose memoirs of Rowley, of which a very incorrect copy has been printed in the Town and Country Magazine for November 1775. It is there said, that Mr. Canynge went into orders, to avoid a marriage proposed by King Edward, between him and a lady of the Widdewile family. It is certain that the register of the Bishop of Worcester, that Mr. Canynge was ordained Acolyte by Bishop Carpenter, on 19th September 1467; and received the higher orders of Sub-Deacon, Deacon, and Priest, on the 12th of March 1467, O. S. the 2d and 16th of April 1468, respectively.

- ON HAPPINESS, by William Canynge.
- ONNE JONNE A DALBENIE, by the same.
- THE GOULER'S REQUIEM, by the same.
- THE ACCOUNT OF W. CANYNGE'S FEASTE.

Of these four poems attributed to Mr. Canynge, the three first are printed from Mr. Catcott's copies. The last is taken from a fragment of vellum; which Chatterton gave to Mr. Barrett as an original. The editor has doubts about the reading of the second word in ver. 7, but he has printed it keene, as he found it so in other copies.

With respect to the three friends of Mr. Canynge mentioned in the last line, the name of Rowley is sufficiently known from the preceding poems. Heannun appears as an actor in the tragedy of Aella, and that of Goddwyn; and a poem, ascribed to him, intitled, " The Merry Tricks of Laynmynton," is inserted in the " Discorde of Bristowe." Sir Theobald Gorges was a knight of an ancient family, seated at Wraxhall, within a few miles of Bristol. See Rot. Parl. 3. H. VI. n. 28. Leland's Itin. Vol. VII. p. 98. He has also appeared above as an actor in both the tragedies, and as the author of one of the mynstralles songes in Aella. His connection with Mr. Canynge is verified by a deed of the latter, dated 20th October 1467; in which he gives to trustees, in part of a benefaction of 500l. to the church of St. Mary Redcliffe, " certain jewels of " Sir Theobald Gorges, Knt." which had been pawned to him for 260l.

THE WORKS OF CHATTERTON.

POEMS.

ADVERTISEMENT TO TYRWHITT'S EDITION.

THE reader is desired to observe, that the notes at the bottom of the several pages, throughout the following part of this book, are all copied from MSS. in the hand-writing of Thomas Chatterton.

ECLOGUE I.

WHANNE Englonde, smecthyng 1 from her lethal 2 wounde,
From her galled necke dyd twytte 3 the chayne
awaic,
Kennynge her legeful sonnes falle all arounde (Myghtie theie fell, 'twas honoure ledde the fraie),
Thanne inne a dael, bie eve's dark surcote 4
Twayne lonelic shepsterres 5 dyd abrodden 6 flie
(The royslyng liff doth theyr whytte hartes af-
fraie 7),
And wythe the owlette trembled and dyd crie;
Firse Roberte Neatherde hys fore boesom
stroke,
Then fellen on the grounde, and thus yspoke.

Roberte.

Ah, Raufe! gif thos the howres do comme a-longe,
Gif thos wee flie in chafe of farther woe,
Our fote wylle sayle, alheyte wee bec strange,
Ne wylle oure pace fweste as oure danger goe.
To oure grete wronges we have enhed 8 moe,
The baronnes warre! oh, woe and well-a-daic!
I haveth lyff, bott have escaped fce,
That lyff ytsel mie senses doe affraie.
Oh, Raufe! comme lyste, and hear mie der-nic 9 tale,
Comme heare the balefull ro dome of Robynne of the Dale.

Raufe.

Saie to mee nete; I kenne thie woe in myne:
O! I've a tale that Sabalus 11 mote 12 telle.

1 Smetbing, smoking; in some copies bletheynge, but in the or'al as above. 2 deadly. 3 pluck or pull. 4 surcote, a cloke or mantel, which hid all the other drefs. 5 shepherds. 6 abruptly; fo Chaucer—Syke he abredden dyd attourne. 7 affright. 8 Added. 9 sad. 10 woeful, lamentable. 11 the devil. 12 might.

Swote 13 flouretts, mantled meadows, foresles dygne 14;
Gravots 15 far-kend 16 arounde the errmiets 17 cell:
The swote ribible 18 dynning 19 yn the dell;
The joyous daunceynge ynn the hoastrie 20 courte;
Eke 21 the high songe and everych joie fare-
Farewell the veric shade of fayre dysporte 22;
Impeftering 23 trobble omi mie heade doe comme,
Ne on kynde feynde to warde 24 the aye 25 en-creafynge dome.

Roberte.

Oh! I coulde waile mie kyng-coppe-decked mecs 26,
Mie spreedynge flockes of shepe of lillie white,
Mie tendre applynges 27, and embodie 28
trees, [fyghte,
Mie Parker's Grange 29, far spreedynge to the Mie cuyen 30 kyne 31, mie bullockes stringe 32
yn fyghte,
Mie gorne 33, emblaunched 34 with the com-
frie 35 plante,
Mie floure 36 Seynde Marie shotteyng wythe
the lyghte, [grant
Mie store of all the bleflynge Heaven can
I amm dureffed 37 unto forrowes blowe,
Ihanten'd 38 to the payne, will lette ne falte tear flowe.

13 Sweet. 14 good, neat, genteel. 15 groves; sometimes used for a coppice. 16 far seen. 17 hermit. 18 violin. 19 sounding. 20 inn, or public-house. 21 also. 22 pleasure. 23 annoying. 24 to keep off. 25 ever, always. 26 meadows. 27 grafted trees. 28 thick, stout. 29 liberty of pasture given to the parker. 30 tender. 31 cows. 32 strong. 33 garden. 34 whitened. 35 cumfrey, a favourite dish at that time. 36 marygold. 37 hardened. 38 accustomed.

Raufe.

Here I wille obaie 39 untylle dethe doe 'pere,
 Here lyche a foule empyoned leathel 40 tree,
 Whyche fleath 41 everychone that commeth
 nere,
 Soe wille I fixyd unto thys place gre 42.
 I to beament 43 haveth moe cause, than thee;
 Sleene in the warre mie boolie 44 fadre lies;
 Oh! joicous I hys mortherer would flea,
 And big hys syde for aie, enclose myne eies.
 Calked 45 from everych joie, heere wyllle I blede; [f]tede.
 Fell ys the Cullys-yatte 46 of mie hartes castle.
 Oure woos alyche, alyche our dome 47 shal bee.
 Mie sonne, mie sonne alleyn 48, ystroyen 49 ys;
 Here wyllle I staie, and eod mie lyff with thee;
 A lyff lyche myne a borden ys ywis.
 Now from een logges 50 flossen ys felynels 51,
 Mynterres 52 alleyn 53 can boaste the hallie 54
 seyncte,
 Nowe doeth Englonde weare a blondie dresse,
 And wyth her champyones gore her face depeyncte;
 Peace fledge, disorder showeth her dark rode 55,
 And thorow ayr doth flie, yn garments steyned with bloude.

ECLOGUE II.

SPRYTES I of the bleste, the pious Nygelle fed,
 Poure owte yer pleasaunce 2 onn mie fadres hedde.
 Rycharde of Lyons harte to fyghte is gon,
 Uponne the brede 3 sea doe the banners gleme 4;
 The amenuf 5 nationes be aston 6,
 To ken 7 fyke 8, large a flete, fyke syne, fyke
 breme 9. [f]stre;
 The barkis heafods 10 coupe 11 the lymed 12
 Oundes 13 synkeynge oundes upon the hard ake
 14 rief; [f]ste;
 The water slughornes 15 wythe a fwotye 16
 cleme 17
 Conteke 18 the dynnyng 19 ayr, and reche
 the skies. [f]stedde 21,
 Sprytes of the bleste, on gouldyn troncs 20
 Poure owte yer pleasaunce onn mie fadres hedde.
 The gule 22 depeyncted 23 oares from the black tyde, [f]te;
 Decorn 24 wyth fonnes 25 rare, doe slemryng

39 Abide. This line is also wrote—"Here wyll
 I obaie untill dethe appere;" but this is modernized. 40 deadly. 41 destroyeth, killeth. 42 grow.
 43 lament. 44 much loved, beloved. 45 cast out, ejected. 46 alluding to the portcullis, which guarded the gate, on which often depended the castle. 47 fate. 48 my only son. 49 dead. 50 cottages. 51 happiness. 52 monasteries. 53 only.
 54 holy. 55 complexion.—1 Spirits, souls. 2 pleasure. 3 broad. 4 shine, glimmer. 5 diminished, lessened. 6 astonished, confounded. 7 see, discover,
 know. 8 such, so. 9 strong. 10 heads. 11 cut.
 12 glassy, reflecting. 13 waves, billows. 14 oak.
 15 a musical instrument, not unlike a hautboy.
 16 sweet. 17 found. 18 confuse, contend with.
 19 founding. 20 thrones. 21 seated. 22 red. 23 painted. 24 carved. 25 devices. 26 glimmering.

Upwalyng 27 doe heie 28 fiewe ynne drierie
 pryde, [f]kyes;
 Lyche gore-red estells 29 in the eve 30 merk 31
 The nome-depeyncted 32 shields, the speres aryle,
 Alyke 33 talle roshes on the water sude
 Alenge 34 from bark to bark the bryghte
 sheene 35 flies; [f]glyde.
 Sweft-kervd 35 delyghtes doe on the water
 Sprites of the bleste, and everich sayncte ydedde,
 Poure owte your pleasaunce on mie fadres hedde.
 The Sarafen lokes owte: he doethe feere,
 That Englonde brondeous 37 fonnes do cotta
 the waie.
 Lyke honted bockes, theye reineth 38 here and there, [f]obaie 40.
 Onknowlacheynge 39 inne whatte place to
 The banner glesers on the beme of daie;
 The mittee 41 croffe Jerusalem ys seene;
 Dhereof the fyghte yer corrage doe affraie 42,
 In balefull 43 dole their faces be ywreene 44.
 Sprytes of the bleste, and everich seyncte ydedde,
 Poure owte your pleasaunce on mie fadres hedde.
 The bollengers 45 and cottes 45, foe swyfte yn
 fyghte,
 Upon the fydes of everich bark appere;
 Foorth to his offyce lepethe everych knyghte,
 Eitsoones 46 hys squyer, with hys shield and spere.
 The jynnyng shields: doe shemre and moke
 glare 47; [f]dynne;
 The dotheynge oare doe make gemoted 48
 The reyng 49 foemen 50, thynckeynge gif 51
 to dare,
 Boun 52 the merk 53 swerde, theie seche to fraie 54, theie blyn 55.
 Sprytes of the bleste, and everyche seyncte ydedde,
 Poure owte yer pleasaunce onn mie fadres hedde.
 Now comm the warynge Sarafyns to fyghte;
 Kyng Rycharde, lyche a lyoncel 56 of warre,
 Inne slienyng 57 goulde, lyke feerie 57 groufers 58, dyghte 59.
 Shaketh alof hys honde, and seene affare.
 Syke haveth espyde a greter starre
 Amenge the drybblet 60 ons to sheene fulle
 bryghte;
 Syke sunnys wayne 61 wyth amayl'd 62 beams
 doe barr [f]lyghte.
 The blaunchie 63 mone, or estells 64 to gev

27 Rising high, swelling up. 28 they. 29 a corruption of estolle; Fr. a star. 30 evening.
 31 dark. 32 rebuffed shields; a herald term, when the charge of the shield implies the name of the bearer. 33 like. 34 along. 35 shine. 36 short-lived. 37 furious. 38 runneth. 39 not knowing.
 40 abide. 41 mighty. 42 affright. 43 woeful.
 44 covered. 45 different kinds of boats. 46 full soon, presently. 47 glitter. 48 united, assembled.
 49 running. 50 foes. 51 if. 52 make ready.
 53 dark. 54 engage. 55 cease, stand still. 56 a young lion. 57 flaming. 58 a meteor; from gros, a fen, and fer, a corruption of fire; that is, a fire exhaled from a fen. 59 decked. 60 small, insignificant. 61 carr. 62 enamelled. 63 white, silver. 64 stars.

Sprytes of the bleste, and everich feyncte ydedde,
 Pourte owte your pleasaunce on mie fadres hedde.

Disfraughte 65 affraie 66, wythe lockes of blodde-red die,

Termure, emburled 67 yn the thonders rage,
 Dethe, lynked to dismaie, dothe ussomme 68
 sie, [wage]

Enchafynge 69 echone champyonne war to Speeres bevyle 70 speres; swerdes upon swerdes engage;

Armoure on armoure dynn 71, shielde upon shielde;

No dethe of thousandes can the warre assuage,
 Botte falleynge numbers sable 72 all the feeide.
 Sprytes of the bleste, and everich feyncte ydedde,
 Pourte owte your pleasaunce on mie fadres hedde.

The foemen sal aronde; the crofs reles 73 hye;
 Steyned ynne goere, the harte of warre ys feen;
 Kyng Rycharde, thorough everych trepe dothe
 sie,

And beereth meynte 74 of Turkes onto the greene;

Bie hymmi the floure of Ayses meen ys steene 75;
 The walyng 76 mone doth fade before hys
 sonne; [deene 77,

Bie hym hys knyghtes bee formed to actions
 Docynge syke marvels 78, strongers be aston 79.
 Sprytes of the bleste, and everich feyncte ydedde,
 Pourte owte your pleasaunce on mie fadres hedde.

The fyghte ys wonne; Kyng Rycharde maffter is;

The Englonde banner kisseth the hie ayre;
 Full of pure joie the armie is iwys 80,

And everich one hæveth it onne his bayre 81;
 Agayne to Englonde comme, and worchepped
 there,

Twygbte 82 into lovyngre armes, and, feasted
 eate 83;

In everich eyne are dyngre nete of wyere 84,
 Of all remembrance of past payne bereite.

Sprytes of the bleste, and everich feyncte ydedde,
 Syke pleafres powre upon mie fadres hedde.

Syke Nigel sed; whan from the bluiet sea
 The upswol 85 sayle dyd daunce before his eyne;

Swifte as the wythe, he roe the beeches dyd sie,
 And founde his fadre sleppeynge from the bryne.

Lette thyssen menne, who hæveth sprite 86 loove,
 Bethyncke untoe hemselves howe frome the meetynge prove.

ECLOGUE III.

Would'st thou kenn nature in her better parte?
 Goe, serche the logges 1, and bordels 2 of the
 hynde 3;

65 Distracting, 66 affright, 67 armed, 68 terribly, 69 encouraging, heating, 70 break, a herald term signifying a spear broken in tilting, 71 sounds,

72 blacken, 73 waves, 74 many, great numbers, 75 slain, 76 decreasing, 77 glorious, worthy, 78 wonders, 79 astonished, 80 certainly,

81 brow, 82 plucked, pulled, 83 often, 84 grief, trouble, 85 swoln, 1 Lodges, huts, 2 cottages,

3 servant, slave, peasant.

Gyff 4 theie, have able, itte ys roughe made arte, [kynde 7,

Inne hem 5, you see the blakied 6 forme of Havethi your mynde a lycheyng 8 of a mynde?

Woulde it kenne everich thyngre, as it mote 9
 bee? [the hynde,

Woulde ytte here phrase of the vulgar from Without wyteegeger 10 wordes and knowlache 11

free?
 Gyf soe, rede thys, whyche iche dysporte-
 ynge 12 pende;

Gif nete besyde, yttes rhyme maie ytte commende.
 Manne.

Botte whether, fayre mayde, do ye goe?
 O where do ye bende yer waie?

I wille knowe whether you goe,
 I wille not bee affeled 13 naie.

Womanne.

To Rohyn and Nell, all downe in the delle,
 To hele 14 hem at makeynge of haie.

Manne.

Syr Rogerre, the parfoune, hav hyred mee there,
 Comme, comme, lett us tryppe ytte await,

We'lle wurke 15 and we'lle syngre, and wylle
 drenchre 16 of stronge beer

As longe as the merrie tomers dait.
 Womanne.

How harde ys mie dome to wurch!
 Make is mie woe,

Dame Agnes, whoe lies ynne the chyrche
 With birlette 17 golde,

Wythe gelten 18 aumers 19 stronge outbolde,
 What was thee moe than me, to be soe?

Manne.

I kenne Syr Roger from afar
 Tryppynge over the lea;

Ich ask whie the loversds 20 son
 Is moe than mee.

Syr Rogerre.

The sweltrie 21 sonne dothe hie space hys
 wayne 22,

From everich beme a seme 23 of lyfe doe falle;
 Swythyn 24 seille 25 oppe the haie uponne the playne; [talle,

Methynckes the cockes begynneth to gre 26
 Thys ys alyche our doome 27; the great, the
 smalle,

Moste withre 28 and bee forwyned 29 by deathe
 See 1 the swote 30 flourrette 31 haie noe swote
 at alle;

Itte wythe the ranke wede breathe evalle 32 parte.

4 If, 5 a contraction of them, 6 naked; original, 7 nature, 8 liking, 9 might, 10 The sense of this line is, Would'st thou see every thing in its primalval state, 11 wise-egger, a philosopher,

12 knowledge, 13 sporting, 14 answered, 15 aid, or help, 16 work, 17 drink, 18 a hood, or covering for the back part of the head, 19 gilded,

20 borders of gold and silver, on which was laid thin plates of either metal counterchanged, not unlike the present spangled laces, 20 lord, 21 fill-try, 22 car, 23 feed, 24 quickly, presently,

25 gather, 26 grow, 27 fate, 28 a contraction of wither, 29 dried, 30 sweet, 31 flower, 32 equal.

The cravant 33 warrioure, and the wyfe be blente 34.

Alyche to drie away wythe thofe theic dyd bement 35.

All-a-boon 36, Syr Priefte, all-a-boon,
Byc yur preeftichype nowe faic unto mee;
Syr Gaurdyr the knyghte who lyvethe harde bie,
Whi: fhoude hee than mee

Beec moc greate,

Inne honnoure, knyghthoode and cftate?

Syr Rogerre.

Attourne 37 thine eyne arounde thys haied mee,
Tentyflie 38 loke arounde the chaper 39 delle 40;
An anfwere to thie barganette 41 here fee,
Thys welked 42 flourette wylle a lefon telle:

Arist 43 it blew 44, itte florifhed and dyd welle,
Lokeynge afaunce 45 upon the naighboure greene;
Yet with the deigned 46 greene yttes rennome 47
to the felle.

Eftfoones 48 ytte thronke upon the daic-brente 49
Didde not yttes loke, whileft ytte there dyd
ftonde,

To croppe ytt in the bodde moye fomme dred
Syke 50 ys the waic of lyffe; the loverds 51
ente 52

Mooveth the robber hym therfor to flea 53;
Gyf thou has ethe 54, the shadowe of contente, Believe the trothe 55, theres uone moc haile 56
yan thee.

Thou wurcheft 57; welle, canne thatte a troble
Slothc moe wulde jade thee than the roughft daic.

Couldft thou the kivercled 58 of foughlys 59 fec,
Thou wouldest eftfoones 60 fee trothe ynne
whatte I faic;

Botte lette me heere thie waic of lyffe, and Heare thou from me the lyffes of other menne.

Manne.

I ryfe wythe the fonne,
Lyche hym to dryve the wayne 61,
And cere mie wurchc is don

I fynge a fonge or twayne 62.
I followe the plough-tayle,

Wythe a longe jubb 63 of ale.
Botte of the maydens, oh!

Itte lacketh notte to telle;
Syr preefte mote notte crie woe;

Culde hys bull do as welle.
I daunce the beste heie deygnes 64,

And foile 65 the wyfett feygnes 66.
On everych feynctes hie daic

Wythe the mynftrelle 67 am I feene;

33 Coward. 34 ceafed, dead, no more. 35 lam-
ent. 36 a manner of asking a favour. 37 turn.
38 carefully, with circumfpection. 39 dry, sunburnt. 40 valley. 41 a fong, or ballad. 42 withered. 43 arifen, or arofe. 44 bloffomed. 45 dif-
dainfully. 46 dafined. 47 glory. 48 quickly.
49 burnt. 50 fuch. 51 lord's. 52 a purfe, or bag.
53 flay. 54 cafe. 55 truth. 56 happy. 57 work-
eft. 58 the hidden or fecret part of. 59 fouls.
60 full-foon, or prefently. 61 ear. 62 two. 63 a bottle. 64 a country dance, ftill prafticed in the north. 65 battle. 66 a corruption of feints. 67 a minftrel is a mulician.

All a footeynge it awaie,
Wythe maydens on the greene.
But oh! I wyfhe to be moc greate,
In rennome, tenure, and cftate.

Syr Rogerre.

Has thou ne feene a tree uponne a hylle,
Whofe unliftc 68 braunces 69 rechen far too
fyghte;

When fuired 70 unwers 71 doe the heaven fylle,
Itte fhaketh deere 72 yn dole 73 and moke af-
fryghte.

Whileft the congeon 74 flowrette abeffie 75
Stondethe unhurte, unquaced 77 bic the ftorme:
Syke is a picte 78 of lyffe. the manne of myghte
Is tempeft-chaft 79, hys woe greate ashy's foame,
Thiefelfe a flowrette of a fmall accounte,

Wouldft harder felle the wynde, as hygher thee
dydftc mounte.

ELINOURE AND JUGA.

ONNE Ruddeborne i bank twa pynynge may-dens fate,

Their tears fafte dryppynge to the water:
Echone bementynge 2 for her abfente mate,
Who at Seyncte Albonis fhooke the northynge 3 fpeare.

The notteborne Elinoure to Juga fayre [eyne.
Dyde fpeke acroole 4, wythe languifhment of Lyche dropes of pearlie dew, lemed 5 the quyyryng brine.

Elinoure.

O gentle Juga! heare mie dernic 6 plainte,
To fyghte for Yorke mie love ys dyghte 7 in ftele;

O maie ne fanguen ftaine the whyte rofe peyncte,
Mai good Seyncte Cuthberte watche Sytre Roberte welle.

Moke moe thanne deathe in phantafie I feele;
See! fee! upon the ground hee bleedynge lies Inluld 8 fome joice 9 of lyffe, or elfe mie deare love dies.

Juga.

Syfters in forrowe, on thys daife-ey'd banke,
Where melancholych broods, we wylle lamente;
Be wette wythe mornynge dewe and evene
danke:

Lyche levynde 10 okes in eche the oder bente,
Or lyche forlettent 11 halles of merrimente, Whofe gafflic mitches 12 holde the train of
fryghte 13;

Where lethale 14 ravens bark, and owlets wake
[Elinoure.]

No moc the myfkynette 15 fhall wake the morne,
The minftrelle daunce, good cheere, and mor-
ryce plaie;

68 Unbounded. 69 branches. 70 furious. 71 tem-
pefts, ftorms. 72 dire. 73 difmay. 74 dwarf. 75 humility. 76 decked. 77 unhurt. 78 picture. 79 tem-peft-beaten.—1 Rudborne (in Saxon, red water), a river near St. Albans, famous for the battles there fought between the houfes of Lancafter and York.
2 lamenting. 3 murdering. 4 faintly. 5 gliften-
ed. 6 bad complaint. 7 arrayed, or cased. 8 in-fufe. 9 juice. 10 blafed. 11 forfaken. 12 ruins.
13 fear. 14 deadly, or deathboding. 15 a fmall bagpipe.

No more the amblunge palfrie and the borne
 Shall from the leffel 16 round the foxe awaie;
 I'll seeke the foreste all the lyve-longe daie;
 All nere among the gravde chyrche 17 glebe
 will goe, [of woe,
 And to the passante Spryghtes lecture 18 mie tale

Whan mokie 19 cloudis do hange upon the lense
 Of leden 20 moon, ynn sylver mantels dyghte;
 The tryppynge faeries weve the golden dreame
 Of selynesse, whyche flyethe wythe the nyghte;
 Then (botte the seynctes forbydde!) gif to a spryte [straughte
 Syrr Rycharde's forme ys lyped, I'll hold dy-
 Hys bledeynge claie colde corse, and die eche daie ynn thoughte.

Elinoure.

Ah woe bementynge wordes; what wordes can shewe! [bleede
 Thou limed 21 ryver, on this linche 23 maie
 Champyons, whose bloude wylle wythe this waterres flowe, [deede!
 And Rudborne streeme be Rudborne streeme in-
 Haste, gentle Jugs, tryppye ytte oere the meade,
 To knowe, or wheder we muste wail agayne,
 Or wythe oure fallen knyghtes be menged onne
 the plain.

Soc sayynge, lyke twa levyn-blasted trees,
 Or wayne of cloudes that holdeth flormie rayne;
 Theie moved gentle oere the dewie mees 24,
 To where Seyncte Albonsholie shrynes remaine.
 There dyd theye fynde that bothe their knyghtes
 were slayne, [bornes lyde,
 Distraughte 25 theie wandered to swollen Rud-
 Yelled theye leathalle knelle, sonke ynn the waves, and dyde.

TO JOHNE LADGATE

(Sent with the following songe to ELLA.)

WELL thanne, gode Johne, sythe ytt must needes be soe,
 Thatt thou and I a bowtyng match must have;
 Lette ytt ne breakynge of oulde friondschyppe bee,
 Thys ys the onelic all-a-boone I crave.
 Remember Stowe, the Bryghtflowe Carmalyte,
 Who whainne John Clarkeynge, one of myckle lare, Dydd throwe hys gauntlette-penne, wyth hym to fyghte, [more.
 Hee showed smalle wytte, and showd hys weaknesse
 Thys ys mie formance, whyche I nowe have wrytte,
 The best performance of mie lyttel wytte.

SONG TO ELLA,

Lorde of the Castel of Brystowe ynn daies of yore.

OH thou, orr what remaines of thee,
 ELLA, the darlyng of futurity,
 Lett thys mie songe bold as this courage be,
 As everlastynge to posteritye.
 Whanne Dacya's foonnes, whose hayres of bloude redde hue, [ing due,
 Lyche kyngge-cuppes brastyng wythe the morn-

16 In a confined sense, a bush or hedge, though sometimes used as a forest. 17 church-yard. 18 relate. 19 black. 20 decreasing. 21 happines. 22
 glassy. 23 bank. 24 meeds. 25 distracted.

Arraug'd ynn dreare arraie,
 Uponne the lethale daie,
 Spredde farre and wyde onne Watchets fiore;
 Than dyddst thou furiose stande,
 And bie thee vaijante hand
 Beesprengedd all the mees wythe gore.

Drawn bie thyn anlace felle,
 Downe to the depthe of helle
 Thousandes of Dacyanns went;
 Bryflowannes, menne of myghte,
 Ydar'd the bloudie fyghte,
 And acted deeds full quent.

Oh thou, whereer (thie bones att reste)
 Thye spryte to haunte deliytheth beste,
 Whether uponne the bloude-embrewedd pleyn,
 Orr whare thou kennst fromm farre,
 The dysmall cry of warre, [fleyne;
 Orr feest fomnie mountayne made of coric of Orr feest the hatchedd stede,

 Ypraunceynge o'er the mede,
 And neighe to be amenged the poyntedd speeres;
 Orr ynn blacke amourre staulke arounde
 Embattel'd Brystowe, once thie grounde,
 And glowe ardurous onn the Castle steers;

Orr fierye round the mynsterr glare;
 Lette Brystowe styll be made thie care; [fyre;
 Garde ytt fromme foemenne and confumynge
 Lyche Avones streeme ensyrke ytte rounde,
 Ne leette a flame enbarne the grounde,
 Tylle ynn one flame all the whole world expyre,

The underwritten lines were composd by John Ladgate a Priest in London, and sent to Rowlic, as an answer to the preceding Songe of ELLA.

HAVYNG wythe mouche attentyonn redde
 What you dydd to mee fend,
 Admyre the varfes mouche I dydd,
 And thus an answerr lende.

Amongs the Greeces Homer was
 A poett mouche renownde,
 Amongs the Lotyns Virgilius
 Was beste of poets founde.

The Brytish Merlynn oftene hanne
 The gyfte of inspyration,
 And Asked to the Sexonne menne
 Dydd fyng wythe elocation.

Ynn Norman tymes, Turgotus and Good Chaucer dydd excelle,
 Then Stowe, the Bryghtflowe Carmalyte,
 Dydd bare awaie the belle.

Nowe Rowlic ynn these mokie dayes
 Lendes owte hys sheenynge lychtes,
 And Turgotus and Chaucer lyves
 Ynn ev'ry lynch he wrytes.

THE TOURNAMENT.

AN INTERLUDE.

Enter an Jevateude.

THE tournament begynnes; the hammer sounde;
 The coursfers lyffe 1 about the mensuredd 2 felde;

1 Sport or play. 2 bounded, or measured.

The hemrynge armour throws the shene arounde;
 Quayntified 2 fons 3 depictedd 4 onn eche
 sheelde. [amielde 6,
 The feerie 5 heulmets, wythe the wreathes
 Supports the rampynge lyoncell 7 orr beare,
 Wythe straunge depyctures 8, Nature maie nott
 Unfeemelie to all order doe appere; [yeelde, Yett yatte 9 to menne, who thyncke and have a spryte 10
 Makes knowen that the phantasies unryghte.

I, sonne of honnoure, spencer 11 of her joies,
 Muste swythen 12 goe to yeve 13 the speeres
 arounde, [emploie,
 Wythe advantayle 14 and borne 15 I meynte 16
 Who withoute mee woulde fall untoe the grounde.
 Soe the tall oake the ivie twysteth rounde;
 Soe the neshe 17 flower grees 18 ynne the woodeland shade. [founde;
 The worlde bie diffraunce ys ynne orderr
 Wydhoue unlikeneffe nothyng could bee made.
 As ynn the bowke 19 nete 20 alleyn 21 can bee
 donne,
 Syke 22 ynn the weal of kynde all thynges are partes of onne.

Enter Syr Symonne de Bourtonne.

Herawde 23, bie heavenne thet tylters staie too long.
 Mic phantafic ys dyinge forr the fyghte.
 The mynstrelles have begonne the thyrd warr
 souge. [fyghte.
 Yett nette a speere of hermm 24 hath grete mie
 I feere there be ne manne wordhie mie myghte.
 I lacke a Guid 25, a Wyllyamm 26 to entylte.
 To reine 27 anente 28 a felle 29 embodiedd
 knyghte, [spylte.
 Ytt gettes ne rennome 30 gyff hys blodde bee
 Bic Heavenne and Marie ytt ys tyme they're here; [spere.
 I lyche nott unthylle 31 thus to wiede the Herawde.

Methynkes I hear yer slughornes 32 dynn 33
 from farre.
Bourtonne.
 Ah! swythen 34 mie shielde and tylyng
 launce bee bounde 35.

Eftfoones 36 becheste 37 mie squyerr to the warr.
 I fie before to clayme a challenge grownde. [Geeb oute.

Herawde.

This valourous actes woulde meinte 38 of menne
 aftounde; [fyghte;
 Harde bee yer shappe 39 encontryng thee ynn

2 Curiously devised. 3 faney's or devices. 4 painted, or displayed. 5 fiery. 6 ornamented, enamelled. 7 a young lion. 8 drawings, paintings. 9 that. 10 soul. 11 dispenser. 12 quickly. 13 give. 14 armor. 15 burnish. 16 many. 17 young, weak, tender. 18 grows. 19 body. 20 nothing. 21 alone. 22-so. 23 herald. 24 a contraction of ibem. 25 Guie de Santo Espido, the most famous tilter of his age. 26 William Rufus. 27 run. 28 against. 29 feeble. 30 honour, glory. 31 useless. 32 a kind of clarion. 33 found. 34 quickly. 35 ready. 36 soon. 37 command. 38 most. 39 fate, or doom.

Anent 40 all menne thou bereft to the grounde,
 Lyche the hard hayle dothe the tall rothespyghte
 41.
 As whanne the mornynge sonneydronkethe dew,
 Syche dothe thie valorous acts droncke 42 eche
 knyghte's huc.

THE LYSTES.

The Kyng, Syr Symonne de Bourtonne, Syr Hugo Ferraris, Syr Ranulph Newille, Syr Lodovick de Clynton, Syr Jobnde Bergomme, and odherr knyghtes, Herawdes, Mynstrelles, and Serceytours 43.

Kyng.

The barganette 43; yee mynstrelles tunc the strynge, [lyng.
 Somme actyonn dyre of antyante kynges now
Mynstrelles.

Wyllamm, the Normannes flour botte Englonde's
 throne.

The manne whose myghte delievretie 44 had knite 45,

Snett 46 oppe hys long strunge bowe and sheelde
 aborne 47,

Bechesteynge 48 all hys honnoureres 49 to fyghte.
 Goe, ronze the lyonn from hys hylted 50 denne;

Let thie flos 51 drenche the blodde of anie thyng
 bott menne.

Ynn the treed forreste doe the knyghtes appere;
 Wyllamm wythe myghte hys bowe enyronn'd

52 plies 53; [eare;
 Loude dynns 54 the arrowe yn the wolffynn's
 Hee ryfeth batten 55, roares, he panctes, hee dyes.

Forflaggenn att thie feete lett wolvyngs bee,
 Lett thie flos drenche theyre blodde, bott do ne
 bredrenn flea.

Throwe the merke 56 shade of twifyng trees
 hee rydes; [wyng;
 The flemed 57 owlett 58 flapps herr eve-speekte
 The lordynge 60 toade yn all hys passies bides;
 The berten 61 neders 62 att hynim darte the
 stynge;

Styll, styll, he passies onn, hys stede astrodde,
 Nee hedes the daungerous waie gyff leadyng un-toe bloodde.

The lyoncel, fromme sweltrie 63 countries
 braughte,

Coucheynge binethe the sheltre of the brierr,
 Att commynge dynn 64 doth rayse himselfe dis-
 traughte 65,

He loketh wyth an eie of flames of fyre.
 Goe, sticke the lyonn to hys hyltren denne,
 Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

The lyoncel, fromme sweltrie 63 countries
 braughte,

Coucheynge binethe the sheltre of the brierr,
 Att commynge dynn 64 doth rayse himselfe dis-
 traughte 65,

He loketh wyth an eie of flames of fyre.
 Goe, sticke the lyonn to hys hyltren denne,
 Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

He loketh wyth an eie of flames of fyre.
 Goe, sticke the lyonn to hys hyltren denne,
 Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

Lette thie flos 66 drench the blodde of anie thyng
 botte menn.

40 Against. 41 pitched, or bent down. 42 drink. 43 servant, attendants. 44 song, or ballad. 45 activity. 46 bent. 47 burnished. 48 commanding. 49 servants. 50 hidden. 51 arrows. 52 worked with iron. 53 bends. 54 sounds. 55 loudly. 56 dark, or gloomy. 57 and 58 frighted owl. 59 marked with evening dew. 60 standing on their hind legs. 61 venomous. 62 aduers. 63 hot, sultry. 64 sound, noise. 65 distracted. 66 arrow.

Wythe passent 67 steppē the lyonn mov'th alonge;
Wyllamm has ironne-woven bowe hee bendes,
Wythe mayghte alyche the roghlyne 68 thonderr
stronge;

The lyonn ynn a roare hys spryte foorth fendes.
Goe, flea the lyonn ynn hys blodde-stein'd denne,
Botte bec the takelle 69 dree fromm blodde of odherr
mennē

Swefte from the thyckett starks the stagge
awaic;

The couraciers 70 as swefte doc afterr fle.
Hee lepethe hic, hee stondes, hee kepes att baie,
Botte metes the arrow, and estsoones 71 doth
die.

Forflagenn atte thie fote lette wyld beastes bee,
Lett thie floes drenche yer blodde, yett do ne bredrenn
flee.

Wythe murther tyredd, hee sleynge hys howe
alyne 72.

The slagge ys ouch'd 73 wythe crownes of lillie
Arounde theire heaulmes theie grencē verte doc entwyne;

Joying and rev' lous ynn the grene wode bowers.
Forflagenn wyth thie floe lette wyld beastes bee,
Fecste thee uppōnc theire fleshe, doe ne thie bredren
flee.

Now to the Tournie 74; who wylle fyrste af-
fraie 75?

Nevylle, a baronne, bee yatte 76 honnoure thync.

I clayme the passage.

I contake 77 thie waic.

Thenn there's mie gauntlette 78 onn mie gaberdyne 79.

A leegefull 80 challenge, knyghtes and cham-
pyonns dyngē 81,

A leegefull challenge, lette the slugghorne founde.

Nevyll ys goeynge, manne and horse, toe grounde.

Loverdes, howe doughtilie 82 the tylters joyne!

Yec champyounnes, here Symonne de Bourtonne fyghtes,

Onne hee hatbe quacedd 83, assayle 84 hymm, yec
knyghtes.

I wyll anente 85 hymm go; mie squierr, mie
shilde;

Orr onne orr odherr wyll doe myckle 86

Before I doc departe the liffedd 88 fiede,
Miefelce or Bourtonne hereuppōnn wyll blethe
89. Mie shilde,

Comme onne, and fitte thie tylte-launce ette 90.
Whanne Bourtonne fyghtes, hee meets a doughtie foe.

Hee falleth; nowe bie heavenne thie woundes
doe smethe 91;

I seere mee, I have wroughte thee myckle wee
Bourtonne hys seconde beereth to the feelde.
Comme onn, ye knyghtes, and wynn the honour'd fieeld.

I take the challenge; iquyre, mie launce and stede.
I, Bourtonne, take the gauntlette for mee staie.
Botte, gyff thou fyghtelle mee, thou shalt have mede 93;

Somme odherr I wyll champyonn toe affraie 94;
Perchaunce fromme hemm I maie possels the daie,
Then I schalle bee a soemanne forr thie spere.
Herehawde, toe the banks of knyghtys saie,
De Berghamme wayteth for a soemann heree.

Botte longe thou schalte ne tende 95; I doc thee fie 96.

Lyche forreyng 97 levynn 98, schalle mie tylte-[Berghamme and Clinton tylte. Clinton falleth.

Nowe, nowe, Syrr Knyghte, attoure 99 thie
beeverded 100 eye,

I have borne downe, and este 101 doe gauntlette
Swythenne 102 begynne, and wrynn 103 thie
shappe 104 orr myne;

Gyff thou dyscomfytt, ytt wylle dobblie bee.
[Bourtonne and Berghamme tylltē. Berghamme falls.

Symonne de Bourtonne haveth borne downe three,

And bie the thyrd hath honnoure of a fourthe.
Lett hymm bee fett asyde, tylle hee doth see
A tylynge forr a knyghte, of gentile wourthe.

Heere commethe straunge knyghtes; gyff cor-
teous 105 heie 106,
Ytt welle besieies 107 to yeve 108, hemm ryghte
of fraic 109.

Straungers wee bee, and homblie doc wee claym:
The rennomes 110 yn thys tourneie 111 forr to tylte;

Dherbie to proove fromm craventes 112 owre
Bewryngē 113; that wee gentile blodde have spylte.

Yec knyghtes of cortseie, these straungers, saie,
Bee you full wyllynge forr to yeve hemm fraic?

67 Walking-leisurely. 68 rolling. 69 arrow.
70 horse courfers. 71 full soon. 72 across his shoulders. 73 garlands of flowers being put round the neck of the game, it was said to be ouch'd, from each, a chain worn by earls round their necks. 74 tournament. 75 fight, or encounter. 76 that. 77 dispute. 78 glove. 79 a piece of armour. 80 lawful. 81 worthy. 82 furiously. 83 vanquished.
84 oppose. 85 against. 86 much. 87 damage, mischief.

88 Bounded. 89 bleed. 90 easy. 91 smoke. 92
hurt, or damage. 93 reward. 94 fight, or engage.
95 attend, or wait. 96 defy. 97 and 98 destroying lightning. 99 turn. 100 beavered. 101 again.
102 quickly. 103 declare. 104 fate. 105 worthy.
106 they. 107 becomes. 108 give. 109 fight.
110 honour. 111 tournament. 112 cowards. 113 declaring.

[Eyve knyghtes tylteth wythe the straunge knyghte, and bee everichone 114 overtrowne.

Bourtonne.

Nowe bie Seyncte Marie, gyff onn alle the fielde
Ycraffed 115 speeres and helmetts bee besprente
116, [117 sheeld;

Gyff everych knyghte dydd houde a piercedd
Gyff alle the feelde wythe champyonne blodde
bee sientte 118,

Yet toe encounter hym I bee contente,
Annodherr lance, Marshalle, anodherr lance,
Albyette hee wythe lowes 119 of fyre ybrente
120,

Yett Bourtonne woulde agenste hys wale 121
Eyve haveth fallenn downe anethe 122 hys speere,
Botte hee schalle bee the next that falleth here.
Bie thee, Seyncte Marie, and thy Sonne I sweare, Thatt ynn whatte place yonn doughtie knyghte shall fall

Anethe 123 the stronge push of mie straughte 124
There schalle aryse a hallie 125 chyrcches walle,
The wyche, ynn honnoure, I wyllh Marye ofroude.

Wythe pillars large, and spyre full hyghe and
And thys I faillie 126 wyll stonde to all,
Gyff yonnstranger falleth to the grounde.

Straungerr, bee boune 127; I champyonn 128
you to warre.

Sounde, founde the slughornes, to bee hearde fromm farre.

[Bourtonne and the Straunger tylt. Straunger sal- leth. 129

Kynge.

The mornynge tyltes now cease,
130

Bourtonne ys kynge.

Dysplaie the Englysh bannerre onn the tente;
Rounde hym, yee mynstralles, songs of achiments
129 syng; [130;

Yee herawdes, getherr upp the speeres besprente
To kynge of Tourney-tylte bee all knees bente.
Dames faire and gentie, for your loves hee foughte;
Forr you the longe tylte-lance, the swerde-
hee sientte 131,

Hee jonstedd, alleine 132 havynge you ynn
Comme, mynstralles; founde the fryngie, goe onn
eche syde,

Whylest hee untoe the Kynge ynn state doe ryde.
Mynstralles.

Whann Battayle, smethynge 133 wythe new-quick-enn'd gore, shedde,

Bendynge wyth spoiles, and bloddie droopynge
Dydd the merke 134 woode of ethe 135 and reit explore,

Seekynge to lie onn pleasures downie bedde,
Pleasure, dauncynge fromm her wode,
Wreathedd wythe floures of aiglintine,

114 Every one. 115 broken, split. 116 scattered.
117 broken, or pierced through with darts. 118 stained. 119 flames. 120 burnt. 121 healn. 122 beneath. 123 against. 124 stretched out. 125
holy. 126 faithfully. 127 ready. 128 challenge.
129 atchievements, glorious actions. 130 broken spears. 131 broke, destroyed. 132 only, alone.
133 smoking, streaming. 134 dark, gloomy. 135
caie.

From hys wyfage washedd the bloude,
Hylyte 136 hys swerde and gaberdyne.

Wythe vyke, an eyne siece swotelic 137 hym dydd
view;

Dydd foe yorvenn 138 everrie shape to joie,
Hys spryte dydd change, untoe, anodherr hue,
Hys armes, ne spoyles, mote any thoughts emploie

All delyghtfomme and contente,
Fyre enthoyng 139 fromm hys eyne,
Ynn hys armes he dydd herr hente 140,

Lyche the merke 141 plante doe entwynne.
Soe, gyff thoud lovest pleasure and herr trayne;
Onknowlachynge 142 ynn whatt place heer to
fynde,

Thys rule yspende 143, and ynn thie mynde re-
Seeke honnoure fyrte, and pleasaunce lies behynde.

BRISTOWE TRAGEDIE.

OR, THE DETHE OF SYR CHARLES BAWDIN.

THE featherd songster chaunticleer
Han wounde hys bugle horneye

And tolde the earlie villager
The commynge of the morne

Kynge Edwarde sawe the ruddie streakes
Of lyghte eclypse the greie;

And here the raven's crokyng throte
Proclayme the fated daie

"Thou'rt ryght," quod he, "for, by the Godde
That fyttes enthron'd on hyghe

"Charles Bawdin, and hys fellowes twaine,
To daie shall surelie die.

Thenne wythe a juggle of nappy ale
Hys knyghtes dydd onne hymn waite;

"Goe tell the traytour, thatt to daie
Hee leaves thys mortall state."

Syr Cantlerone thenne bendedd lowe,
Wythe harte brymm-fulle of woe;

Hee journey'd to the castle-gate,
And to Syr Charles dydd goe.

But wenne hee came, hys children twaine,
And eke hys lovyng wyfe,

Wythe brinie tears dydd wett the floore,
For goode Syr Charleses lyfe.

"O goode Syr Charles!" sayd Cantlerone,
Badde tydyngs I doe bryng;

"Speke boldlie, manne," sayd brave Syr Charles,
"Whatte says the traytor kynge?"

"I greeve to telle; before yonne sonne
Does fromme the welkin fyre,

"Hee hath uppon hys honour sworne,
"Thatt thou shalt surelie die."

"Wee all must die," quod brave Syr Charles;
"Of thatte I'm not affearde;

"Whatte bootes to lyve a litle space?
"Thanke Jesu, I'm prepar'd;

136 Hid, secreted. 137 sweetly. 138 moulded.
139 shooting, darting. 140 graspe, hold. 141 night-
shade. 142 ignorant, unknowing. 143 consider.

Butt telle thye kynge, for myne hee's not,
 " I'de sooner die to-daie,
 " Thanne lyve hys slave, as manie are,
 " Though I shoulde lyve for aie."

Then Canterlooe hee dydd goe out,
 To telle the maior straitte
 To gett all thynges ynnie redundancyes
 For goode Syr Charleses fate.

Thenne Maisterr Canynge laughte the kynge,
 And felle downe oune hys knee;
 " I'm come," quod hee, " unto your grace
 " To move your clemencye."

Thenne quod the kynge, " Youre tale speke out,
 " You have been much oure friende;
 " Whatever youre request may bee,
 " Wee wylle to ytte attende."

" My nobile leige! alle my request,
 " Ys for a nobile knyghte,
 " Who, though may hap hee has donne wronge,
 " Hee thoughte ytte styll was ryghte:"

" He has a spouse and children twaine,
 " Alle rewyn'd are for aie;
 " Yff that you are resolv'd to lett
 " Charles Bawdin die to-dai."

" Speke not of such a traytour vile,"
 " The kynge ynn furie sayde;
 " Before the evening starre doth sheene,
 " Baydin shall loofe hys hedde:"

" Justice does loudlie for hym calle,
 " And hee shall have hys meede:"

" Speke, Maister Canynge! whatte thyng eise
 " Att present doe you neede?"

" My nobile leige!" goode Canynge sayde,
 " Leave justice to our Godde,
 " And laye the yronne rule asyde;
 " Be thyne the olyve rodde."

" Was Godde to serche our hertes and reines,
 " The best were synners grete;
 " Christ's vicar, only knowes as synne,
 " Ynne alle thys mortall state."

" Lest mercie rule thyne infante reigne,
 " Twylle faste thyne crowne fulle sure;
 " From race to race thyne familie
 " Alle sov'reigns shall endure:"

" But yff wythe bloode and slaughter thou
 " Beginne thy infante reigne,
 " Thy crowne upponne thy chyldrennes brows
 " Wylle never long remayne."

" Canynge, awaie! thys traytour vile
 " Has scorn'd my power and mee;
 " Howe canst thou then for such a manne
 " ntreate my clemencye?"

" My nobile leige! the trulie brave
 " Wylle val'rous actions prize,
 " Respect a brave and nobile mynade,
 " Although ynne enemies."

" Canynge, awaie! By Godde ynne Heav'n
 " Thatt dydd mee beinge gyve,
 " I wylle nott taste a bitt of breade
 " Whylst thys Syr Charles dothe lyve,

" By Marie, and alle Seindes ynne Heav'n,
 " Thys sunne shall be hys laste,"
 Thenne Canynge dropt a brinie teare,
 And from the presence paste.

Wyth herte brymm-fulle of gnawynge grief,
 Hee to Syr Charles dydd goe,
 And sat hymn downe upponne a foole,
 And teares beganne to flowe.

" Wee all must die," quod brave Syr Charles;
 " Whatte bootes ytte howe or whenne;
 " Dethe ys the sure, the certaine fate
 " Of all wee mortall menne."

" Saye why, my friende, thie honest soul
 " Runns over att thine eye;
 " Is ytt for my most welcome doome,
 " Thatt thou dost child-lyke crye?"

Quod godlie Canynge, " I doe weepe,
 " Thatt thou soe soone must dye,
 " And leave thy sonnes and helpless wyfe;
 " Tys thys thatt wettes myne eye."

" Thenne drie the tears thatt out thine eye
 " From godlie fountaines sprynge;
 " Dethe I despise, and alle the power
 " Of Edwarde, traytour kynge."

" Whan through the tyrant's welcom means
 " I shall resigne my lyfe,
 " The Godde I serve wylle soone provyde
 " For bothe mye sonnes and wyfe."

" Before I sawe the lyghtsome sunne,
 " Thys was appointed mee;
 " Shall mortall manne repyne or grudge
 " What Godde ordeynes to bee?"

" Howe oft ynne bataille have I stoode,
 " Whan thousand dy'd arounde;
 " Whan smokyng stremes of crimson bloode
 " Imbrew'd the fatten'd grounde:"

" Howe dydd I knowe thatt ev'ry darte,
 " Thatt cutte the arie waie,
 " Myghte nott fynde passage to my harte,
 " And close myne eyes for aie?"

" And shall I nowe, forr feere of dethe,
 " Looke wanne and bee dysmayde?
 " Ne! fromm my herte flie chyllysh feere,
 " Bee alle the manne display'd."

" Ah, goddelyke Henrie! Godde forefende,
 " And garde thee and thys sonne,
 " Yff 'tis hys wylle; but yff 'tis nott,
 " Why thenne hys wylle bee donne."

" My honest friende, my faulte has beene
 " To serve Godde and mye prynce;
 " And thatt I no tyme-server am,
 " My dethe wylle soone convynce."

" Ynne Londonne citey was I borne,
 " Of parents of grete note;
 " My fadre dydd a nobile armes
 " Emblazon onne hys cote:"

" I make no doubtte butt hee ys gone
 " Where soone I hope to goe;
 " Where wee for ever shall bee blest,
 " From oute the reach of woe,

" Hee taughte mee justice and the laws
 " Wyth pitie to unite;
 " And eke hee taughte mee howe to knowe
 " The wronge cause fromm the ryghte:
 " Hee taughte mee wyth a prudent hande
 " To feede the hungrie poore,
 " Ne lett mye farvants dryve awaie
 " The hungrie fromme my doore:
 " And none can faye butt alle mye lyfe
 " I have hys wordyes kept;
 " And summ'd the actyonns of the daie
 " Eche nyghte before I slept.
 " I have a spouse, goe aske of her
 " Yff I defy'd her bedde?
 " I have a kyng, and none can laie
 " Black treason onne my hedde.
 " Ynne Lent, and onne the holie eve,
 " Fromm fleshe I dydd refrayne;
 " Whie should I thenne appeare dismay'd
 " To leave thys worlde of payne?
 " Ne, hapless Henric! I rejoyce
 " I shall ne see thye dethe;
 " Most willynglie ynne thye just cause
 " Doe I resign my brethe.
 " Oh, fickle people! rewyn'd londe!
 " Thou wylt kenne peace ne moe;
 " Whyle Richard's sonnes exalt themselves
 " Thy brookes wythe bloude wylle flowe.
 " Saie, were ye tyr'd of godlie peace
 " And godlie Henric's reigne,
 " Thatt you dyd choppe your easie daies
 " For those of bloude and peyne?
 " Whatte though I onne a sledge be drawne,
 " And mangled by a hynde,
 " I doe defye the traytor's pow'r,
 " Hee can ne harm my mynde;
 " Whatte though, uphoisted onne a pelc,
 " Mye lymbes shall rotte ynne ayre,
 " And ne ryche monument of brasse
 " Charles Bawdin's name shall bear;
 " Yett ynne the holie book above,
 " Whyche tyme can't eate awaie,
 " There wythe the farvants of the Lord
 " Mye name shall lyve for aie.
 " Thenne welcome dethe! for lyfe eterne
 " I leave thys mortall lyfe:
 " Farewell vayne worlde, and all that's deare,
 " Mye sonnes and lovyng wyfe!
 " Nowe dethe as welcome to mee comes
 " As e'er the moneth of Maie;
 " Nor woulde I even wythe to lyve,
 " Wyth my dere wyfe to staie."
 Quod Canynge, " Tys a goodlie thyng
 " To bee prepar'd to die;
 " And from thys worlde of peyne and grefe
 " To Godde ynne heav'n to flie."
 And nowe the belle began to tolle,
 And claryonnes to found;
 Syr Charles hec herde the horses feete
 A prauncyng onne the grounde:

And just before the officers
 His lovyng wyfe came ynne,
 Weepyng unfeigned teers of woe,
 Wythe loude and dysmalle dynne.
 " Sweet Florence! nowe I prae forbere,
 " Ynn quiet lett mee die;
 " Praie Godde that ev'ry Christian soule
 " Maye looke onne thethe as I.
 " Sweet Florence! why these brinie teers?
 " Theye washe my soule awaie,
 " And almost make mee wythe for lyfe,
 " Wyth thee, sweete dame, to staie.
 " Tys butt a journie I shall goe:
 " Untoe the lande of blyss;
 " Nowe, as a proove of husbände's love,
 " Receive thys holie kyffe."
 Thenne Florence, fault'ring ynne her saie, Tremblyng these wordyes spoke,
 " Ah, cruell Edward! bloudie kyng!
 " Mye herte ys welle nyghe broke:
 " Ah, sweete Syr Charles! why wylt thou goe,
 " Wythoute thye lovyng wyfe?
 " The cruell axe thatt cuttes thye necke,
 " Ytte eke shall ende mye lyfe."
 And nowe the officers came ynne
 To bryng Syr Charles awaie,
 Whoe turnedd toe hys lovyng wyfe,
 And thus to her dydd saie:
 " I goe to lyfe, and nott to dethe;
 " Truste thou ynne Godde above,
 " And teache thy sonnes to feare the Lorde,
 " And ynne theyre hertes hym love;
 " Teache them to runne the noble race
 " Thatt I theyre fader runne;
 " Florence! shou'd dethe thee take—adieu!
 " Yee officers leade onne."
 Thenne Florence rav'd as anie madde,
 And dydd her tresses tere;
 " Oh staie mye husbände, lorde, and lyfe!"—
 Syr Charles thenne dropt a teare.
 Tyll tyredd oute wythe rayvng loude,
 Shee fellen onne the flore;
 Syr Charles exerted alle hys myghte,
 And march'd fromm oute the dore.
 Uponne a sledge hee mounted thenne,
 Wythe looks fulle brave and swete;
 Lookes thatt enshone ne moe concern
 Thanne anie ynne the strete.
 Before hym went the council-menne,
 Ynne scarlett robes and golde,
 And tassils spanglyng ynne the sunne,
 Muche glorious to beholde:
 The Freers of Seincte Augustyne next
 Appeared to the fyghte,
 Alle cladd ynne homelic russett weedes,
 Of godlie monkysh plyghte:
 Ynne diffraunt partes a godlie chaume
 Moste sweetlie theye dyd chaunt;
 Behynde theyre backs six mynstrelles came,
 Who tun'd the strunge bataunt,

Thenne fyve-and-twenty archers came;
 Echone the bowe dydd bende,
 From rescue of Kynge Henries friends
 Syr Charles forr to defend.

Bolde as a Lyon came Syr Charles,
 Drawne onne a cloth-layde sledde,
 Bye two blacke stedes ynnne trappynge white,
 Wyth plumes upponne theyre hedde: 14

Behynde hym fyve-and-twenty moe
 Of archers stronge and floute,
 Wyth bended bowe echone ynnne hande,
 Marched ynnne goodlie route:

Seinte James Fréers marched next,
 Echone hys parte dydd chaunt;
 Behynde theyre backs fyx mynffrelles came,
 Who tun'd the frunge bataunt:

Thenne came the maior and eldermenne,
 Ynnne clothe of scarlett deck't,
 And theyre attendyng menne echone,
 Lyke casterne princes trick't:

And after them a multitude
 Of citizenns dydd thronge;
 The wyndows wére alle fulle of heddes
 As hee dydd passe alonge.

And whenne hee came to the hyghe crosse,
 Syr Charles dydd turne and faie,
 "O thou thatt favest manne fromme synne,
 "Washe mye soule cleare thys daie!"

Att the grete mynster wyndowe fat
 The kynge ynnne myckle state,
 To see Charles Bawdin goe alonge
 To hys most welcom fate.

Soone as the sledde drewe nyghe enowe
 Thatt Edwarde hee myghte here,
 The brave Syr Charles hee dydd stande uppe,
 And thys hys wordes declare:

"Thou seest me, Edwarde! traytour vile!
 "Expos'd to infamie;
 "Butt bee assur'd, disloyall manne!
 "I'm greater nowe thanne thée.

"Bye soule procedyngs, murdre, bloude,
 "Thou wearest nowe a crowne;
 "And hast appoynted mee to die,
 "By power nott thyne owne.

"Thou thynkest I shall dye to-daie;
 "I have bene dede 'till nowe,
 "And soone shall lyve to weare a crowne
 "For aie upponne my browe:

"Whylst thou, perhaps, for som few yeares,
 "Shalt rule thys sickle lande,
 "To lett them knowe howe wyde the rule
 "Twixt kynge and tyrant hande:

"Thye pow'r unjust, thou traytour slave!
 "Shall falle onne thye owne hedde"—
 Fromm out of hearyng of the kynge
 Departed thenne the sledde.

Kynge Edwarde's soule rush'd to hys face,
 Hee turn'd hys hedde awaic,

And to hys broder Gloucester,
 Hee thus dydd speke and faie:

"To hym that soe much dreaded dethe,
 "Ne ghastlie terrors brynge,
 "Beholde the mannel hee spake the truthe,
 "Hee's greater thanne a kynge!"

"Soe lett hym die!" Duke Richarde fayde;
 "And maye echone oure foes
 "Bende downe theyre neckes to bloudie axe,
 "And feede the carryon crows."

And nowe the horses gentlie drewe
 Syr Charles uppe the hyghe hylle;
 The axe dydd glysterr ynnne the sunne,
 His pretious bloude to spylle.

Syr Charles dydd uppe the scaffold goe,
 As uppe a gilded carre
 Of victory, bye val'rous chiefs
 Gayn'd ynnne the bloudie warre:

And to the people hee dyd faie,
 "Beholde you see mee dye,
 "For servynge loyally mye kynge,
 "Mye kynge most ryghtfulle.

"As longe as Edwarde rules thys lande,
 "Ne quiet you wyll knowe:
 "Your sonnes and husbandes shall bee flayne,
 "And brookes wythe bloude shall flowe.

"You leave your goode and lawfull kynge
 "Whenne ynnne advertise;
 "Lyke mee, untoe the true cause flycke,
 "And for the true cause dye."

Thenne hee; wyth preestes, upponne hys knees,
 A pray'r to Godde dyd make,
 Befechynge hym unto hymselfe
 Hys partyng soule to take.

Thenne, kneelyng downe, hee layd hys hedde
 Most seemlie onne the blocke;
 Whyche fromme hys bodie fayre at once
 The able heddes-manne stroke:

And oute the bloude begann to flowe,
 And rounde the scaffold twyne;
 And teares, snow to washe't awaic,
 Dydd flowe fromme each mann's eyne.

The bloudie axe hys bodie fayre
 Ynnne foure partes cutte;
 And ev'ry parte, and eke hys hedde,
 Upponne a pole was putte.

One parte dyd rotte onne Kynwulph-hylle,
 One onne the mynster-tower,
 And one from off the castle-gate,
 The crowen dydd devoure:

The other onne Seyncte Powle's goode gate,
 A dreery spectacle;
 Hys hedde was plac'd onne the hyghe crosse,
 Ynnne hyghe-streete most noble.

Thus was the ende of Bawdin's fate:
 Godde prosper longe oure kynge,
 And grante hee maye, wyth Bawdin's soule,
 Ynnne heav'n Godd's mercie synge!

ELLA:

A Tragycal Enterlude, or Discoorsyng Tragedy. Wrotten by Thomas Rowleie; Plaiedd before Mafstre Canynge, atte hys Howse nempte the Roade Lodge; alsoe before the Duke of Norfolk, Johan Howard.

PERSONNES REPRESENTEDD.

ELLA, bie Thomas Rowleie; Preeffe, the Aubour.

GELMONDE, Johan Iscanni, Preeffe.

HURRA, Syrr Thybhotte Gorges, Knyghte.

BIRTHA, Mafstre Edwarde Canynge.

Oderr Partes bie Knyghtes Mynstrelles.

EPISTLE TO MASTRE CANYNGE, ON ELLA.

Tys songe bie mynstrelles, thatte yn auntarynt
 tym,
 Whan reasonn hylt I her selfe in cloude of
 nyghte,
 The preeffe delyvered alle the lege 2 yn rhym;
 Lyche peyncted 3 tyltynge speares to please the fyghte, [dere 5,
 The whyche yn yttes fellie use doe make moke 4
 Syk dyd theire auncyante lee destlie 6 delyghte
 the eare.
 Perchaunce yn vyrtues gate 7 rhym mote bee
 thenne,
 Butte este 8 nowe flyeth to the odher syde;
 In hallie 9 preeffe appereth the ribaudes 10 penne,
 Inne lithie 11 moncke appereth the barrones
 pryde: [teethe,
 But rhym wyth somme, as nedere 12 without Make pleasaunce to the fenfe, botte maie doe lyt-tel feathe 13.
 Syr Johne, a knyghte, who hath a barne of
 lore 14,
 Kennes 15 Latyn at fyrst fyghte from French or Greke, [more,
 Fyghtethe 16 hys knowlachynges 17 ten yeres or
 To ryng upon the Latynne worde to speke.
 Whoever speke the Englysch ys despyed,
 The Englysch hym to please moiste fyrste be La-tynized.
 Vevyan, a moncke, a good requiem 18 synges:
 Can preache so wele, eche hynde 19, hys me-
 neynge knowes;
 Albetthe these gode, gwyfts awaie he flynges,
 Beeynge as badde yn vearfe as goode yn prose.
 Hee synges of feynctes who dyed for yer Godde,
 Everych wynter nyghte afreliche he sheddeth theyr bloode.
 To maydens, hufwyfes, and unlored 20 dames,
 Hee redes hys tales of merrymnt and woe.

Loughe 21 loudlie dynneth 22 from the dolte 23
 adrames 24;
 He swelles on laudes of foolles, though kennes 25
 hem loe.
 Sommetyme at tragedie theie laughe and synges;
 At merrie yaped 26 sage 27 somme hard-drayned water brynge.

Yette Vevyan ys ne foole, beynde 28 hys lynes.
 Geofroie makes vearfe, as handycraftes theyr ware;
 Wordes wythoute sense, fulle groffyngelyc 29
 he twynes,
 Cotteynge hys storie off as wythe a sheere;
 Waytes monthes on nothyng, and hys storie
 donne,
 Ne moe you from ytte kenn, than gyf 30 you
 necre begonne.

Enowe of odhers; of mie selfe to write,
 Requyrng what I doe notte nowe possels,
 To you I leave the taske; I kenne youre myghte Wyll make mie faultes, mie meynthe 32 of faultes, be lefs.

ELLA wythe thys I sende, and hope that you
 Wylle from ytte caste awaie, whaitte lynes maie be untrue.

Playes made from hallie 32 tales I holde un-
 meete;

Lette somme greate storie of a manne be songe;
 Whanne, as a manne, we Godde and Jesus treate,
 In mie pore mynde, we doe the Godhedde wronge.

Botte lette ne wordes, whyche droorie 33 mote
 ne heare,

Bee placed yn the same. Adieu untylle anere 34-
 THOMAS ROWLEIE.

LETTER TO THE DYNNGE MASTRE CANYNGE.

STRAUNGE dome ytte ys, that, yn these daies of oures,
 Nete 35 butte a bare recytalle can hav place;
 Nowe shapelie poesie hast losse yttes powers,
 And pynant hystorie ys onlie grace;
 Heie 36 pycke up wolfoome weedes, ynstedde of flowers,
 And families, ynstedde of wytte, theie trace;
 Now poesie canne meete wythe ne regrate 37,
 Whyfste prose, and herehaughtrie 38, ryfe yn estate.
 Lette kynges and rulers, when heie gayne a
 throne,
 Shewe what theyre grandfieres, and great grand-
 fiers bore,
 Emarchalled armes, yatte, ne before theyre owne,
 Now raung'd wyth what yeir fadres han before;
 Lette trades and toune folck, lett syke 39 thynges
 alone,
 Ne fyghte for fable yn a fieelde of aure;

1 Hid, concealed. 2 law. 3 painted. 4 much hurt, damage. 5 sweetly. 6 cause. 8 oft. 9 holy. 10 rake, lewd person. 11 humble. 12 ad-
 der. 13 hurt, damage. 14 learning. 15 knows.
 16 plucks, or tortures. 17 knowledge. 18 a service used over the dead. 19 peasant. 20 un-learned.

21 Laugh. 22 sounds, 23 foolish. 24 churls.
 25 knows. 26 laughable. 27 tale, jest. 28 beyond. 29 foolishly. 30 if. 31 many. 32 holy.
 33 strange perversion of words. Droorie, in its ancient signification, stood for meddly. 34 another.
 35 nought. 36 they. 37 effecul. 38 heraldry.
 39 such.

Seldomm, or never are armes virtues mede,
Shee nillynge 40 to take myckle 41 aie dothe hede.

A man ascaunfe uppon a peece maye looke,
And shake hys hedde to styrre hys rede 42 aboute;
Quod he, gyf I askaunted oere thys booke,
Schulde fynde thereyn that trouthe ys left wyth-
out; 43

Eke, gyf 43 ynto a vew percase 44 I tooke
The longe beade-rolle of al the wrytynge route,
Asferius, Ingolphus, Torgotte, Bedde,
Thorow hem 45 al nete lyche ytt I coulede rede.—

Pardon, yee Graiebarbes 46, gyff I saie, onwise
Yec are, to stycke so close and bysmarelle 47
To hytorie; you doe ytte tooe muche pryze,
Whyche amenufed 48 thoughtes of poesie;
Somme drybblette 49 share you shoulde to yatte 50
alye 51,

Nott makinge everyche thyng bee hystorie;
Instedde of mountynge onn a wynged horse,
You onn a rouncey 51 dryve ya dolefull course.

Cannyng and I from common course dysfente;
Wee ryde the stede, botte yev to hym the reene;
Ne wylle betweene crased molteryng booke be pente; [sheene;]

Botte soare on hyghe, and yn the sonne-beemes
And where wee kenne somme ishad 54 floures be-sprente,

We take ytte, and from ould rouste doe ytte clene;
Wee wylle ne cheynedd to one pasture bee,
Botte sometymes soare 'bove trouthe of historic.

Saie, Canyng, whatt was yearfe yn daies of yore?
Fyne thoughtes, and couplettes fetyvelie 54 be-wryen 55,

Notte syke as doe annoie thys age so fore,
A keppened poyntelle 56 restyng at eche lyne.
Verie maie be goode, botte poesie wantes more,
An onlist 57 lecturn 58, and a songe adyng 59;
Accordynge to the rule I have thys wroughte,
Gyff ytt please Canyng, I care notte a groate.

The thyng ytt moste bee yetself owne defense;
Som metre maie notte please a womannes ear.
Canyng looks notte for poesie, botte sence;
And dygne, and wordie thoughtes, ys all hys care.
Canyng, adieu! I do you greete from hence;
Full soone I hope to taste of your good cheere;
Goode Byshoppe Carpynter dyd byd mee saie,
Hee wysche you healtie and felinesse for aie.

T. ROWLEIE.

ENTROUCTIONNE.

SOMME cherifaunce 60 it ys gentle mynde, Whan heie have chevyced 61 theyre londe from bayne 62,

1 40 Unwilling. — 41 much. — 42 wisdom, council. 43 if. 44 perchance. 45 them. 46 Gray-beards. 47 curiously. 48 lessened. 49 small.
50 that. 51 allow. 52 cart-horse. 53 broken.
54 elegantly. 55 declared, expressed. 56 a pen, used metaphorically as a muse or genius. 57 bound-lets. 58 subject. 59 nervous, worthy of praise.
60 comfort. 61 preserved. 62 ruin.

Whan theie ar dedd, thee leave yer name behynde,
And thyre goode deedes doe on the earthe remayne;
Downe yn the grave wee yn hyme 63 everyche
fleyne,

Whyleft al her gentleness ys made to sheene,
Lyche fetyve baubels 64 geafonne 65 to be seene.

Ælla the wardenne of thys 66 castell 67 stede,
Whyleft Saxons dyd the Englysch sceptre swaie,
Who made whole troopes of Dacyan men to blede,
Then seel'd 68 hys eyne, and seeled hys eyne for
aie,

Wee rowze hym uppe before the judgment daie,
To saie what he, as clergyond 69 can kenne,
And howe hee sojourned in the vale of men.

CELMONDE, ATT BRYSTOWE.

BEFORE yonne roddie sonne has droove hys wayne Throwe halfe hys journie, dyghte yn gites 1 of goude,

Mee, happeless mee, hee wylle a wretche behoude,
Miefelse, and al that's myne, bounde ynne mys-
chaunces chayne.

Ah, Birtha! whie dydde natyre frame thee
fayre? [wreene 3]

Whie art thou all that poyntelle 2 canne be-Whie art thou not as coarfe as odhers are?—

Botte thenn thie foughle woulde throwe thy vyfage sheene,

Yatt shemres onn thie comelie semlykeene 4, Lyche nottebrownne cloude, whann bie the sonne mane redde,

Orr scarlette, wythe waylde lynnen clothe ywreene 5, [spredde.

Syke 6 woulde thie spryde upponn thie vyfage
Thys daie brave Ælla dothe thyne honde and harte

Clayme as hys owne to be, whyche nee fromm
hys moste parte.

And cann I lyve to see herr wythe anere 7!
Ytt cannotte, muste notte, naie, ytt shall not
bee. [beere,

Thys nyghte I'll putte stronge poyfonn ynn the
And hymm, herr, and myselfe, attenes 8 wyll
lea. [tende,

Assyst mee, helle! lett devylles rounde mee
To flea miefelse, mie love, and eke mie doughtie, friende.

ÆLLA, BIRTHA.

Ælla.

NOTTE, whanne the hallie prieste dyd make me
knyghte,

Blessyng the weaponne, tellyng fnture dede,
Howe bie mie honde the prevyd 10 Dane shoulde
blede, [fyghte;

Howe I schulde often bee, and often wyne, ynn

63 Inter. 64 jewels. 65 rare. 66 Bristol.
67 castle. 68 closed. 69 taught.—1 Robes, mantels. 2 a pen. 3 express. 4 countenance. 5 covered. 6 such. 7 another. 8 at once. 9 mighty.
10 hardly, valorous.

Notte, whann I fyrste behelde thie beauteous hue,
 Whyche strooke mie mynde, and rouzed mie
 softer soule;
 Nott whann from the barbed horse yn fyghte
 dyd viewe.
 The flying Dacians o'er the wyde playne roule,
 Whan all the troopes of Denmarke made grete
 dole,
 Dydd I sele joie wyth syke reddoure 11 as nowe,
 Whann hallie preest, the lechemanne of the foule,
 Dydd knytte us both ynn a caytyfnede 12 vowe:
 Now hallie Aëlla's selynesse ys grate;
 Shap 13 haveth nowe ymade hys woos for to em-
 mate 14.

Birba.

My lordie and husbände, syke a joie ys myne;
 Botte mayden modestie molte ne soe saie,
 Albeyt thou mayest rede ytt ynn myne eyne,
 Or ynn myne harte, where thou shalt be for aie;
 Inne sothe, I have botte mended oute thie
 saie 15;
 For twelve tymes, twelve the mone hathe bin
 yblente 16,
 As manie tymes hath veyed the godde of daie,
 And on the grassie her lemes 17 of sylver-sente,
 Sythe thou dydst cheeke mee for thie swote to bee,
 Inactyng ynn the same most faicfullie to mee.

Ofte have I seene thee atte the none-daie feaste, Whanne deyde bie thie chiefelle, for wante of pheeres 18, [easte,
 Awylst thou merryemen dydde laughe and
 On mee thou semest all eyne; to mee all eares,
 Thou wardest mee as gyff ynn hundred feeres,
 Alest a daygnous 19 looke to thee be fente,
 And offendes 20 made mee, moe thann yie com-
 pheeres,

Ofte scarpes 21 of scarlette, and fyne para-
 mente 22;
 All thie yntente to please was lysed 23 to mee,
 I saie ytt, I moste streve that thou ameded bee.

Aëlla.

Mie lyttel kyndnesse whyche I dydd doe,
 Thie gentleness doth corven them so grete,
 Lyke bawfye 24 olyphauntes 25 mie guattes
 doe shewe; [mate 26.

Thou doste mie thoughtes of paying love a-Botte hann myn actyonnes straughte 27 the rolle of fate,

Pyghte thee fromm hell, or broughte heaven
 down to thee, [eete,
 Layde the whol worlde a falldstole att, thie
 On smyle woulde be suffyccill mede for mee.

I am love's borrowr, and canne never paie,
 But bee hys borrowr stytle, and thynne, mie
 swete, for aie.

Birba.

Love, doe notte rate your achevmentes 28 soe
 smalle;
 As I toe you, syke love untoc mee beare;

11 Violence. 12 binding, enforcing. 13 fate-
 14 lessen, decrease. 15 faith. 16 blinded. 17 lights, rays. 18 fellows, equals. 19 disdainful. 20 presents, offerings. 21 scars. 22 robes of scarlet.
 23 bounded. 24 large. 25 elephants. 26 de-troys. 27 stretched, 28 services.

For nothyng paste wille Birtha ever call,
 Ne on a foode from heaven thynke to cheere,
 As farr as thys frayle brutylle fleisch wylle spere.
 Syke, and ne fardher I expecte of you;
 Be notte toe slacke yn love, ne overdeare;
 A smalle fyre, yan a loude flame, proves more true.

Aëlla.

Thie gentle wordis doe thie volunde 29 kenne
 To bee moe clegionde thann ys ynn meyncte of menne.

AëLLA, BIRTHA, CELMONDE, MYN-STRELLES.Celmonde.

ALLE blesynges shovre on gentle Aëlla's hedde!
 Oft made the monne, yn sylver sheenyng
 lyghte,

Inne varied chaunges varied blesynges shiede,
 Besprengyng far abrode mischauntes nyghte;
 And thou, fayre Birtha! thou, fayre dame, so
 bryghte,

Long mayest thou wyth Aëlla fynde muche peace,
 Wythe selynesse, as wythe a roabe, be dyghte,
 Wyth everych charyngyng more new joies en-creafe!

I, as a token of mie love to speake,
 Have brought you jubbes of ale, at nyghte your brayne to breake.

Aëlla.

Whan supperes paste we'lle drenche youte ale soe
 stronge,

Tyde lyfe, tyde death.

Celmonde.

Ye mynstrelles, chaunt your songe.

Mynstrelles Songe, bie a Manne and Womanne.Manne.

Tourne thee to thie shepfer 30 swayne;
 Bryghte sonne has ne dronke the dewe,
 From the floures of yellowe hue;
 Tourne thee, Alyce, backe agayne.

Womanne.

No, bestoikerre 31, I wylle goe,
 Softlie tryppynge o'ere the mees 32,
 Lyche the sylver-footed doe,
 Seekeynge sheltter yn grene trees.

Manne.

See the mofs-growne daisey'd banke;
 Pereynge ynn the strete belowe;
 Here we'lle sytte, yn dewie danke;
 Tourne thee, Alyce, do notte goe.

Womanne.

I've hearde erste mie grandame saie,
 Younge damoselles schulde ne bee,
 Inne the swote moonthe of Maie,
 Wythe yonge menne bie the grene wode tre.

Manne.

Sytte thee, Alyce, sytte and harke,
 Howe the ouzle 33 chauntes hys noate,
 The chelandree 34, grele moir larke,
 Chauntynge from theyre lyttel throate;

29 Memory, understanding. 30 shepherd. 31 deceiver. 32 meadows. 33 The blackbird. 34 goldfinch.

Womanne.

I heare them from eche grene wode tree,
Chauntinge owte so blauntantlie 35,
Tellynge lecturnyes 36 to mee,
Myfcheefe ys whanne you are nygh.

Manne.

See alonge the mees so grene
Pied daifies, kyngge-coppes swote ;
Alle wee see, bie non bee seene,
Nette botte shepe fettes here a fote.

Womanne.

Shepster swayne, you tare mic gratche 37.
Oute uponne ye! lette me goe.
Leave me fwythe, or I'll alatche.
Robynne, thys youre dame shall knowe.

Manne.

See, the crokyng brionie
Rounde the popler twyfte hys sprae ;
Rounde the oake the greene ivie
Florryschethe and lyveth aie.

Lette us feate us bie thys tree,
Laughe, and syngte to lovyng ayres ;
Comme, and doe notte coyen bee ;
Nature made all thynges bie payres.
Drooried cartes wylle after kynde ;
Gentle doves wylle kyfs and coe.

Womanne.

Botte manne, hee mofte beewyrynde,
Tylle syr preeste make on of two.

Tempte mee ne to the foule thyng ;
I wylle no mannes lemanne be ;
Tyll syr preest hys songe doethe syngte,
Thou shalt neere synde aught of mee.

Manne.

Bie oure ladie her yborne,
To-morrowe, soone as ytte ys daie,
I'lle make thee wyfe, ne' bee forfworne,
So tyde me lyfe or dethe for aie.

Womanne.

Whatt dothe lette, botte thatte nowe
Wee attenes 38, thos honde yn honde,
Unto divinstre 39 goe,
And bee lyncked yn wedlocke bonde ?

Manne.

I agree, and thus I plyghte
Honde, and harte, and all that's myne ;
Goode syr Rogerr, do us ryghte,
Make us one, at Cothbertes shryne.

Botte.

Wee wylle ynn a bordelle 40 lyve,
Halie, thoughte of no estate ;
Everyche clocke moe love shall gyve ;
Wee ynn godenelle wylle bee greate.

Elle.

I lyche thys songe, I lyche ytt myckle well ;
And there ys monie for yer syngeyngte nowe ;
Butte have you nonne thatt marriage-blefyinges telle ?

Celmonde.

In marriage, blefyinges are botte fewe, I trowe.

Mynstrelles.

Laverde 41, we have ; and, gyff you please,
wille syngte,
As well as owre choughe-voyses wylle permytte.

Elle.

Comme then, and see you swotelie tune the ftryngte,
And fret 42, and engyne all the human wytte,
Toe pleefe mic dame.

Mynstrelles.

We'lle strayne our wytte and syngte.

MYNSTRELLES SONGE.

Fyrste Mynstrelle.

The boddynge flourettes blosches atte the lyghte ;
The mees be sprenge wyth the yellowe hue ;
Ynn daifeyd mantels ys the mountayne dyghte ;
The nesh 43 yongc coweslepe bendethe wyth
the dewe ;
The trees enlesed, yntoe Heavenne straughte,
Whenn gentile wyndes doe blowe, to wheshlyng dynne ys brought.

The evenyng commes, and brynges the dewe
alonge ;

The roddie welkynne sheeneth to the eyne ;
Arounde the alestake mynstrells syngte the
songe :

Yongc ivie rounde the doore poste to entwynie ;
I laie mee on the graffe ; yette, to mie wylle,
Albeytte alle ys fayre, there lackethe somethyngte fytte.

Seconde Mynstrelle

So Adam thoughtenne, whann, ynn Paradyse,
All Heavenn and erthe dy'd hommage to hys
mynde ;
Ynn womann alleyne mannes pleafaunce lyes ;
As instrumetes of joie were made the kynde.
Go, take a wyfe untoe thic armes, and see Wynter, and brownie hylles, wyll have a charme for thee.

Thyrde Mynstrelle.

Whanne Autumnpe blake 44 and sonne-brente
doe appere, [lese,
With hys goulde honde guylteyngte the falleynge
Bryngeyngte oppe Wynter to folfyllte the yere,
Beeryngte uponne hys backe the riped shefe ;
Whan al the hyls wythe wodde fede ys whyte ;
Whanne levynne-fyres and lemes do mete from far the syghte ;

Whann the fayre apple, ruddle as even skie,
Do bende the tree unto the fructyle grounde ;
When joicie peres, and berries of blacke die,
Doe daunce yv ayre, and call the eyne arounde ;
Thann, bee the even foule, or even fayre,
Meethynckes mie hartys joie ys steynced wyth
somme care,

Seconde Mynstrelle.

Angelles bee wroghte to bee of neidher kynde ;
Angelles alleyne fromm chafe 45 desyre bee
free ;
Dheere ys a fomwhatte evere yn the mynde,
Yatte, wythout womanne, cannot ftylled bee ;
Ne syncte yn celles, botte, havynge blodde and tere 46,
Do synde the spryte to joie on syghte of womanne
fayre ;

35 Loudly. 36 lectures. 37 apparel. 38 at once
39 a divine. 40 a cottage. 41 lord.

42 Stretch. 43 tender. 44 naked. 45 hot.
46 health.

Wommen bee made, notte for hemselfes, botte manne,

Bone of hys bone, and chyld of hys desire;
Fromme an ynutile membre fyrst beganne,
Ywrought with moche of water, lyttle fyre;
Therefore theie seke the fyre of love to hete,
The mylkynefs of kynde, and make hemfelses complete.

Albeyttee, without wommen, menne were pheeres
To falvage kynde, and wulde botte lyve ^{[flea,}
Botte wommenne este the spryghte of peace so cheres,

Tochelod yn angel joi heie angeles bee;
Go, take thee swythyn 47 to thie bedde a wyfe,
Bee bante or blessed hie, yn proovynge marryage lyfe.

Anodber Mynstrelles Songe, bie Syr Thybbot Gorges.

As Elynour bie the green lesselle was fyttynge,
As from the sones hete she harried,
She sayde, as herr whyttee hondes whyte hofen
was knyttynge,
Whatte pleasure yt ys to be married!

Mie husbande, Lord Thomas, a forrester boulede,
As ever clove pynne, or the baskette,
Does no cheryfauncys from Elynour houde,
I have ytte as soon as I ask ytte.

Whan I lyved wyth my fadre yn merrie Clowdell,

Though twas at my lise to mynd spynnyng,
I styll wanted somethynge, botte whatte ne could telle,

Mie lorde fadres barbde haulte han ne wynnyng.

Eche mornynge I ryse, doe I sette mie may dennes
Somme to spynn, sonime to curdell, sonime bleachynge,

Gyff any new entered doe aske for mie aidens,
Thann swythynne you fynde mee a teachynge.

Lord Waiterre, mie fadre, he lov'd me well,
And nothynge unto mee was nedeynge,
Botte schulde I agen goe to merrie Clowdell,
In sothen twoulde bee wythoute redeynge.

Shee sayde, and Lorde Thomas came over the lea
As hee the fatte derkynnes was chacyng,
She putte uppe her knyttynge and to him wente
shee;

So wee leave hem bothe kyndelie embracyng.

Ælla.

I liche eke thys; goc ynn untoe the feaste;
Wee wylle permyttee you antecedente bee:
There swotolie syngs eche carolle, and yaped
48 jeaste;

And there ys monnie, that you merrie bee;
Comme, gentle love, wee wylle toe spouse-
feaste goe,
And there ynn ale and wyne bee dryncted 49
everych woe.

ÆLLA, BIRTHA, CELMONDE, MESSENGERE.

Messengere.

ÆLLA, the Danes ar thondrynge onn our coaste;
Lyche scolles of locusts, caste oppe bie the sea,
Magnus and Hurra, wyth a doughtir hoaste,
Are ragyng, to be quansed so be none botte
thee;

Haste, swyfte as Levynne to these royners flee;
Thie dogges allyne can tame thys ragynge bulle.

Hast swythyn, fore anieghe the townie theie
And Wedecsterres rolle of dome bee fulle.

Haste, haste, O Ælla, to the byker flie,
For yn a momentes space tenne thousand menne
maie die.

Ælla.

Beshrew thee for thie newes! I mozte be gon.
Was ever lockless dome so hard as myne!
Thos from dysportysimete to warr to ron,
To chaunge the selke veste for the gaberdyne.

Birtha.

O! lyche a nedere, lette me rounde thee twyne,
And hylte thie boddie from the schaftes of warre.

Thou shalte nott, must not, from thie Birtha
Botte kenn the dynne of slughornes from asarre.

Ælla.

O love, was thys thie joi, to shew the treatte,
Than Groffyshe to forbydde thie hungered guesstes
to eate?

O mie upswalyng 51 harte, what wordes can saie ^{[ybrente?}

The peynes, thatte passethe ynn mie soule
Thos to bee torne uponne mie spousall dai,
O! 'tys a peyne beyond entendementte.

Yee mighte goddes, and is yor favoures sente
As thous faste dented to a loadte of pcyne? [tent,
Mofte wee aie holde yn chace the shade con-
And for a bodykyn 52 a swarthe obteyne?

O! whie, yee seyntes, oppress yee thos mie fowle?

How shalle I speke mie woe, mie fremte, mie dreerie dole!

Celmonde.

Sometyme the wyfeste lacketh pore mans redde.
Reasonne and counynge wytte este flees awaie.
Thann, loverde, lett me sai, wyth hommagd
drede

(Bineth your fote ylayn) me counselle sai;
Gyff thos wee lett the matter lethlen 53 laie,
The foemenn, everych honde-poyncte, getteth fote.

Mie loverde, lett the speere-menne, dyghte for
And all the sabbataners goe aboute.

I speke me loverde, alleyn to upryse ^{[alyfe.}
Your wytte from marvellte, and the warrour to

Ælla.

Ah! nowe thou pottest takells 54 yn mie harte;
Mie soulghe dothe nowe begynne to see her-felle;

47 Quickly. 48 laughable. 49: drowned.

50 Stilled, quenched. 51 swelling. 52 body, substance. 53 still, dead. 54 arrows, darts.

Y ij

I wylle upryse mie myghte, and do mie parte,
To flea the soemne yn mie furie felle.
Botte howe canne tynge mie rampynge fourie
telle,

Whyche ryseth from mie love to Birtha fayre?
Ne coulede the queene, and all the myghte of helle,

Founde out impleasance of fycke blacke a gear.
Yette I wylle bee myselfe, and rouze mie spryte

To acte wythe rennome, and goe meet the bloddie fyghte.

Birtba.

No, thou schalte never leave thie Birtha's syde;
Ne schall the wynde uponne us blowe alleyne;
I, lyche a nedre, wylle untoe thee byde:

Tyde lyfe, tyde deathe; yette shall behoulde us
twayne.

I have mie parte of drierie dole and peyne;
Itte brasleth from mee atte the hotred eyne:
Ynne tydes of teares mie swarthynge spryte wyll drayne.

Gyff drierie dole ys thyne, tys twa tymes myne.
Goe notte, O Aëlla; wythe thie Birtha staie;
For wyth thie femmyked mie spryte wylle goe
awaie.

Aëlla.

O! tys for thee, for thee alleyne I sele;
Yet I muste bee myselfe; with valoures gear
I'lle dyghte mie hearte, and notte mie lymbes
yn stele,

And shake the bloddie swerde and sleyned spere.

Birtba.

Can Aëlla from hys breaste hys Birtha teare!
Is shee so roue and ugsonne 55 to hys fyghte?
Entrykeynge wyght! ys feathall warre so deare.

Thou pryzeest mee belowe the joies of fyghte.
Thou schalt notte leave mee, albytte the erthe Hong pendaunte bie thie swerde, and craved for thy morthé.

Aëlla.

Dydest thou kenne how mie woes, as starres
ybrente,

Headed bie these thie wordes doe onn mee falle,
Thou woulde fryve to gyve mie harte contente,
Waking mie slepyng mynde to honoures calle.

Of felynesse I pryze thee moe yan all Heav'n can me fend, or connygne wytte ac-quyse,

Yette I wylle leave thee, onne the foe to falle,
Retournynge to thie eyne with double fyre.

Birtba.

Moste Birtha boon requeste and bee denyd?
Receyve attenes a darte yn felynesse and pryde?
Doe staie, att leaste tyll morrowes sonne appercs.

Aëlla.

Thou kenneest welle the Dacyannes myttee
powerre;

Wythe them a mynute wurchethe bane for years;

Theie undoe realmes wythyn a syngle hower.
Rouze all thie honnoure, Birtha; look attoure

This bledeyng countrie, which for haultie ded
Calls for the rodyng of some doughtie power,
To royn ytts royners, make ytts foemen blede.

Birtba.

Rouze all thie love; false and entrykyng
wyghte!
Ne leave thie Birtha thos uponne pretence of
fyghte.

Thou nedest not goe, untill thou haste command

Under the sygnette of our lorde the kyng.

Aëlla.

And wouldest thou make me then a recreande?
Hollie Snyde Marie, keepe mee from the thynge!

Heere, Birtha, thou hast potte a double stynge,
One for thie love, anodher for thie mynde.

Birtba.

Alytled 56 Aëlla, thie abredyng 57 bynng 58.
Twas love of thee thatte soule intente ywrynde.

Yette heare mie supplicate, to mee attende,
Hear from mie groted 59 harte the lover and the friende,

Lette Celmonde yn thie armour-brace be dygate!
And yn thie stead unto the battle goe;

This name alleyne wylle putte the Danes to flyghte,

The ayre thate beares ytt woulde presse downe
[the foe.]

Aëlla.

Birtha, yn vayne thou wouldest mee recreand
doe.

I moste, I wylle fyght for mie countries wele,
And leave thee for ytt. Celmonde, swestlie goe,

Telle mie Bryflouans to be dyghte yn stele;
Tell hem I scorne to kenne hem from afar,
Botte leave the vyrgyn brydall bedde for bedde of warre.

AëLLA, BIRTHA.

Birtba.

And thou wylt goe: O mie agroted harte!

Aëlla.

Mie countrie waites mie marche; I muste
awaie;

Albeytte I schulde goe to mete the darte
Of certen dethe, yette here I woulde note stai.
Botte thos to leave thee, Birtha, dothe affwaie-
Moe torturynge peynes yanne canne be sedde
bie tyngue,

Yette rouze thie honoure uppe, and wayte the Whan rounde aboute mee songe of war heie fyng.

O Birtha, strev mie agreeme 60 to accaie 61,
And joyous see my armes, dyghte onte ynn warre, arraie.

Birtba.

Difficile 62 ys the pennaunce, yette I'lle strev
To keepe mie woe behyltren yn mie breaste.
Albeytte nete maye to me pleasaunce yev,
Lyche thee, I'lle strev to sette mie mynde att
reste.

Yett oh! forgeve, yf I have thee dystresse;
Love, doughtie love, wyll beare no odhre fwaie.

Iuste as I was wythe Ælla to be bleste,
Shappe foullie thos hath snatched hym awaie.
It was a tene too doughtie to bee borne,
Wydhoute an ounde of teares and breaste wyth
fyghes ytorne.

Ælla.

This mynde ys now thieffelse; why wylte thou
bee

All blanche, al kyngelic, all soe wyse yn mynde,
Alleyne to lette pore wretched Ælla see,
Whatte wondrous biges 63 he nowe muste
leave behynde? [wynde,

O Birtha fayre, warde everyche commynge
On everyche wynde I wyll a token sende;
Onn mie longe shielde, ycorne thic name thoul't
fynde,
But here commes Celmonde, wordhic knyghte and friende.

ÆLLA, BIRTHA, CELMONDE SPEAKING.

This Brystowe knyghtes for thie forth-comynge
lynge 64;
Echone athwarte hys backe hys longe warre-
shield dothe flynge.

Ælla.

Birtha, adieu; but yette I cannotte goe.

Birtha.

Lyfe of mie spryte, mie gentle Ælla staie.
Engyne mee notte wyth syke a dricrie woe.

Ælla.

I muste, I wyll; tys honnoure calt awaie.

Birtha.

O mie agroted harte, braste, braste ynn twaie.
Ælla, for honnoure, flyes awaie from mee.

Ælla.

Birtha, adieu: I maie notte here obaie,
I'm flynge from miefelse yn flyng thee.

Birtha.

O Ælla, houfband, friend, and loverde, staie.
He's gon, he's gone, alas! percase he's gone for aie.

Celmonde.

Hope, hallie faster, sweepynge through the skie,
In croune of goulde, and robe of lillie whyte,
Whyche farre abrode ynn gentle aire doe flie,
Meetynge from distaunce the enjoyous fyghte,
Albeytte este thou takest thic hie flyghte
Hecket 65 ynn a myste, and wyth thyde eyne
yblente,

Nowe comest thou to mee wythe starre lyghte;
Ontoe thie veste the rodde soune ys adente 66;
The Sommer tyde, the month of Maie appere,
Depycte wythe skylled honde upon this wyde aumere.

I from a nete of hoplin am slawed,
Awhaped 67 atte the fetyveness of daie;
Ælla, bie nete moe than hys myndbruche
awed,

Is gone, and I moke followe; to: the fraic,
Celmonde canne ne'er from anie byker staie.

Dothe warre begyne! there's Celmonde yn
the place, [awaie.
Botte whanne the warre ys donne, I'll haste
The reste from ne:the tyns masque mult-shew yates face.

I see onnumbered joles arounde mee ryse; I Brake 68 stonde the future doome, and joie dothe
mee alyse.

O honnoure, honnoure, what ys bie thee hanne?
Hailie the robber and the bordcler,
Who kens ne thee, or ys to thee bestance,
And nothyng does thee myckle gastnes fere.
Fayuge woulde I from mie bosomme alle thes tare.

Thou there dysperpellest 69 the levynne-bronde;
Whylest mie fough's forwyned, thou art the gare;

Sleene ys mie conforste bie thic ferie honde;
As some talle hylle, whan wynds doe shake the
ground,
Itte kerveth all abroade, bie brasleyng hyltren
wounde.

Honnoure, whatt be ytt? tys a shadowes
shade,

A thyng of wychencref, an idle dreme;
On of the fonnis which the clerche have made Menne wydhoute sprytes, and wommen for to feme;

Knyghtes, who este kenne the loudc dynne of the beme,

Schulde be forgarde to syke enseeblyng waies,
Make everych acte, alyche theyr foules, bo
breme,

And for theyre chyvalrie alleyns have prayse.

O thou, whateer thie name,
Or Zabalus or Queed,

Comme, steel mie sable spryte,
For fremde 70 and dulefullc dede,

MAGNUS, HURRA, AND HIE PREESTE,

WITH THE ARMIE, NEAR WATCHETTE.

Magnus.

SWYTHE 71 lette the effendres 72 to the goddes begynne.

To knowe of hem the issac of the fyghte.
Potte the blodde-steyned sword and payves
ynne;

Spreade swythyn all arounde the hallie lyghte.

Hie Prestie syngeb.

Yee, who hie yn mokie ayre
Delethe stafounes foule or fayre,
Yee, who, whannes yee weere aggyulte,
The mone yn bloddie gyttelles 73 hylte,
Mooved the starres, and dyd unbynde
Everyche barriere to the wynde:
Whanne the oundynge waves dystresse,
Stroven to be overest,
Sockeynge yn the spyre-gyrte towne,
Swolteryng wole natyones downe,

63 Jewels. 64 stay. 65 wrapped closely; covered. 66 fastened. 67 astonished.

68 Naked. 69 scatterest. 70 strange. 71 Quickly.
72 offerings. 73 mantles.

Sendyng dethe, on plagues astrodde,
Moovynge lyke the erthys godde;
To mee sende your heste devyne,
Lyghte cletten 74 all myne eyne,
That I maie now undevyfe
All the actyonnes of th' emprize.

[falleth downe and este ryfeth.]

Thus fayethe the goddes; goe, yfsee to the playne; [slayne.]
Forr there shall meynte of mytte menae bee

Magnus.

Whie, foe there evere was, whanne Magnus foughte. [hoaste,

Efte have I treynted noyance throughthe the Athorowe swerdes, alyche the Queed dystraught [loaste.

Have Magnus pressyng wroghte hys foemen
As whanne a tempeste vexeth soare the coaste,
The dyngceyng ounde the saudeie stonde doe
tare,

So dyd I inne the warre the javlynne toste,
Full meynte a champyonnes breaste received mie spear.

Mie sheelde, lyche sommere morie gronfer droke,
Mie lethalle speere, alyche a levyn-mylted oke.

Hurra.

This wordes are greate, full hyghe of sound,
and ecke [rayne.

Lyche thonderre, to the whych dothe comme no
lthe lacketh notte a doughtie honde to speke;
The cocke saithe dresthe 75, yett armed ys he alleyne.

Certes thie wordes maie, thou motest have sayne
Of mee, and meynte of moe, who eke canne
fyghte,

Who haveth trodden downe the adventayle,
And tore the heaulmes from hedes of myckle
myghte.

Sythence fyke myghte ys placed yn thie honde,
Lette blowes thie actyons speeke, and bie thie courage stonde.

Magnus.

'Thou are a warrioure, Hurra, thatte I kenne,
And myckle famed for thie handie dede.

Thou fyghtest anente 76 maydens and ne menne,
Nor aike thou makest armed hartes to blede.

Efte I, caparyson'd on bloddie stede,
Havythe thee seene binethe mee ynn the fyghte,
Wythe thes corfes I investyng everich mede,
And thou aston, and wondryng at mie myghte.
Thanne wouldest thou comme yn for mie renome, [dome?

Albeytte thou wouldest reyne awaie from bloddie

Hurra.

How! butte bee bourne mie rage. I kenne aryghte

Bothe thee and thyne maie ne bee wordhye peene.

Eksonnes I hope wee scalle engage yn fyghte;
Thanne to the souldyers all thou wyte beween.

I'll prove mie courage onne the burled greene;
Tys there alleyne I'll telle thee whatte I bee.

Gyf I weelde notte the deadlie sphere adeane,
Thanne let mie name be fulle as lowe as thee.

Thys mie adented shielde, thys mie warre
speare,
Schalle telle the falleynge foe gyf Hurra's harte can feare.

Magnus.

Magnus woulde speke, butte thatte hys noble
spryte [saie.

Dothe foe enrage, he knowes notte whatte to He'dde speke yn blowes, yn gottes of blodde
he'd wryte,

And on thie heafod peyncte hys myghte for aie.
Gyf thou anent an wolfynnes rage wouldest
staie,

'Tys here to meet ytt; botte gyff nott, bec goe;
Left I in furrie shulde mie armes displaie,
Whyche to thie boddie wyll wurch 77 myckle
woe.

Oh! I bee madde, dystraughte wyth brendyng rage;

Ne seas of smcthyng gore wyll mie chafed harte affwayne.

Hurra.

I kenne thee Magnus, welle; a wyghte thou art

That doest aslee alonge ynn doled dystresse,
Strynge bulle yn boddie, lyoncelle yn harte,
I almost wyfche thie proves were made lesse.

Whan Ælla (name drest uppe yn ugfonnes 78
To thee and recreandes 79) thondered on the playne,

Howe dydste thou thorowe fyrste of fleers presse!
Swefter thanne federed takelle dydste thou reyne.

A ronnyng pryze onn feyncte daie to ordayne,
Magnus, and none botte hee, the ronnyng pryze
wyll gayne.

Magnus.

Eternalle plagues devour thie baned tyng!
Myriades of neders pre upponne thie spryte!
Maicst thou sele al the peynes of age whylst
yngge,

Unmanned, uneyned, excludod aie the lyghte,
Thie senses, lyche thiefselc, enwrapped yn
nyghte,

A scoff to foemen, and to bestes a pheere;
Maie furched levynne onne thie head alyghte,
Maie on thee falle the shuyr of the unweere:

Fen vaipoures blaste thie everiche manlie
powere,

Maie thie bante boddie quycke the wolfome
peenes devoure.

Fayngge woulde I curse thee further, botte mie
tyngue

Denies mie harte the favoure foe toe doe.

Hurra.

Nowe bie the Dacaynne goddes, and Welkyns kyngge,

Wythe shurie, as thou dydste begynne, persue;
Calle on mie, heade all tortures that bec rou,
Banc onne, tyll thie owne tongue thie curses
sele.

Sende onne mie heade the blyghteyng levynne blewe,

The thonder loude, the swellynge azure rele 80.
Thie wordes be hie of dynne, botte nete besyde;

Bane on, good chieftayn, fyghte wythe wordes of myckle pryde, [come.

Botte doe notte waffe thie breath, lest Ælla
Magnus.

Ælla and thee togyder synke toe helle!
Bee your names blasted from the rolle of dome!
I feere noe Ælla, thatte thou kenneft welle.

Unlydgesulle traytoure, wylt thou nowe re-
belle? [myne,

*Tys knowen, thatte yie menn bee lyncked to Bothe sente, as troopes of wolves, to sietre felle;
Botte nowe thou lackest hem to be all yne.

Nowe, bie the goddes yatte reule the Dacyanne state, [dysregate.

Speacke thou yn rage once moe, I wyll thee
Hurra.

I pryze thie threattes joste as I doe thie banes,
The fede of melyce and recendize al.

Thou arte a iteyne unto the name of Danes;
Thou alleyne to thie tyngue for prooffe canst
call.

Thou best a worme so groffile and so smal,
I wythe thie bloude woulde scorne to foul mie
sworde, [falle.

Botte wythe thie weaponnes woulde upon thee
Alyche thie owne feare, flea thee wythe a worde.

I, Hurra, amme miesel, and aie wylle bee,
As greate yn valorous actes, and yn commande as thee.

MAGNUS, HURRA, ARMYE AND MES- SENGERE.

Messengere.

Blynye your contekions 81, chiefs; for as I stode
Uppone mie wathe, I spiede an armie commynge,

Notte lyche an handfulle of a fremded 82 foe,
Botte blacke wythe armoure, moyunge ug-
somial, [alonge

Lyche a blacke fulle cloude, thatte dothe goe
To droppe yn hayle, and hele the thunder storme.

Magnus.

Ar there meynthe of them?

Messengere.

Thycke as the ante-flyes ynne a sommer's none,
Seemynge as though theie styngye as persante too.

Hurra.

Whatte matters thatte? lettes sette oure warr-
arraie. [pare;

Goe, sounde the beme, lette champyons pre-
Ne doubtynge, we wylle styngye as fatte as heie:
Whatte? doest forgard 83 thie bloddie? ys ytte
for feare? [stere,

Wouldest thou gayne the towne, and castle-
And yette ne byker wythe the soidyer garde?
Go, byde thee ynn mie tente annethe the lere;
I of thie boddie wylle keepe wathe and warde.

Magnus.

Oure goddes of Denniarke know mie harte ys gode.

Hurra.

For nete uppon the erthe, botte to be cloughens
foode.

MAGNUS; HURRA, ARMIE, SECONDE MESSENGERE.

Seconde Messengere.

As from mie towre I kende the commynge foe;
I spied the crossed shielde and bloodie swerde,
The furyous Ælla's banner; wythyne kenne
The armie ys. Djsorder throughoure oure hoaste
Is fleynge, borne onne wynges of Ælla's name;
Styr, sty, mie lordes!

Magnus.

What? Ælla? and so neare?

Thenne Denmarques roiend; oh mie rysynge feare!

Hurra.

What doest thou mene? thys Ælla's botte a
manne.

Nowe bie mie sworde, thou arte a verie berne 84:
Of late I dyd thie creand valoure scanne,
Whanne thou dydt boaste soe mochê of actyon derne.

Botte I toe warr mie doeynges moste atturme,
To cheere the Sabbataneres to deere dede.

Magnus.

I to the knyghtes onne everyche syde wylle
burne,

Telleynge them alle to make her foemen blede;
Sythe shame or deathe onne eider syde wylle bee, [flea.

Mie harte I wylle upryse, and inne the battele

ÆLLA, CELMONDE, AND ARMIE, NEAR WATCHETTE.

Ælla.

Nowe havyngê done oure mattynes and oure
vowes,

Lette us for the intended fyghte be boune,
And everyche champyone potte the joyous croune [browes.

Of certane masterschyppe upon hys gleitreyng

As for mie harte, I owne ytt ys as ere
Itte has beene ynne the sommer-shene of fate,
Unknowen to the usfome gratch of fere;
Mie blodde embollen, wythe masterie elate,
Boyles ynne mie veynes; and rolles ynn rapyd
state,

Impatylene forr to mete the persante stele,
And telle the worlde thatt Ælla dyed as greate
As anie knyghte who fought for Englonde's
weale. [more drete,

Friends, kyune, and soidyerres, ynne black ar-
mie actyons ymytate, mie presente redyngye here.

There ys ne house, athrow thys shap-scurged 85
isle,

Thatte has ne loste a kynne yn these fell fyghtes,
Fatte blodde has forsicket the hongerde ioyle,
And townes enlowed 86 lemed 87 oppe the nyghtas.

81 Contentions. 82 frightened. 83 lose.

84 Child. 85 fate-scurged. 86 flamed, fired.
87 lighted.

Inne gyte of fyre oure hallie churche there
 dyghtes ;
 Oure sonnes lie storven 88 ynne theyre smethynge
 gore ; [pyghtes,
 Oppe bie the rootes oure tree of lyfe dheie
 Vexynge oure coaste, as byllowes doe the flore.
 Yee meine, gyf ye are menne, diiplaie yor name,
 Ybrende yer tropes, alyche the roarynge tempest
 flame.

Ye Chrystyans, doe as wordhie of the name ;
 These roynertes of oure hallie houfes flea ;
 Braste, lyke a cloude, from whence dothe come
 the flame, [taines, bee.
 Lyche torrentes, gushynge downe the moun-
 And, whanne alonge the grene yer champions
 flec, [bronde,
 Swefte as the rodde for-weltrynge 89 levyn-
 Yatte hauntes the flyinge murtherer oere the lea,
 Soe lie oponne these royners of the londe.
 Lette those yatte ar unto her battayles fledde,
 Take slepe eterne oponne a feerie lowynge bedde.

Let cowarde Londonne see herre towne onn
 fyre, [honde,
 And frew wyth goulde to staie the royners
 Ælla and Brystowe havethe thoughtes thattes hygher, [londe.
 Wee fyghte notte for ourselves, botte all the
 As Severnes hygher lyghethe, banckes of sonde, Pressynge ytte downe binethe the revynge
 fire, [stronde,
 Wythe dreerie dynn enswolters 90 the hyghe
 Beerynge the rockes alonge ynn fhurye breme,
 Soe wylle we beere the Dacyanne armie downe,
 And throughe a storme of blodde wylle reache the champion crowne.

Gyff ynn thys battelle locke ne wayte oure gare.
 To Brystowe dheie wylle tourne yeyre fhuyrie
 dyre ;
 Brystowe, and alleher joies, wylle synke toe ayre,
 Brendeynge perforce wythe unenhantende 91
 fyre.
 Theinne lette oure safetie double moove oure ire
 Lyche wolfyns, rovynge for the evynge pre,
 See [ing] the lambe and shepiter nere the brire,
 Doth th' one forr safetie, th' one for hongre flea ;
 Thanne, whanne the ravenne crokes uponne
 the playne, [anns slayne.
 Oh ! lette ytte bee the knelle to myghtie Dacy-
 Lyche a rodde gronfer shalle mie anlase sheene,
 Lyche a strynge lyoncelle, I'll bee ynne fyghte, Lyche fallynge leaves the, Dacyannes shalle bee
 fleene, [myghte.
 Lyche [a] loud dynnyng streeme scalle be mie
 Ye menne, who woulde deserve the name of
 knyghte,

Lette bloddie teares bie all your paves he wepte ;
 To commynge tymes no poyntelle shalle ywrite,
 Whanne Englonde han her foemenn, Brystow
 flepte. [crie
 Yourselfes, youre chyl dren, and youre fellows
 Go, fyghte ynne rennomes gare, be brave, and wynde or die.

88 Dead. 89 blasting. 90 swallows, sucks in 91 unaccustomed.

I faie ne moe ; youre spryte the reste wylle faie ;
 Your spryte wylle wrynde, thatte Brystow ys
 yer place ; [waite ;
 To honoures houe I nede notte marcke the Inne youre owne hartes you maie the foote-pathe trace. [space ;
 Twexte shape and us there ys botte lyttelle
 The tyme ys nowe to proove yourselfes bee
 menne ; [grace,
 Drawe forthe the bornyshed bylle wythe fetyve
 Rouze, lyche a wolfsynne rouzing from hys denne.
 Thus I enrone mie anlase ; go thou shethe ;
 I'll potte ytt ne ynn place, tyll ytte ys fycke wythe deathe.

Soldyers.

Onn, Ælla, on ; we longe for bloddie fraie ;
 Wee longe to here the raven fyng yn vayne ;
 Onn, Ælla, on ; we certys gayne the daie,
 Whanne thou doste leade us to the lethal playne.

Celmonde.

Thie speche, O Loverde, fyrethe the whole trayne ; [bræathe ;
 Theie pancte for war, as honted wolves for
 Go, and sytte crowned on corfes of the slayne ;
 Go, and ywielde the massie swerde of deathe.

Soldyeres.

From thee, O Ælla, alle oure courage reynnes,
 Echone yn phantafie do lede the Danes ynne chaynes.

Ælla.

Mie cuntrymenne, mie friendes, your noble
 sprytes
 Speke yn youre cyne, and doe yer master telle.
 Swefte as the rayne-storm toe the erthe alyghtes,
 Soe wylle we fall upon these royners felle.
 Oure mowynge swerdes shalle plonge hem
 downe to helle ; [starres ;
 Theyre throngynge corfes shall onlyghte the
 The barrowes brastyng wythe the fleene schall
 swelle, [warres ;
 Brynnyng 92 to commynge tymes our famous
 Inne everie eyne I kenne the lowe of myghte, Sheenyng abroad, alyche a hylle-fyre ynne the nyghte. [saie,
 Whanne poyntelles of oure famous fyghte shall
 Echone wylle marvelle atte the dernie dede,
 Echone wylle wyssen hee hanne seene the daie,
 And bravelie helped to make the foemenn blede ;
 Botte for yer holpe oure battelle wylle notte
 nede ;
 Oure force ys force enowe to staie theyre honde ;
 Wee wylle retourne unto thys grened mede,
 Oer corfes of the foemen of the londe.
 Nowe to the warre lette all the slughornes
 sounde, [grounde,
 The Dacyanne troopes appere on ynder ryfynge
 Chiefes, heade youre bandes, and leade.

DANES FLYING, NEARE WATCHETTE.

Fyrfte Dane.

FLY, fly, ye Danes ; Magnus the chiefe ys fleene,
 The Saxones commé wythe Ælla atte theyre heade ;

Lette's hrew to gette awaie to yinder greene:
Flie, flie; thys ys the kyngdomme of the deadde.

Seconde Dane.

O goddes! have thoufandesbie mie anlace bledde,
And must I nowe for safetic flie awaie?
See! farre besprenged alle oure troopes are
spreade,

Yette I wyllie fyinglie dare the bloddie fraie.
Botte ne; I'll flie, and morther yn reetrete; Deathe, blodde, and fyre, scalle 93 marke the goeynge of my feete.

Thyrde Dane.

Enthoghteynge for to scape the brondeyng foe,
As nere unto the byllowd beche I came,
Farr offe I spied a fyghte of myckle woe, Oure spyrynge battayles wrapt ynn sayles of
flame.

The burled Dacyannes, who were ynn the fame,
Fro fyde to fyde fledde the pusfute of deathe;
The swelleyunge fyre yer corrage doe enflame,
Theic lepe ynto the sea, and bobbyng yield yer breathe;

Whylest those thatt bee uponne the bloddie
playne, [slayne]
Bee deathe-doomed captives taene, or yn the battle

Hurra.

Now bie the goddes, Magnus, dyscourteous
knyghte,

Bie cravente 94 havyoure havethe don oure woe,
Dyspendyng all the talle menne yn the fyghte,
And placeyng valourous menne where draffts
mote goe.

Sythence oure fourtunie have the tourned foe,
Gader the souldyers lefte to future shappe,
To somme newe place for safetic wee wyllie goe,
Inne future daie wee wyllie have better happe.
Sounde the loude slughorne for a quicke forloyne 95; [joyne.

Lette alle the Dacyannes swythe untoe our banner
Throw hamlettes wee wyllie sprengde fadde dethe
and dole, [ynne;

Bathe yn hotte gore, and wasch ourselves there-
Goddess! here the Saxonne lyche a byllowe rolle.

I heere the anlaxis detested dynne.
Awaie, awaie, ye Danes, to yonder penne;
Wee now wyllie make forloyne yn tyme to fyghte agenne.

CELMONDE, NEAR WATCHETTE.

O for a spryte al feere! to telle the daie,
The daie whyche scal astounde the herers rede, Makinge oure foemennes envyyngde hartes to blede, [for aie.

Ybereyngde thro the worlde oure rennomde name

Bryghte sonne han ynne hys roddie robes byn dyghte,

From the redde easte he flytted wythe hys trayne,
The howers drewe awaie the geete of nyghte,
Her sable tapistrie was rente yn twayne.

The dauncyngde streakes bedecked heavennes
playne, [eie,
And on the dewe dyd smyle wythe shemryngde

Lyche gottes of blodde whiche doe blacke ar-
amour steyne, [bic;
Sheenyngde upon the borne 96 whyche stondeth
The souldyers stode uponne the hillis fyde,
Lyche yonges enlesed trees whyche yn a forreste byde.

Ælla rose lyche the tree besette wyth brieres;
Hys talle speere sheenyngde as the starres at
nyghte,

Hys eyne ensemeyngde as a lowe of fyre;
Whanne he encheered everie manne to fyghte,
Hys gentle wordes dyd moove eche valourous
knyghte:

Itte mooveth 'hem, as honterres lyoncell;
In trebled armour yz theyre courage dyghte;
Eche warringde harte forr prayse and rennome
swelles; [streame,
Lyche slowelie dynnyngde, of the croucheyngde
Syche dyd the motmryngde found of the whol armie seme.

Hee ledes 'hem onne to fyghte; oh! thenne to
saie

How Ælla loked, and lokyng dyd encheere,
Moovyngde alyche a mountayne yn affraie,
Whanne a lowde whyrlevyngde doe yttes boc-
somme tare,

To telle howe everie loke wulde banythe feere,
Woulde aske an angelles poyntelle or hys-tongue,
Lyche a talle rocke yatte ryfeth heaven-were,
Lyche a yonge wolfyne brondecous and stryngde,
Soe dydde he goe, and myghtie warriours hedde;

Wythe gore-depycted wynges masterie arounde
hym fledde.

The battelle jyned; swerdes uponne swerdes
dyd ryngde;

Ælla was chafed, as lyonnys madded bee;
Lyche fallyngde starres, he dydde the javlynn
flyngde;

Hys mightie anlace mightie menne dyd flea;
Where he dydde come, the flemed 97 foe dydde
flee,

Or felle benethe hys honde, as fallyngde rayne,
Wythe syke a shuyrie he dydde onn 'hemni
dree, [playne;
Hylles of yer bowkes dyd ryse opponne the Ælla, thou arte—botte staie, mie tyngde; saie nee;

Howe greate I hymme maye make, styllie greater hee wyllie bee.

Nor dydde hys souldyerres see hys astes yn
vayne. [felle;

Heere a stoute Dane uponne hys compheere
Heere lorde and hyndlette sonke uponne the
playne;

Heere sonne and fadre trembled ynto helle.
Chief Magnus fought hys waie, and shame to telle!

Hee sought hys waie for flyghte; botte Ælla's
speere

Uponne the flyyngde Dacyannes schoulder felle,
Quyte throwe hys boddie, and hys harte ytte
tate,

He groned, and sonke uponne the gorie greene,
And wythe hys corse increafed the pylcs of Dacy-annes fleene.

Spente wythe the fyghte, the Danyfhe cham-
pyons ftonde,

Lyche bulles, whose strengthe and wondrous
myghte ys ftedde;

Ælla, a javelynne grypped yn eyther honde,
Fyces to the thronge, and doomes two Dacy-
annes deadde.

After hys aete, the armie all yfpedde;
Fromm everich on unmyffynge javlynnes flewe;
Theie ftraughte yer doughtie fwerdes; the foe-
meen bledde; [flewe;

Full three of foure of myghtie Danes dheie
The Danes, wythe terroure rulynge att their head, [ravenne ftedde.

Threwe downe their bannere talle, and lyche a
The foldyerres followed wythe a myghte crie,
Cryes yatte welle myghte the floutefte hartes
affraie. [annes flie;

Swefte as yer fhyppes the vanquyshed Dacy-
Swefte as the rayne uponne an Aprylle daie,
Preffynge behynde, the Englyfche foldyerres flaie.

Botte halfe the tythes of Danyfhe menne re-
Ælla commaundes heie fhoulde the flectre flait,
Botte bynde hem pryfonners on the bloddie
playne.

The fyghtyne beyng done, I came awaie,
In odher fields to fyghte a moe unqualle fraie.

Mie fervant fquyre!

CELMONDE, SERVITOURE.

Celmonde.

Prepare a fleing horfe,
Whose feete are wynges, whose pace ys lycke
the wynde, [yn courfe,

Whoe wylle outfreppe the morneynge lyghte
Leaveyng the gyttles of the merke behynde.

Somme hyltren matters doe mie prefence fynde.
Gyv oute to alle yatte I was fleene ynne fyghte.

Gyff ynne thys gare thou doeft mie order mynde,
Whanne I returne thou fhalt be made a knyghte;

Flie, flie, be gon; an howerre ys a daie;
Quycke dyghte, mie beffe of ftedes, and bryng
hymm heere—awaie!

Celmonde.

Ælla ys wounded fore, and ynne the toun
He waytethe, tyll hys woundes bee broghte to ethe. [croune,

And fhalle I from hys browes plocke off the Makyng the vyctore yn hys vyctorie blethe?
O no! fülle fooner fhulde mie hartes blodde
fmethe,

Fullle foonere woulde I tortured bee toe deathe;
Botte—Birtha ys the pryze; ahe! ytte were ethe
To gayne fo gayne a pryze wythe losse of breathe;
Botte thanne rennome æterne 98—ytte ys botte
ayre; [there.

Bredde ynne the phantafie, and alleyn lyvyng

Albeytte everyche thinge yn lyfe confpyre
To telle me of the faulte I nowe fhulde doe,

Yette woulde I battenlie affuage mie fyre,
And the fame menes as I fcall nowe purfue.
The qualyties I fro mie parentes drewe
Were blodde, and morthor, mafterie, and warre;
Thie I wylle holde to now, and hede ne moe
A wounde yn rennome, yanne a boddie fcarre.
Nowe, Ælla, nowe lme plantynge of a thorne,
Bie whyche thie peace, thie love, and glorie fhalle be torne.

BRYSTOWE.

BIRTHA, EGWINA.

Birtha.

GENTLE Egwina, do notte preche me joie;
I cannotte joie ynne anie thynge botte were 99.
Oh! yatte aughte fhulde oure fellyneffe deftroie,
Floddyng the face wythe woe and brynie teare!

Egwina.

You muft, you muft endeavour for to cheere
Youre harte unto fomme cherifaunced reft.
Youre loverde from the battie wylle appere,
Ynne honoure, and a greater love, be drefte;
Botte I wylle call the mynftrelles roundelaic;
Perchance the fwotie founde maic chafe your wiere 99 awaie.

BIRTHA, EGWINA, MYNSTRELLES.

Mynftrelles Spnge.

O! fynge untoe mie roundelaic,
O! droppe the brynie teare wythe mee,
Daunce ne moe atte hallie daie,
Lycke a reynnng 100 ryver bee;
Mie love ys dedde,
Gon to hys death-bedde,
Al under the wyllowe tree.

Blacke hys cryne 101 as the wyntere nyghte,
Whyte hys rode 102 as the fommer fnowe,
Rodde hys face as the mornynge lyghte,
Cald he lyes ynne the grave belowe;
Mie love ys dedde,
Gon to hys death-bedde,
Al under the wyllowe tree.

Swote hys tyngue as the throftles note,
Quycke ynn daunce as thought canne bee,
Dcfe hys taboure, codgelle fote,
O! hee lyes bie the wyllowe tree;
Mie love ys dedde,
Gonne to hys deathe-bedde,
Alle under the wyllowe tree,

Harke! the ravenne flappes hys wyng,
In the briered delle belowe;
Harke! the dethe-owle loude dothe fynge,
To the nyghte-mares as heie goe;
Mie love ys dedde,
Gonne to hys deathe-bedde,
Al under the wyllowe tree.

See! the whyte moone fhenees onne hie;
Whyterre ys mie true loves fhroude;
Whyterre yanne the mornynge fkie,
Whyterre yanne the evenng cloude;

99 Grief. 100 running. 101 hair. 102 conplexion.

Mie love ys dedde,
Gon to hys deathe-bedde,
Al under the willow tree.

Heere uponne mie true loves grave,
Schalle the baren fleurs be layde,
Nec on hailie feynste to save
Al the celnes of a mayde.

Mie love ys dedde,
Gone to hys death-bedde,
Al under the willow tree.

Wythe mie hondes I'll dente the brieres
Rounde his hallie corse to gre,
Ouphante fairie, lyghte your fyres,
Heere mie bodie still schalle bee.

My love ys dedde,
Gon to hys death-bedde,
Al under the willow tree.

Comme, wythe acorne-coppe and thorne,
Drayne mie hartys blodde awaie;
Lyfe and all ytts goode I scorne,
Daunce bic nete, or feaste by daie.

Mie love ys dedde,
Gon to hys death-bedde,
Al under the willow tree.

Waterre wythes, crownede wythe reytes 103
Bere mee to yer leathalle tyde.
I die; I komme; mie true love waytes.
Thos the damfelle spake, and dyed.

Birtha.

Thys syngyng haveth whatte coulede ytte
pleafe; [cafe.]

Butte mie uncourtlie shappe benymmes mee of all

ÆLLA, ATTE WATCHETTE.

CURSE onne mie tardie woundes! bryngc mee
a stede!

I wylle awaie to Birtha bie thys nyghte;
Albeytte fro mie woundes mie soul doe blede,
I wylle awaie, and die wythynne her fyghte.
Bryngc mee a stede, wythe eagle wynges for
fyghte,

Sweste as mie wyshe, and, as mie love ys stronge.
The Danes have wrought mee myckle woe ynne fyghte.

Inne kepeynge mee from Birtha's armes so longe.

O! whatte a dome was myne, sythe masterie
Canne yeve ne pleasaunce, nor mie londes goode
leme myne cie!

Yee goddes, howe ys a loverres temper formed!
Some tymes the samme thyngc wyll both bane
and blesse? [warmed]

On tyme encalde 104, yanne bic the same thyngc
Estroughted foorth, and yanne ybroughten leis.
Tys Birtha's losf whyche doe mie thoughts
possesse;

I wylle, I must awaie: whie staies mie stede?
Mie hufcarles, hyther haste; prepare a dresse,
Whyche couracrys 105 yn hastie journies nede.

O heavens! I most awaie to Byrtha eyne,
For yn her looks I fynde mie beyngc doe en-
twyne.

CELMONDE, ATT BRYSTOWE.

The worlde ys darke wythe nyghte; the wyndes
are styll; [gleme;
Faynelic the mone her palyde lyght makes
The upryste 106 sprytes the sylence letten 107
fyllc,

Wythe ouphant faeryes joynyng ynn the dreme;
The foreste sheenethe wythe the sylver leme;
Nowe maie mie love be fated ynn ytts treatc;
Uponne the lynche of somme sweste reynyng-
streame,

Att the swote banquette I wylle swotelic eate.
Thys ys the howfe; yee hyndes, fwythyn appere.

CELMONDE, SERVYTOURE.

Celmonde.

Go telle to Birtha strayte, a straungere waytethe
here.

CELMONDE, BIRTHA.

Birtha.

Celmonde! yee scynctes! I hope thou haste goode newes.

Celmonde.

The hope ys loste; for heavie newes prepare.

Birtha.

Is Ælla welle?

Celmonde.

Hee lyves; and styllc maie use
The behylte 108 blesynges of a future yeare.

Birtha.

Whatte heavie tydyngc thenne have I to feare?
Of whatte mischaunce dydste thou so lachlic
saic?

Celmonde.

For heavie tydynges fwythyn now prepare.
Ælla sore wounded ys, yn bykerous fraite;
In Wedecster's wallid toune he lies.

Birtha.

O mie agroted breast!

Celmonde.

Wythoute your syght he dyce.

Birtha.

Wylle Birtha's presence ethe her Ælla's payne?
I fie; newe wynges doe from mie schoulders sprynge.

Celmonde.

Mie stede wythoute wylle deftelic beere us
twayne.

Birtha.

Oh! I wyll fie as wynde, and no waie lynge;
Swestlic caparifons for rydyngc bryngc;
I have a mynde wynged wythe the levynce ploome.

O Ælla, Ailla! dydste thou kenne the styngc,
The whiche doeth canker yanne mie hartys
roome, [bec]

Thou wouldste see plaync thiefselc the gare to Aryfe, uponne thic love, and fie to meeten mee.

Celmonde.

The stede, on whyche I came, ys sweste as ayre;
Mie servytoures doe wayte mee nere the wode;
Swythynne wythe mee unto the place repayre;
To Ælla I wylle gev you conduct goode.

103 Water-flags. 104 frozen, cold. 105 horse carriers, carriers.

106 Rifen. 107 church-yard. 108 promised.

Youré cync, alyche a baulme, wyll staunche
hys bloode,
Holpe oppe hys woundes, and yev hys hearte
alle cheere :
Uponne your eyne heholdes hys lvelyhode roq;
You doe hys spryte, and alle hys pleasaunce bere.
Comme, lette's awaie, albeytte ytte ys moke,
Yette love wille bee a tore to tourne to feere nyghtes smoke.

Birba.

Albeytte unweares dyd the welkynn rende,
Reync, alyche fallyng ryvers, dyd ferse bee,
Erthe wythe the ayre enchafed dyd contende;
Everychone breathe of wynde wythe plaguts
dyd flec,
Yette I to Ælla's eyne estfoones woulde flec;
Albeytte hawthornes dyd me fleshe enfeme,
Owlettes, wythe scrychynge, shakeynge everyche
tree,
And water-neders wrygglynge yn eche streme,
Yette woulde I flie, ne under coverte staic,
Botte seke mie Ælla owte; brave Celmonde, leade the waic.

A WOODE.

HURRA, DANES.

Hurra.

HEERE ynn yis forreste lette us watche for pree,
Bewreckeynge on our foemane oure ylle
warre;
Whateverre schalle be Englysch wee wylle flea,
Spreddeynge our ugomme rennome to afarre.
Ye Dacyanne menne, gyff Dacyanne menne yee are,
Lette nete botte blodde suffycyle for yee bee;
On everych breafe yn gorie letteres fearre,
What sprytes you have, and howe those sprytes
maie drece.
And gyff yee gette awaie to Denmarkes shore,
Estfoones we will retourne, and vanquished bee
ne moere,
The battelle loste, a battelle was yndede;
Note queedes hemselfes culde stonde so harde a fraie; [blede,
Oure verie armoure, and our healmes dyd
The Dacyannes sprytes, lyche dewe drops, fledde awaie.
Ytt was an Ælla dyd commaunde the daic;
Ynn spytte of foemane, I most faic hys myghte;
Botte wee ynn hynd lettes blodde the losf wylle
paie,
Brynyngc, thatte we knowe howe to wynde
yn fyghte; [deströic;—
Wee wylle, lyke wyfles enloosed from chaynes, Oure amoures—wynter nyghte shotte oute the daic of joie.
Whene swefte-fote tyme doe rolle the daic
alonge, [brende;
Somme hamlette scalle onto oure fhuyrie
Braftyngc alyche a rocke, or mountayne stronge,
The tale chyrche-spyre upon the grene shalle
bende; [rende,
Wee wylle the walles, and auntaryte tourettes

Pete everych tree whych goldyn fruyte doe
beere,
Downe to the goddes the ownerrs there of sende,
Besprengynge alle abroad fadde warre and bloddie weere.
Botte fyrste to yynder oke-tree wee wylle flie;
And thence wylle yffue owte onne all yatte commeth bie.

ANODHER PARTE OF THE WOODE.

CELMONDE, BIRTHA.

Birba.

THYS mercknes doe affraie mie wommanns breafe.
Howe fable ys the spredynge skie arrayde!
Hailie the bordeleire, who lyves to reste,
Ne ys att nyghts flemynge hue dyfmayde;
The starres doe scantillie in the fable brayde;
Wyde ys the sylver lemes of comforte wove;
Speke, Celmonde, does ytte make thee notte afrayde?

Celmonde.

Merker the nyghte. fitter tyde for love.

Birba.

Saieft thou for love? ah! love is far awaie.
Faygne would I see once moe the roddie lemes of daie.

*Celmonde.*Love maie bec nie, woulde Birtha calle ytte here.Birba.

How, Celmonde, dothe thou mene?

Celmonde.

Thys Celmonde menes.
No leme, no eyne, ne mortalle manne appere,
Ne lyghte, an act of love for to bewreene;
Nete in thys forreste, botte thys tore in, dothe
sheene, [nyght;
The whych, potte oute, do leave the whole yn
See! howe the brauncyngc trees do here en-
twyne, [fyghte;
Makeyng thy bower so pleasyngc to the Thys was for love fyrst made, and here ytt
stondes,
That hereynne lovers maie enlyncke yn true loves bondes.

Birba.

Celmonde, speake whatte thou menest, or alse
mie thoughtes
Perchance maie robbe thie honestie so fayre.

Celmonde.

Then here, and knowe, hereto I have you
broughte,
Mie longe hydde love unto you to make clere.

Birba.

O heaven and earthe! whatte ys ytt I doe
here?
Am I betraite in? where ys mie Ælla, faic?

Celmonde.

O! do nette now to Ælla fyke love bere,
Botte geven some onne Celmondes hedde.

110 Scarcely, sparingly. 111 torch. 112 betrayed.

Birtha.

Awaic!

I wyll be gone, and groape mie passage oute,
Albeytte neders ftynges mie legs do twyne aboute.

Celmonde.

Nowe bie the feyndes I wyll notte lette thee
goe,

Ontylle thou docte mie brendyng-love amate.
Thofe cyne have caufed Celmonde myckle woe,
Yenne-lette yer smyle fyrft take hymni yn regrate.

O! didft thou fec mie breaftris troblous ftate,
There love doth harrie up mie joie, and ethe! I
I wretched bee, beyonde the hele of fate,
Gyff Birtha ftyle wyll make mie harte-veynes blethe.

Softe as the fomme flowreets, Birtha, looke,
Fullc ylle I canne thie frowncs and harde dyf-pleafauce brooke.

Birtha.

This love ys foule; I woulde bee deafe for aie,
Radher thanne heere fyche deflavatie; I fedde.
Swythynne flie from mee, and he further faie;
Radher thanne heare thie love, I woulde bee dead.

[hedde]

Yee feyndes! and fhaf I wronge mie Ælla's
And wouldeft thou, Celmonde, tempte me to the thynges?

Let mec be gone—alle curfes onne thie hedde!
Was ytte for thys thou dydste a meffage bryng!
Lette mee be gone, thou maïne of fable harte!
Or welkyn 114 and her ftarres wyll take a may-dens parte.

Celmonde.

Sythence you wyll notte lette mie fuyte avele,
Mie love wyll have yttes joie, altho wythe
guylte; [ftele]
Your lymbes fhall bende, albeytte ftynges as
The merkye sefonne wyll your blofhes hylte 115.

Birtha.

Holpe, holpe, ye feyndes! oh thatte mie blodde was fpylte!

Celmonde.

The feyndes att diftaunce flonde ynn tyme of nede.

Strev notte to goe; thou canste notte, gyff thou wylte.

Unto mie wyfche bee kinde, and nete alfe hede.

Birtha.

No, foule beftoykerre, I wyll rende the ayre,
Tylle dethe to ftaic mie dynne, or fomme kynde
roder heare.

Holpe! holpe! oh Godde!

CELMONDE, BIRTHA, HURRA, DANES.

Hurra.

Ah! thatts a wommane cries.
I kenn hem; faie, who are you, yatte bee there?

Celmonde.

Yee hyndes, awaic! orre bie thys fwerde yee
dies.

Hurra.

This wordes wyll ne mie hartis fete affere.

Birtha.

Save mee, oh! fave me from thys roynere heere!

Hurra.

Stonde thou hic, mie; now faie thie name and londc;

Or fwythynne fhall mie fwerde thie boddie tare.

Celmonde.

Bothe I wyll fhewe thee bie mie brondeous 116
honde.

Hurra.

Befette hym rounde, yee Danes.

Celmonde.

Come onne, and fec [bec.]

Gyff mie ftynges anlase maie bewryen whatte I [Fyghte at anenfte Celmonde, maynte, Danes be fleath, and faleth to Hurra.]

Celmonde.

Oh! I forflagen 117 bee! ye Danes, now kenne,
I amme yatte Celmonde, feconde yn the fyghte,
Who dydd, atte Watchette, fo forflege youre
menne; [nyghte;—
I fele myne cyne to fwymmen yn aterne
To her be kynde.]

Hurra.

Thenne felle a wordhie knyghte.

Saie, who bee you?

Birtha.

I am greate Ælla's wyfe.

Hurra.

Ah!

Birtha.

Gyff anenfte hym you harboure foule defpyte,
Nowe wythe the lethal anlase take mie lyfe,
Me thankes I ever onne you wyll beftowe,
From ewbryce 118 you mee pyghte, the worfte of mortal woe.

Hurra.

I wyll; ytte fcale bee foe: ye Dacyans, here,
Thys Ælla havethe been oure foe for aie.
Thorowe the battelle he dyd brondeous teare,
Beyng the lyfe and head of everyche fraie;
From everych Dacyanne power he won the daie,
Forflagen Magnus, all oure fchippes ybrente;
Bie hys felle arme wee now are made to fraie;
The fpeere of Dacya he ynn pieces fhente;
Whanne hantoned barckes unto our londc dyd
comme,
Ælla the gare dheie fed, and wyfched hym byt-
ter dome.

Birtha.

Mercie!

Hurra.

Bee ftyle.

Botte yette he ys a foemanne goode and fayre;
Whanne wee are fpente, he foundethe the forloyne;

The captives chayne he tofseth ynn the ayre,
Cheered the wounded bothe wythe bredde and wyne;

Has hee notte untoc fomme of you bynn dygne?
You woulde have fmethed onne Wedecftrian
fielde,

Botte hee behylte the flughorne for to cleyne,
Throwyng onne hys wyde backe, hys wyder
fpreddyng fielde.

Whanne you, as caitysned, yn fælde dyd bee,
Hee oathed you to bee skylle, and strayte dydd sette
you free.

Scalle wee forleige 119 hys wyfe, because he's brave?

Bicaus hee fyghteth for hys countrys gare?
Wylle hee, who havith bynne yis Ælla's slave,
Robbe hym of whatte percase he holdith deere?
Or scalle we menne or mennys sprytes appere,
Doeynge hym favoure for hys favoure donne,
Swefte to hys pallace thys damoifelle bere,
Bewrynne oure case, and to oure waic be gone?
The last you do approve; so lette ytte bee;
Damoifelle, comme awaic; you safe scalle bee wythe mee.

Birtha.

All blessinges maie the seynctes unto yee gyve!
All pleasaunce maie your longe-straighte
livynges bee!

Ælla, whanne knowynge thatte bie you I lyve,
Wylle thyncke too smalle a guyfte the londe and sea.

O Celmonde! I maie destlie rede bie thee,
Whatte ille betydethe the enfouled kynde;
Maie ne thie cross-stone 120 of thie crynie bewree! [mynde!

Maie alle menne ken thie valoure, fewe thie
Soldyer! for syke thou arte ynn noble fraic,
I wylle thie goynges 'tende, and doc thou lede the waic.

Hurra.

The mornynge 'gyns alonge the easte to sheene;
Darklinge the lyghte doe onne the waters plaie;
The feynthe rodde leme slowe creepeth oere the
greene,

Toe chase the merkynes of nyghte awaic;
Swifte flies the howers thatte wylle brynge oute
the daie;

The sulte dewe falleth onne the greeynge
graffe;

The shepster mayden, dyghtynge her arraie,
Scante 121 sees her vyfage yn the wawie glaffe;
Bie the fulle daylieghte wee scalle Ælla see,

Or Brytlowes wallyd towne; damoifelle, followe
mee.

AT BRYSTOWE.

ÆLLA AND SERVITOURES.

Ælla.

Tys nowe fulle morne; I thoughten, bie laste
nyghte [love;

To have been heere; mie stede han notte mie
Thys ys mie pallace; lette mie hyndes alyghte,
Whylste I goe oppe, and wake mie slepeynge dove.

Staie here, mie hyndlettes; I shal goe above.
Nowe, Birtha, wyll thie loke enbele mie spryte,
Thie smyles unto mie woundes a baulme wylle prove;

Mie ledanne boddie wylle be sette aryghte.

Egwina, haite, and ope the portalle doore,
Yatte I on Birtha's breste maie thynke of warre ne more.

Ælla, Egwina.

Egwina.

Oh Ælla!

Ælla.

Ah! that seemlykeene to mee
Specketh a legendary tale of woe.

Egwina.

Birtha is—

Ælla.

Whatt? where? how? faie, whatte of faie?

Egwina.

Gone—

Ælla.

Gone! ye goddes!

Egwina.

Alas! ytte ys toe true.

Yee seynctes, hee dies awaic wythe myckle
woe!

Ælla! what? Ælla! oh! hee lyves agen.

Ælla.

Cal mee notte Ælla; I am hymne ne moc.

Where ys shee gon awaic? ah! speake! how?
when?

Egwina.

I will.

Ælla.

Caparyson a score of stedes; fie, fie.
Where ys shee? swythynne speeke, or instante thou shalte die.

Egwina.

Style this loud rage, and here thou whatte I knowe.

Ælla.

Oh! speek.

Egwina.

Lyche prymrose, droopynge wythe the heavie
rayne, [wiere,
Laste nyghte I leste her, droopynge wythe her
Her love the gare, thatte gave her harte syke peyne—

Ælla.

Her love! to whomme?

Egwina.

To thee, her sponse alleyn 122.
As ys mie hentylle everyche morne to goe,
I wente, and oped her chamber doore ynn
twayne,

Botte found her notte, as I was wont to doc;
Thanne alle arounde the pallace I dyd feere 123, Botte culde (to mie hartes woe) ne fynde her anie wheree.

Ælla.

Thou lyeest, soul hagg! thou lyeest; thou art
her ayde [bee.

To chere her loustie;—botte noe; ytte cannotte
Egwina.

Gyff trouthe appear notte inne whatte I have sayde, [slea.

Drawe forthe thie anlace swythyn, thanne mee
Ælla.

Botte yette ytte muste, ytte muste bee foe; I see,
Shee wythe somme loustie paramoure ys gone;
Ite moste bee foe—oh! how ytte wracketh mee!
Mie race of love, mie race of lyfe ys runne;

Nowe rage, and brondeous storm, and tempeste
comme; [domme.
Nete luyving upon erthe can now enfwote mie

ÆLLA, EGWINA, SERVYTOURE.

Servytoure.

Loverde! I am aboute the trouthe to saie.
Latte nyghte, fulle late I dydde retourne to reste.
As to mie chamber I dydde bende mie waie,
To Birtha onne hys name and place adreste;
Downe to hym camme she; butte thereof the
reste

I ken ne matter; so, mie homage made—

Ælla.

O speake ne moe; mie harte flames yn yttes
hafte;

I once was Ælla; nowe bee notte yttes shade.

Hanne alle the furie of mysfortunes wylle
Fallen one mie benned 124 heade-I hanne been Ælla styll.

Thys alleyn was unburlid 125 of alle mie spyte;
Mie honoure, honoure, frownd on the dolce 126
wynde, [pyghte;

Thatte fleeked on ytte; nowe wyth rage im-
A brondeous unweere ys mie engnyed mynde.

Mie hommeur yette somme drybblit joie maie
fynde,

To the Danes woundes I wylle another yeve;
Whanne thos mie rennome 127 and mie peace
ys rynde,

Itte were a recrandize to thyncke to lyve;

Mie huscarles, untoe everie afker telle,

Gyffe noblie Ælla lyved, as noblie Ælla felle.

[Stabbeth hys breste.

Servytoure.

Ælla ys fleene; the flower of Englonde's marrde.

Ælla.

Be styll; swythe lette the chyrches ryngie mie knelle.

Call hyther brave Coer nyke; he, as warde

Of thys mie Brystowe castle, wyl doë welle.

[Knelle ryngeth.

ÆLLA, EGWINA, SERVYTOURE, COER-NYKE.

Ælla.

Thee I ordeyne the warde; foe alle maie telle,
I have botte lyttel tym to dragge thys lyfe;

Mie lethal tale, alyche a lethalle belle!

Dynne yn the eares of her I wyschd mie wyfe!

Botte, ah! shee maie be fayre.

Egwin.

Yatte shee moste bee.

Ælla.

Ah! faie notte foe! yatte worde would Ælla doubly fle.

ÆLLA, EGWINA, SERVYTOURE, COER-NYKE, BIRTHA, HURRA.

Ælla.

Ah! Birtha here!

Birtha.

Whatte dynne ys thys? whatte menes yis leathalle knelle? [hee?

Where ys mie Ælla? speeke; where? howe ys
Oh Ælla! art thou yanne alyve and welle?

Ælla.

I lyve yndeed; botte doe notte lyve for thee.

Birtha.

What menes mie Ælla?

Ælla.

Thie foulnefs urged mie honde to gyve thys
wounde,

Ytte mee unsprytes 128.

Birtha.

Ytt hathe unsprytied mee.

Ælla.

Ah Heavens! mie Birtha fallethe to the grounde!
Botte yette I am a manne, and so wylle bee,

Hurra.

Ælla! I amme a Dane; botte yette a friend to thee.

Thys damoyfelle I founde wythynne a woode,
Strevyngie fulle harde anenfte a burlid fwayne;
I sente hym myryngie yanne mie compheeres
blodde, [trayne.

Celmonde hys name, chief of thie warryngie
Yis damoiselle soughte to be here agayne;
The whyche, albeytte foemen, wee dydd wylle;
So here wee broughte her wythe you to re-mayne.

Coer nyke.

Ye nobylle Danes! wythe goule I wyll you fyll.

Ælla.

Birtha, mie lyfe! mie love! oh! shee ys fayre.
Whatte faultes coulede Birtha have, whatte faultes coulede Ælla feare?

Birtha.

Amm I yenne thynne? I cannotte blame thie feere,

Botte doe reste mee upponne mie Ælla's breaste;
I wylle to thee bewryen the woefulle gare.

Celmonde dyd comme to mee at tyme of reste,
Wordeyngie for mee to flie, att your requeste,
To Watchette towne, where you deceafyngie
laie; [preste,

I wyth hym fledde; through a murke wode we
Where hee foule love unto mie eares dyd faie;

The Danes—

Ælla.

Oh! I die contente.— [dieth.

Birtha.

Oh! ys mie Ælla dedde?

O! I will make hys grave mie vyrgyn spousal bedde.
[Birtha seyneth.

Coer nyke.

Whatt? Ælla deadde! and Birtha dyngie toe!
Soe falls the fayrett flourettes of the playne.

Who canne unplyte the wurchys Heaven can
doe,

Or who untweste the role of shappeyn twayne?
Ælla, thie rennome was thie only gayne;

124 Cursed, tormented. 125 unarmed. 126 soft, gentle. 127 renown.

For yatte, thie pleasaunce, and thie joie was loste.
Thie countrymen shall rere thee, on the playne,
A pile of carnes, as anie grave can boaste;
Further, a just amede to thee to bee,
Inne Heaven thou syng of Godde, on erthe we'lle syng of thee.

GODDWYN;

A TRAGEDIE.

By Thomas Rowleie.

PERSONS REPRESENTED.

HAROLDE, bie T. Rowleie, the Audhoure.
GODDWYN, bie Johan de Iseanne.
ELWARDE, bie Syrr Tybot Gorges.
ALSTAN, bie Syrr Alan de Vere.
KYNGE EDWARDE, bie Maistre Willyam Canynge.

Oubers bie Knyghtes Mynnstrelles.

PROLOGUE.

MADE BIE MAISTRE WILLIAM CANYNGE.

WHYLOME I bie pensmeune 2 moke 3 un-gentle 4 name
Have upon Goddwynne Earl of Kente bin layde, Dherbie benymmyng 5 hymme of faie 6 and fame;
Unliart 7 divinstres 8 haveth faide,
Thatte he was knowen toe noe hallie 9
wurche 10; [churche]
Botte thys was all hys faulte, he gyfted ne 11 the
The auchhoure 12 of the piece whiche we enacte,
Albeytte 13 a clergyon 14, trouthe wyll wrytte.
Inne drawyng of hys menne no wytte ys lackte;
Entyn 15 a kynge mote 16 be full pleased to
nyghte.
Attende, and marcke the partes nowe to be done;
Wee better for to doe do champyon 17 anie onne.

GODDWYN, AND HAROLDE.

Goddwyn.

HAROLDE.

Harolde.

Mic loverde 18!

Goddwyn.

O! I weepe to thyncke,

What foemen 19 riseth to ifrete 20 the londe.
Theie batten 21 onne her fleshe, her heartes
bloude dryncke,

And all ys graunted from the roial borde.

Harolde.

Lette notte thie agreme 22 blyn 23, ne aledge 24
stonde:
Bee I toe wepe, I wepe in teres of gore:
Am I betrayed 25, fyke 26 shulde mie burlie 27
bronde [I bore].
Dep eync 28 the wronges on hym from whom

Goddwyn.

I ken thie spryte 29 ful welle; gentle thou art,
Stringe 30, ugfomme 31, rou 32, as smethynge 33
armyes leeme; [parte,
Yett est 34, I feare, thie chesfes 35 toe grete a
And that thie rede 36 bee este borne downe bie
brene 37,

What tydynge from the kynge?

Harolde.

His Normans know.

I make noe compeehers of the shemryng 38.
trayne.

Goddwyn.

Ah Harolde! 'tis a syghte of myckle woe,
To kenne thiefe Normannes everich rennome.
gayne.

What tydyng with the foulke 39?

Harolde.

Stylle mormoryng atte yer shap 40, hylle toe
the kynge
Theie rolle theire trobbles, lyche a forgie fea.
Hane Englonde theine a tongue, butte notte a stynge?

Dothe alle compleyne, yette none wyll ryghted
Goddwyn.

Awate the tyme whanne Godde wyll fende us ayde.

Harolde.

No, we muste streve to ayde oureselvs wythe
powre. [prayde]
Whan Godde wyll fende us ayde! tis fetelic 41
Moste we thofe calke 42 awaic the lyve-longe
howre? [dareynge 44,
Thos croche 43 cure armes, and ne toe lyve
Unburled 45, undelievre 46, unespryte?
Far fro mie harte be fled thyk 48 thoughte of
peyne,

Ille free mie countrie, or Ille die yn fyghte. I. I.

Goddwyn.

Botte lette us wayte untylle somme season fytt.
Mie Kentysmen, thie Summertons shall ryfe;
Adented 49 prowels 50 to the gite 51 of witte,
Agayne the argent 52 horfe shall daunce yn skies.
Oh, Harolde, heere forstraughteyng 53 waahope 54 lies.
Englonde, oh Englonde, tys for thee I blethe 55.

22 Grievance; a sense of it. 23 cease, be still.
24 idly. 25 deceived, imposed on. 26 so. 27 fury,
anger, rage. 28 paint, display. 29 soul. 30 strong.
31 terrible. 32 horrid, grim. 33 smoking, bleed-
ing. 34 oft. 35 heat, rashness. 36 counsel, wif-
dom. 37 strength, also strong. 38 taudry, glimmering. 39 people. 40 fate, destiny. 41 nobly.
42 cast. 43 cross, from crouche, a cross. 44 attempt, or endeavour. 45 unarmed. 46 unactive.
47 unspirited. 48 such. 49 fastened, annexed. 50 might, power. 51 mantle, or robe. 52 white, alluding to the arms of Kent, a horse saliant, argent,
53 distracting. 54 despair. 55 bleed.

1 Of old, formerly. 2 writers, historians. 3 much-inglorious. 5 bereaving. 6 faith. 7. unforgiving.
8 divines, clergymen, monks. 9 holy. 10 work.
11 not. 12 author. 13 though, notwithstanding.
14 clerk, or clergyman. 15 entyn, even. 16 might.
17 challenge. 18 lord. 19 foes, enemies. 20 devour, destroy. 21 fatten.

Whylste Edwarde to thie sonnes wylle nete
 alyfe 56,
 Shulde anie of thie sonnes fele aughte of ethe 57?
 Upponne the throne 58 I sette thee, helde thie
 crowne; [downe.
 Botte oh! twere hommage nowe to pyghte 59 thee
 Thou arte all preeste, and notheynge of the kyng.
 Thou arte all Norman, notheynge of mie blodde.
 Know, ytte befeise 60 thee notte a masse to synge; [Godde.
 Servynge thie leegefolcke 61 thiou arte feryngē
 Harolde.
 Thenne Ille doe heaven a serveyce. To the skyes
 The dailie contekes 62 of the londe ascende.
 The wyddowe, fahdreleffe, and bondēmenes cries [tende 65.
 Acheke 63 the mokie 64 aite and heaven a-
 On us the rulers doe the folcke depende;
 Hancelled 66 from erthe these Normanne 67
 hyndes shalle bee; [brende 70;
 Lyche a barrantly 68 low 69, mie swerde shalle
 Lyche fallynge softe rayne droppe, I wyll
 hem 71 flea 72; [fayte 73;
 Wee wayte too longe; our purpose wylle de-Aboute 74 the hyge empryze 75, and rouze the champyones straye.
 Goddwyn.

This suster—

Harolde.

Aye, I knowe she is his queene. [fayre,
 Albeyte 76, dyd shee speeke her foemen 77
 I wulde dequae 78 her comelie femlykeene 79,
 And fouldē mie bloddie anlance 80 yn her hayre.
 Goddwyn.

Thye shuir 81 blyn 82.

Harolde.

No, bydde the leathal 83 mere 84,
 Upriste 85 withe hiltrene 86 wyndes and cause
 unkend 87,
 Beheste 88 it to be lette 89; fo twylle appeare,
 Eere Harolde hyde hys name, his contries frende.
 The gule-heyne 90 brygandyne 91, the adven-
 taylor 92, [prevayle.
 The ferrie anlance 92 brede 93 shal make mie gare 94

Goddwyn.

Harolde, what wuldest doe?

Harolde.

Bethyncke thee whatt!

Here liethe Englonde, all her drites 95 unfree,
 Here liethe Normans coupynge 96 her biē lotte,
 Caltyfnyng 97 everich native plante to gre 98,

Whatte woulde I doe? I brōnceous 99 wulde hem flee 1; [brene 2;
 Tare owte theyre sable harte bie ryghisfulle
 Theyre deathe a meanes untoe mie lyte shulde bee, [streme.
 Mie spryze shulde revelle yn theyr harte-blodde
 Eftoones I wylle bewryne 3 thie ragefulle ire;
 And Goddis anlance 4 wicde yn furie dyre.
 Goddwyn.

Whattē wouldest thou wythe the kyngē?

Harolde.

Take offe hys crowne;

The ruler of somme mynster 5 hym ordeyne;
 Sette uppe som dygner 6 than I han pyghte 7
 downe; [gayne.
 And peace in Englonde shulde be brayd 8 a-

Goddwyn.

No, lette the super-hallie 9 seyncte kyngē reygne,
 Ande somme moe reded to rule the unten-
 tyll 11 reaulme;

Kyngē Edwarde, yn hys cortefin, wylle deygne
 To yielde the spoiles, and allayne were the heaulme; [gayne.

Botte from mie harte bee everych thoughte of
 Not anie of mie kin I wysche him to ordeyne.

Harolde.

Tell mee the meenes, and I wylle boutē ytte straye; [done.

Bete 12 mee to flea 13 mie self, ytte shalle be

Goddwyn.

To thee I wylle fwythynne 14 the menes unplayte 15, [sonne.

Bie whyche thou, Harolde, shalte be proved mie
 I have longe seen whatte peynes were undergon, Whatte agrames 16 braunce 17 out from the general tree; [gron 19

The tyme ys commynge, whan the mollock 18
 Drented 20 of alle yts swolyngē 21 owndes 22
 shalle bee;

Mie remedie is goode; oure menne stall ryse:
 Eftfoones the Normans and owre agramē 23 flies.

Harolde.

I will to the west, and gemote 24 alle mie
 knyghtes, [as brede 25

Wythe hylles that panctē for blodde, and theeldes
 As the ybroched 26 moon, whan blaunch 27 the
 dyghtes 28

The wodeland grounde or water-mantled mede;
 Wythe hondes whose myghte canne make the doughtiest 29 blede,

Who este have kneltē upon forslagen 30 foes,
 Whoe wythe yer fote orreits 31 a castle stode 32,
 Who dare on kynges for to bewrecke 33 yiere
 woos; [daie,

Nowe wylle the menne of Englonde haile the Whan Goddwyn leads them to the ryghtfulle fraie.

56 Allow. 57 ease. 58 throne. 59 pluck. 60
 becomes. 61 subjects, 62 contentions, complaints.
 63 choke. 64 dark, cloudy. 65 astonish. 66 cut off, destroyed. 67 slaves. 68 loud roaring. 69 flame of fire. 70 burn, consume. 71 them. 72
 slay. 73 decay. 74 make ready. 75 enterprise.
 76 notwithstanding. 77 foes. 78 mangle; destroy.
 79 beauty, countenance. 80 an ancient sword. 81
 fury. 82 cease. 83 deadly. 84 lake. 85 swollen.
 86 hidden. 87 unknown. 88 command. 89 still.
 90 red-stained. 91, 92 parts of armour. 93 broad.
 94 cause. 95 rights, liberties. 96 cutting, mang-
 ling. 97 forbidding. 98 grow.

Vol. XI.

99 Furious. 1 slay. 2 strength. 3 declare. 4 sword. 5 monastery. 6 more worthy. 7 pulled, plucked. 8 displayed. 9 over-righteous. 10 counselled, more wise. 11 uncareful, neglected. 12 bid, command. 13 slay. 14 presently. 15 explain.
 16 grievances. 17 branch. 18 wet, moist. 19 fen, moor. 20 drained. 21 swelling. 22 waves. 23
 grievance. 24 assemble. 25 bread. 26 horned.
 27 white. 28 decks. 29 mightiest, most valiant.
 30 slain. 31 oversets. 32 a cattle. 33 revenge

Z

Goddwyn.

Botte firste we'll call the loverdes of the west,
The erles of Mercia, Conventrie and all; [beste,
The moe wee gayne, the gare 34 wylle prosper
Wythe syke a number wee can never fall.

Harolde.

True, so wee sal doe best to lyncke the chayne,
And alle attenes 35 the spreddyng kyngedomme
bynde. [seygne

No crouched 36 champyone wythe an herte moe
Dyd yssue owte the halie 37 sward to synde,
Than I nowe strev to ryd mie londe of peyne.

Goddwyn, what thanckes owre laboures wylle enhepe!

I'lle ryse mie friendes untoe the bloddie pleyne;
I'lle wake the honnoure thatte ys nowe aspe.
When wylle the chiefes mete atte thie festive halle, [calle?

That I wythe voice alowde maie' there upon 'em

Goddwyn.

Next eve, mie sonne.

Harolde.

Nowe, Englonde, ys the tyme,
Whan thee or thie selle foemens cause motte die.
Thie geason 38 wronges bee reyne 39 ynto
theyre pryme;

Nowe wylle thie sonnes unto thie succoure flie.
Alyche a storm egederinge 40 yn the skie,
Tys fulle ande brasteth 41 on the chaper 42
grounde;

Sycke ihalle mie shuirye on the Normans flie,
And alle theyre mittee 43 menne be sleene 44
arounde. [falie,

Nowe, nowe, wylle Harolde or oppressioun
Ne moe the Englyshmenne yn vayne for hele 45
shal calle.

KYNGE EDWARDE AND HYS QUEÈNE.

Queene.

BOTTE, loverde 46, whie so manie Normannes here? [londe.

Mee thynckethe wee bee notte yn Englyshe
These browded 47 straungers alwaie doe appere,
Theie parte yor trone 48, and sete at your ryghte
honde.

Kynge.

Go to, goe to, you doe ne understonde:
Theie yeave mee lyffe, and dyd mie bowkie 49
kené; [gronde;

Theie dyd mee feeste, and did embowre 50 me
To trete hem ylle wulde lette mie kyndnesse slepe.

Queene.

Mancas 51 you have yn store, and to them parte;
Youre leege-folcke 52 make moke 53 dole 54, you have theyr worthe asterte 55.

34 Cause. 35 at once. 36 one who takes up the crois in order to fight against the Saracens. 37 holy. 38 rare, extraordinary, strange. 39 run, shot up. 40 assembling, gathering. 41 bursteth. 42 dry, barren. 43 mighty. 44 slain. 45 help. 46 lord. 47 embroidered; it is conjectured embroidery was not used in England till Henry II. 48 throne. 49 person, body. 50 lodge. 51 marks. 52 subjects. 53 much. 54 lamentation. 55 neglected, or valued by

Kynge.

I heste 56 no rede of you. I ken mie friendes,
Hallie 57 dheie are, fulle ready mee to hele 58.
Theyre volundes 59 are ystorven 60 to self endes;
No denwere 61 yn mie breste I of them fele:
I muste to prayers; goe yn, and you do wele;
I muste ne lose the dutie of the daie;
Go inne, go ynne, ande viewe the azure rele 62,
Fulle welie I wote you have noe mynde toe praie.

Queene.

I leeve youe to doe hommage heaven-were 63;
To serve your leege-folcke toe is doeynge hommage
there.

KYNGE AND SYR HUGHE.

Kynge.

Mie friende, Syr Hughe, whatte tydynges brynges thee here?

Hughe.

There is no mancas yn mie loverdes ente 64;
The hus dyspense 65 unpaied doe appere;
The laste receiveur 66 ys estesoones 67 dis-
pente 68.

Kynge.

Thenne guylde the weite.

Hughe.

Mie loverde, I dyd speke
Untoe the mitte 69 Erle Harolde of the thyng;e
He rayfed hys honde, and smote me onne the cheke, [kynge.
Saieynge, go bearre thatte message to the Kynge.

Arace 70 hym of hys powere; bie Goddis worde,
Ne moe thatte Harolde shall ywield the erlies swerde.

Hughe.

Atte seefon fytte, mie loverde, lette itt bee;
Botte rowe the folcke doe soe enalfe 71 hys
name, [slea;
In strevvynge to slea hymme, ourselves wee
Syke ys the doughtyness 72 of hys grete fame.

Kynge.

Hughe, I beethyncke, thie rede 73 ys notte to blame. [yn Kente.
Botte thou maieft synde fulle store of marckes,

Hughe.

Mie noble loverde, Goddwyn ys the same; [ent.
He sweeres he wylle notte swelle the Normans

Kynge.

Ah traytoure! botte mie rage I wylle com-
maunde. [the launde.
Thou arte a Normanne, Hughe, a fraunger to Thou kenneste howe these Englyche erle doe bere

Such stednes 74 in the yll and evylle thyng,
Botte atte the goode theie hover yn denwere 75,
Onknowlathynge 76 gif thereunto to clynge.

56 Require, ask. 57 holy. 58 help. 59 will-60 dead. 61 doubt. 62 waves. 63 heaven-ward, or God-ward. 64 purse, used here probably as a treasury. 65 expence. 66 receipt. 67 soon. 68
expended. 69 a contraction of mighty. 70 divest.
71 embrace. 72 mightiness. 73 counsel. 74 firmness, steadfastness. 75 doubt, suspence. 76 not knowing.

Hugbr.

Onwordie fyke a maruelle 77 of a kyngel
 O Edwarde, thou deseruest purer leege 78;
 To the heie 79 shulden al their mancas brynge;
 This nodde should save menne, and thie glomb 80
 forleege 81.
 I amne no curriedowe 82, I lacke no wite 83,
 I speke whatte bee the trouthe, and whatt all see is ryghte.

Kynges.

Thou arte a hallie 84 manne, I doe thee pryze.
 Comme, comme, and here and hele 85 mee ynn
 mie praires.
 Fulltweentie mancas I wylle thee alife 86,
 And twayne of hamlettes 87 to thee and thie
 heyres.
 See shallice all Normannes from mie londe be fed,
 Theie alleyn 88 have fyke love as to acqyre yer bredde.

CHORUS.

Whan freedom, dreste yn blodde-steyned veste,
 To everie knyghte her warre-songe sunge,
 Uponne her hedde wylde wedes were spredde,
 A gorie anlacc bye her hongre.
 She daunced onne the heathe;
 She hearde the voice of deathe;
 Pale-eyned affryghte, hys harte of sylver hue,
 In vayne afflayed 1 her bosomme to acale 2;
 She hearde onflemed 3 the shrieking voice of
 woe,
 And sadnesse ynn the owlette shake the dale.
 She shooke the burlid 4 speere,
 On hie she jette 5 her sheelde,
 Her foemen 6 all appere,
 And flizze 7 alonge the feeelde.
 Power, wythe his heafod 8 straught 9 ynto the skyes, [starre]
 Hys speere a sonne-beame, and his sheelde a Alyche 10 twaie 11 brendeynge 12 gronfyres 13
 rolls hys eyes, [to war]
 Chafte 14 with hys yronne feete and foundes
 She fytted upon a rocke;
 She bendes before hys speere,
 She ryfes from the shoocke,
 Wieldyng her owne yn ayre.
 Harde as the thonder doth she drive ytte on,
 Wytte scillye 15 wymped 16 gies 17 ytte to hys
 crowne,
 Hys longe sharpe speere, hys spreddyng sheelde
 ys gon,
 He falles, and fallyng rolleth thousandes down.
 War, goare-faced war, ble envie burld 18,
 arif 19,
 Hys ferrie heulme 20 nodyng to the ayre,
 Tenne bloddie arrowes ynn hys streynyng—

77 Wonder. 78 homage, obeifance. 79 they.
 80 frown. 81 kill. 82 curridowe, flatterer. 83
 reward. 84 holy. 85 help. 86 allow. 87 manors. 88 alone. 1 endeavoured. 2 freeze. 3 undismayed. 4 armed, pointed. 5 hoite. on high, raised. 6 foes, enemies. 7 fly. 8 head. 9 stretch-
 ed. 10 like. 11 two. 12 flaming. 13 meteors.
 14 beats, stamps. 15 closely. 16 mantled, covered. 17 guides. 18 armed. 19 arose. 20 helmet.

ENGLISH METAMORPHOSIS.

BIE T. ROWLEIE.

BOOKE I. I.

WHANNE Scythyanne, salvage as the wolves
 theie chade,
 Peyned in horrowe 2 formes bie nature dyghte,
 Heckled yn beastkyngs, slepte uponne the wafte,
 And wyth the mornynge rouzed the wolfe to
 fyghte,
 Sweete as descendencyng leimes 4 of roddie lyghte
 Plonged to the hullfired 5 bedde of lavyng seas, Gerd 6 the blacke mountayn okes yn drybblets 7
 twighte 8,
 And ranne yn thought along the azure mees,
 Whose eyne dyd ferrie sheene, like blue-hayred
 deis 9, [clefs]
 That dreerie hange upon Dover's emblaunched 10
 Soft boundeynge over swelleyng azure teles 11,
 The salvage natyves sawe a shyppe appere;
 An uncouth 12 denwete 13 to theire bosomme
 feles; [of fere]
 Theyre myghte ys knopped 14 ynn the froste
 The headed javlyn listeth 15 here and there;
 Theie stonde, theie ronne, theie loke with eger
 eyne; [lie ayre]
 The shyppe fayle, bolcynge 16 wythe the kynde-
 Ronnet 17 to harbour from the beateyng bryne;
 Theie dryve awaie aghaste, whanne to the stonde [yn honde]
 Aburled 17 Trojan lepes, wythe Morglaign sweerde
 Hymne followede eftsoones hys compheeres 18, whofe swerdes [nete]
 Glestred lyke gleydeyng 19 starres ynn frostie
 Hayleyng theire capytayne in chirkyng 20
 wordes [fete]
 Kyng of the lande, whereon theie fet theyre
 The grette kyng Brutus thanne theie dyd hym grette,
 Prepared for battle, marefchalled the fyghte;
 Theie urg'd the warre, the natyves fledde, as flete [fyghte]
 As fleayng cloude that swymme before the
 Tyll tyred with battles, for to ceefe the fraie, Theie uncted 21 Brutus kyng, and gave the Tro-janns swaie.
 Twayne of twelve years han lemed 22 up the myndes, [breste]
 Leggende 23; the salvage unthewes 24 of theire
 Improved in mysterk 25 warre, and lymmed 26
 theyre kyndes,
 When Brute from Brutons sonke to æterne reste,

1 I will endeavour to get the remainder of these poems. 2 unseemly, disagreeable. 3 wrapped. 4 rays. 5 hidden, secret. 6 broke, rent. 7 small pieces. 8 pulled, rent. 9 vapours, meteors. 10 emblaunched. 11 ridges, rising waves. 12, 13 unknown tremour. 14 fastened, chained, congealed.
 15 boundeth. 16 swelling. 17 armed. 18 companions. 19 livid. 20 a confused noise. 21 A-pointed. 22 enlightened. 23 allowed. 24 savage barbarity. 25 mystic. 26 polished.

Eftfoons the gentle Locryne was posselt
Of swaie, and vested yn the paramente 27;
Halceland 28 the bykrous 29 Huns, who dyd infeste
Hys wakeyng kyngdom wyth a foule intente;
As hys broade swerde oer Homberres heade was honge, [alonge.
He turned toe ryver wyde, and roarynge rolled

He wedded Gendolyne of roical fede, Upon whose countenance rodde healthe was
spreade;
Bloushing, alyche 30 the scarlette of herr wede,
She sonke to pleasaunce on the marriage bedde.
Eftfoons her peacefull joie of mynde was fledde;
Elfrid ametten with the kyng Locryne;
Unnumbered beauties were upon her shedde,
Moche fyne, moche fayrer thanne was Gendo-
lyne;

The mornyng tyng, the rose, the lillie floure
In ever ronneyng race on her dyd peyncte theyre
powere.

The gentle fuyte of Locryne gayned her love:
Theie lyved soft moments to a swotic 31 age;
Eft 32 wandringe yn the coppinge, delle, and grove,

Where ne one eyne mote theyre disporte engage;
There dydde theie tell the merrie lovyng
fage 33, [heade;

Croppe the prymrosen floure to decke theyre
The ferie Gendolyne yn woman rage
Gemoted 34 warrioris to bewrecke 35 her bedde:
Theie rose; yhne battle was greete Locryne fleene; [queene.

The faire Elfrida fledde from the enchafed 36

A tye of love, a dawter fayre she hanne,
Whose boddeyng morneyng shewed a fayre
daie,

Her sadre Locryne, once an hailie manne.
Wyth the fayre dawterre dydde she haste awaie,
'To where the western mittee 37 pyles of claie
Arise ynto the cloudes, and doe them beere:
There dyd Elfrida and Sabryna staie;
The fyrite tryckde out a whyle yn warryours
gratch 38 and gear;

Vyncente was the ycleped, butte fulle soonie fate
Sente deathe, to tell the dame she was notte yn regrate 39.

The queene Gendolyne sente a gyaunte knyghte,
Whose doughtie heade swepte the cimert-
leyng 40 skies.

To flea her wherefoever she shulde be pyghte 41,
Eke everychoan who shulde her ele 42 em-
prize 43. [flies,

Swepte as the roareyng wyndes the gyaunte
Stayde the loude wyndes, and shaded reaulmes
yn nyghte,

Stepte over cytties, on meint 44 acres lies,
Meeteyng the herchaughtes of morneyng
lighte;

27 A princely robe. 28 defaced. 29 warring.
30 like. 31 sweet. 32 oft. 33 a tale. 34 assembled. 35 revenge. 36 heated, enraged. 37 mighty. 38 apparel. 39 esteem, favour. 40 glittering.
41 settled. 42 help. 43 adventure. 44 many.

Tyll mooveyng to the weste, myfchaunce hyt
gyc 45, [espie.
He thorowe warrioris gratch fayre Elfrid did

He tore a ragged mountayne from the grounde
Harried 46 uppe noddynge forrests to the skie,
Thanne wythe a fuire mote the erthe astounde 47,
To meddle ayre he lette the mountayne flie.
The flying wolffynnes sente a yelleynge crie;
Onne Vyncente and Sabryna felle the mount;
To lyve æternalle dyd theie estfoones die;
Thorowe the sandie grave boiled up the purple
founte,

On a broade grassie playne was layde the hylle,
Staleyng the rounyng course of meint a lim-
med 48 rylle.

The goddess, who kenned the actyons of the wyghte,

To leggen 49 the sadde happe of twayne so fayre, Houton 50 dyd make the mountaine bie their michte.

Forth from Sabryna ran a ryverre cleere,
Roaryng and rolleyng on yn course byf-
mare 51;

From female Vyncente shotte a ridge of stones,
Echie fyde the ryver ryfynge heavenwere;
Sabrynas floode was helde ynne Elftrys bones.
So are theie cleped; gentle and the hynde
Can telle, that Severnes streeme bie Vyncentes rocke's ywrynde 52.

The bawfyn 53 gyaunt, he who dyd them flee,
To tell Gendolyne quycklie was yfped 54;
Whanne, as he strod alonge the shakeyng lee,
The roddie levynne 55 glesterrd on hys heade;
Into hys hearte the azure vapoures spreade;
He wrythde arounde yn drearie dernie 56 payne;
Whanne from his lyfc-bloode the rodde lemes 57
were fed,

He felle an hepe of ashes on the playne:
Stylle, does hys ashes shoote ynto the lighte,
A wondrous mountayne hie, and Snowdon ys ytte hyghte.

AN EXCELENT BALADE OF CHARITE :

As wroten bie the gode Prieste Thomas Rowley I, 1464:

In Virgyne the sweltrie sun gan shecne,
And hotte upon the mees 2 did caste hys raie;
The apple rodde 3 from its palie greene,
And the mole 4 peare did bende the leafy fraie,
The peede chelandri 5 fonge the livelong daie;
'Twas nowe the pride, the manhode of the yeare,
And eke the grounde was dighte 6 in its mofe deste
7 aumerce 8.

45 Guide. 46 toft. 47 astonish. 48 glassy, reflecting. 49 lessen, alloy. 50 hollow. 51 bewildered, curious. 52 hid, covered. 53 huge, bulky.
54 dispatched. 55 red lightning. 56 cruel. 57 flames, rays.—I Thomas Rowley, the author, was born at Norton Mal-reward in Somersetshire, educated at the convent of St. Kenna at Kynesham, and died at Westbury in Gloucestershire. 2 meads.
3 reddened, ripened. 4 soft. 5 pied goldfinch. 6 drest, arrayed. 7 neat, ornamental. 8 a loose robe or mantle.

The sun was gleaming in the middle of daie,
 Deade still the aire, and eke the welken 9 blue,
 When from the sea ariste 10 in dreare arraie
 A hepe of cloudes of fable fullen huc,
 The which full fast unto the woodlande drewe,
 Hiltring 11 attenes 12 the sunnis fetive 13 face,
 And the blacke tempeste swolne and gatherd up apace.

Beneathe an holme, faste by a pathwaie side,
 Which hide unto Seyncte Godwine's covente 14
 lede,

A haples pilgrim moneynge did abide,
 Pore in his viewe, ungentle 15 in his weede,
 Longe brectful 16 of the miseries of neede,
 Where from the hailstone coulde the almer 15
 flie?

He had no housen there, ne anic covent nie.

Look in his glommed 18 face, his sprighte there scanne; [deade!

Howe woe-be-gone, how withered, forwynd 19,
 Haste to thie church-glebe-houfe 20 afshrewed
 21 manne!

Haste to thie kiste 22, thie onlie dortoure 23
 bedde,

Cale, as the claie which will gre on thie hedde,
 Is charitie and love aminge highe clves;
 Knightis and barons live for pleasure and themselves.

The gatherd storme is rype; the bigge drops falle;
 The forswat 24 meadowes smethe 25, and drenchen
 26 the raine;

The comyng ghastnes do the cattle pall 27,
 And the full flockes are drivynge oer the plaine;
 Dashde from the cloudes the waters flote 28
 againe;

The welkin opes; the yellow levynne 29 flies;
 And the hot fieric smothe 30 in the wide lowings
 31 dies.

Liste; now the thunder's rattling clymmynge
 32 found

Shewes 33 flowlie on, and then embollen 34 clangs,
 Shakes the high spyre, and losst, dispended,
 drown'd,

9 The sky, the atmosphere. 10 arose. 11 hiding, shrouding. 12 at once. 13 beauteous. 14
 It would have been charitable, if the author had not pointed at personal characters in this Ballad of Charity. The abbot of St. Godwin's at the time of writing of this was Ralphe de Bellomont, a great stickler for the Lancastrian family. Rowley was a Yorkist. 15 beggarly. 16 filled with. 17 beggar. 18 clouded, dejected. A person of some note in the literary world is of opinion, that glum and glom are modern cant words; and from this circumstance doubts the authenticity of Rowley's manuscripts, Glum-mong, in the Saxon signifies twilight, a dark or dubious light; and the modern word gloomy is derived from the Saxon glum. 19
 dry, hapless. 20 the grave. 21 accursed, unfortunate. 22 coffin. 23 a sleeping room. 24 sunburnt. 25 smoke. 26 cloud. 27 pall, a contraction from appall, to fright. 28 fly. 29 lightning.
 30 steam or vapours. 31 flames. 32 noisy. 33
 noisy. 34 swelled, strengthened.

Still on the gallard 35 care of terroure hanges;
 The winds are up; the lofty elmen swanges;
 Again the levynne and the thunder poures,
 And the full cloudes are braste 36 attenes in stonen showers.

Spurreynge his palfrie oere thia watrie plaine,
 The abbotte of Seyncte Godwines covente came
 His chapournette 37 was drented with the reine,
 And his pencte 38 gyrdle met with mickle shame;
 He aynewarde tolde his bederoll 39 at the fame;
 The storme encreasen, and he drew aside,
 With the mist 40 almes craver neere to the holme to bidde.

His cope 41 was all of Lyncolne clothe so syne,
 With a gold button fasten'd neere his chynne;
 His autrenacte 42 was edged with golden twynne,
 And his hoone pyke a loverds 41 mighte have binne;

Full well it shewn he thoughten coste no sinne:
 The trammels of the palfrye pleafde his fighte,
 For the horse millanare 44 his head with roses
 dighte.

An almes, sir prieste! the droppynge pilgrim
 saide,

O let me waite within your covente dore,
 Tille the sunne sheneth hie above our heade,
 And the loude tempeste of the aire is oer;
 Helpless and ould am I alas! and poor;
 No houfe, ne friend, ne moncie in my pouche!
 All yatte I call my owne is this my silver crouche.

Varlet, reply'd the abbatte, cease your dinne;
 This is no season almes and prayers to give;
 Mie porter never lets a faiet our 45 in;
 None touche mie rynges who not in honour live.
 And now the sonne with the blacke cloudes did stryve,

And shettyng on the grounde his glairie raie,
 The abbatte spurrdde hissteede, and effsoones roadde
 awaie.

Once moe the skie was blacke, the thounder
 rolde;

Faste reynneynge oer the plaine a prieste was seen;
 Ne dighte full proude, ne buttoned up in golde;
 His cope and jape 45 were graie, and eke were clene;

A Limitoure he was of order scene;
 And from the pathwaie side then turned hec,
 Where the pore almer laie binethe the holmen
 tree.

An almes, sir priest! the droppynge pilgrim
 saide,

For Sweet Seyncte Marie and your order sake.
 The limitoure then loofen'd his pouche threads,

35 Frighted. 36 burst. 37 a small round hat, not unlike the shapournette in heraldry, formerly worn by ecclesiastics and lawyers. 38 painted. 39
 he told his beads backwards; a figurative expression to signify curling. 40 poor, needy. 41 a cloke.
 42 a loose white robe worn by priests. 43 a lord, 44 I believe this trade is still in being, though but seldom employed. 45 a beggar or vagabond.
 46 a short surplice, worn by friars of an inferior class, and secular priests.

And did thereoute a groate of silver take;
The miser pilgrim dyd for halline 47 shake.
Here take this silyer, it maic eathe 48 thie care;
We are Goddes stewards all, nete 49 of oure owne
we bare.

But ah! unhaille 50 pilgrim, lerne of me,
Scathe anie give a rentrolle to their Lorde,
Here take my semecope 51, thou art bare I see;
Tis thyne; the seynctes will give me mie re-warde.

He left the pilgrim, and his waie aborde,
Virgynne and hallie seyncte, who sitte yn
gloure 52, [power.
Or give the mittee 53 will, or give the gode man

BATTLE OF HASTINGS.

No. I.

O CHRYS TE, it is a grief for me to telle,
How manie a noble erle and valrous knyghte
In fyghtynge for Kyng Harrold noble fell,
Al sleynge in Hastyngs feeld in bloudie fyghte,
O sea-o'er-teeming Dover! han thy floude,
Han anie fructuous entement, [bloude,
Thou wouldst have rose and sank wyth tydes of
Before Duke Wyllyam's knyghts han hither went;
Whose coward arrows manie crles sleynne,
And brued the feeld wythe bloude as feason
raync. 10

And of his knyghtes did eke full manie die,
All passyng hie, of mickle myghte echone,
Whose poygnante arrowes, typp'd with destynie,
Caus'd many wydowes to make myckle mone.
Lordinges, avaunt, that chycken-harted are,
From oute of hearynge quicklie now departe;
Full well I wote, to fyngce of bloudie warre
Will greewe your tenderlie and mayden harte.
Go do the weaklie womman inn man's gearc,
And scound your mansion if grymm war come
there. 20

Soone as the erlie maten belle was tolde,
And sonne was come to byd us all good daie,
Both armies on the feeld, both brave and bolde,
Prepar'd for fyghte in champion arraie.
As when two bulles, destyn'd for Hocktide fyghte
Are yoked bie the necke within a sparre,
Theie rend the erthe, and travellers affryghte,
Lackynge to gage the sportive bloudie warre; 28
Soe lacked Harroldes menne to come to blowes,
The Normans lacked for to welde their bowes.

Kyng Harrold turnynge to his leegemen spake;
My merriemen, be not caste downe in mynde;
Your onlie lode for ay to mar or make,
Before you sunne has donde his welke you'll fynde
Your lovyng wife, who erst dyd rid the londe
Of Lurdanes, and the treasure that you han,
Wyll falle into the Normanne robber's honde,
Unlesse wyth honde and harte you plaie the manne.
Cher up your hartes, chafe sorrowe farre
awaie,
Godde and Seyncte Cuthbert be the worde to
daie. 40

And thenne Duke Wyllyam to his knyghtes did
saie;

My merrie menne, be bravelie everiche;
Gif I do gayn the honore of the daie,
Ech one of you I will make myckle riche,
Beer you in mynde, we for a kyngdomm fyghte;
Lordshippes and honores echone shall possess;
Be this the worde to daie, God and my ryghte;
No doubt but God wyll our true cause bleffe.
The clarions then sounded sharpe and shrille;
Deathdoeynge blades were out intent to kille. 30
And brave Kyng Harrold had now donde hys saie; [fear,

He threw wythe myghte amayne hys shorte horse-
The noise it made the duke to turn awaie,
And hytt his knyghte, de Beque, upon the ear.
His cristede beaver dyd him smalle abounde;
The cruel speare went thorough all his hede;
The purpel blonde came goufhyngce to the grounde,
And at Duke Wyllyam's feet he tumbled deade:
So fell the myghtie tower of Standrip, whenne
It felte the furie of the Danish menne. 60

O Affeni, son of Cuthbert, holie sayncte, [payne;
Come ayde thy freend, and shewe Duke Wyllyams
Take up thy pencyl, all his features paincte;
Thy colorynge excells a synger strayne.
Duke Wyllyam sawe hys freende sleynne piteouflic,
His lovyngce freende whom he much honored,
For he han lovd hym from puerilitie,
And theie together bothe han bin ybred:
O! in Duke Wyllyam's harte it rayfde a flame,
To whiche the rage of emptie wolves is tame. 70

He tooke a brasen crosse-bowe in his honde,
And drewe it harde with all hys myghte amcin,
Ne doubtyng but the bravest in the londe
Han by his foundynge errowe-lede bene sleynne.
Alured's stede, the fynest stede alyve,
Bye comelic forme knowlached from the rest;
But nowe hys destin'd howre dyd aryve,
The arrowe hyt uponne his milkwite breste:
So have I seen a ladie-smoke soe white,
Blown in the mornynge, and mowd downe at night. 80

With thilk a force it dyd his bodie gore,
That in his tender guttes it entered,
In veritee a fulle clothe yarde or more,
And downe with flaiten noyse he sunken dede.
Brave Alured, benethe his faithfull horse,
Was smeerd all over wythe the gorie duste,
And on hym laie the recer's lukewarme corse,
That Alured coude not hymself aluste.
The standynge Normans drew their bowe echone,
And broght full manie Englysh champions
downe. 90

The Normans kept aloofe, at distaunce styll,
The Englysh nete but shorte horse-spears could welde;
The Englysh manie dethe sure dartes did kille,
And manie arrowes twang'd upon the sheelde.
Kyng Harroldes knyghts desir'de for hendie stroke,
And marched furious o'er the bloudie pleyne,
In hodie close, and made the pleyne to smoke;
Theie sheelds rebounded arrowes back agayne,
The Normans stood aloofe, nor hede the fame,
Their arrowes woulde do dethe, though from far of they came. 100

Duke Wyllyam drewe agen hys arrowe frynge,
An arrowe withe a sylver-hede drewe he,
The arrowe dauncyng in the ayre dyd syng,
And hytt the horse Joffelyn on the knee.
At this brave Joffelyn threwe his short horse-
speare;

Duke Wyllyam stooped to avoyde the blowe;
The yrone weapon hummed in his care,
And hitte Sir Doullie Naibor on the prow:
Upon his helme foe furious was the stroke,
It splete his bever, and the ryvets broke. 110

Downe fell the beaver by Joffelyn splete in tweine,
And onn his hede expos'd a punie wounde,
But on Destoutvilles sholder came ameine,
And fell'd the champyon to the bloudie grounde.
Then Doullie myghte his bowefryng drewe,
Enthoughte to gyve brave Joffelyn bloudie
wounde,

But Harolde's asenglave stopp'd it as it flewe,
And it fell bootles on the bloudie grounde.
Siere Doullie, when he sawe hys venge thus broke, 119
Death-doyng blade from out the scabard toke.

And now the battail closde on everych syde,
And face to face appeard the knyghts full brave;
They lifted up their bylles with myckle pryde,
And manie woundes unto the Normans gave.
So have I sene two weirs at once give grounde,
White fomyng hygh to roryng combat ruine;
In roaryng dyn and heaven-breaking founde,
Burste waves on waves, and spangle in the sunne;
And when their myghte iii burstyng waves is fled,

Like cowards, stele alonge their ozy bede. 130

Yong Egelrede, a knyghte of comelic mien,
Affynd unto the kyng of Dynefarr,
At echone tylte and tourney he was seene,
And lov'd to be amonge the bloudie warre;
He couch'd hys launce, and ran wyth mickle
myghte

Ageinste the brest of Sieur de Bonoboc;
He grond and funken on the place of fyghte,
O Chryste! to fele his wounde, his harte was woe.
Ten thousand thoughtes push'd in upon his
mynde, 139
Not for hymselfe, but those he left behynde.

He dy'd and leffed wyfe and chyl dren tweine,
Whom he wyth cheryfment did dearlie love;
In Englands court, in good Kyng Edward's regne,

He wonne the tylte, and ware her crymson glove;
And thence unto the place where he was borne,
Together with hys welthe and better wyfe,
To Normandie he dyd perdie returne,
In peace and quietnesse to lead hys lyfe;

And now with fowrayn Wyllyam he came,
To die in battel, or get welthe and fame. 150

Then, swefte as lyghtnyng, Egelredus set
Agaynst du Barlie of the moun ten head!
In his dere hartes bloude his longe launce was wett,
And from his courser down he tumbled dede.
So have I sene a mountayne oak, that longe
Has caste hys shadowe to the mountayne syde,
Brave all the wyndes, though ever they so stronge,
And view the briers belowe with self-taught pride;

But, whan throwne downe by mightie thunder
He'de rather bee a bryer than an oke. [stroke,

Then Egelred dyd in a declynie 161
Hys launce upere with all hys myghte ameine,
And strok Fitzpore upon the dexter eye,
And at his pole the spear came out agayne.
But as he drewe it forthe, an arrowe fledge
Wyth mickle myght sent from de Tracy's bowe,
And at hys syde the arrowe enterd,
And oute the crymson flreme of bloude gan flowe;
In purple strekes it dyd his armer staine,
And smok'd in puddles on the dustie plaine. 170

But Egelred, before he funken downe,
With all hys myghte ameine his spear besped,
It hytte Betrammil Manne upon the crowne,
And bothe together quicklie funken dede.
So have I seen a rocke o'er others hange,
Who stronglie plac'd laughde at his slippry state,
But when he falls with heaven-peercyng bauge
That he the sleeve unravels all their fate,
And broken onn the beech thys lesson speak,
The stronge and firme should not defame the weake. 180

Howel ap Jevah came from Matraval,
Where he by chaunce han slayne a noble's son,
And now was come to fyghte at Harold's call,
And in the battel he much goode han done;
Unto Kyng Harold he fought mickle near,
For he was yeoman of the bodie guard;
And with a targyt and a fyghtyng spear,
He of hys boddie han keppe watch and ward:
True as a shadowe to a substant thyng,
So true he guarded Harold hys good kyng. 190

But when Egelred tumbled to the grounde,
He from Kyng Harold quicklie dyd advaunce,
And stroke de Tracie thilk a crewel wounde,
Hys harte and lever came out on the launce.
And then retreated for to garde hys kyng,
On dented launce he bore the harte awaic;
An arrowe came from Auffroie Griel's fryng,
Into hys heele betwyxt hys yron itaie;
The grey-goose pnyon, that thereon was sett, Eftsoons with smokyng crymson bloud was wett. 200

His bloude at this was waxen flaminge hotte,
Without adoe he turned once agayne,
And hytt de Griel thilke a blowe, God wote,
Maugre hys helme, he splete hys hede in twayne.
This Affroie was a manne of mickle pryde,
Whose featliest bewty ladden in his face;
His chaunce in warr he ne before han tryde,
But lyy'd in love and Rosaline's embrace;
And like a useles weede amonge the haie
Amonge the fleine warriours Griel laie. 210

Kyng Harold then he putt hys yeomen bie,
And ferlie ryd into the bloudie fyghte;
Erle Ethelwolf, and Goodrick, and Allic,
Cuthbert, and Goddard, mical menne of myghte,
Ethelwin, Ethelbert, and Egwin too,
Efred the famous, and Erle Ethelwarde,
Kyng Harold's leegmenn, erlies hie and true,
Rode after hym, his bodie for to garde:
The reste of erlies, fyghtyng other wheres,
Stained with Norman bloude their fyghtyng
speres. 220

As when some ryver with the feason raynes
White fomynge hie doth breke the bridges oft,
Ocerturns the hamelet and all contains,
And layeth oer the hylls a muddie foft;
So Harold ranne upon his Normanne foes,
And layde the great and small upon the grounde,
And delte among them thilke a store of blowes,
Full manie a Normanne fell by him dede wounde;
So who he be that ouphant fairies strike,
Their foules will wander to Kyng Offa's dyke.

Fitz Salnarville, Duke William's favourite knyghte,
To noble Edelwarde his lyfe dyd yielde;
Withe hys tylte launce hec stroke with thilk a
myghte,
The Norman's bowels steemde upon the feeld.
Old Salnarville beheld hys son lie ded,
Against Erle Edelwarde hys bowe-strynge drew;
But Harold at one blowe made twaine his head;
He dy'd before the poignant arrowe flew.
So was the hope of all the isle gone,
And in one battle fell the fire and fon. 240

De Aubignee rod ferely through the fyghte,
To where the boddie of Salnarville laic;
Quod he; And art thou ded, thou manne of
myghte?

I'll be revenged, or die for thee this daie,
Die then thou shalt, Erle Ethelward he said;
I am a cunningge erle, and that can tell; [hede,
Then drew hys sward, and ghastlie cut hys
And on his freend estfoons he lifeless fell,
Stretch'd on the bloudie pleyne; great God
forefend,
It be the fate of no such trustie freende! 250

Then Egwen Sieur Pikeny did attaque;
He turned aboute and viley fenten flec;
But Egwyn cutt so depe into his backe,
He rolled on the grounde and soon dyd die.
His distant sonne, Sire Romera de Biere,
Soughte to revenge his fallen kynfman's lote,
But soone Erle Cuthbert's dented fyghtyng spear
Stucke in his harte, and staid his speed, Got wote,
He tumbled downe close by hys kynfman's syde, Myngle their stremes of pourple bloude, and dy'd. 260

And now an arrowe from a bowe unwote
Into Erle Cuthbert's harte estfoons dyd flec;
Who dying sayd; ah me! how hard my lote,
Now slayne, mayhap, of one of lowe degree.
So have I seen a leafie elm of yore
Have been the pride and glorie of the pleine;
But, when the spendyng landlord is growne poore,
It falls benethe the axe of some rude sweine;
And like the oke, the sovran of the woode,
It's fallen boddie tells you how it ftoode. 270

When Edelward perceevd Erle Cuthbert die,
On Hubert strongest of the Normanne crewe,
As wolfs when hungred on the cattel flec,
So Edelward amaine upon him flewe.
With thilke a force he byt hym to the grounde;
And was demasing howe to take his life,
When he behynde received a ghastlie wounde
Gyven by de Torcie, with a stabbyng knyfe;
Bafe trecherous Normannes, if such actes you
doe,
The conquer'd maie claime victorie of you. 280

The erlie felt de Torcie's trecherous knyfe
Han made his crymfon bloude and spirits floe;
And knowlaching he soon must quyit this lyfe,
Resolved Hubert should too with hym goe.
He held hys trustie sward against his breste,
And down he fell, and peerd' him to the harte;
And both together then did take their rest,
Their foules from corpses unakell'd depart;
And both together soughte the unknown floure,
Where we shall goe, where manie's gon before. 290

Kyng Harolde Torcie's trechery dyd spic,
And hie alofe his temper'd sward dyd welde,
Cut offe his arme, and made the bloude to flec,
His prooffe steel armour did him littel sheelde;
And not contente, he splete his hede in twaine;
And down he tumbled on the bloudie grounde;
Meanwhile the other erlies on the playne
Gave and received manie a bloudie wounde,
Such as the arts in warre han learnt with care,
But manie knyghtes were women in men's gcer. 300

Herrewald borne on Sarim's spreddyng plaine,
Where Thor's fam'd temple manie ages stooce;
Where druids, ancient preests, did ryghtes ordaine,
And in the middle shed the victym's bloude;
Where auncient Bardi dyd their verfes syng
Of Cæsar conquer'd, and his mighty hoste,
And how old Tynyan, necromancing kyng,
Wreck'd all hys shyppyng on the British coaste,
And made hym in his tatter'd barks to flec,
'Till Tynyan's dethe and opportunity.

To make it more renemed than before,
(I, tho a Saxon, yet the truthe will telle)
The Saxonnes steynd the place wyth Britfish gore,
Where nete but bloud of sacrifices sellec.
Tho' Chryfians, styll they thoughte mouche of the pile,
And here theie mett when causes dyd it neede;
'Twas here the ancient elders of the isle
Dyd by the trecherie of Hengist bleede;
O Hengist! han thy cause bin good and true,
Thou wouldst such murderous acts as these ef-
chew. 320

The erlie was a manne of hie degree,
And han that daie full manie Normannes fleine;
Three Norman champions of hie degree
He left to smoke upon the bloudie pleine;
The Sier Fitzbotevilleine did then advance,
And with his bowe he smote the erlies hede;
Who estfoons gored hym with his tyling launce,
And at his hortes feet he tumbled dede:
His partyng spirit hovered o'er the floude
Of foddayne roushyng mouch lov'd pourple
bloude. 330

De Vipoute then, a squier of low degree,
An arrowe drew with all his myghte amaine;
The arrowe graz'd upon the erlies knee,
A punie wounde, that causd but littel peine.
So have I seene a dolthead place a stone,
Enthoughte to stae a driving rivers course;
But better han it bin to lett alone,
It onlie drives it on with mickle force;
The erlie, wounded by so bafe a hynde,
Rays'd furyous doyngs in his noble mynde. 340

The Siere Chatillion, yonger of that name,
 Advanched next before the erlie's fyghte;
 His fader was a manne of mickle fame,
 And he renomde and valorous in fyghte.
 Chatillion his tristie swerd forth drewe,
 The erlie drawes his, menne bothe of mickle
 myghte;
 And at eche other vengouflic they flewe,
 As mastie dogs at Hocktide set to fyghte;
 Bothe scorn'd to yeelde, and both abhor'de to flie,
 Resolv'd to vanquishe, or resolv'd to die. 350

Chatillion hyt the erlie on the hede,
 Thatt splytte eftfoons his cristed helm in twayne;
 Whiche he perforce withe target covered,
 And to the battel went with myghte ameine.
 The erlie hytte Chatillion thilke a blowe
 Upon his breste, his harte was plein to see;
 He tumbled at the hories feet alsoe,
 And in dethe panges he feez'd the recer's knee:
 Faste as the ivy rounde the oke doth clymbe,
 So faste he dying gryp'd the recer's lymbe. 360

The recer then beganne to slynge and kicke,
 And toste the erlie farr off to the grounde;
 The erlie's squier then a swerde did sticke
 Into his harte, a dedlic ghastlie wounde;
 And downe he felle upon the crymson pleine,
 Upon Chatillion's souleles corse of claie;
 A puddle streme of bloude flow'd out ameine;
 Stretch'd out at length besmer'd with gore he laie;
 As some tall oke fell'd from the greenie plaine,
 To live a second time upon the main. 370

The erlie now an horse and beaver han,
 And nowe agayne appered on the feild;
 And manie a muckle knyghte and mightie manne
 To his dethe-doyng swerd his life did yeeld;
 When Siere de Broque an arrowe longe lett flie,
 Intending Herewaldus to have fleuye;
 It mis'd; butt hytte Edardus on the eye,
 And at his pole came out with horrid payne.
 Edardus felle upon the bloudie grounde, 379
 His noble soule came roushyng from the wounde.

Thys Herewald perceevd, and full of ire
 He on the Siere de Broque with furie came;
 Quod he: Thou'st slaughterd my beloved squier,
 But I will be revenged for the same.
 Into his bowels then his launce he thruste,
 And drew thereout a steemie drerie lode;
 Quod he: These offals are for ever curst,
 Shall serve the coughs, and rooks, and dawes, for foode.

Then on the pleine the steemie lode hee throwde,
 Smokynge with lyfe, and dy'd with crymson
 bloude. 390

Fitz Broque, who saw his father killen lie,
 Ah me! sayde he, what woefull fyghte I see!
 But now I must do somethyng more than sighe;
 And then an arrowe from the bowe drew he.
 Beneth the erlie's navil came the darte;
 Fitz Broque on foote han drawne it from the bowe;
 And upwards went into the erlie's harte,
 And out the crymson streme of bloude gan flowe.
 As fromm a hatch, drawne with a vehement geir,
 White rushe the burstynge wayes, and roar
 along the weir. 400

The erlie with one honde grasped the recer's mayne,
 And with the other he his launce besped;
 And then felle bleedyng on the bloudie plaine.
 His launce it hytte Fitz Broque upon the hede;
 Upon his hede it made a wounde full flyghte,
 But peerc'd his shoulder, ghastlie wounde inferne,
 Before his opties daunced a shade of nyghte,
 Whyche soone were closed ynn a sleepe eterne.
 The noble erlie than, withoute a grone, 409
 Took flyghte, to fynde the regyons unknowne.

Brave Alured from binethe his noble horse,
 Was gotten on his leggs, with bloude all smore;
 And now elleten on another horse,
 Eftsoons he withe his launce did manie gore.
 The coward Norman knyghtes before hym fledde,
 And from a distaunce sent their arrowes keene;
 But noe such detinie awaits his hedde,
 And to be sleyen by a wighte so meene.
 Tho oft the oke falls by the villen's flock, 419
 'Tys moe than hyndes can do, to move the rock.

Upon du Chatelet he ferelie sett,
 And peerc'd his bodie with a force full grete;
 The asenglave of his tylt-launce was wett,
 The rollynge bloude alonge the launce did fleet.
 Advaucinge, as a mastie at a bull,
 He rann his launce into Fitz Warren's harte;
 From Partaies bowe, a wight unmercifull,
 Within his owne he felt a cruel darte;
 Close by the Norman champyons he han sleine,
 He fell; and mixd his bloude with theirs upon the pleine. 430

Erle Ethelbert then hove, with clinie just,
 A launce, that stroke Partaie upon the thighe,
 And pinn'd him downe unto the gorie duste;
 Cruel, quod he, thou cruellie shalt die.
 With that his launce he enterd at his throte;
 He scritch'd and screem'd in melancholie mood;
 And at his backe eftfoons came out, God wote,
 And after it a crymson streme of bloude:
 In agonie and peine he there dyd lie,
 While life and dethe strove for the masterrie. 440

He gryped hard the bloudie murdring launce,
 And in a grone he left this mortal lyfe.
 Behynde the erlie Fiscampe did advance,
 Bethoghte to kill him with a stabbynge knife;
 But Egwarde, who perceevd his fowle intent,
 Eftsoons his trustie swerde he forthwyth drewe,
 And thilke a cruel blowe to Fiscampe sent,
 That soule and bodie's bloude at one gate flewe.
 Think deeds do all deserve, whose deeds so fowle
 Will blacke their earthlie name, if not their soule. 450

When lo! an arrowe from Walleris honde,
 Winged with fate and dethe, daunced alonge;
 And slew the noble flower of Povyflonde,
 Howel ap Jevah, who ycleped the thronge.
 When he the first mischaunce received han,
 With horsefemans haste he from the armie rodde;
 And did repaire unto the cunnynge manne,
 Who fange a charme, that dyd it mickle goode:
 Then praid Seyncte Cuthbert, and our holic
 Dame,

To blesse his labour, and to heal the same. 460
 Then drewe the arrowe, and the wounde did seck,
 And putt the teint of holic herbies on;

And putt a rowe of bloude stones round his neck ;
 And then did say—go, champion, get agone.
 And now was comyng Harrolde to defend;
 And metten with Walleris cruel darte :
 His sheelde of wolf-skinn did him not attend,
 The arrow peered into his noble harte ;
 As some tall oke, hewn from the mountayne hed, 469

Falls to the pleine ; so fell the warrior dede.

His countryman, brave Mervyn ap Teudor,
 Who love of hym han from his country gone,
 When he percevd his friend lie in his gore,
 As furious as a mountayne wolf he ranne.
 As ouphant faeries, whan the moone sheenes
 bryghte,

In littel circles daunce upon the greene,
 All living creatures flie far from their syghte,
 Ne by the race of destinie be seen ;

For what he be that ouphant faeries stryke,
 Their foules will wander to Kyng Offa's dyke.

So from the face of Mervyn Tewdor brave 481
 The Normans estfoons fled awaie aghaste ;
 And leste behynde their bowe and asenglave,
 For fear of hym, in thilk a cowart haiste.

His garb sufficient were to move asfryghte ;
 A wolf skyn girded round hys myddle was ;
 A bear skyn, from Norwegians wan in fryghte,
 Was tytend round his shoulders by the claws :

So Hercules, 'tis sungen, much like to him,
 Upon his sholder wore a lyon's skyn. 490

Upon his thyghes and harte-sweste legges he wore
 A hugie goat skin, all of one grete piece ;
 A boar skyn sheelde on his bare armes he bore ;
 His gauntletts were the skynn of harte of greece.
 They fleede ; he followed close upon their heels,
 Vowynge vengeance for his deare countrymanne !
 And Siere de Sancelotte his vengeance feels ;
 He peerc'd hys backe, and out the bloude ytt
 ranne. [arme]

His bloude went downe the swerde unto hys
 In springing rivulet, alive and warme. 500

His swerde was shorte and broade, and myckle
 keene, [waie ;

And no mann's bone could stonde to stoppe itt
 The Normann's harte in partes two cutt cleane,
 He clos'd his eyne, and clos'd hys eyne for aie.
 Then with his swerde he fett on Fitz du Valle,
 A knyghte mouch famous for to runne at tylte ;
 With thilk a furie on hym he dyd falle,
 Into his neck he ranne the swerde and hylte ;
 As myghtie lyghtenyng often has been founde,
 To drive an oke into unfallow'd grounde. 510

And with the swerde, that in his neck yet stoke,
 The Norman fell unto the bloudie grounde ;
 And with the fall ap Tewdore's swerde he broke,
 And bloude afreshe came trickling from the wounde.

As whan the hyndes, before a mountayne wolfe,
 Flie from his paws, and angrie vyfage grym ;
 But when he falls into the pittic golphe,
 They dare hym to his bearde, and battone hym ;
 And cause he fryghted them so muche before,
 Lyke cowart hyndes, they battone hym the
 more, 520

So, whan they sawe ap Tewdore was bereft
 Of his keen swerde, thatt wroghte thilke great
 difmaie,

They turned about, estfoons upon him lept,
 And full a score engaged in the fraie.
 Mervyn ap Tewdore, ragyng as a bear,
 Seiz'd on the beaver of the Sier de Lacque ;
 And wring'd his hedde with such a vehemnt gier,
 His visage was turned round unto his backe.
 Backe to his harte retyr'd the useles gore,
 And felle upon the pleine to rife no more. 440

Then on the mightie Siere Fitz Pierce he flew,
 And broke his helm, and seiz'd hym bie the throte :
 Then manie Normann knyghtes their arrowes
 drew,

That enter'd into Mervyn's harte, God wote.
 In dying panges he gryp'd his throte more stronge,
 And from their sockets started out his eyes ;
 And from his mouthe came out his blameles tonge :
 And bothe in peine and anguifhe estfoons dies.

As some rude rocke torne from his bed of claie,
 Stretch'd onn the pleyne the brave ap Tewdore
 laie. 540

And now Erle Ethelbert and Egward came,
 Brave Mervyn from the Normannes to assist ;
 A myghtie siere, Fitz Chataulet bie name,
 An arrowe drew, that dyd them littel list.
 Erle Egward points his launce at Chataulet,
 And Ethelbert at Walleris fet his ;
 And Egward dyd the siere a hard blowe hytt,
 But Ethelbert by a myschauunce dyd mis :
 Fear laide Walleris flat upon the strande,
 He ne deserved a death from erlies hande. 550

Betwyxt the ribbes of Sire Fitz Chatelet,
 The poynted launce of Egward did ypafs ;
 The distaunt syde thereof was ruddie wet,
 And he fell breathles on the bloudie gras.
 As cowart Walleris laie on the grounde,
 The dreaded weapon hummed o'er his heade,
 And hytt the fqaier thylke a lethal wounde,
 Upon his fallen lorde he tumbled dead :

Oh, shame to Norman armes ! a lord a slave,
 A caphye villeyn than a lorde more brave ! 560

From Chatalet hys launce Erle Egward drew,
 And hit Wallerie on the dexter cheek ;
 Peerc'd to his braine, and cut his tongue in two :
 There, knyght, quod he, let that thy actions speak—

BATTLE OF HASTINGS.

No. II.

Oh truth ! immortal daughter of the skies,
 Too lytle known to wyrters of these daies,
 Teach me, fayre saincte ! thy passyng worthe to pryze,
 To blame a friend, and give a foeman prayfe.
 The fickle moone, bedeckt wythe silver rays,
 Leadyng a traine of starres of feeble lyghte,
 With look adigne the worlde below surveies,
 The world, that wotted not it could be nyghte ;
 Wyth armour dyd, with human gore ydeyd,
 She sees Kyng Harolde stande, fayre Englands curse and pryde. 10

With ale and vernage drunk his fouldiers lay;
 Here was an hynde, anie an erlie spredde;
 Sad keepynge of their leaders natal daie!
 'This even in drinke, to-morrow with the dead!
 Through everie troope disorder reer'd her hedde;
 Dancyng and heideignes was the onlie theme;
 Sad dome was theires, who leste this easie hedde,
 And wak'd in tormentes from so sweet a dream.
 Duke Williams menne, of comeing dethe afraide,
 All nyghte to the great Godde for succour askd
 and praied. 20

Thus Harolde to his wites that stode arounde;
 Goe, Gyrthe and Eilward, take bills halfe a score,
 And searh how farre our soeman's campe doth
 bound;

Yourself have rede; I nede to saie no more.
 My brother best below'd of anie ore,
 My Leofwinus, goe to everich wite;
 Tell them to raunge the battel to the grore,
 And waiten tyll I sende the hest for fyghte.
 He saide; the loieaul broders leste the place,
 Succes and cheerfulness depicte on ech face. 30

Slowelie brave Gyrthe and Eilwarde dyd ad-
 vauce,
 And mark'd wyth care the armies dystant syde,
 When the dyre clatterynge of the shielde and launce

Made them to be by Hugh Fitzhugh espyd.
 He lysted up his voice, and lowdlie cryd;
 Like wolfs in wintere did the Normanne yell;
 Girthed drew hys swerde, and cutte hys burled
 hyde;

The proto-slene manne of the felde he felle;
 Out freemd the bloude, and ran in smokynge
 curles,
 Reflected bie the moone seemd rubies mixt wyth
 pearles. 40

A troope of Normannes from the mafs-songe
 cane,
 Rounfd from their praiers by the floting crie;
 Thoughie Girthed and Ailwardus perceevd the
 fame,

Not once theie stode abashd, or thoughte to flie.
 He seizd a bill, to conquer or to die;
 Fierce as a clevis from a rocke ytorne,
 That makes a vallie wherfo're it lie;

* Fierce as a ryver burstynge from the borre;
 So fiercelie Gyrthe hitte Fitz du Gore a blowe,
 And on the verdaunt playne he layde the cham-
 pyone lowe. 50

Tancarville thus; alle peace in Williams name;
 Let none edrawe his arcublaste bowe.
 Girthed cas'd hys weppone, as he hearde the
 fame,

And vengynge Normannes staid the flyinge floe.
 The fire wente onne; ye menne, what mean ye fo,

Thus unprovok'd to courte a bloudie fyghte?
 Quod Gyrthe; oure meanyng we ne care to showe,
 Nor dread thy duke wyth all his men of myghte;

* In Turgot's tyrne Hollenwell braste of erthe so fierce, that it threw a stone-mell carrying the same awaye. J. Lydgate ne knowing this, leste out a line.

Here singe onlie these to all thie crewe
 Shall shewe what Englysh handes and heartes can
 doe. 60

Seek not for bloude, Tancarville calme reply'd
 Nor joie in dethe, lyke madmen most distraught;
 In peace and mercy is a Chrystians pryde;
 He that dothe contestes pryze is in a faulte.
 And now the news was to Duke William brought,
 That men of Haroldes armie taken were;
 For theyre good cheere all caties were en-
 thoughte,

And Gyrthe and Eilwardus enjoi'd goode cheere,
 Quod Willyam; thus shall Willyam be founde
 A friend to everie manne that treads on Englysh
 ground. 70

Erle Leofwinus throughe the campe ypafs'd,
 And sawe bothe men and erlies on the grounde;
 They slepte, as though they woulde have slepte
 theyr last,

And hadd already felte theyr fatale wounde.
 He started backe, and was wyth shame astownd;
 Loked wanne wyth anger, and he shooke wyth
 rage;

When throughe the hollow tentes these wordes
 dyd found,

Rowse from your sleepe, detratours of the age!
 Was it for thys the stoute Norwegian bledde?
 Awake, ye hufcarles, now, or waken wyth the
 dead. 80

As when the shepster in the shadie bowre
 In jintle slumbers chafe the heat of daie,
 Hears doublyng echoe wind the wolfsin rorc,
 That neare hys flocke is watching for a praie,
 He tremblyng for his sheep drives dreeme awaie,
 Gripes faste hys burled croke, and fore adrade
 Wyth fleeting strides he hastens to the fraie,
 And rage and prowes fyres the coifrell lad;
 With trustie talbots to the battel flies,
 And yell of men, and dogs, and wolfsin, tear the skies. 90

Such was the dire confusion of each wite,
 That rose from sleep and walsome power of wine;

Theie thoughte the foe by trechit yn the nyghte
 Had broke theyr camp and gotten paste the line;

Now here now there the burnysht sheeldes and byll-spear shine;

Throwote the campe a wild confusionne spredde;
 Eche braed hys armlace siker ne desygne,
 The crested helmet nodded on the hedde;
 Some caught a slughorne, and an onsett wounde;
 Kynged Harolde hearde the charge, and wondred at the founde. 100

Thus Leofwine; O women cas'd in stele!
 Was itte for thys Norwegia's stubborn fede
 Through the black armour dyd the anlace
 fele,
 And rybbes of solid brasse were made to bleede?
 Whylt yet the worlde was wondryng at the deede.

You fouldiers, that shoulde stand with byll in
 hand,
 Get full of wine, devoid of any rede.
 Oh shame! oh dyre dishonoure to the land!

He sayde; and shame on everie visage spredde,
Ne sawe the erlies face, but addawd hung their head. 110

Thus he; rowze yee, and forme the boddie tyghte.

The Kentysh menne in fronte, for strenght re-
nownd,

Next the Brystowans dare the bloudie fyghte,
And last the numerous crewe shall presse the grounde.

I and my king be wyth the Kenters founde;
Bythric and Alfwold hedde the Brystowe bande;
And Bertrams sonne, the man of glorious
wounde,

Lead in the rear the menged of the lande;
And let the Londoners and Suffers plie

Bie Herewardes meumie and the lighte skyrts anie. 120

He saide; and as a packe of hounds belent,
When that the trackyng of the hare is gone,
If one perchaunce shall hit upon the scent,
With twa redubbedd fluir the alans run;
So styrrd the valiante Saxons everych one;
Sonne linkd man to man the champyones
floode;

To 'tone for their bewrate so soone 'twas done,
And lysted bylls enscem'd an yron woodde;
Here glorious Alfwold tow'r'd above the wites,
And seem'd to brave the fuir of twa ten thousand fights. 130

Thus Leofwine; today will Englandes dome
Be fyxt for aie, for gode or evill fate;
This sonnes aunture befelt for years to come;
Then bravelie fyghte, and live till deathe of date.

Thinke of brave Ælfridus, yclept the grete,
From porte to porte the red-haired Dane he chaffd,
The Danes, with whomme not lyoncels could
mate,

Who made of peopled realmes a barren waste;
Think how at once by you Norwegia bled
Whilste dethe and victorie for magystrichested. 140

Meanwhile did Gyrthe unto Kyng Harolde ride,

And tolde howe he dyd with Duke Willyam fare.

Brave Harolde lookd askaunte, and thus replyd;
And can this fay be bowght wyth drunken cheer?

Gyrthe waxen hotte; fluir in his eyne did glare;

And thus he saide; oh brother, friend, and
kyng,

Have I deserved this fremed speche to heare?
Bie Goddess hie hallidome ne thoughte the thyng.

When Toftus sent me golde and sylver store,
I scorn'd hys present vile, and scorn'd hys treason
more. 160

Forgive me, Gyrthe, the brave Kyng Harolde
cryd;

Who can I trust, if brothers are not true?

I think of Toftus, once my joie and pryde.

Gyrthe saide, with looke adigne; my lord, I doe.

But what oure soemen are, quod Gyrth, I'll shewe;

By Gods hie hallidome they preestes are.
Do not, quod Harolde, Gyrthe, mystell them so,
For theie are everich one brave men at warre.
Quod Gyrthe; why will ye then provoke theyr hate?

Quod Harolde; great the foe, so is the glorie
grete. 170

And nowe Duke Willyam mareschalled his band,
And stretchd his armie owre a goodlie rowe.

Firft did a rank of arcublastries stande,
Next those on horsebacke drewe the ascendyng
flo,

Brave champyons, eche well lerned in the bowe,
Theyr asenglave acrosse theyr horfes ty'd,

Or with the lovers squier behinde dyd goe,
Or waited squier lyke at the horfes syde,

When thus Duke Willyam to a monke dyd saie,
Prepare thyfelse wyth spede, to Harolde haste
awaie. 180

Telle hym from me one of these three to take;
That hee to mee do homage for thys lande,

Or mee hys heyre, when he deceasyth, make,
Or to the judgment of Chryst's vicar stande.

He saide; the monke departed out of hande,
And to Kyng Harolde dyd this message bear;

Who said; telle thou the duke, at his likand
If hee can gette the crown hee may itte wear.

He said, and drove the monke out of his fyghte,
And with his brothers rouz'd each manne to bloudie fyghte. 190

A standarde made of fylke and jewells rare, Whercin alle coloures wroughte aboute in bighes,

An armyd knyghte was scen deth-doyng there,
Under this motte, He conquers or he dies.

This standarde rych, endazzlyng mortal eyes,
Was borne near Harolde at the Kenters heade,

Who chardg hys broders for the grete empryze
That fraite the heft for battle should be spredde.

To evry erle and knyghte the worde is gyven,
And cries a guerre and slughornes shake the vaulted heavn. 200

As when the erthe, torne by convulsyons dyre,
In realmes of darkness hid from human fyghte,

The warring force of water, air, and fyre,
Braft from the regions of eternal nyghte,

Through the darke caverns seekte the realmes
of lyght;

Some lottie mountaine, by its fury torne,
Dreadfully moves, and causes grete affryght;

Now here, now there, majestic nods the bourne,
And awfull shakes, mov'd by the almighty
force,

Whole woods and forests nod, and ryvers change
theyr course. 210

So did the men of war at once advance,
Linkd man to man, enscem'd one boddie light;

Above a wood, yform'd of bill and launce,
That noddid in the ayre most straunge to fyght.

Harde as the iron were the men of mighte,
Ne neede of slughornes to enowse theyr minde;

Eche shootyng spere yreaden for the fyghte,
More seerce than fallynge rocks, more swefte
than wynd;

With solemne step, by ecchoe made more dyre,
One single boddie all theie marchd, theyr eyen on fyre. 220

And now the greie-eyd morne with v'lets drest,
Shakyng the dewdrops on the flourie meedes,
Fled with her rose radiance to the west:
Forth from the easterne gatte the fyerie feedes
Of the bright sunne awaytynge spirits leedes:
The sunne, in fierie pompe enthron'd on hie,
Swyfter than thoughte alonge hys jernie gledes,
And scatters nyghtes remaines from oute the skie:

He saw the armies make for bloudie fraie,
And stopt his driving feedes, and hid his light-
some raye. 230

Kynge Harolde hie in ayre majestic rayd
His mightie arme, dockt with a manchyn rare;
With even hande a mighty javlyn paizde,
Then fursoufe sent it whytlyng through the ayre.

It struck the helmet of the Sieur de Beer;
In vayne did brasse or yron stop its waie:
Above his eyne it came, the bones dyd tare,
Peercynge quite through, before it dyd allaie;
He tumbled, feritchyng wyth hys horrid payne;
His hollow cuishes rang upon the blouidie
pleyne. 240

This Wyllyam saw, and foundynge Rowlandes
songe

He bent his yron interwoven bowe,
Makyng bothe endes to meet with myghte
full stronge,

From out of mortals fyght shut up the floe:
Then swyfte as fallynge starres to earthe belowe
It flaunted down on Alfswoldes peyncted sheelde;
Quite through the silver-bordurd croste did goe,
Nor loste its force, but stuck into the feelde;
The Normannes, like theyr sovryn, dyd prepare,
And shotte ten thousande flos uprysynge in the aire. 250

As when a flyghte of cranes, that takes their waie

In householde armies through the flanchd skie,
Alike the cause, or companie, or prey,
If that perchance some boggie fenne is nie,
Soone as the muddy natyon theie espie,
Inne one blacke cloude theie to the erth de-scende;

Feirce as the fallynge thunderbolte they flie;
In vayne do reedes the speckled folk defend;
So prone to heavie blowe the arrowes felle,
And peerd through brasse, and sente manie to heaven or helle. 260

Ælan Adclfred, of the stowe of Leigh,
Felte a dire arrowe burnynge in hys breste;
Before he dyd, he sente hys spear awaie,
Thenne funke to glorie and eternal reste.
Neville, a Normanne of alle Normannes beste,
Throw the joint cnishe dyd the javlyn felle,
As hee on horsebacke for the fyghte address'd,
And sawe hys bloude come smokynge oer the steele;

He sente the avengeynge floe into the ayre,
And turnd hys horses hedde, and did to leech re-
payre. 270

And now the javelyns, barbd with death his wynges,

Hurld from the Englysh handes by force aderne,
Whyzd dreare alonge, and songes of terror
fynges,

Such songes as alwaies clos'd in lyfe eterne.

Hurld by such strength along the ayre theie
burne, [bloude;

Not to be quenched butte yn Normannes

Wherere theie came they were of lyfe forlorne,

And alwaies followed by a purple floude;

Like cloudes the Normanne arrowes did descend,

Like cloudes of carnage full in purple drops dyd
end. 280

Nor, Leafwynus, dydst thou still estande;

Full soon the pheon glytted in the aire;

The force of none but thyne and Harolds hande

Could hurle a javlyn with such lethal geer:

Itte whyzzed a ghastlie dynne in Normannes ear,

Then thundryng dyd upon hys greave alyghte,

Peirce to his hearte, and dyd hys bowels tear,

He clos'd hys eyne in everlastynge nyghte;

Ah! what avalyd the lyons on hys creste!

His hatchments rare with him upon the grounde was prest. 290

Wyllyam agayne ymade his bowe-ends meet,

And hie in ayre the arrowe wynged his waie,

Descendynge like a shafte of thunder fletee,

Lyke thunder rattling at the noon of daie,

Onne Algars sheelde the arrowe dyd affaie,

There throghe dyd peerse, and kycke into his groine;

In grypyng torments on the feelde he laie,

The welcome dethe came in and clos'd his eyne;

Distort with peyne he laie upon the borne,

Lyke sturdie elms by stormes in uncothe wry-
thynges torne. 300

Alrick his brother, when hee this perceevd,

He drewe his sward, his leste hande helde a speere, [feede,

Towards the duke he turnd his prauncyng

And to the Godde of Heaven he sent a prayre;

Then sent his lethale javlyn in the ayre,

On Hue de Beaumontes backe the javelyn came,

Through his redde armour to hys harte it tare,

He felle and thondred on the place of fame;

Next with his sward he 'sayld the Sejur de Roe,

And brasse his sylver helme, soe furyous was the blowe. 310

But Wyllyam, who had seen hys prowesse great,
And feered muche how farre his bronde might
goe,

Tooke a strong arblaster, and bigge with fate

From twangynge iron sente the flectyng floe,

As Alric hoistes hys arme for dedlie blowe,

Which, han it came, had been Du Roees laste,

The swyfte-wyngd messenger from Wyllyams
bowe

Quite throwe his arme into his syde ypaste;

His eyne shotte fyre, lyke blazyng starre at
nyghte,

He grypd hys sward, and felle upon the place of
fyghte. 320

O Alfwolde, saie, how shalle I synge of thee
Or telle howe manie dyd benethe thee falle;
Not Haroldes self more Normanne knyghtes
did fle,

Not Haroldes self did for more praifes call;
How shall a penne like myne then shew it all?
Lyke thee their leader, eche Bristowyanne
foughte;

Lyke thee, their blaze must be canonical,
For theie, like thee, that daie bewrecke
yroughte:

Did thirtie Normannes fall upon the grounde,
Full half a score from thee and theie receive their fatale wounde. 330

First Fytz Chivelloys felt thie direful force;
Nete did hys helde out brazen sheelde availe;
Eftsoones throwe that thie drivynge speare did
peerce,

Nor was ytte stopped by his coate of mayle;
Into his breaſte it quicklie did assaile;
Out ran the bloude, like hygra of the tyde;
With purple stayned all hys adventayle;
In scarlet was his cuishe of sylver dyde;
Upon the bloudie carnage houte he laie,

Whylist hys longe sheelde dyd gleem with the sun's ryfing ray. 340

Next Fescampé felle; O Christe, howe harde
his fate

To die the leckedst knyghte of all the thronge!
His sprite was made of malice deslavate,
Ne shouldeſt find a place in anie sounge.

The broch'd keene javlyn hurld from honde fo
stronge

As thine came thundrynge on his crysted beave;
Ah! neete avayld the brafs or iron thonge,
With mightie force his skulle in twoe dyd
cleave;

Fallyng he shookeſt out his smokyng braine,
As wither oakes or elms are hewne from off the
playne. 350

Nor, Norcie, could thie myghte and skilfulle
lore

Preserve thee from the doom of Alfwold's speere, Couldſt thou not kenne, moſte skyll'd Aitrela-goure,

Howe in the battle it would wythe thee fare?
When Alfwolds javelyn rattlynge in the ayre,
From hand dyvine on thie habergeon came,
Oute at thy backe it dyd thie hartes bloude bear,

It gave thee death and everlastyng fame:
Thy deathe could onlie come from Alfwolde
arme, 359

As diamondes onlie can its fellow diamonds harme.

Next Sire du Mouline fell upon the grounde,
Quite throughe his throte the lethal javlyn
preſte,

His soule and bloude came roufhyng from the
wounde;

He closd his eyen, and opd them with the bleſt.
It can ne be I should behight the rest,

That by the myghtie arme of Alfwolde felle,
Passe bie a penne to be counte or expreste,

How manie Alfwolde sent to heaven or helle;

As leaves from trees shooke by derne autumns
hand,

So laie the Normannes slain by Alfwolde on the strand. 370

As when a drove of wolves with dreary yells
Assaile some flocke, ne care if shepſter ken't, Bespreng destructione ocr the woodes and delles;

The shepſter ſwaynes in vayne theyr leeslament;
So foughte the Bryſtowe menne; ne one crea-
vent,

Ne on abash'd enthoughten for to flee;
With fallen Normans all the playne besprent,
And like theyr leaders every man did flee;

In vayne on every side the arrows fled;
The Bryſtowe menne styll rag'd, for Alfwold was not dead. 380

Manie meanwhile by Haroldes arm did falle,
And Leofwyne and Gyrthe encreas'd the slayne;
'Twould take a Nestor's age to synge them all,
Or, telle how manie Normannes presse the
playne;

But of the cries, whom recorde nete hath slayne,
O truthe! for good of after-tymes relate,

That thow'e they're deade, theyr names may lyve agayne,

And be in deathe, as they in life were, greate;
So after-ages maie theyr actions see,

And like to them eternall alwaie stryve to be. 390

Adhelm, a knyghte, whose holie deathles fire
For ever bended on St. Cuthbert's shryne,
Whose breaſt for ever burnd with sacred fyre,
And een on erthe he myghte be calld dyvine;
To Cuthbert's church he dyd his goodes re-
fyne,

And leſte hys son his God's and fortune's knyghte;
His son the saincte behelde with looke adigne,
Made him in gemot wyſe, and greate in fyghte;
Seinſte Cuthberte dyd him ayde in all hys deeds,

His friends he lets to live, and all his foemen
bleedes. 400

He married was to Kenewalchae faire,
The fynest dame the sun or moone adave;
She was the myghtie Aderedus' heyre,
Who was alreadie hastyng to the grave;
As the blue Bruton, ryfing from the wave,
Like sea-gods seene in moſt majestic guise,
And rounde aboute the rifyng waters lave,
And their longe hayre arounde their bodie flies,
Such majestic was in her porte displaid, 409
To be excelld bie none but Homer's martial maid.

White as the chaulkie clyffes of Brittaines ile
Red as the highest colour'd Gallic wine,
Gaie as all nature at the mornynge smile,
Those hues with pleasaunce on her lippes combine, [skyne,

Her lippes more redde than summer evenyng
Or Phœbus ryfinge in a frostie morne,
Her breste more white than snow in ſeeldes that
lyne,

Or lillie lambes that never have been shorne,
Swellyng like bubbles in a boilyng welle,
Or new-braſte brooklettes gently whysperinge in the delle. 420

Browne as the fylberte droppynge from the shelle,

Brown: as the nappy ale at Hocktyde game,
So browne the crokyde rynges, that featlie fell
Over the neck of the all-beauteous dame.
Greie as the morne before the ruddie flame
Of Phebus charyotte rollynge thro the skie, Greie as the steel-horn'd goats Conyan made tame,

So greie appeard her featly sparklyng eye;
Those eyne, that did oft mickle pleased look
On Adhelm valyant man, the virtues doomsday book. 430

Majestic as the grove of okes that stooode
Before the abbie buylt by Oswald kynge;
Majestic as Hybernies holie woode,
Where sainctes and soules departed masses synges;
Such awe from her sweete looke for issuyng
At once for reveraunce and love did calle;
Sweet as the voice of thraslarke in the spring,
So sweet the wordes that from her lippes did falle;

None fell in vayne; all showed some entent;
Her wordies did displaic her great entendem-
ment. 440

Tapre as candles layde at Cuthberts shryne,
Tapre as elmes that Goodrickes abbie srove,
Tapre as silver chalices for wine,
So tapre was her armes and shape ygrove.
As skyllful mynemme by the stones above
Can ken what mettalle is ylach'd belowe,
So Kennewalcha's face, ymade for love,
The lovelie ymage of her foule did showe;
Thus was the outward form'd; the sun her mind
Did guilde her mortal shape and all her charms
refin'd. 450

What blazours then, what glorie shall he clayme
What doughtie Homere shall hys praifes syng,
That left the bosome of so fayre a dame
Uncall'd, unafkt, to serve his lorde the kynge?
To his fayre shrine goode subjects ought to bring

The arms, the helmets, all the spoyles of warre, Throwe everie reaulm the poets blaze the thyng, [farre,
And travelling merchants sprede hys name to
The stout Norwegians had his anlax selte,
And nowe amonge his foes dethe-doyng blowes
he delte. 460

As when a wolfyn gettyng in the meedes
He rageth fore, and doth about hym slee,
Nowe here a talbot, there a lambkin bleeds,
And all the grassie with clotted gore doth stree;
As when a rivlette rolles impetuonslie,
And breaks the bankes that would its force re-
frayne,

Alonge the playne in fomyng rynges doth flee,
Gaynste walls and hedges doth its course main-tayne;
As when a manne doth in a corn-fielde mowe,
With ease at one felle stroke full manie is laide
lowe. 470

So manie, with such force, and with such ease,
Did Adhelm slaughtre on the bloudie playne;

Before hym manie dyd theyr hearts bloude lease,
Ofttymes he foughte on towres of smokyng flayne.

Angillian felte his force, nor felte in vayne;
He cutte hym with his swerde athur the breste;
Out ran the bloude, and did hys armour flayne,
He clos'd his eyen in ætarnal reste;
Lyke a tall oke by tempeste borne awaie,
Stretch'd in the armes of dethe upon the plaine he
laie. 480

Next thro the ayre he sent his javlyn feerce,
That on De Clearmoundes buckler did alyghte,
Throwe the vaste orbe the sharpe pheou did
peerce,
Rang on hys coate of mayle and spente its mighte.
But soon another winged its aery flyghte,
The keen broad pheon to his lungs did goe;
He felle, and groand upon the place of fighte,
Whilst lyfe and bloude came issuyng from the blowe.

Like a tall pyne upon his native playne,
So fell the mightie fire and mingled with the flaine. 490

Hue de Longeville, a force doughtre mere,
Advauncyd forward to provoke the darte,
When soone he founde that Adhelms poynted
speere

Had founde an easie passage to his hearte.
He drewe his bowe, nor was of dethe astarte,
Then fell down brethlesse to encrease the corse;
But as he drewe hys bowe devoid of arte,
So it came down upon Troyvillains horse;
Deep thro hys hatchments wente the pointed floe;

Now here, now there, with rage bleedynge he rounde doth goe. 500

Nor does he hede his mastres known commands,
Tyll, grown furiousc by his bloudie wounde,
Erect upon his hynder feete he staundes,
And throwes hys mastre far off to the grounde.
Near Adhelms feete the Normanne laie af-
tounde,

Befprengd his arrowes, loofend was his sheelde,
Thro his redde armour, as he laie ensoond.
He peerd his swerde, and out upon the feelde,
The Normannes bowels steemed, a dedlie fyghte!
He opd and closd hys eyen in everlaityng
nyghte. 510

Caverd, a Scot, who for the Normannes foughte,
A man well skilld in swerde and soundynge
stryng,

Who sed his country for a crime enstrote,
For daryng with bolde worde hys loiaule
kyng. [flyng

He at Erle Aldhelme with grete force did
An heavie javlyn, made for bloudie wounde,
Alonge his sheelde askaunt the same did ringe,
Peerd thro the corner, then stuck in the grounde:

So when the thonder rauttles in the skie,
Thro some tall spyre the shaftes in a torn clevis
flic. 520

Then Adhelm hurld a croched javlyn stronge,
With mighte that none but such grete cham-
piones know;

Swifter than thoughte the javlyn past alonge
 And hytte the Scot most ferlic on the plove;
 His helmet brasted at the thondring blowe,
 Into his brain the tremblin javlyn steck;
 From eyther syde the bloude began to flow,
 And run in circling ringlets rounde his neck;
 Down fell the warrior on the lethal strande,
 Lyke some tall vessel wreckt upon the tragick
 fande. 530

CONTINUED.

Where fruytless heathes and meadowes cladde
 in greic, [ble heade,
 Save where derne hawthornes reare theyr hum-
 The hungrie traveller upon his waie
 Sees a huge defarte alle arounde hym sprede,
 The distaunte citie scantlie to be spedde,
 The curlynge force of smoke he sees in vayne,
 'Tis too far distaunte, and hys onlie bedde
 Twimpled in hys cloke ys on the playne,
 Whylste rattlynge thonder forrey oer his hedde,
 And raines come down to wette hys harde un-
 couthlie bedde. 540

A wondrous pyle of rugged mountaynes standes,
 Placd on eche other in a dreare arraie,
 It ne could be the worke of human handes,
 It ne was reared up bie menne of claie.
 Here did the Brutons adoration paye
 To the false god whom they did Tauran name,
 Dightyng hys altarre with greetefyres in Maie, Roastlyng theyr vyctimes round aboute the
 flame,

'Twas here that Hengyst did the Brytons see,
 As they were mette in council for to bee. 550

Neere on a loftie hylle a citie standes,
 That listes yts scheafed heade ynto the skies,
 And kinglee lookes arounde on lower landes,
 And the longe browne playne that before itte lies.

Herewarde, borne of parentes brave and wyfe,
 Within this vylle fyrste adrewg the ayre,
 A blessinge to the erthe sente from the skies,
 In anie kyngdom nee coulde fynde his peer;
 Now ribbd in steele he rages yn the fighte,
 And sweeps whole armies to the reaulmes of
 nyghte. 560

See when derne Autumne with hys fallowe
 hande

Tares the green mantle from the lymed trees,
 The leaves besprenged on the yellow strande
 Flie in whole armies from the blataunte breeze;
 Alle the whole felde a carnage-house he sees,
 And fowles unknelled hover'd oer the bloude;
 From place to place on either hand he flees,
 And sweeps alle neere hym lyke a brondded
 floude;

Dethe honge upon his arme; he fleed so maynt,
 'Tis paste the pointel of a man to paynte. 570

Bryghte sonne in haste han drove hys fierie
 wayne

A three howres course alonge the whited skyen,
 Vewyng the swarthless bodies on the playne,
 And longed greetlie to plonce in the bryne.
 For as hys beemes and far-stretchyng eyne
 Did view the pooles of gore yn purple sheene,

The wolfomme vapours rounde hys lockes dyd
 twyne,
 And dyd disfyng all hys femmlikeen;
 Then to harde actyon he hys wayne dyd rowfe,
 In hyssyng ocean to make glair hys browes. 580

Duke Wyllsiam gave commaunde, eche Norman
 knyghte,

That beer war-token in a shielde so fyne,
 Shoulde onward goe, and dare to cloier fyghte
 The Saxonne warryor, that dyd fo entwyne,
 Lyke the nesse bryon and the eglantine,
 Orre Cornysh wrastlers at a Hocktyde game.
 The Normannes, all emarchialld in a lyne,
 To the ourt arraie of the thigh Saxonnes came;
 There 'twas the whaped Normannes on a parre Dyd know that Saxonnes were the sonnes of
 warre. 590

Oh Turgotte, wherefoer thie spryte dothe
 haunte,

Whither wyth thie lovd Adhelme by thie syde,
 Where thou mayste hear the swotic nyghte-
 larke chaunte, [glide,
 Orre wyth some mokyng brooklette swetelie
 Or rowle in fersele wythe ferse Severnes tyde,
 Whereer thou art, come and my mynde enleme
 Wyth such greet thoughts as dyd with thee
 abyde, [beeme,

Thou sonne, of whom I ofte have caught a
 Send mee agayne a drybblette of thie lyghte,
 That I the deeds of Englyshmenne maie wryte. 600

Harold, who saw the Normannes to advance,
 Seizd a huge byll, and layd hym down hys spere;
 Soe dyd ech wite laie downe the bruched launce,
 And groves of bylles did glitter in the ayre.

Wyth showtes the Normannes did to battel steere;

Campynon famous for his stature highe,
 Fyrey wythe brasse, benchte a shyrt of lere,
 In clouddie daie he reechd into the skie;
 Neere to Kyng Harold dyd he come alonge,
 And drew hys steel Morglaien sworde so
 stronge. 610

Thryce rounde hys heade hee swung hys anlace
 wyde,

On whyche the sunne his visage did agleeme,
 Then straynyng, as hys membres would dy-
 vyde, [breme;

Hee stroke on Haroldes sheelde yn manner
 Alonge the felde it made an horrid cleembe, Coupeyng Kyng Haroldes payncd sheeld in
 twayne,

Then yn the bloude the serie swerde dyd steeme,
 And then dyd drive ynto the blouddie playne;
 So when in ayre the vapours doe abounde,
 Some thunderbolte tares and dryves ynto the
 grounde. 620

Harolde upreer'd hys bylle, and furious sente
 A stroke, lyke thondre, at the Normannes syde;
 Upon the playne the broken brasse besprente
 Dyd ne hys bodie from dethe-doeynge hyde;
 He tournyd backe, and dyd not there abyde;
 With straught oute sheelde hee ayenwarde did
 goe, [divide,

Threwe downe the Normannes, did their ranks
 To save himselfe leste them unto the foe;

So olyphaantes, in kingdomme of the sunne,
When once provok'd doth throwe their owne
troopes runne. 630

Harold, who ken'd hee was his armies staie,
Nedeynge the rede of generall so wyfe,
Byd Alfwoulde to Campynon haste awaie,
As thro the armie aynwarde he hies,
Swyfte as a feether'd takel Alfwoulde flies,
The steele bylle blufhyng oer wyth lukewarm
bloude;

Ten Kenters, ten Bristowans for th' emprize
Hasted wyth Alfwoulde where Campynon stood,
Who aynwarde went, whylste everie Normanne
knyghte 639
Dyd blush to see their champyon put to flyghte.

As paincyd Bruton, when a wolyn wyld,
When yt is calcand bluftrynge wyndes do blowe,
Enters hys bordelle, taketh hys yonge chyld,
And wyth his bloude bestreynts the lillie snowe,
He thoroughe mountayne hie and dale doth goe,
Throwe the quyk torrent of the bollen ave,
Throwe Severne rollynge oer the sands belowe
He skymys alofe, and blentz the beatyng wave,
Ne styntz, ne lagges the chace, tyll for hys
eyne 649
In peecies hee the motkering thief doth chyne.

So Alfwoulde he dyd to Campynon haste;
Hys bloudie bylle awhap'd the Normannes
eyne;
Hee fled, as wolves when bie the talbots chac'd,
To bloudie byker he dyd ne encline.
Duke Wyllyam stroke hym on hys brigandyne,
And sayd; Campynon, is it thee I see?
Thee? who dydst actes of glorie fo bewryen,
Now poorlie come to hyde thieselfe bie mee?
Awaie! thou dogge, and adde a warriors parte,
Or with mie swerde I'll perce thee to the harte. 660

Between Erle Alfwoulde and Duke Wyllyam's bronde
Campynon thoughte that nete but deathe coulde
bee,
Seezed a huge swerde Morglaign yn his hande,
Mottrynge a prair to the Vyrgyne:
So hunted decre the dryvyng houndes will flee,
When theie dyscover they cannot escape;
And fearful lambkyns, when theie hunted bee,
Theyre infante hunters doe theie ofte awpae;
Thus stonde Campynon, greete but hertlesse
knyghte,
When feere of dethe made hym for deathe to fychte. 670

Alfwoulde began to dyghte hymselfe for fychte,
Meanewhyle hys menne on everie syde dyd flee,
Whan on hys lysted sheilde withe alle hys
myghte
Campynon's swerde in burlic-brande dyd dree;
Bewopen Alfwoulde sellen on his knee;
Hys Bryflowe menne came in hym for to save;
Estfoons nngotten from the grounde was hee,
And dyd agayne the touing Norman brave;
Hee graspd hys bylle in syke a drear arraie,
Hee seem'd a lyon catchyng at hys preie. 680

Upon the Normannes brazen adventayle
The thondryng bill of myghtie Alfwoulde game;
VOL. XL

It made a dentful brufe, and then dyd fayle;
Fromme rattlyng weepens shotte a sparklyng
flame;

Estfoons agayne the thondryng bill ycame,
Peers'd thro hys adventayle and skyrts of lare;
A tyde of purple gore came wyth the fame,
As out hys bowells on the feelde it tare;
Campynon felle, as when some citie-walle
Ine dolefull terrours on its mynours falle. 690

He felle, and dyd the Norman rankes dyvide;
So when an oke, that shotte ynto the skie,
Feeles the broad axes peerfyng his broade fyde,
Slowly hee falls and on the grounde dothe lie,
Preffyng all downe that is wyth hym anighe,
And stoppyng wearie travellers on the waie;
So straught upon the playne the Norman hie

Bled, gron'd, and dyed: the Normanne knyghtes aitound
To see the bawfir champyon presse upon the
ground. 700

As when the hygra of the Severne roars,
And thunders ugtore on the sandes below,
The cleembe reboundes to Wedcesters shore,
And sweeps the black' firdie rounde its horie
prowe;

So breemie Alfwoulde thro the warre dyd goe;
Hys Kenters and Bryflowans flew ech lyde,
Betrented all alonge with bloudles foe,
And seemd to swym alonge with bloudie tyde;
Fromme place to place besneard with bloud
they went,
And rounde aboute them swartheles corse be-spreute. 710

A famous Normanne who yclepd Aubene,
Of skyl in bow, in tylte, and handesworde
lyghte,
That daie yn feelde ban manie Saxons beene,
Forre hee in fother was a manne of nyghte;
Fyftie dyd his swerde on Adelgar alyghte,
As hee on horseback was, and peersd hys gryne,
Then upwarde wente: in everlastyng nyghte.
Hee closd hys rollyng and dymyghted eyne.
Next Eadlyn, Tazyn, and sam'd Adred,
Bie various causes funken to the dead. 720

But now to Alfwoulde he oppofyng went,
To whom compar'd hee was a man of stre,
And wyth bothe houndes a myghtie blowe he fente

At Alfwouldes hezd, as hard as hee could dree;
But on hys paynced sheilde fo bismarlic
Assaunte his swerde did go ynto the grounde;
Then Alfwoulde him attack'd most furyouslie,
Athrowe hys gaberdyne hee dyd him wounde,
Then soone agayne hys swerde hee dyd wynde
And clove his creke and split hym to the eyne. 730

ONN OURE LADIES CHYRCH.

As onn a bylle on eve fityng,
At oare Ladie's Chyrche mouchie wonderyng,
The counyng handeworke so fyne,
Han well nigh dazzled mine eyne;
Quod I; some counyng fairie hande
Yrec'd this chapelle in this lande;

Full well I wote so fine a fyghte
 Was ne yreer'd of mortall wighte.
 Quod Trouthe; thou lackest knowlacheunge;
 Thou forsoth ne wotteth of the thyng.
 A rev'rend fadre, William Canynghe hight,
 Yreered uppe this chapelle brighte;
 And eke another in the towne,
 Where glasse bubblyng Trymme doth rouñ.
 Quod I; ne doubt for all he's given
 His fowle will certes goe to heaven.
 Yea, quod Trouthe; than goe thou home,
 And see thou doe as hee hath donne.
 Quod I; I doubt, that can ne bee;
 I have ne gotten markes three. [soe;
 Quod Trouthe; as thou hast got, give almes-dedes
 Canynges and Gaunts culde doe ne moe.

T. R.

ON THE SAME.

STAY, curyous traveller, and pass not bye,
 Until this fetive pile astounde thine eye.
 Whole rocks on rocks with yron joynd furvie,
 And okes with okes entremed dispōned lic.
 This mightie pile, that keapesthe wyndes at baie,
 Fyre-levyn and the mokie storme desie,
 That shootes aloofe into the realmes of daie,
 Shall be the record of the buylders fame for aie.

Thou seest this maystrie of a human hand,
 The pride of Brystowe and the westerne lande,
 Yet is the buylders vertues much moe greete,
 Greeter than can bie Rowlies pen be scande.
 Thou seest the saynctes and kynges in stonen
 state, [pande,
 That seemd with breath and human soule dis-
 As payrde to us enseem these men of state,
 Such is greete Canynghe's mynde when payrd to God elate.

Well maifest thou be astound, but view it well;
 Go not from hience before thou see thy fill,
 And learn the builder's vertues and his name;
 Of this tall spyre in every countye telle,
 And with thy tale the lazynge ryche men shame;
 Showe howe the glorious Canynghe did excelle;
 How hee, good man, a friend for kynges became,
 And gloryous paved at once the way to heaven and fame.

EPITAPH ON ROBERT CANYNGE.

Thys mornynge, starre of Radcleves ryfynge
 raie, [hyghte,
 A true manne good of mynde and Canynghe
 Benethe thys stone lies moltrynge ynto claie,
 Untylle the darke tombe sheene an eterne lyghte.
 Thyrede fromme hys loynes the present Canynghe came;

Houton are wordes for to telle hys doe;
 For aye shall lyve hys heaven-recorded name,
 Ne shall yt dye whanne tyme shall bee no moe;
 Whanne Mychael's trumpe shall founde to rise
 the folle,
 He'll wyngge to heavn wyth kynne, and happie
 bee hys dollie.

THE STORIE OF WILLIAM CANYNGE.

ANENT a brooklette as I laie reclynd,
 Lysteynge to heare the water glyde alonge,

Myndeynge how thorowe the grene mees yt
 twynd,
 Awihilt the cavys respons'd yts mottring fonge,
 At distaunt ryfynge Avonne to he sped,
 Amenged wyth ryfynge hylles dyd shewe yts head;

Engarlanded wyth crownes of ofyer weedes
 And wraytes of alders of a bercie scent,
 And stickeynge out wyth clowde ageded reedes,
 The hoarie Avonne show'd dyre semblamente,
 Whylest blataunt Severne, from Sabryna clepde,
 Rores flemie o'er the sandes that she hepde.

These eynegears fwythyn bringethe to mie
 thoughte,
 Of hardie champyons knowen to the floude,
 How onne the banks thereof brave Ælle foughte,
 Ælle descended from Mercē kynglie bloude,
 Warden of Brystowe towne and castel stede,
 Who ever and anon made Danes to blede.

Methoughte such doughtie menn must have a sprighte
 Dote yn the armour brace that Mychael bore,
 Whan he wyth Satan kyng of helle dyd fyghte,
 And earthe was drented yn a mere of gore;
 Orr, soone as theie dyd see the worldis lyghte,
 Fate had wrott downe, thys mann ys borne to
 fyghte.

Ælle, I sayd, or els my mynde dyd saie,
 Whic ys thy actyons left so spare yn storie?
 Were I toe dispone, there should lyvvcn aie
 In erthe and hevenis rolles thie tale of glorie;
 Thie actes foe doughtie should for aie abyde,
 And bie theyre teste all after actes be tryde.

Next holie Wareburghus fylld mie mynde,
 As sayre a sayncte as anie towne can boaste,
 Or bee the erthe wyth lyghte or merke ywrynde,
 I see hys ymage waulkyng throwe the coaste:
 Fitz Hardyng, Bithrickus, and twentie moe
 Ynn vifoyon fore mie phantasic dyd goe.

Thus all mie wandrynge saytour thynkeynge
 strayed,
 And eche dygne buylder dequac'd onn mie mynde,
 Whan from the distaunt freeme arose a mayde,
 Whose gentle tresses mov'd not to the wynde;
 Lyche to the sylver moone yn frostie neete,
 The damoifelle dyd come foe blythe and sweete.

Ne browded mantell of a scarlette hue,
 Ne shoone pykes plaited o'er wyth ribbande geere,
 Ne costlie paraments of woden blue,
 Noughte of a dresse, but bewtie dyd shee weere;
 Naked shee was, and loked swete of youthe,
 All dyd bewryen that her name was Trouthe.

The ethie ringlets of her notte-browne hayre
 What ne a manne should see dyd fwotetie hyde,
 Whych on her milk-white bodykin so sayre
 Dyd showe lyke browne streemes fowlyng the white tyde,
 Or veynes of brown hue yn a marble cuarr,
 Whyche by the traveller ys kenn'd from farr.

Astounded mickle there I sylente laie,
 Still scauncing wondrous at the walkynge fyghte;
 Mie senses forgarde ne coulde reyn awaic;
 Put was ne fortraughte whan she dyd alyghte

Anie to mee, dresse up yn naked viewe,
Whych mote yn some ewbrycious thoughtes a-brew.

But I ne dyd once, thynke of wanton thoughte;
For well I mynded what bie vowc I hete,
And yn mie pockete han a crouchee broughte,
Whych yn the blösom woude such sins anete;
I lok'd wyth cyne as pure as angelles doe,
And dyd the everie thoughte of soule eschewe.

Wyth sweet semblate and an angel's grace
Shee 'gan to lecture from her gentle breste;
For T'routhis wordes ys her myndes face,
Falsc oratoryes she dyd aie deteste:
Sweetnesse was yn eche worde she dyd ywrecne,
Tho she strove not to make that sweetnesse sheene.

Shee sayd; mic manner of appereyng here.
Mie name and sleighted myndbruch maie thee telle; [were,
I'm Trouthe, that dyd descende fromm heaven-
Goulers and courtiers doe not kenne mee welle;
This inmoste thoughtes, thie labryngc brayne I
fawe,

And from this gentle drecme will thee adawe.

Full manie champyons and menne of lore,
Payncters and carvellers have gaind good name,
But there's a Canyngc, to encrease the store,
A Canyngc, who shall buie uppe all theyre fame.
Take thou mic power, and see yn chylde and manne
What troulic noblenesse yn Canyngc rannc.

As when a bordelier onn ethie bedde,
Tyr'd wyth the laboures maynt of sweltrie daie,
Yn slepeis bosom laieth hys deft headde,
So, senfes sonke to reste, mic boddie laie;
Eftsoons mic sprighte, from ethlie bandes untyde,
Immengde yn flanchcd ayre wyth trouthe asyde.

Strayte was I carryd back to tymes of yore,
Whylst Canyngc swathed yet yn fleshlic bedde,
And saw all actyons whych han been before,
And all the feroll of fate unravelled;
And when the fate-mark'd babe acome to syghte,
I saw hym eager gaspyngc after lyghte.

In all hys shepen gambols and chyldes plaie,
In everie merriemakeyng, fayre or wake,
I kenn'd a perpled lyghte of wysdom's raic;
He cate downe learynyngc wyth the wastle cake.
As wife as anie of the eldermenne,
He'd wytte enowc toe make a mayre at tenne.

As the dulce downie barbe beganne to gre,
So was the well thyghte tecture of hys lore; -
Eche daie enhedeyngc moekler for to bee,
Greete yn hys counceil for the daies he bore.
All tongues, all carrols dyd unto hym syngc,
Wondryng at one soe wyfe, and yet soe yingc.

Encreaseyngc yn the yeares of mortal lyfe,
And hasteyngc to hys journie ynto heaven,
Hee thoughte ytt proper for to cheefe a wyfe,
And use the sexes for the purpose gevene.
Hee then was yothe of comelic femlikeede,
And hee had made a mayden's herte to blede.

He had a fader, (Jesus rest hys soule)!
Who loved moncy, as hys charie joie;
Hee had a broder (happie manne be's dole)!
Yn mynde and boddie, hys owne fadre's boie;

What then could Canyngc wiffen as a parte
To gyve to her whoc had made chop of hearte?

But landes and castle tenures, golde and bighes,
And hoardes of sylver rousted yn the ent,
Canyngc and hys fayre sweete dyd that despyfe,
To change of troulic love was theyr content;
Theire lyv'd togeder yn a house adyngc,
Of goode sendaument commilie and syne.

But soone hys broder and hys fyre dyd die,
And lefte to Willyam states and renteyngc rolles,
And at hys wyll hys broder Johnc supplie.
Hee gave a chaurtrie to redeeme theyre soules;
And put hys broder ynto syke a trade, [made.
That he lorde mayor of Londonne towne was

Eftsoons hys mornyngc tounrd to gloomie nyghte;
Hys dame, hys seconde selfe' gyve upp her brethe,
Seekeyngc for eterne lyfe and endles lyghte,
And flect good Canyngc; sad mytake of dethe!
Soe have I seen a flower ynu sommer tyme
Trodde downe and broke and widder ynn ytts pryme.

Next Radcleve chyrche (oh worke of hande of
heav'n,

Whare Canyngc sheweth as an instrumente),
Was to my bismarde eyne-syghte newlic giv'n;
'Tis past to blazonne ytt to good contente,
You that woude faygn the fetive buyldyngc see
Repayre to Radcleve, and contented bee.

I sawe the myndbruch of hys nobille soule
Whan Edwarde meniced a seconde wyfe;
I saw what Pheryons yn hys mynde dyd rolle;
Nowe fyx'd fromm seconde dames a preefte for lyfe.

Thys ys the manne of menne, the vision spoke;
Then belle for even-songe mic senfes woke.

ON HAPPINESSE.

BY WILLIAM CANYNGE.

MAIE Selynesse on erthes boundes bee hadde?
Maie yt adyghte yn human shape bee founde?
Wote yec, ytt was wyth Edin's bower bestadde,
Or quite eraced from the seance-layd grounde,
Whan from the secret fontes the waterres dyd
abounde?

Does yt agrosed slun the bodyed waulke,
Lyve to ytself, and to yttes ecchoe taulke?

All hayle, Contente, thou mayde of turtle-eyne,
As thie behoulders thynke thou arte ywrecne,
To ope the dore to Selynesse ys thine,
And Chrystis glorie doth uppone thee sheene.
Doer of the soule thyngc 'ne hath thee seene;
In caves, vnn wodes, ynn woe, and dole distresse,
Whore hath thee hath gotten Selynesse.

ONN. JOHNE A DALBENIE.

BY THE SAME.

JOHNE makes a jarre boutc Lancaster and Yorke;
Bee stille, gode manue, and learne to mynde thie worke.

THE GOULER'S REQUIEM.

BY THE SAME.

MIE boolic entes, adieu! ne moe the syghte
Of guilden merke shall mete mie joicous cyne,
A ij

Ne moe the fylver noble sheenyng bryghte
Schall fyll mie honde with weicht to speke ytt
fyne;

Ne moe, ne moe, alafs! I call you myne:
Whydder must you, ah! whedder must I goe?
I kenn not either; oh mie emmers dygne,
To parte wyth you wyll wurcke me myckle woe;
I muste be gonne, botte whare I dare ne telle;

O sthorthe unto mie mynde! I goe to helle.

Soone as the morne dyd dyghte the roddie sunne,
A shade of theves eche streake of lyght dyd
seeme;

Whann ynn the heavn full half hys course was runn,

Eche stirryng nayghbour dyd mie harte affeme;
Thye losf, or quyck or slepe, was aie mie dreme;

For thee, O gould, I dyd the lawe ycrase;

For thee I gotten or bic wiles or breme;

Ynn thee I all mie joie and good dyd place;

Botte now to mee thic pleasaunce ys ne moe,
I kenne notte botte for thee I to the quede must goe.

THE

ACCOUNTE OF W. CANYNGES FEAST.

THOROWE the halle the belle han founde;

Bydecoyle doe the grave beseeume;

The ealdermenne doe fyttte arounde,

Ande snoffelle oppe the cheorte steeme.

Lyche affes wyldc ynne defarte waste

Swotelye the morncyngc ayre doe taste.

Syke keene theic ate; the minstrels plaie,

The dynne of angelles doe theic keepe;

Heie stytle the guesstes ha ne to saie,

Butte nodde yer thankes ande falle aslape.

Thus echone daie bee I to deene,

Gyf Rowley, Hamme, or Tyb. Gorges be ne seene,

A GLOSSARY OF UNCOMMON WORDS.

IN the following glossary, the explanations of words by Chatterton, at the bottom of the several pages, are drawn together, and digested alphabetically, with the letter C, after each of them. But it should be observed, that these explanations are not to be admitted but with great caution; a considerable number of them being (as far as the editor can judge) unsupported by authority or analogy. The explanations of some other words, omitted by Chatterton, have been added by the editor, where the meaning of the writer was sufficiently clear, and the word itself did not recede too far from the established usage; but he has been obliged to leave many others for the consideration of more learned or more sagacious interpreters.

EXPLANATION OF THE LETTERS OF REFERENCE.

Æ. stands for Ælla, a Tragedy Entertide.
 Ba. The Debt of Syr C. Bawdin.
 Ch. Balade of Charitie.
 E. I. Eclogue the first.
 E. II. Eclogue the second.
 E. III. Eclogue the third.
 El. Elinour and Jug.
 Ent. Introductionne to Ælla.
 Ep. Epistle to M. Canynge.
 G. Goddwyn, a Tragedie.
 H. 1. Battle of Hastings, No. 1.
 H. 2. Battle of Hastings, No. 2.
 Lc. Letter to M. Canynge.
 M. Englysh Metamorphosis.
 P. G. Prologue to Goddwyn.
 T. Tournament.

A.

ABESSIE, E. III. humility. C.
 Aborne, T. burnished. C.
 Abounde, H. I.
 Aboune, G. make ready. C.
 Abredynge, Æ. upbraiding. C.
 Abrewe, as brew.
 Abrodden, E. I. abruptly. C.
 Acale, G. freeze. C.
 Accaie, Æ. assuage. C.
 Achments, T. achievements. C.

Acheke, G. choke. C.
 Achevements, Æ. services. C.
 Acoyne; as come.
 Acrool, El. faintly. C.
 Adave, H. 2.
 Adawe, awake.
 Addawd, H. 2.
 Adente, Æ. fastened. C.
 Adented, G. fastened, annexed. C.
 Aderne, H. 2. See Derne, Dernie.
 Adigue. See adyng.
 Adrames, Ep. churls. C.
 Adventaile, T. armor. C.
 Adygne, Le. nervous; worthy of praise. C.
 Affynd, H. 1. related by marriage.
 Affeme, as fleme; to drive away, to affright.
 After la gourre, H. 2. should probably be afretre
gour; astrologer.
 Agram, G. grievance. C.
 Agreme, Æ. torture. C.—G. grievance. C.
 Agrosed, as agrised; terrified.
 Agroted, Æ. See Groted.
 Agylted, Æ. offended. C.
 Aidens, Æ. aidance.
 Ake, E. II. oak. C.
 Alans, H. 2. bounds.
 Alatche, Æ.
 Aledge, G. idly. C.
 Alcst, Æ. left.
 All a boon, E. III. a manner of asking a favour. C.
 Allyn, E. I. only. C.
 Almer, Ch. beggar. C.
 Aluste, H. I.
 Alyne, T. across his shoulders. C.
 Alyse, Le. allow. C.
 Amate, Æ. destroy. C.
 Amavid, E. II. enamelled. C.
 Ameded, Æ. revaried.
 Amenged, as menged, mixed.
 Amenufed, E. II. diminished. C.
 Amield, T. ornamented, enamelled. C.
 Anente, Æ. against. C.
 Anere, Æ. another. C.
 Anette,
 Anie, as nie; night.
 Anlace, G. an ancient sword. C.
 Antecedent, Æ. going before.

- Applings, E. I. grafted trees. C.
 Arace, G. divers. C.
 Arift, Ch. arose. C.
 Arrowe-lede, H. 1.
 Afeauce, E. III. disdainfully. C.
 Afenglave, H. 1.
 Afskaunted, I. c.
 Aflee, Æ.
 Affeled, E. III. answered. C.
 Afhrewed, Ch. accursed, unfortunate. C.
 Affwaie, Æ.
 Aftedde, E. II. feated. C.
 Afteude, G. aftonifh. C.
 Aferte, G. neglected. C.
 Afoun, E. II. aftonifhed. C.
 Afounde, M. aftonifh. C.
 Af, de, perhaps afyde; afcended.
 Athur, H. 2. as thurgh; thorough.
 Attence, Æ. at once. C.
 Attoure, T. turn. C.
 Attoure, Æ. around.
 Ave, H. 2. for eau. Fr. water.
 Aumere, Ch. a loofe robe or mantle. C.
 Aumeres, E. III. borders of gold and fiver, &c. C.
 Auture, H. 2. as aventure; adventure.
 Autremete, Ch. a loofe white robe worn by priefts. C.
 Awhaped, Æ. aftonifhed. C.
 Aynewarde, Ch. backwards. C.
- B.
- Bankes, T. benches.
 Barb'd hall, Æ.
 Barbed horfe, Æ. covered with armour.
 Baren, Æ. for barren.
 Bargalette E. III. a fong or ballad. C.
 Bataunt, Ba.
 Battayles, Æ. boats, fhips. Fr.
 Batten, G. fatten. C.
 Battent, T. loudly. C.
 Battently, G. loud roaring. C.
 Battone, H. 1. beat with fticks. Fr.
 Baubels, Ent. jewels. C.
 Bawfin, Æ. large. C.
 Bayre, E. II. brov. C.
 Behefte, G. command. C.
 Behight, H. 2.
 Behylte, Æ. promifed. C.
 Belent, H. 2.
 Beme, Æ. trumpet.
 Bement, E. I. lament. C.
 Benned, Æ. curfed, tormented. C.
 Benymmynge, P. G. bereaving. C.
 Bercie
 Berne, Æ. child. C.
 Berten, T. venomous. C.
 Befcies, T. becomes. C.
 Befprente, T. fattered. C.
 Befladde,
 Befanne, Æ.
 Befte, H. 2.
 Beftoiker, Æ. deceiver. C.
 Beftreynt, H. 2.
 Bete, G. bid. C.
 Betrafled, G. deceived, impofed on. C.
 Betrafte, Æ. betrayed. C.
 Betreinted, H. 2.
 Bevyte, E. II. break. A berald term, fignifying a fpear broken in tilting. C.
 Bewrate, H. 2.
- Bewrecke, G. revenge. C.
 Bewreen, Æ. exprefs. C.
 Bewryen, Le. declared, exprefsed. C.
 Bewryne, G. declare. C.
 Bewryning, T. declaring. C.
 Bighes, Æ. jewels. C.
 Birlette, E. III. a hood or covering for the back part of the head. C.
 Bifmarde.
 Blake, Æ. naked. C.
 Blakied, E. III. naked, original. C.
 Blanche, Æ. white, pure.
 Blaunchie, E. II. white. C.
 Blatauntlic, Æ. loudly. C.
 Blente, E. III. ceafed, dead. C.
 Blethe, T. bleed. C.
 Blynge, Æ. ceafe. C.
 Blyn, E. II. ceafe, ftand ftill. C.
 Boddekin, Æ. body, fubftance. C.
 Boleynge, M. fweeling. C.
 Bollengers and Cottes, E. II. different kinds of boats. C.
 Boolic, E. I. beloved. C.
 Bordel, E. III. cottage. C.
 Bordelier, Æ. cottager.
 Borne, T. Æ. burnifh. C.
 Boun, E. II. make ready. C.
 Bounde, T. ready. C.
 Bouric, Æ.
 Bouting matche,
 Bowke, T.—Bowkie, G. body. C.
 Braffeth, G. burfteth. C.
 Brayd, G. diffayed. C.
 Brayde, Æ.
 Breme, fuft. G. ftrength. C.
 ——— adj. E. II. ftrong. C.
 Brende, G. burn, confume. C.
 Bretful, Ch. filled with. C.
 Broched, H. 2. pointed.
 Brondeous, E. II. furious. C.
 Browded, G. embroidered. C.
 Brynyng, Æ. declaring. C.
 Burled, M. armed. C.
 Burlic bronde, G. fury, anger. C.
 Byeleycole, bel-oeuil. Fr. the name of a perfonage in the Roman de la Rose, which Chaucer has rendered fair-welcoming.
 Byker, Æ. battle.
 Bykrous, M. warring. C.
 Byfmarc, M. bewildered, curious. C.
 Byfmarelic, Le. curioufly. C.
- Calc, Æ. cold.
 Calke, G. caff. C.
 Calked, E. I. caff out. C.
 Caltyfning, G. forbidding. C.
 Carnes, Æ. rocks, ftones. Brit.
 Caffle-ftede, G. a caffle. C.
 Caties, H. 2. cates.
 Caytifned, Æ. binding, enforcing. C.
 Celnefs, Æ.
 Chafe, Æ. bot. C.
 Chaftes, G. beats, ftamps. C.
 Champion, v. P. G. challenge. C.
 Chaper, E. III. dry, fun-burnt. C.
 Chapournette, Ch. a fmall round hat.
 Chere, G. beat, rafenefs. C.
 Chelandree, Æ. goldfinch. C.
 Chcoarte,

Cherifaunce, Ent. comfort. C.
 Cherifaunied, Æ. perhaps cherifaunced.
 Cheves, Ch. movers. C.
 Chevyled, Ent. preserved. C.
 Chirkyng, M. a confused noise. C.
 Church-glebe-house, Ch. grave. C.
 Cleme, E. II. found. C.
 Clergyon, P. G. clerk, or clergyman. C.
 Clergyon'd, Ent. taught. C.
 Clevis, H. 2.
 Cleyne, Æ.
 Clinie, H. 1.
 Cloude-agedsted.
 Clymmyng, Ch. noisy. C.
 Coitrell, H. 2.
 Compheeres, M. companions. C.
 Congeon, E. III. dwarf. C.
 Contake, T. dispute. C.
 Conteins, H. 1. for contents.
 Conteke, E. II. confuse, contend with. C.
 Contekions, Æ. contentions. C.
 Cope, Ch. a cloak. C.
 Corven, Æ. See ycorven.
 Cotte, E. II. cut.
 Cottis, E. II. See bollengers.
 Coupe, E. II. cut. C.
 Couracières, T. horse-courser. C.
 Coyen, Æ. coy. q?
 Cravent, E. III. coward. C.
 Creand, Æ. as recreand.
 Crine, Æ. hair. C.
 Croched, H. 2. perhaps broched.
 Croche, v. G. cross. C.
 Crokyng, Æ. bending.
 Cross-stone, Æ. monument. C.
 Cuarr, quarry. q?
 Cullis-yatte, E. I. portcullisgate. C.
 Curriedowe, G. flatterer. C.
 Cuyen kine, E. I. tender cows. C.
 D.
 Dareynge, G. attempt, endeavour. C.
 Declynie, H. 1. declination. q?
 Decorn, E. II. carved. C.
 Deene, E. II. glorious, worthy. C.
 Deere, E. III. dire. C.
 Defs, M. vapours, meteors. C.
 Defayte, G. decay. C.
 Deste, Ch. neat, ornamental. C.
 Deigned, E. III. disdained. C.
 Delievretie, T. adivinity. C.
 Demasing, H. 1.
 Dente, Æ. See adente.
 Dented, Æ. See adented.
 Denwere, G. doubt. C.—M. tremour. C.
 Dequace, G. mangle, destroy. C.
 Dequaced.
 Dere, Ep. hurt, damage. C.
 Derkynnes, Æ. young deer. q?
 Derne, Æ.—H. 2.
 Dernie, E. I. woeful, lamentable. C.
 — M. cruel. C.
 Deslavate, H. 2.
 Deslavatic, Æ. letchery. C.
 Detratours, H. 2.
 Deyfde, Æ. seated on a deis.
 Dheie, they.
 Dhere, Æ. thers.

Dhereof, thereof.
 Difficile, Æ. difficult. C.
 Dighte, Ch. dress, arrayed. C.
 Dispande, perhaps for disponed.
 Dispone, dispose.
 Divinitre, Æ. divine. C.
 Dolce, Æ. soft, gentle. C.
 Dole, n. G. lamentation. C.
 Dole, adj.
 Dolte, Ep. foolish. C.
 Donde, H. 1.
 Donore, H. 1. This line should probably be written thus: O sea-berteeming Dover!
 Dortoure, Ch. a sleeping-room. C.
 Dote, perhaps as dighte.
 Doughtre mere, H. 2. d'outre mere, Fr. From beyond sea.
 Dree, Æ.
 Dreffe, Æ. leaf. C.
 Drented, G. drained.
 Dreynted, Æ. drowned. C.
 Dribblet, E. II. small, insignificant. C.
 Drites, G. nights, liberties. C.
 Drocke, T. drink. C.
 Droke, Æ.
 Droorie, Ep. See Chatterton's note. Drurie is courtship, gallantry.
 Drooried, Æ. courted.
 Dulce, as dolce.
 Duresfed, E. I. hardened. C.
 Dyd, H. 2. should probably be dyght.
 Dygne, T. worthy. C.
 Dynning, E. I. founding. C.
 Dysperpelleit, Æ. scattered. C.
 Dyfporte, E. I. pleasure. C.
 Dyfportiment, Æ. as dyfporte.
 Dyregate, Æ.

E.

Edraw, H. 2. for ydraw, draw.
 Est, E. II. often. C.
 Estfoones, E. III. quickly. C.
 Eie, M. help. C.
 Eletten, Æ. enlighten. C.
 Eke, E. I. also. C.
 Emblanchied, E. I. whitened. C.
 Embodyde, E. I. thick, stout. C.
 Embowre, G. lodge. C.
 Emburled, E. II. armed. C.
 Emmate, Æ. lessen, decrease. C.
 Emmers.
 Emmertleyng, M. glittering. C.
 Enalle, G. embrave. C.
 Encaled, Æ. frozen, cold. C.
 Enchafed, M. beated, enraged. C.
 Engyne, Æ. torture.
 Enheedyng.
 Enlowed, Æ. flamed, fired. C.
 Enrone, Æ.
 Enfeme, Æ. to make seams in. q?
 Enseening, Æ. as seeming.
 Enshoting, T. shooting, darting. C.
 Enstrote, H. 2.
 Enswote, Æ. sweeten. q?
 Enswolters, Æ. swallows, sucks in. C.
 Ensyrke, encircle.
 Ent, E. III. a purse or bag. C.
 Entendement, Æ. understanding.

- Enthoghteing, Æ.
 Entremed.
 Entrykeynge, Æ. as tricking.
 Entyn, P. G. even. C.
 Estande, H. 2. for ystande, stand.
 Estells, E. II. A corruption of espoile, Fr. a star. C.
 Eftroughted, Æ.
 Ethie, E. III. ease. C.
 Ethie, easy.
 Evalle, E. III. equal. C.
 Evefpeckt, T. marked with evening dew. C.
 Ewbrice, Æ. adultery. C.
 Ewbrycious, lascivious.
 Eync-gears.
- F.
- Fage, Ep. tale, jest. C.
 Faifully, T. faithfully. C.
 Faitour, Ch. a beggar, or vagabond. C.
 Faldstole, Æ. a folding stool, or seat. See Du Cange in v. Faldstorium.
 Fayre, Æ. clear, innocent.
 Feere, Æ. fire.
 Feerie, E. II. flaming. C.
 Fele, T. feeble. C.
 Pellen, E. I. fell, pa. t. sing. q?
 Feticie, G. nobly. C.
 Fetive, Ent. as festive.
 Feticvelic, Le. elegantly. C.
 Fetivenes, Æ. as festiveness.
 Feygness, E. III. A corruption of seints. C.
 Fhuir, G. fury. C.
 Fic, T. defy. C.
 Flaiten, H. 1.
 Flanchd, H. 2.
 Flemed, T. frighted. C.
 Flemie.
 Flizze, G. fly. C.
 Floe, H. 2. arrow.
 Flott, Ch. fly. C.
 Foile, E. III. baffle. C.
 Fons, fonnes, E. II. devices. C.
 Forgard, Æ. lose. C.
 Forletten, El. forsaken. C.
 Forloyne, Æ. retreat. C.
 Forreyng, T. destroying. C.
 Forslagen, Æ. slain. C.
 Forslege, Æ. slay. C.
 Forstraughte, disfracted.
 Forstraughteyng, G. disfracting. C.
 Forfwat, Ch. sun-burnt. C.
 Forweltring, Æ. blasting. C.
 Forwyned, E. III. dried. C.
 Fremde, Æ. strange. C.
 Fremded, Æ. frighted. C.
 Freme, Æ.
 Fructile, Æ. fruitful.
- G.
- Gaberdine, T. a piece of armour. C.
 Gallard, Ch. frighted. C.
 Gare, Ep. cause. C.
 Gastneis, Æ. ghastliness. q?
 Gayne, Æ. To gayne, so gayne a pryze.—Gayne
 has probably been repeated by mistake.
 Geare, Æ. apparel, accoutrement.
 Geafon, Ent. rare, C.—G. extraordinary, strange,
 C.
 Geer, H. 2. as gier.
- Geete, Æ. as gite.
 Gemote, G. assemble. C.
 Gemoted, E. II. united, assembled. C.
 Gerd, M. broke, rent. C.
 Gies, G. guides. C.
 Gier, H. 1. a turn, or twist.
 Gif, E. II. if. C.
 Gites, Æ. robes, mantels. C.
 Glair, H. 2.
 Gledceyng, M. livid. C.
 Glomb, G. frown. C.
 Glommed, Ch. clouded, dejected. C.
 Glytted, H. 2.
 Gorne, E. I. garden. C.
 Gottes, Æ. drops.
 Gouler.
 Graiebarbes, Le. graybeards. C.
 Grange, E. I. liberty of pasture. C.
 Gratche, Æ. apparel. C.
 Grave, chief magistrate, mayor.
 Gravots, E. I. groves. C.
 Gree, E. I. grow. C.
 Groffile, Æ.
 Groffish, Æ.
 Grofflyngie, Ep. foolishly. C.
 Gron, G. a fen, moor. C.
 Gronfer, E. II. a meteor: from gron, a fen, and fer, a corruption of fire. C.
 Gronfyres, G. meteors. C.
 Grore, H. 2.
 Groted, Æ. sworn. C.
 Gule-depincted, E. II. red-painted. C.
 Gule-steynt, G. red-stained. C.
 Gytteles, Æ. mantels. C.
- H.
- Haile, E. III. happy. C.
 Haillie, Æ. as haile.
 Halceld, M. defeated. C.
 Hallie, T. boly. C.
 Hallie, Æ. wholly.
 Halline, Ch. joy. C.
 Hancelled, G. cut off, destroyed. C.
 Han, Æ. batb. q?
 Hanne, Æ. bad, particip. q?—Æ. bad, pa. t.
sing. q?
 Hantoned, Æ.
 Harried, M. toil. C.
 Hatched.
 Haveth, E. I. have, 1st pers. q?
 Heafods, E. II. heads. C.
 Heavenwere, G. heavenward. C.
 Hecked, Æ. wrapped closely, covered. C.
 Heckled, M. wrapped. C.
 Heie, E. II. they. C.
 Heideeynes, E. III. a country dance, still practis- ed in the north. C.
 Hele, n. G. help. C.
 Hele, v. E. III. to help. C.
 Hem, T. a contraction of them. C.
 Hente, T. grasp, hold. C.
 Hentyll, Æ.
 Herfelle, Æ. herself.
 Heste, Æ.
 Hilted, hiltren, T. hidden. C.
 Hiltring, Ch. biding. C.
 Hoatrie, E. I. inn, or public house. C.
 Holtred, Æ.

- Hommeur, Æ.
 Hondepoint, Æ.
 Hopelen, Æ.
 Horrowe, M. unseemly, disagreeable. C.
 Horfe-millanar, Gh. See C's note.
 Houton, M. hollow. C.
 Hulftred, M. hidden, secret. C.
 Hufcarles, Æ. house-servants.
 Hyger, Æ. The flowing of the tide in the Severn was anciently called the Hygra. Gul. Malmesh. de Pontif. Ang. L. iv.
 Hylle-fyre, Æ. a beacon.
 Hylte, T. hid, screened. C.—Æ. hide. C.
 Jape, Ch. a short surplice, &c. C.
 Jeste, G. hoisted, raised. C.
 Jfete, G. devour, destroy. C.
 Ihanted, E. I. accustomed. C.
 Jintle, H. 2. for gentle.
 Impfeftering, E. I. annoying. C.
 Inhild, El. infuse. C.
 Ishad, Le. broken. C.
 Jubb, E. III. a bottle. C.
 Iwreene.
- K
- Ken, E. II. see, discover, know. C.
 Kennes, Ep. knows. C.
 Keppened, Le.
 Kifte, Ch. coffin. C.
 Kiverled, E. III. the hidden or secret part. C.
 Knopped, M. fastened, chained, congealed. C.
 Ladden, H. 1.
 Leathel, E. I. deadly. C.
 Lechemanne, Æ. physician.
 Leckedt, H. 2.
 Lecturn, Le. subject. C.
 Lecturnies, Æ. lectures. C.
 Leden, El. decreasing. C.
 Ledanne, Æ.
 Leege, G. homage, obeysance. C.
 Leegefolcke, G. subjects. C.
 Lege, Ep. law. C.
 Leggen, M. lessen, alloy. C.
 Leggende, M. alloyed. C.
 Lemanne, Æ. mistress.
 Lemes, Æ. lights, rays. C.
 Lemed, El. gliftened. C.—Æ. lighted. C.
 Lere, Æ.—H. 2. seems to be put for leather.
 Lefel, El. a bush or hedge. C.
 Lete, G. fill. C.
 Lethal, El. deadly, or death-boding. C.
 Lethlen, Æ. fill, dead. C.
 Letten, Æ. church-yard. C.
 Levynde, El. blasted. C.
 Levynne, M. lightning. C.
 Levyn-mylted, Æ. lightning-melted. q?
 Liefe, Æ.
 Liff, E. I. leaf.
 Ligheth, Æ.
 Likand, H. 2. liking.
 Limed, E. II. } glassy, reflecting. C.
 Limmed, M. }
 Linge, Æ. stay. C.
 Liffed, T. bounded. C.
 Lithic, Ep. bumble. C.
 Leaste, Æ. loss.
- Logges, E. I. cottages. C.
 Lordinge, T. standing on their hind legs. C.
 Lovard's, E. III. Lord's. C.
 Low, G. flame of fire. C.
 Lowes, T. flames. C.
 Lowings, Ch. flames. C.
 Lymmed, M. polished. C.
 Lynch, El. bank. C.
 Lyoncel, E. II. young lion. C.
 Lyped, El.
 Lyffe, T. sport, or play. C.
 Lyffed, Æ. bounded. C.
 Mancas, G. marks. C.
 Manchyn, H. 2. a sleeve, Fr.
 Maynt, meynite, E. II. many, great numbers. C.
 Mee, mees, E. I. meadow. C.
 Meeded, Æ. rewarded.
 Memuine, H. 2.
 Meniced, menaced, q?
 Mere, G. lake. C.
 Merk-plante, T. night-bade. C.
 Merke, T. dark, gloomy. C.
 Miefel, Æ. myself.
 Miikynette, El. a small bagpipe. C.
 Mist, Ch. poor, needy. C.
 Mitches, El. ruins. C.
 Mittee, E. II. mighty. C.
 Mockler, more.
 Moke, Ep. much. C.
 Mokie, El. black. C.
 Mole, Ch. soft. C.
 Mollock, G. wet, moist. C.
 Morglaim, M. the name of a sword in some old romances.
 Morthe, Æ.
 Morthynge, El. murdering. C.
 Mote, E. I. might. C.
 Motte, H. 2. sword, or motto.
 Myckle, Le. much. C.
 Myndbruch, Æ.
 Mynfter, G. monastery. C.
 Myfterk, M. mystic. C.
 Ne, P. G. not. C.
 Ne, nigh.
 Nedere, Ep. adder. C.
 Neete, night.
 Nesh, T. weak, tender. C.
 Nete, Æ. night.
 Nete, T. nothing. C.
 Nilling, Le. unwilling. C.
 Nome-depainted, E. II. rebus'd fields; a herald term, when the charge of the shield implies the name of the bearer. C.
 Notte-browne, nut-brown.
 O.
- Obaic, E. I. abide. C.
 Offrendes, Æ. presents, offerings. C.
 Olyphautes, H. 2. elephants.
 Onknowlacheynge, E. II. not knowing. C.
 Onlight, Æ.
 Onplift, Le. boundless. C.
 Orrefts, G. oversets. C.
 Ouchd, T. See C's note.
 Ouphante, Æ. quippen, cluck.
 Ourt, H. 2.

- Ouzle, Æ. black-bird. C.
 Owndes, G. waves. C.
 P.
 Pall, Ch. Contraction from appall, to fright. C.
 Paramente, Æ. robes of scarlet. C.—M. a princely robe. C.
 Pavcs, Pavyes, Æ. shields.
 Peede, Ch. pid. C.
 Penctc, Ch. paintcd. C.
 Penne, Æ. mountain.
 Percafe, Le. peribance. C.
 Pere, E. I. a pear. C.
 Perpled, purple, q?
 Perfant, Æ. piercing.
 Pete, Æ.
 Pheeres, Æ. fellows, equals. C.
 Theon, H. 2. in heraldry, the barbed head of a dart.
 Pheryons.
 Picte, E. III. picture. C.
 Pighte, T. pitched, or bent down. C.
 Poyntel, Le. a pen. C.
 Prevvd, Æ. bardy, valourous. C.
 Proto-flenc, H. 2. first-flain.
 Prowe, H. I.
 Pynant, Le. pining, meagre.
 Pyghte, M. scalded. C.
 Pyghteth, Ep. plucks, or tortures. C.
 Q.
 Quaced, T. vanquished. C.
 Quantified, T. curiously devised. C.
 Quantfd, Æ. stilled, quenched. C.
 Queede, Æ. the evil one, the devil.
 R.
 Receivre, G. receipt. C.
 Reeer, H. I. for raeer.
 Recendizc, Æ. } for recreandice, cowardice.
 Recrandize, Æ. }
 Recreand, Æ. coward. C.
 Reddour, Æ. violence. C.
 Rede, Le. wisdom. C.
 Reded, G. counsellcd. C.
 Redeing, Æ. advice.
 Regrate, Le. esteem. C.—M. esteem, favour. C.
 Rele, n. Æ. wave. C.
 Reles, v. E. II. waves. C.
 Rennome, T. honour, glory. C.
 Reyne, Reine, E. II. run. C.
 Reyning, E. II. running. C.
 Reytes, Æ. water-flags. C.
 Ribaude, Ep. rake, lewd person. C.
 Ribbande-geere, ornaments of ribbands.
 Rodded, Ch. reddend. C.
 Rode, E. I. complexion. C.
 Rodeing, Æ. riding.
 Roder, Æ. rider, iraveller.
 Roghling, T. rolling. C.
 Roim, Æ. ruin.
 Roiend, Æ. ruin'd.
 Roincr, Æ. ruiner.
 Rou, G. horrid, grim. C.
 Rowncy, Le. cart-borse. C.
 Rynde, Æ. ruin'd.
 S.
 Sabalus, E. I. the devil. C.
 Sabbatanners, Æ.
 Scalle, Æ. ball. C.
 Scante, Æ. scarce. C.
 Scantillie, Æ. scarcely, sparingly. C.
 Scarpes, Æ. scarfs. C.
 Scethe, T. hurt or damage. C.
 Scille, E. III. gather. C.
 Scillye, G. closely. C.
 Scolles, Æ. scales.
 Scond, H. I. for abscond.
 Seck, H. I. for suck.
 Seeled, Ent. closed. C.
 Seere, Æ. search. C.
 Selyncfs, E. I. bappinesf. C.
 Semblate,
 Seme, E. III. seed. C.
 Semecope, Ch. a short under-cloke. C.
 Semmykeed, Æ.
 Semlykeene, Æ. countenance. C.—G. beauty, countenance. C.
 Sendaument,
 Sete, Æ. feat.
 Shappe, T. fate. C.
 Shap-furged, Æ. fate-scourged. C.
 Shemring, E. II. glimmering. C.
 Shente, T. broke, destroyed. C.
 Shepen,
 Shepftere, E. I. shepherd. C.
 Shoone-pykes, shoes with piked toes. The length of the pikes was restrained to two inches, by 3 Edw. 4. c. 5.
 Shrove, H. 2.
 Sletre, Æ. slaughter.
 Slughornes, E. II. a mystical instrument not unlike a hautboy. C.—T. a kind of clarion. C.
 Smethe, T. smoke. C.
 Smething, E. I. smoking. C.
 Smore, H. I.
 Smothe, Ch. steam or vapours. C.
 Snett, T. bent. C.
 Sothen, Æ. sooth. q?
 Souten, H. I. for sought. pa. t. sing. q?
 Sparre, H. I. a wooden bar.
 Spedde, H. 2.
 Spencer, T. dispenser. C.
 Spere, Æ.
 Spyring, Æ. towering.
 Staie, H. I.
 Starks, T. stalks.
 Steeres, stairs.
 Stent, T. stained. C.
 Steynced, Æ.
 Storthe.
 Storven, Æ. dead. C.
 Straughte, Æ. stretchcd. C.
 Stret, Æ. stretch. C.
 Strev, Æ. strive.
 Stringe, G. strong. C.
 Suffycyl, Æ.
 Swarthe, Æ.
 Swartheing, Æ.
 Swarthless, H. 2.
 Sweft-kervd, E. II. short-liv'd. C.
 Swoltering, Æ.
 Swotie, E. II. sweet. C.
 Swythe, Swythen, Swythyng, quickly. C.
 Syke, E. II. suck, so. C.
 T.
 Takelle, T. arrow. C.
 Teint, H. I. for tent.

Tende, T. attend, or wait. C.
 Tene, Æ. sorrow.
 Tentyflie, E. III. carefully. C.
 Tere, Æ. health. C.
 Thighte.
 Thoughten, Æ. for thought. pa. t. sing. q?
 Thyflen, E. II. these, or those. q?
 Tochelod, Æ.
 Tore, Æ. torcb. C.
 Trechit, H. 2. for forget, deceit.
 Treynted, Æ.
 Twyghte, E. II. stucked, pulled. C.
 Twytte, E. I. pluck, or pull. C.
 Tyngc, Tyngue, tongue.
 U.
 Val, T. helm. C.
 Vernage, H. 2. vernaccia. Ital. a sort of rich wine.
 Ugfomeneſs, Æ. terror. C.
 Ugfomme, E. II. terribly. C.—Æ. terrible. C.
 Unaknell'd, H. 1. without any knell rung for them. q?
 Unburled, Æ. unarmed. C.
 Uncted, M. anointed. C.
 Undelievre, G. inactive. C.
 Unenhantend, Æ. unaccostomed. C.
 Uncspryte, G. unsprited. C.
 Unhaille, Ch. unhappy. C.
 Unliart, P. G. unforgiving. C.
 Unlist, E. III. unbounded. C.
 Unlored, Ep. unlearned. C.
 Unlydgefull, Æ.
 Unplayte, G.—Unplyte, Æ. explain. C.
 Unquaced, E. III. unhurt. C.
 Unsprytes, Æ. un-souls. C.
 Untentyff G. uncareful, neglected. C.
 Unthylle, T. useless. C.
 Unwere, E. III. tempest. C.
 Volunde, Æ. memory, understanding. C.—G. will.
 C.
 Upriste, Æ. risen. C.
 Uprync, H. 2.
 Upfwalyngc, Æ. swelling. C.
 W.
 Walsome, H. 2. walsome, loathsome.
 Wanhope, G. despair. C.
 Wayld, Æ. choice, selected.
 Waylinge, E. II. decreasing. C.

Wayne, E. III. car. C.
 Weef, Æ. grief. C.
 Welked, E. III. withered. C.
 Welkyn, Æ. heaven. C.
 Wiſeegger, E. III. a philosopher. C.
 Wiſſen, Æ. wiſe.
 Wite, G. reward. C.
 Withe, E. III. a contraction of wither. C.
 Wolfome, Le. See walsome.
 Wraytes. See reytes.
 Wrynn, T. declare. C.
 Wurche, Æ. work. C.
 Wychenereſ, Æ. witchcraft.
 Wyere, E. II. grief trouble. C.
 Wympled, G. mantled, covered. C.
 Wynnyngc, Æ.

Y.

Yan, Æ. than.
 Yaped, Ep. laughable. C.
 Yatte, T. that. C.
 Yblente, Æ. blinded. C.
 Ybroched, G. burned. C.
 Ycorne, Æ.
 Ycorven, T. to mould. C.
 Ycraſed, T. broken. C.
 Yenne, then.
 Yer, E. II. their.
 Yer, Æ. your.
 Ygrove, H. 2.
 Yinder, Æ. yonder.
 Yis, this.
 Ylach'd, H. 2.
 Ynhyme, Ent. interr. C.
 Ynutile, Æ. useless.
 Yreaden, H. 2.
 Yroughte, H. 2. for ywroughte.
 Yſped, M. dispatched. C.
 Yſpende, T. consider. C.
 Yſtorven E. I. dead. C.
 Ytsel, E. I. itself.
 Ywreen, E. II. covered. C.
 Ywrinde, M. bid, covered. C.
 Yyne, Æ. thine.
 Z.
 Zabalus, Æ. as Sabalus; the devil.

MISCELLANIES.

ETHELGAR, A SAXON POEM.

'Tis not for thee, O man! to murmur at the will of the Almighty. When the thunders roar, the lightnings shine on the rising waves, and the black clouds sit on the brow of the lofty hill; who then protects the flying deer, swift as a sable cloud, tost by the whistling winds, leaping over the rolling floods, to gain the hoary wood; whilst the lightnings shine on his chest, and the wind rides over his horns? when the wolf roars; terrible as the voice of the Severn; moving majestic as the nodding forests on the brow of Michel-stow; who then commands the sheep to follow the swain, as the beams of light attend upon the morning?—Know, O man! that God suffers not the least member of his work to perish, without answering the purpose of their creation. The evils of life, with some, are blessings: and the plant of death healeth the wound of the sword.—Doth the sea of trouble and affliction overwhelm thy soul, look unto the Lord, thou shalt stand firm in the days of temptation, as the lofty hill of Kinwulf; in vain shall the waves beat against thee; thy rock shall stand.

Comely as the white rocks; bright as the star of the evening; tall as the oak upon the brow of the mountain; soft as the showers of dew, that fall upon the flowers of the field, Ethelgar arose, the glory of * Exanceastre: noble were his ancestors, as the palace of the great Kenric; his soul, with the lark, every morning ascended the skies; and sported in the clouds: when stealing down the steep mountain, wrapt in a shower of spangling dew, evening came creeping to the plain, closing the flowers of the day, shaking her pearly showers upon the rustling trees; then was his voice heard in the grove, as the voice of the nightingale upon the hawthorn spray; he sung the works of the Lord; the hollow rocks joined in his devotions; the stars danced to his song; the rolling years, in various mantles dress'd, confess him man.—He saw Egwina of the vale; his soul was astonished, as the Britons who fled before the sword of Kenric; she was tall as the towering elm; stately as a black cloud bursting into thunder; fair as the wrought bowels of the earth; gentle and sweet as the morning breeze; beautiful as the sun; blushing like the vines of the west; her soul as fair as the azure curtain of heaven. She saw Ethelgar; her soft soul melted as the flying snow, before the sun. The shrine of St. Cuthbert united them. The minutes fled on the golden wings of bliss. Nine horned moons had decked the sky, when Ethelgar saw the light; he was like a young plant upon the mountain's side, or the sun hid in a cloud; he felt the strength of his fire; and, swift as the lightnings of heaven, pursued the wild boar of the wood. The morn' awoke the sun, who, stepping from the mountain's brow, shook his ruddy locks upon the shining dew; Ethelgar arose from sleep; he seized his sword and spear, and issued to the chase. As waters swiftly falling down a craggy rock, so raged young Ethelgar through the wood; the wild boar bit his spear, and the fox died at his feet. From the thicket a wolf arose, his eyes flaming like two stars; he roared like the voice of the tempest; hunger made him furious, and he fled like a falling meteor to the war. Like a thunder bolt tearing the black rock, Ethelgar darted his spear through his heart. The wolf raged like the voice of many waters, and seizing Ethelgar by the throat, he fought the regions of the blessed.—The wolf died upon his body.—Ethelgar and Egwina wept.—They wept like the rains of the spring; sorrow sat upon them as the black clouds upon the mountains of death: but the power of God settled their hearts.

The golden sun arose to the highest of his power; the apple perfumed the gale; and the juicy grape delighted the eye. Ethelgar and Egwina bent their way to the mountain's side, like two stars that move through the sky. The flowers grew beneath their feet; the trees spread out their leaves; the sun played upon the rolling brook; the winds gently passed along. Dark, pitchy clouds veiled the face of the sun; the winds roared like the noise of a battle; the swift hail descended to the ground; the lightnings broke from the sable clouds, and gilded the dark-brown corners of the sky; the thunder shook the lofty mountains; the tall towers nodded to their foundations; the bending oaks divided the whistling wind; the broken flowers fled in confusion round the mountain's side. Ethelgar and Egwina fought the sacred shade, the bleak winds roared over their heads, and the waters ran over their feet. Swift from the dark cloud the lightning came; the skies blushed at the fight. Egwina stood on the brow of the lofty hill, like an oak in the spring; the lightnings danced about her garments, and the blasting flame blackened her face: the shades of death swam before her eyes; and she fell breathless down the black steep rock: the sea received her body, and she rolled down with the roaring water.

* Exeter.

Ethelgar stood terrible as the mountain of Maindip; the waves of despair harrowed up his soul, as the roaring Severn plows the sable sand; wild as the evening wolf, his eyes shone like the red vapours in the valley of the dead: horror sat upon his brow; like a bright star shooting through the sky, he plunged from the lofty brow of the hill, like a tall oak breaking from the roaring wind. Saint Cuthbert appeared in the air; the black clouds fled from the sky; the sun gilded the spangling meadows; the lofty pine stood still; the violets of the vale gently moved to the soft voice of the wind; the sun shone on the bubbling brook. The faint, arrayed in glory, caught the falling mortal; as the soft dew of the morning hangs upon the lofty elm, he bore him to the sandy beech, whilst the sea roared beneath his feet. Ethelgar opened his eyes, like the grey orbs of the morning, folding up the black mantles of the night—Know, O man! said the member of the blessed, to submit to the will of God; he is terrible as the face of the earth, when the waters sunk to their habitations; gentle as the sacred covering of the oak; secret as the bottom of the great deep; just as the rays of the morning. Learn that thou art a man, nor repine at the stroke of the Almighty, for God is as just as he is great. The holy vision disappeared as the atoms fly before the sun. Ethelgar arose, and bent his way to the college of Kenevalcin; there he flourishes as a hoary oak in the wood of Arden.

Bristol, March 4, 1769.

D. B.

KENRICK.

TRANSLATED FROM THE SAXON.

WHEN winter yelled through the leafless grove; when the black waves rode over the roaring winds, and the dark-brown clouds hid the face of the sun; when the silver brook stood still, and snow environed the top of the lofty mountain; when the flowers appeared not in the blasted fields, and the boughs of the leafless trees bent with the loads of ice; when the howling of the wolf affrighted the darkly glimmering light of the western sky; Kenrick, terrible as the tempest, young as the snake of the valley, strong as the mountain of the slain; his armour shining like the stars in the dark night, when the moon is veiled in fable, and the blasting winds howl over the wide plain; his shield like the black rock; prepared himself for war.

Ceolwolf of the high mountain, who viewed the first rays of the morning star, swift as the flying deer, strong as a young oak, fierce as an evening wolf, drew his sword; glittering like the blue vapours in the valley of Horfo; terrible as the red lightning, bursting from the dark-brown clouds; his swift bark rode over the foaming waves, like the wind in the tempest; the arches fell at his blow, and he wrapt the towers in flames; he followed Kenrick, like a wolf roaming for prey.

Centwin of the vale arose, he seized the maffy spear; terrible was his voice, great was his strength;

he hurled the rocks into the sea, and broke the strong oaks of the forest. Slow in the race as the minutes of impatience. His spear, like the fury of a thunderbolt, swept down whole armies; his enemies melted before him, like the stones of hail at the approach of the sun.

Awake, O Eldulph! thou that sleepest on the white mountain, with the fairest of women: no more pursue the dark-brown wolf; arise from the mossy bank of the falling waters; let thy garments be stained in blood, and the streams of life discolour thy girdle; let thy flowing hair be hid in a helmet, and thy beauteous countenance be writhed into terror.

Egward, keeper of the barks, arise like the roaring waves of the sea: pursue the black companies of the enemy.

Ye Saxons, who live in the air and glide over the stars, act like yourselves.

Like the murmuring voice of the Severn, swelled with rain, the Saxons moved along; like a blazing star the sword of Kenrick shone among the Britons; Tenyan bled at his feet; like the red lightning of Heaven he burnt up the ranks of his enemy.

Centwin raged like a wild boar. Tatward sported in blood, armies melted at his stroke. Eldulph was a flaming vapour, destruction sat upon his sword. Ceolwolf was drenched in gore, but fell like a rock before the sword of Mervin.

Egward pursued the slayer of his friend; the blood of Mervin smoked on his hand.

Like the rage of a tempest was the noise of the battle; like the roaring of the torrent, gushing from the brow of the lofty mountain.

The Britons fled, like a black cloud dropping hail, flying before the howling winds.

Ye virgins! arise and welcome back the pursuers; deck their brows with chaplets of jewels; spread the branches of the oak beneath their feet, Kenrick is returned from the war, the clotted gore hangs terrible upon his crooked sword, like the noxious vapours on the black rock; his knees are red with the gore of the foe.

Ye sons of the song, sound the instruments of music; ye virgins, dance around him.

Coftan of the lake, arise, take thy harp from the willow, sing the praise of Kenrick, to the sweet sound of the white waves sinking to the foundation of the black rock.

Rejoice, O ye Saxons! Kenrick is victorious.

CERDICK.

TRANSLATED FROM THE SAXON.

THE rose-crowned dawn dances on the top of the lofty hill. Arise, O Cerdick, from the mossy bed, for the noise of the chariots is heard in the valleys.

Ye Saxons, draw the sword, prepare the flying dart of death: swift as the glancing fight meet the foe upon the brow of the hill, and cast the warriors headlong into the roaring stream.

The swords of the Saxons appear on the high rock, like the lake of death reflecting the beams of the morning sun.

The Britons begin to ascend the ragged fragments of the shrinking rock: thick as the hail in the howling storm, driven down the mountain's side, the son of the tempest; the chariot, and the horse roll in confusion to the blood-stained vale.

Sons of war, descend, let the river be swelled with the smoking streams of life, and the mountain of the slain ascend to the stars.

They fall beneath the spear of Cerdick.

Sledda is a flame of fire. Kenbert scatters the never-erring shaft of death. Ælla is a tempest, a cloud bursting in blood, a winter's wind blasting the soul: his knees are encircled with life-warm gore, his white robe is like the morning sky. Ceaulin's spear is exalted like the star of the evening; his fallen enemies rise in hills around him.

The actions of Cerdick astonish the soul; the foe is melted from the field, and the gods have lost their sacrifice.

Cerdick leans upon his spear, he sings the praises of the gods: let the image be filled with the bodies of the dead, for the foe is swept away like purple bloom of the grape, no more to be seen. The sacred flames ascend the clouds, the warriors dance around it. The evening slowly throws her dusky vale over the face of the sun.

Cerdick arose in his tent.

Ye sons of war, who shake the silver javelin and the pointed shield, arise from the soft slumbers of the night, assemble to council at the tent of Cerdick.

From the dark-brown spring, from the verdant top of the impending rock, from the flowery vale, and the coppiced heath, the chiefs of the war arose.

Graceful as the flower that overlooks the silver stream, the mighty Cerdick stood among the warriors: attention seals up their lips.

Why will ye sleep, ye Saxons, whilst the hanging mountain of fortune trembles over our heads; let us gird on the reeking sword, and wrap in flame the town of Doranceastre: strong as the foundation of the earth, swift as the impetuous stream, deadly as the corrupted air, sudden as the whirlwind piercing to the hidden bed of the sea, armed in the red lightnings of the storm, will we come upon the foe. Prepare the sword and shield, and follow the descendant of Woden.

As when the sable clouds incessantly descend in rivers of rain to the wood-crowned hills, the foundation of the ground is loosened, and the forest gently slides to the valley, such was the appearance of the warriors, moving to the city of Doranceastre: the spears appeared like the stars of the black night, their spreading shields like the evening sky.

Turn your eyes, O ye Saxons, to the distant mountain: on the spreading top a company is seen: they are like the locusts of the east, like a dark-brown cloud expanding in the wind: they come down the hills like the stones of hail; the javelin nods over the helm; death sports in their shadows. They are children of Woden: see the god of battle fans the air, the red sword waves in their banner. Ye sons of battle, wait their approach, let their eyes be sealed with the chaplets of victory.

It is Kenrick! I see the lightning on his shield! his eyes are two stars, his arm is the arrow of death—he drinks the blood of the foe, as the rays of the summer sun drink the softly stealing brook: he moves like the moon, attended by the stars; his blood-stained robe flies around him, like the white clouds of the evening, tinged with the red beams of the sinking sun.

See the chaplet hangs on his helm: shade him, O ye sons of war, with the pointed shield.

Kenrick approaches, the shields of the brave hang over his head. He speaks; attention dances on the ear.

Son of Woden, receive a conquering son: the bodies of the slain rise in mountains; the ashes of the towns choke up the river; the roaring stream of Severn is filled with the slaughtered sons of thunder; the warriors hang upon the cliffs of the red rocks; the mighty men, like the sacrifice of yesterday, will be seen no more; the briars shall hide the plain; the grags dwell in the desolate habitation, the wolf shall sleep in the palace, and the fox in the temple of the gods; the sheep shall wander without a shepherd, and the goats be scattered in the high mountains, like the furrows on the bank of the swelling flood; the enemies are swept away; the gods are glutted with blood, and peace arises from the solitary grove.

Joy wantons in the eye of Cerdick. By the powers that send the tempest, the red lightning, and roaring thunder; by the god of war, whose delight is in blood, and who preys upon the souls of the brave; by the powers of the great deep, I swear that Kenrick shall sit on my throne, guide the sanguine spear of war, and the glittering sceptre of peace.

Cerdick girds his son with the sword of royalty: the warriors dance around him: the clanging shields echo to the distant vales; the fires ascend the skies; the town of Doranceastre increases the flame, and the great image is red with the blood of the captives: the cries of the burning foe are drowned in the songs of joy; the ashes of the image are scattered in the air, the bones of the foe are broken to dust.

Great is the valour of Cerdick, great is the strength of Kenrick.

Bristol, May 20.

D. B.

GODRED CROVAN.

A POEM.

Composed by Dognal Syrric Sebeld of Godred Crovan, King of the Isle of Man.

ARISE, O son of Harald the Black, for the son of Syrric sleeps upon the mountain, under the mossy rock; prepare thy silver lance, shake the clotted gore of the wolf from thy spreading shield; Fingal of the brown lake, whose sword divides the lofty pine, whose spear is ever moist with the blood of the slain, will assist thy arm. Cullifin who sleeps on the brow of the mountain, whose feet are swift as the days of mirth, will draw forth his troops from the forest. The lions of the plain, Mervor and Eslyr, will swell thy army, as the falling rain swells the silver brook: they wait for thy presence, as the brown meadow for the spring; they will shoot out in blood, and blossom in victory.

Godred Crovan, son of Harald the Black, whose name has put to flight armies, arise.

Godred arose; he met the chiefs on the plain; they sat down, and feasted till the evening: there sat Cochlin with the long spear, whose arm is a thunderbolt: on the banks of the sea he fought an host, and rained blood on the plain of Mervor: brown is his face as the sun-burnt heath; strong his arm as the roaring sea: he shook his black locks like clouds tossed by the winds: he sings the song of joy. Godwin of the rusby plain lay upon the skin of the wolf; his eyes are stars, his blows are lightning. Tatwallin sat by his side, he sung sweet as the birds of spring, he fought like the angry lion.

O Tatwallin! sing the actions of Harald the Swift.

Tatwallin arose from his feat, the horn of mirth graced his right-hand.

Hear, ye sons of blood, whilst the horn of mirth is refreshing your souls, the actions of Harald the Swift.

"The wolf of Norway beat his anlace on his silver shield; the sons of war assembled around him: swain of the cleft-hill shook the spear on his left; and Harald the Black, the lion of Iceland, on his right, dyed in gore. Fergus of the spreading hills was cased in black armour; his eyes shone with rage, his sword sported with the beams of the sun.

"Warriors," said the chief of the host, "let us assault the foe; swift as the hawk let us fly to the war; strong as the bull, fierce as the wolf, will we rage in the fight: the followers of Harald, the son of Godwin, shall melt away as the summer clouds; they shall fall like the flowers of the field; their souls will fade with the blasting of our valour.

"Swain prepares for war; he founds the brazen helmet; his followers lift high the deadly spear.

"The son of Godwin appears on the bridge; his banner waves in the wind; like a storm he scattered the troops of Swain.

"Edmund shot the arrows of death.

"Maddened by defeat, Swain plunged into his band: the sword of Edmund sounded on his helmet; their silver shields were heard upon the stream: the sword of Edmund sunk to the heart of the son of Egwin; he bit the bloody sand at his feet.

"Harald the Black stood on the bridge; he swelled the river with gore: he divides the head of Edmund, as the lightning tears the top of the strong rock: armies melted before him; none can withstand his rage. The son of Godwin views him from the hill of death; he seized the flaming banner, and founds the silver shield.

"Girth, Leofric, and Morcar, pillars of the war, fly to his shadow: with a troop of knights, fierce as evening wolves, they beset Harald the Black; like a tempest they rage, like a rock he repels their assault: hills of the slain arise before him; the course of the stream is turned aside.

"Warriors," said the son of Godwin, "though we rage like a tempest, like a rock he repels our assault. Morcar, let one of thy knights descend beneath the bridge, and pierce him through the back with a spear.

"Selwin, swift as a falling meteor, shot beneath the wave; the sharp spear pierces through the back of Harald the Black; he falls like a mountain in an earthquake; his eyes shot fire, and his teeth gnashed with rage: he dies.

"The hopes of Norway are no more; Harald the Swift led his troops to the bridge; they started at the sight of the mighty body, they wept, they fled.

"Thee, Godred, only thee! of all the thousands of the war, prepared thy sword for battle; they dragged thee from the field.

"Great was the sorrow of the sons of Norway."

Tatwallin ended his song, the chiefs arose from the green plain; they assemble their troops on the banks of Lexy.

Ceurmond, with the green spear, martialled his band: he deduced his lineage from Woden, and displayed the shield of Penda. Strong as the tower of Pendragon on the hill, furious as the souls of the unburied warriors; his company were all chiefs. Upon the high hills he encountered Moryon; like dashing waves, they rushed to the war; their swords rained blood to the valley beneath. Moryon, wild as the winter's wind, raged in the fight; the pointed javelin quivered in his breast; he rolled down the high hill. Son of Woden, great was thy might; by thy hand the two sons of Osmor fell to the valley.

How are thy warriors stretched upon the bank of the Lexy, like willows!

Ealward, of the brown rock, who dyes his anlace in the blood of the wolves of the hill, whose spear, like a star, blasts the souls of the foe; see, he sleeps with the chiefs upon the skin of the wolf; the battle is raging in his fancy; he grasps the bloody spear; his enemies fly before him; joy and rage dance on his brow: thus sleeping, he is as the sun slightly covered with a cloud.

Dugnall, who inhabits the isles, whose barks are swifter than the wind, stands on the bank of the stream; his eyes are bent on the spangling wave; his hands press the silver-headed spear; he is a lion in the war, in the council wise as the ancient priests.

Wilver stands on the right hand of Godred; he is a rock, unmoved by the tempest of war.

Lagman is a young oak; he flourishes in the heat of the glory of his fire: the warriors are like the stars of the winter night.

The noise of a multitude is heard from the hills: Godred sets his troops in order for war; they are seen on the brow of the hill. Many are the foes of Godred; great is the courage of his warriors.

Raignald of the isles attends the chiefs of his foes; his arm is strong as the flourishing oak, of wisdom deep as the black lake; his flow over the waves; he defied to battle the prince of the mountains

Bladdyn fell by his hand; he burnt the palace of the wood; the horn, embossed with gold, graced his spoils; he returned to his castle, over a sea of blood.

Dunhelm bears the banner of the foe; he is the dragon of the mossy plain; he kept the water of the seven springs. Wynfylt and his warriors fought to bear away the water in the horn of hospitality. Dunhelm arose from his strong fort; his anlace glittered over his head.

Children of the hills (said the son of Olave), restore the water to the gently-running stream.

The son of Meurig answered not: the anlace of Dunhelm divided his head; his blows fell like the stones of hail, when the loud winds shake the top of the lofty tree; the warriors fled like the clouds of night, at the approach of the sun.

Elgar, from the borders of Northumberland, was among the enemies of Godred Crovan, son of Harald the Black: he led his troop down the hill, and began the fight with Ospray: like the raging of the lake of blood, when the loud winds whistle over the sharp cliffs of the rock, was the noise of the battle.

Summerled rose in the fight like the rays of the morning; blood beamed about him; his helmet fell from his head; his eyes were like the lights upon the billows.

Occha, who fought for Godred, opposed the passage of his rage; his shield was like the rising sun, his spear the tower of Mabyn; the spear of Summerled founded on the shield of Occha; he heard the shrill cry of joy, as the broken weapon fell to the ground: his sword fell upon the shoulder of Summerled; he gnashed his teeth, and died.

Ospray, like a lion, ravages the band of Elgar. Occha follows behind him, dying his long white robe in blood.

Elgar flies to the son of Vorti; his spear sounds upon his helmet; the sword of Occha divides the shield of Elgar: the Northumbrian warrior retires to his band. Dunhelm drives his long spear through the heart of Occha; he falls to the ground. Wilver sets his foot upon his breathless corpse, and buries him beneath the bodies of the foe.

Raignald, with his band, flies to the relief of Dunhelm: the troops of Wilver and Ospray slowly retire. Dunhelm falls by the javelin of an unknown warrior; so falls the eagle by the arrow of the child.

Raignald rages like the fires of the mountain; the troops of Dugnal and Geormond melt before him.

Dugnal lifts high his broad shield against the breast of Raignald; his sword hangs over his head: the troops of Raignald retire with their chief. Ealward, and the son of Harald the Black, fly to the war: the foe retire before them. Raignald encourages his men: like an eagle he rages in the fight.

The troops of Godred halt: the bands of Dugnal and Geormond forsake their leaders.

Godred retires to the bank of the Lexy; the foe followed behind, but were driven back with shadow on the bank of the Lexy the warriors god of batt like broken oaks.

Godred sounds the silver shield; the chiefs assemble round his tent.

Let us again to the war, O chiefs! and drive the foe over the mountains.

They prepare for war; Dugnal leads the wolves of the file; with a loud voice they began the fight. Ealward falls by the sword of Raignald. Cullifin scatters the javelins of fate. Fingal rages in the fight, but fell by the sword of Elgar.

Cochlin heard the dying groans of his friend; his sword pierced the heart of Elgar; he fell upon the body of Fingal.

Morvor and Essyr raged like sons of blood; thousands fell around them. Godwin scattered slaughter through the host of the foe. Tatwallin sweeps down the chief of the battle; like the noise of torrents rolling down the high mountains, is the noise of the fight; the feet of the warriors are wet with blood; the sword of Cochlin is broken; his spear pierces through the foe like lightning through the oak: the chiefs of Godred fill the field with the bodies of the dead: the night approaches, and victory is undecided: the black clouds bend to the earth; Raignald and Godred both retire.

The chiefs of Godred assembled at the tent of council: Tatwallin arose and sung:

"When the flowers arose in the verdant meadows, when the birds of spring were heard in the grove of Thor, the son of Victa prepared his knights for war; strong as the mossy tomb of Uric, were the warriors he had chose for his band; they issued out to the war. Wecca shook the crooked anlace at their head.

"Halt," said the son of Victa; "let the troops stand still: still as the silent wood, when the winds are laid asleep, the Saxons stood on the spreading plain,

"Sons of blood!" said the immortal Wecca, "the foe against whom we must fight, are stronger than the whole power of our king; let the son of Henna, with three hundred warriors, be hid in the dark-brown wood; when the enemy faint in the battle, let them spread themselves like the bursting cloud, and rain a shower of blood; the foe will be weakened, astonished, and fly.

"The warriors held their broad shields over the head of the son of Victa; they gave him the chaplet of victory, and sang the song of joy.

"Hennack, with the flower of the war, retired to the dark-brown wood: the sun arose arrayed in garments of blood; Wecca led his men to the battle: like bears they raged in the fight; yet the enemy fled not, neither were they moved: the fight continued till noon; the troops of the son of Victa fought like the dragons of the mountain; the foe fainted; they were weakened, yet they fled not.

"The son of Henna drew forth his band to the plain; like a tempest they fell upon the foe; they were astonished; they fled.

"Godred Crovan, son of Harald the Black, the lion of Iceland, and all the warriors who fight in his cause, let us pursue the same method; let the mountain of Seafull conceal Dugnal, and three hundred chosen warriors, from the eyes of Raignald; when he is spent in the fight, let them issue to the war."

Godred arose from his throne, he led Tatwallin to a seat at his right-hand.

Dugnal prepares his troop; sing, O Tatwallin, the actions of Hengist and Horfa.

Tatwallin arose from his seat:

"When the black clouds stooped below the tops of the high hills, when the wolf came forth from the wood, when the branches of the pine perished, when the yews only smiled upon the ruffet-heath, the sons of Woden led the furious warriors to the bank of the swift stream; there sat the horse of the hill, whose crooked sword shone like the star of the evening.

"Peada was the banner of the hills: when he waved his golden torse upon the bodies of the slain, the hearts of his companions beamed with victory: he joined the numerous bands of the sons of Woden; like a swelling stream they enter the borders of the land of Cuccurtha.

"Locca of the brown valley sounds the shield; the king of Urrin hears the sound, he starts from his seat: assemble the lions of war, for the enemy are upon the borders.

"Sons of Morven, upon whose shields are seen the hawk and the serpent, swift as the wind fly to the warriors of Abou's stream: sons of war, prepare the spreading shield, the sword of fire, the spear, the azure banner made sacred by the God.

"Cuccurtha issues to the war, as an enemy's wolf to the field.

"Selward, whose face is a summer cloud, gleaming with the recent lightning of the storms, shakes the broad anlace.

"Eadgar and Emmieldred, sons of the mighty Rowan, who discomfitted Olmiron with his steeds of fire, when the god of war, the blood stained Woden, pitched his tent on the bank of the wide lake, are seen in the troop.

"Creadda, whose feet are like those of the horse, lifts high the silver shield.

"On the plain, near the palace of Frica, he encountered with Egward; their swords rained blood, shields echoed to the valley of slaughter.

"These were the warriors of Cuccurtha, the lions of the war.

"Hengist and Horfa met them on the sandy plain; the shafts of death clouded the sun, swift as the ships of Horfa, strong as the arm of Suchullin: Peada ravaged the band of Cuccurtha like a mountain. Eadgar sustained the blow of Hengist; great was the fury of Emmieldred, his spear divided the broad shield, his anlace sunk into the heart: the sword of Anyoni pierced the breast of Cuccurtha, he fell like an oak to the plain.

"Creadda rages in the battle, he is a wild boar of the wood: the anlace of Horfa sounds on his round helm, he gnashes his teeth, he churns the smoking gore, he dies. Locca reclines on his long spear, he is wearied with dealing death among his foes: the anlace of Hengist alights on his back, he falls to the ground.

"The men of Urrin fled to the forest: the lions of war, Hengist and Horfa, throw the spears of flight; they burn up the souls of the flying foe;

Vol. XI.

the great image is red with blood; the flame lights the stars; the moon comes forth to grace the feast; the chaplet of victory hangs on the brow of the warriors."

Tatwallin ended his song,

The morning crept from the mountains, Dugnal with his troops retired to the forest on the mountain of Scoafull.

Godred Crovan, son of Harald the Black, the lion of Iceland, prepares for battle. Raingald came down to the plain: long was the fight and bloody.

Godred Crovan beat his anlace on the shield; the warriors upon the mountain heard the sound of the silver shield; swift as the hunted stag they fly to the war, they hear the noise of the battle; the shout of the onset swells in the wind, the loud din of the war increases, as the thunder rolling from afar; they fly down the mountains, where the fragments of the sharp rock are scattered around; they ascend like the vapours, folding up the high hill, upon the borders of Ofloch; their helmets sweep the dawn of the morning; the saffron light shines on the broad shield; through the dark dells they cut a passage, through the dells where the beams of the sun are never seen.

On the rushy moor of Rossin they astonish the foe, and join in the war.

There fought Godred Crovan, death sat on his sword, the yelling breath of the dying foe shook his banner; his shield, the stream of Lexy, which surrounds the dark-brown wood, and shines at the noon of day; his anlace dropped blood, and tore through the helmets of the foe like the red lightning of the storm.

Dugnal, chief of the mountain warriors, who drove Rygvallon from his chariot of war, lifted his shield and spear through the heart of Morval; the weapon perforated, he yelled like a wolf of the mountain, he died.

Woolmund, of the white rock, arose in the fight; like the fires of the earth he burnt up the ranks of the foe; his spear a blasted oak, his shield the sea when the winds are still, he appeared a hill, on whose top the winter snow is seen, and the summer sun melts it up: victory sat on his helmet, death on his anlace.

Wilver, who supports the tottering rocks, who flies like the bird of summer over the plain, shakes the crooked sword as he rages upon the hills of the slain, and is red with living gore: the spears of the foe are gathered about him, the sharp javelins found on his shield; he looks around the field, the savage Edwin flies to his aid; like two wolves they rage in the war, their shields are red with blood.

The bear of the north throws his lance: the fur-clad Godard Syrric displays his starry shield, the chiefs fall at his feet, he rises on the breast of Rynon, storms of blood surround his sword, blood flows around him.

When the storm rages in the sky, the torrents roll to the plain, the trees of the wood are borne away, the cattle falls to the ground, such was the fury of the fight on the moor of Rossin: the chiefs fell, our foes halt, they fly swift as the clouds of winter. Ospray throws the spear of Chafó; swift as their fear he flies to the pursuit; the soul of Godred melted, he rolled the blue banner, wrought with gold, round the crimson stream: his warriors dance around him, they sing the song of Harald the Black; they hail him king; the golden sandal is thrown over his helmet. May the gods grant this war for empire be his last.

B b

THE HIRLAS,

Translated from the ancient British of Owen Cyfeliog, Prince of Powys.

ERE the sun was seen on the brow of the mountain, the clanging shields were heard in the valley: our enemies were appalled at the sound. The red armour of our warriors glittered till the noon of day. The foe fled from the borders; they fell in the chase like stones of hail; they panted like hunted wolves.

Let the hirlas of Rhys overflow like the waters of the great river.

Where the golden banners declare the valour of Rhys, had the horn of hospitality long been used: it relieved the warriors, who fainted in the chase, and the traveller whose habitation is beyond the white mountains.

Bring here, O cupbearer, the carved hirlas of mirth, which glows with livid gold: let the sparkling mead flow around it.

Gwgwyn, prince of my table, son of mighty men, thine are the first honours of the Hirlas; small is the gift of gratitude; great were thy services. When thy ancestors stood in the fight, victory stood with them; loud were their voices in the battle, as the hydra of their charge.

Fill the golden hirlas of mirth; attend to the merits of the warriors; lest they revenge on thee the disgrace of their honour.

See Gryffydd, with his uplifted crimson spear, expects it; he is the bulwark of the borders: sprung from Cynfyll and the dragons of the hill; his name shall ever live in the songs of the bards. As refreshed with the drink of mirth, his attendants fought, furious as the battle of the champions of the valley. Whilst the tomb of Pendragon shall stand on the hill, his fame shall remain in the song.

Fill up the hirlas to Eadnyfed, who sits like a god upon his broken armour: like a tempest he fell upon the shields of his foes: near Gyrthyn he slew an host.

The distant nations heard the noise of the battle of Maelor; the sound of the shields was heard in the mountains. Dreadful was the conflict as that of Bangor, when the warriors were trod to the ground. The princes fled: Morach beat the earth with his feet: Morvran fled over the mountain.

Fill up the golden hirlas. Let the mead be borne to Sylliw, defender of our coast; to the lion of war, the son of Madoc; fierce as a welf in the fight; soft as the mossy bed in peace.

To the sons of Esfyner, bear it next: strong as two rocks they raged in the fight; the bravest champion falls before them; like storms they pierce the targets of the foe, sweeping down the multitude as the loud billows sweep the sand.

Fill up the badge of honour. To Tudor bear the golden hirlas. Now to Moreiddeg, who, with his brother, assisted our cause: valour set upon their brows; like wolves they fought for blood. These are my chiefs.

Let the golden hirlas go round to the feat of Morgan, whose name shall be heard in the songs of our children: the sight of his useless sword blasted my soul.

Fill up the badge of honour, the golden hirlas. To Gronwys bear it; astonished I saw him stand like a rock on the spreading plain of Givestun; he sustained the assault of an army. Upon the sandy bank of the sea his attendants did wonders. The chief of the foe was burnt in the fire of his rage, and the gleanings of the sword were lost in the stream.

In the heat of the battle, the son of Gryffydd burst his chains; Menrig again raged in the war. When the sun sat on the hill, we sung the song of victory.

Fill the hirlas of mirth to all the chiefs of Oweyn, who are the wolves of the mountain. Madoc and Meyler are in soul one; they are our castles. The warriors of the hill stood round their chief, strong as the spear of Uther, swift in pursuit as the vapours of the night.

Fill the hirlas with mead. Let us drink to the honour of the warriors, who fell in the war.

Bear it to Daniel,auteous as the verdure of the forest, savage as the prowling wolf.

O cupbearer! great is thy service, in displaying the merits of the warrior; if thou hast not heard his fame, his spear flies to thy breast, and his followers drink thy blood.

Whilst the lamps of joy are burning, let the hirlas go round to the warriors who fought at Llydcomb; they fought with the rage of lions; the mead is their due: they defended Cwrys.

Let the hirlas go round. May the Ruler of all send us liberty and life.

Bristol, Jan. 3. 1770.

D. B.

GORTHMUND,

TRANSLATED FROM THE SAXON.

THE loud winds whistled through the sacred grove of Thor; far over the plains of Denania, were the cries of the spirits heard. The howl of Hubba's horrid voice swelled upon every blast, and the shrill shriek of the fair Locabara, shot through the midnight-ky.

Gorthmund slept on his couch of purple; the blood of the slain was still on his cruel hand: his helmet was stained with purple, and the banner of his father was no more white. His soul shuddered at the howl of Hubba, and the shrill shriek of Locabara: he shook like the trembling reed, when the loud tempest rolls the foaming flood over the pointed rocks: pale was his face as the eglantine, which climbs the branches of the flowery bram-ble. He started from his couch: his black locks stood upright on his head, like the spears which stand round the tent of the warriors, when the silver moon sparkles on the tranquil lake.

Why wilt thou torment me, Hubba; it was not by my hand that the sword drank thy blood. Who saw me plunge the dagger to the heart of Locabara? No! Nardin of the forest was far away. Cease, cease, thy shrieks; I cannot bear them. On thy own sword thou hast thy death; and the fair virgin of the hills fell beneath the rage of the mountains. Leave me, leave me: witness Hel*; I knew not Locabara, I forced her not to my embraces; no, I slew her not; she fell by the mountaineers. Leave me, leave me, O soul of Hubba!

Exmundbert, who bore the † silver shield of Gorthmund, flew from his downy couch, swift as the rumour of a coming host. He struck the golden cup, and the king of the flying warriors awakened from his dream of terror. Exmundbert, is he gone? Strike the silver shield, call up the sons of battle, who sleep on the mossy banks of Frome. But stay, 'tis all a vision; 'tis over and gone as the image of Woden, in the evening of a summer-day. Hence to thy tent, I will sleep again.

Gorthmund doubled his purple robe, and slept again.

Loud as the noise of a broken rock breaking down the caverns of Seggefwaldseyre ‡, was the voice of Hubba heard; sharp as the cry of the bird of death at the window of the wounded warrior, when the red rays of the morning rise breaking from the east, and the soul of the sick is flying away with the darknefs, was the shriek of Locabara. Rise from thy couch, Gorthmund, thou wolf of the evening. When the sun shines in the glory of the day; when the labouring swain dances in the woodland-shade; when the sparkling stars glimmer in the azure of the night, and contentment sleeps under the rustic roof, thou shalt have

* Hela, or Hel, was the idôl of the Danes, not, as some authors falsely assert, of the Saxons. He was the god of battle and victory. It is worthy remark, that every pagan deity of the northern nations, had its symbol or type, under which he was worshipped: The type of Hel was a black raven: hence the Danish standard was a raven. The symbol of Woden was a dragon, which was the standard of the Saxons in general, and the arms of Wessex.

† The office of shield bearer was very ancient and honourable: the leaders of armies had generally three shield-bearers; one to bear the shield, painted or engraved with the symbol of the god, and the others were employed to sound the shields of alarm.

‡ Seggefwaldseyre, from Seggefwald, where Ethelbald, the ninth king of the Mercians, and fifteenth monarch of England, was slain in an insurrection of his subjects. This poem is certainly older than Alfred's time, and is, among numerous others, a proof that the division of England into shires, was not introduced by that glorious monarch.

no rest. Thine are the bitter herbs of affliction; for these shall the wormwood shed its seed on the blossoms of the blooming flower, and imbitter with its falling leaves the waters of the brook. Rise, Gorthmund, rise, the Saxons are burning thy tents; rise, for the Mercians are assembled together, and thy armies will be slain with the sword, or burnt in the image of *Tewisk. The god of victory shall be red with thy blood, and they shall shout at the sacrifice. Rise, Gorthmund, thy eyes shall be closed in peace no more.

The king of the swift warriors started from his couch; he shook like an oak through which the lightnings have cut their rapid way; his eyes rolled like the lights on the Saxons banks, in the tempest of the dark and black night.

Exmundbert flew to his chief; he struck the silver shield. Sueno of the dark lake, and the black-haired Lecolwin, caught the lance and the shield, and prest into the royal tent.

Warriors, strike the shields of alarm; the Mercians are assembled together; the Saxons are burning our tents: give the cry of war, and issue to the battle; come upon them by the side of the thick wood, near the city of † Reggacester. Lift the banner Reafan; and he is a worshipper of false gods, who withholds his sword from blood. The silver shield resounded to the wood of Sel, and the ‡ great island trembled at the clamorous noise.

Deiward of the strong arm, and Ax-bred of the forest of wolves, led the warriors to the thick wood: but quiet was the forest as the tranquil lake, when the winds sleep on the tops of the lofty trees. The inhabitants of Reggacester slept in the strength of their walls. The leaders returned.

There is no enemy near, O king! still as the habitation of the dead, are the kingdoms around us: they have felt the strength of thy arm, and will no more rise up to oppose us. As the grass falls by the hand of the mower, so shall they fall before us, and be no more: The banner Reafan shall be exalted, and the seven gods of the Saxons be trampled in the dust. Let the armies of the north rejoice, let them sacrifice to the gods of war, and bring out the prisoners for the § feast of blood. The warriors threw down the lance, and the shield, and the ax of battle; the plates of brass dropped from their shoulders, and they danced to the sound of the § instrument of sacrifice: Confu-

* The Pagan Saxons had a most inhuman custom of burning their captives alive in a wicker image of their god Tewisk. Whilst this horrid sacrifice was performing, they shouted and danced round the flames.

† Rowcester, in Derbyshire, a place of great antiquity.

‡ In the original Muchilney. As there were several islands of this name, the particular one here mentioned is Aubions.

§ The Danes, not to be behind hand with the Saxons in acts of barbarity, had also their bloody sacrifices. Their captives were bound to a stake, and shot to death with arrows.

¶ The word in the original is Regabibol, an instrument of music, of which, as I know nothing farther, than that it was used in sacrifices, I have

ed as the cry of the fleet dogs, when the white bear is pursued over the mountains of the north; confused as the resolutions of terror was the noise of the warriors. They danced till the mantle of midnight ascended from the earth.

The morning shook the dew from her crown of roses, on the yellow locks of the dancers; and the gleams of light shot through the dark gray sky, like the reeking blood over the shield of steel. See, warriors, a dark cloud sits on the mountain's brow, it will be a tempest at noon, and the heavy rains will fall upon us. Yes, ye * Danes, it will be a tempest, but a tempest of war; it will rain, but in showers of blood. For the dark cloud is the army of † Segowald: he leads the flower of the warriors of Mercia, and on his right hand is the mighty son of battle, the great Sigebert, who leads the warriors of Wessax.

The dance was ended; and the captives of sacrifice bound to the sacred tree: they panted in the pangs of death.

Sudden from the borders of the wood, was the alarm given; and the silver shield roused the sun from behind the black clouds. The archers of the sacrifice dropped the bow, and caught the lance and the shield. Confusion spread from watch-tower to watch-tower, and the clamour rung to the distant hills.

Gorthmund raged like a wild boar, but he raged in vain; his whole army was disordered, and the cry of war was mixed with the yell of retreat.

Segowald came near with his Mercians on the right hand: and the great Sigebert led the Saxons round the thick wood.

The Danes rage like the tempest of winter, but the Mercians stand firm as the grove of oaks on the plains of ‡ Ambroisburgh: great is the strength of the swift warriors of the north, but their troops are broken, and out of the order of battle.

The Saxons, with the great Sigebert, have encircled the wood; they rage in the fight like wolves. The Danes are pressed on all sides; they fly like the leaves in Autumn before the strong wind.

Gorthmund scorns to fly; he is descended from the son of battle, L'Achollan, whose sword put to flight the armies of Moeric, when the sun was covered with a mantle of blood, and darkness descended upon the earth at noon-day. He bears upon his arm the shield of Lofgar, the keeper of the castle of Teigne. Lofgar never fled, though the translated as above. Ribble, among the Anglo-Saxons, was an instrument not unlike a violin, but played on with the fingers.

 In the original Taimen, which signifies either Danes or northern men.*

† A Mercian of this name commanded the army of Offa; and a nobleman named Sigebert, was of great account in the court of Brightrick, king of Essex.

‡ Ambresbury, in Wiltshire, where Alfritha, wife to King Edgar, built a nunnery to atone for the murder of her son-in-law, Edward. In this place Eleanor, queen to Henry the Third, lived a nun.

lances of the foe flew about him numerous as the winged ants in summer. Lofgar never fled, though the warriors of the mountains hurled the rocks upon him in the valley, when he fought for the shield of Penda: and should Gorthmund fly, Gorthmund, whose sword was his law, who held justice in his banner?

Segowald fought Gorthmund; he found him singly encountering an army.

Turn to me, son of Lofgar; I am Segowald of the lake, hast thou not heard of my fame in battle? When the army of Hengist panted on the dark-brown heath, I cheered them to the war; and the banner of victory waved over my head. Turn thy arms upon me, Gorthmund, I am worthy thy strength.

The son of Lofgar rushed to the son of Alderwald; they fought like the children of destruction on the plain of Marocan. Gorthmund fell. He fell, like the mountain boar beneath the arrow of the hunter.

As the shades of death danced before his eyes, he heard the yell of Hubba, and the shrill shriek of Locabara: Thou art fallen, thou son of injustice, thou art fallen; thy shield is degraded in the dust: and thy banner will be honoured no more! Thy swift warriors are fled over the plain, as the driving sheep before the wolf. Think, Gorthmund, think on Hubba, the son of Crinewalch of the green hill. Think on Locabara, whom thy sword sent to the regions of death. Remember thy injustice, and die!

NARVA AND MORED.

AN AFRICAN ECLOGUE.

RECITE the loves of Narva and Mored, The priest of Chalma's triple idol said. High from the ground the youthful warriors sprung, Loud on the concave shell the lances rung: In all the mystic mazes of the dance, The youths of Banny's burning sands advance, Whilst the soft virgin, panting, looks behind, And rides upon the pinions of the wind; Ascends the mountains brow, and measures round The steepy cliffs of Chalma's sacred ground. Chalma, the god whose noisy thunders fly Through the dark covering of the midnight sky. Whose arm directs the close-embattled host, And sinks the labouring vessels on the coast. Chalma, whose excellence is known from far; From Lupa's rocky hill to Calabar.

The guardian god of Afric and the isles, Where nature in her strongest vigour smiles; Where the blue blossom of the forky thorn, Bends with the nectar of the op'ning morn; Where ginger's aromatic, matted root, Creep through the mead, and up the mountains shoot.

Three times the virgin, swimming on the breeze,

Danc'd in the shadow of the mystic trees: When, like a dark cloud spreading to the view, The first-born sons of war and blood pursue; Swift as the alk they pour along the plain; Swift as the flying clouds distilling rain.

Swift as the boundings of the youthful roe,
 They course around, and lengthen as they go.
 Like the long chain of rocks, whose summits rise
 Far in the sacred regions of the skies;
 Upon whose top the black'ning tempest lours,
 Whilst down its side the gushing torrent pours;
 Like the long clifty mountains which extend
 From Lorbar's cave, to where the nations end;
 Which sink in darkness, thick'ning and obscure,
 Impenetrable, mystic, and impure;
 The flying terrors of the war advance,
 And, round the sacred oak, repeat the dance.
 Furious they twit around the gloomy trees,
 Like leaves in autumn, twirling with the breeze.
 So when the splendour of the dying day,
 Darts the red lustre of the wat'ry way;
 Sudden beneath Toddida's whistling brink,
 The circling billows in wild eddies sink,
 Whirl furious round, and the loud bursting wave
 Sinks down to Chalma's sacerdotal cave,
 Explores the palaces on Zira's coast,
 Where howls the war-song of the chieftan's ghost;
 Where the artificer in realms below,
 Gilds the rich lance, or beautifies the bow;
 From the young palm-tree spins the useful twine,
 Or makes the teeth of elephants divine.
 Where the pale children of the feeble sun,
 In search of gold, through every climate run:
 From burning heat to freezing torments go,
 And live in all vicissitudes of woe,
 Like the loud eddies of Toddida's sea,
 The warriors circle the mysterious tree;
 Till spent with exercise, they spread around
 Upon the op'ning blossoms of the ground.
 The priestess rising, sings the sacred tale,
 And the loud chorus echoes through the dale.

Priestess.

Far from the burning sands of Calabar;
 Far from the lustre of the morning star;
 Far from the pleasure of the holy morn;
 Far from the blessedness of Chalma's horn;
 Now rest the souls of Narva and Mored,
 Laid in the dust, and number'd with the dead.
 Dear are their memories to us, and long,
 Long shall their attributes be known in song.
 Their lives were transient as the meadow flow'r
 Ripen'd in ages, wither'd in an hour.
 Chalma, reward them in his gloomy cave,
 And open all the prisons of the grave.
 Bred to the service of the godhead's throne,
 And living but to serve his God alone,
 Narva was beauteous as the op'ning day,
 When on the spangling waves the sun-beams play,
 When the Mackaw ascending to the sky,
 Views the bright splendour with a steady eye.
 Tall, as the house of Chalma's dark retreat,
 Compact and firm, as Rhadal Ynca's fleet,
 Completely beauteous as a summers fun,
 Was Narva, by his excellence udione.
 Where the soft Togla creeps along the meads,
 Through scented Calamus and fragrant reeds;
 Where the sweet Zinfa spreads its matted bed,
 Liv'd the still sweeter flow'r, the young Mored;
 Black was her face, as Tolga's hidden cell;
 Soft as the moss where hissing adders dwell.
 As to the sacred court she brought a fawn,
 The sportive tenant of the spicy lawn,

She saw and lov'd! And Narva too forgot
 His sacred vestment and his mystic lot.
 Long had the mutual sigh, the mutual tear,
 Burst from the breast, and scorn'd confinement
 there,

Existence was a torment! O my breast!
 Can I find accents to unfold the rest!
 Lock'd in each others arms, from Hyga's cave,
 They plung'd relentless to a wat'ry grave;
 And, falling, murmur'd to the pow'rs above—
 "Gods, take our lives, unless we live to love!"

Shoreditch, May 2. 1770.

C.

THE DEATH OF NICOU.

AN AFRICAN ECLOGUE.

ON Tiber's banks, Tiber, whose waters glide
 In slow meanders down to Gaigra's side;
 And, circling all the horrid mountain round,
 Rushes impetuous to the deep profound;
 Rolls o'er the ragged rocks with hideous yell,
 Collects its waves beneath the earth's vast shell:
 There for a while in loud confusion hurl'd,
 It crumbles mountains down, and shakes the world.
 Till borne upon the pinions of the air,
 Through the rent earth the bursting waves appear;
 Fiercely propell'd, the whiten'd billows rise,
 Break from the cavern, and ascend the skies;
 Then lost and conquer'd by superior force,
 Through hot Arabia holds its rapid course.
 On Tiber's banks where scarlet jast'mines bloom,
 And purple aloes shed a rich perfume;
 Where, when the sun is melting in his heat,
 The reeking tygers find a cool retreat;
 Balk in the sedges, lose the sultry beam,
 And wanton with their shadows in the stream,
 On Tiber's banks, by sacred priests rever'd,
 Where in the days of old a god appear'd;
 'Twas in the dead of night, at Chalma's feast,
 The tribe of Alra slept around the priest.
 He spoke; as evening thunders bursting near,
 His horrid accents broke upon the ear;
 Attend, Alraddas, with your sacred priest!
 This day the sun is rising in the east;
 The sun, which shall illumine all the earth,
 Now, now is rising, in a mortal birth.
 He vanish'd like a vapour of the night,
 And sunk away in a faint blaze of light.
 Swift from the branches of the holy oak,
 Horror, confusion, fear, and torment broke;
 And still when midnight trims her mazy lamp,
 They take their way through Tiber's wat'ry swamp.

On Tiber's banks, close rank'd, a warring train,
 Stretch'd to the distant edge of Galca's plain:
 So when arriv'd at Gaigra's highest steep,
 We view the wide expansion of the deep;
 See in the gilding of her wat'ry robe,
 The quick declension of the circling globe;
 From the blue sea a chain of mountains rise,
 Blended at once with water and with skies:
 Beyond our sight in vast extension curl'd,
 The check of waves, the guardians of the world.
 Strong were the warriors, as the ghost of Cawn,
 Who threw the Hill-of-archers to the lawn:
 When the soft earth at his appearance fled,
 And rising billows play'd around his head;

B b ij

When a strong tempest rising from the main,
 Dash'd the full clouds, unbroken on the plain.
 Nicou, immortal in the sacred song,
 Held the red sword of war, and led the strong;
 From his own tribe the fable warriors came,
 Well try'd in battle, and well known in fame.
 Nicou, descended from the god of war,
 Who liv'd coeval with the morning star;
 Narada was his name; who cannot tell,
 How all the world through great Narada fell
 Vichon, the god who rul'd above the skies,
 Look'd on Narada but with envious eyes.
 The warrior dar'd him, ridicul'd his might,
 Bent his white bow, and summon'd him to fight.
 Vichon, disdainful, bade his lightnings fly,
 And scatter'd burning arrows in the sky;
 Threw down a star the armour of his feet,
 To burn the air with supernat'ral heat;
 Bid a loud tempest roar beneath the ground;
 Lusted the sea, and all the earth was drown'd.
 Narada still escap'd; a sacred tree
 Lusted him up, and bore him through the sea.
 The waters still ascending fierce and high,
 He tower'd into the chambers of the sky:
 There Vichon sat; his armour on his bed,
 He thought Narada with the mighty dead.
 Before his seat the heavenly warrior stands,
 The lightning quiv'ring in his yellow hands.
 The god, astonish'd, dropt; hurl'd from the shore,
 He dropp'd to torments, and to rise no more.
 Headlong he falls; 'tis his own arms compel,
 Condemn'd in ever-burning fires to dwell.
 From this Narada, mighty Nicou sprung;
 The mighty Nicou, furious, wild, and young.
 Who led th' embattled archers to the field,
 And bore a thunderbolt upon his shield:
 That shield his glorious father died to gain,
 When the white warriors fled along the plain:
 When the full sails could not provoke the flood,
 Till Nicou came, and swell'd the seas with blood.
 Slow at the end of his robust array,
 The mighty warrior pensive took his way:
 Against the son of Nair, the young Roreft,
 Once the companion of his youthful breast.
 Strong were the passions of the son of Nair,
 Strong, as the tempest of the evening air.
 Insatiate in defence; fierce as the boar;
 Firm in resolve as Cannic's rocky shore.
 Long had the gods endeavour'd to destroy,
 All Nicou's friendship, happiness, and joy:
 They fought in vain, till Vicat, Vichon's son,
 Never in feats of wickedness outdone,
 Saw Nica, sister to the mountain king,
 Drest beautiful, with all the flowers of spring:
 He saw and scatter'd poison in her eyes;
 From limb to limb, in varied forms he flies;
 Dwelt on her crimson lip, and added grace
 To every glossy feature of her face.
 Roreft was fir'd with passion at the sight,
 Friendship and honour sunk to Vicat's right:
 He saw, he lov'd, and burning with desire,
 Bore the soft maid from brother, sister, fire.
 Pining with sorrow, Nica faded, died,
 Like a fair aloe in its morning pride.
 This brought the warrior to the bloody mead,
 And sent to young Roreft the threat'ning reed.
 He drew his army forth: Oh! need I tell!
 That Nicou conquer'd, and the lover fell:

His breathless army mantled all the plain;
 And death sat smiling on the heaps of slain.
 The battle ended, with his recking dart,
 The pensive Nicou pierc'd his beating heart:
 And to his mourning valiant warriors cry'd,
 I, and my sister's ghost are satisfy'd.

Brooke-Street, June 12.

ELEGY,

To the Memory of Mr. Thomas Phillips of Fairford.

No more I hail the morning's golden gleam;
 No more the wonders of the view I sing;
 Friendship requires a melancholy theme;
 At her command the awful lyre I string.

Now as I wander through this leafless grove,
 Where the dark vapours of the ev'ning rise,
 How shall I teach the chorded shell to move;
 Or stay the gushing torrents from my eyes?

Phillips, great master of the boundless lyre,
 Thee would the grateful muse attempt to paint;
 Give me a double portion of thy fire,
 Or all the pow'rs of language are too faint.

Say what bold number, what immortal line
 The image of thy genius can reflect?
 O, lend my pen what animated thine,
 To show thee in thy native glories deckt.

The joyous charms of Spring delighted saw,
 Their beauties doubly glaring in thy lay:
 Nothing was Spring, which Phillips did not draw,
 And ev'ry image of his muse was May.

So rose the regal hyacinthal star;
 So shone the pleasant rustic daised bed;
 So seem'd the woodlands less'ning from afar;
 You saw the real prospect as you read.

Majestic Summer's blooming flow'ry pride
 Next claim'd the honour of his nervous song;
 He taught the stream in hollow trills to glide,
 And lead the glories of the year along.

When golden Autumn, wreath'd in ripen'd corn,
 From purple clusters press'd the foamy wine,
 Thy genius did his fallow brows adorn,
 And made the beauties of the season thine.

Pale rugged Winter bending o'er his tread,
 His grizzled hair bedropt with icy dew;
 His eyes, a dusky light, congeal'd and dead;
 His robe, a tinge of bright ethereal blue:

His train, a motley'd, sanguine, fable cloud,
 He limps along the russet dreary moor;
 Whilst rising whirlwinds, blasting, keen, and loud,
 Roll the white furies to the sounding shore.

Nor were his pleasures unimprov'd by thee;
 Pleasures he has, though horridly deform'd:
 The silver'd hill, the polish'd lake, we see,
 Is by thy genius fix'd, preserv'd, and warm'd.

The rough November has his pleasures too;
 But I'm insensible to every joy:
 Farewell the laurel, now I grasp the yew,
 And all my little powers in grief employ.

In thee each virtue found a pleasing cell,
 Thy mind was honour, and thy soul divine:

With thee did ev'ry power of genius dwell:
Thou wert the Helicon of all the nine.

Fancy whose various figure-tinctur'd vest,
Was ever changing to a different hue:
Her head, with varied bays and flow'rets drest,
Her eyes, two spangles of the morning dew.

In dancing attitude she swept thy string,
And now she soars and now again descends,
And now reclining on the zephyr's wing,
Unto the velvet-vested mead she bends.

Peace, deck'd in all the softness of the dove,
Over thy passions spread her silver plume:
The rosy vale of harmony and love,
Hung on thy soul in one eternal bloom.

Peace, gentlest, softest of the virtues, spread
Her silver pinions, wet with dewy tears,
Upon her best distinguish'd poet's head,
And taught his lyre the music of the spheres.

'Temp'rance, with health and beauty in her train,
And massy-muscl'd Strength in graceful pride,
Pointed at scarlet Luxury and Pain,
And did at every cheerful feast preside.

Content, who smiles at all the frowns of fate,
Fann'd from idea ev'ry seeming ill;
In thy own virtue, and thy genius great,
The happy muse laid anxious troubles still.

But see! the sick'ned glare of day retires,
And the meek ev'ning shades the dusky gray:
The west faint glimmers with the fassron fires,
And, like thy life, O Phillips! dies away.

Here, stretch'd upon this heav'n ascending hill,
I'll wait the horrors of the coming night;
I'll imitate the gently-plaintive rill,
And by the glare of lambent vapours write.

Yet with the dew the yellow'd hawthorns bow;
The loud winds whistle through the echoing dell;
Far o'er the sea the breathing cattle low,
And the shrill shriekings of the screech-owl swell.

With rustling sound the dusky foliage flies,
And wantons with the wind in rapid whirls:
The gurg'ling riv'let to the valley hies,
And lost to sight, in dying murmurs curls.

Now as the mantle of the ev'ning swells
Upon my mind, I feel a thick'ning gloom!
Ah! could I charm, by friendship's potent spells,
The soul of Phillips from the deathly tomb!

Then would we wander through the dark'ned
vale,
In converse such as heav'nly spirits use,
And borne upon the plumage of the gale,
Hymn the Creator, and exhort the muse.

But horror to reflection! Now no more
Will Phillips sing, the wonder of the plain,
When doubting whether they might not adore,
Admiring mortals heard the nervous strain.

A madd'ning darkness reigns through all the lawn,
Naught but a doleful bell of death is heard,
Save where into an hoary oak withdrawn,
The scream proclaims the curst nocturnal bird.

Now, rest my muse, but only rest to weep,
A friend made dear by every sacred tie!
Unknown to me be comfort, peace, or sleep,
Phillips is dead, 'tis pleasure then to die!

FEBRUARY,

AN ELEGY.

BEGIN, my muse, the imitative lay,
Aonian doxies found the thrumming string;
Attempt no number of the plaintive Gray,
Let me like midnight cats, or Collins sing.

If in the trammels of the doleful line,
The bounding hail, or drilling rain descend;
Come, brooding Melancholy, pow'r divine,
And ev'ry uniform'd mass of words amend.

Now the rough goat withdraws his curling horns,
And the cold wat'rer twirls his circling mop:
Swift sudden anguish darts through all ring corns,
And the spruce mercer trembles in his shop.

Now infant authors, madd'ning for renown,
Extend the plume, and hum about the stage,
Procure a benefit, amuse the town,
And proudly glitter in a title page.

Now, wrapt in ninefold fur, his squeamish grace
Defies the fury of the howling storm;
And whilst the tempest whistles round his face,
Exults to find his mantled carcass warm.

Now rumbling coaches furious drive along,
Full of the majesty of city dames,
Whose jewels sparkling in the gaudy throng,
Raise strange emotions and invidious flames.

Now Merit, happy in the calm of place,
To mortals as a Highlander appears,
And conscious of the excellence of lace,
With spreading frogs and gleaming spangles glares:

Whilst Envy, on a tripod seated nigh,
In form a shoe-boy, daubs the valu'd fruit,
And darting lightnings from his vengeful eye,
Raves about Wilkes, and politics, and Bute,

Now Barry, taller than a grenadier,
Dwindles into a stripling of eighteen;
Or fabled in Othello breaks the ear,
Exerts his voice, and totters to the scene:

Now Foote, a looking-glass for all mankind,
Applies his wax to personal defects;
But leaves untouched the image of the mind,
His art no mental quality reflects.

Now Drury's potent king extorts applause,
And pit, box, gallery, echo, "How divine!"
Whilst vers'd in all the drama's mystic laws,
His graceful action saves the wooden line.

Now—But what further can the muses sing?
Now dropping particles of water fall;
Now vapours riding on the north wind's wing,
With transitory darkness shadows all.

Alas! how joyless the descriptive theme,
When sorrow on the writer's quiet preys:
And like a mouse in Cheshire cheese supreme,
Devours the substance of the less'ning bays.

Come, February, lend thy darkest sky,
There teach the winter'd muse with clouds to soar:

Come, February, lift the number high;
Let the sharp strain like wind through alleys roar.

Ye channels, wand'ring through the spacious street,
In hollow murmurs roll the dirt along,
With inundations wet the sabled feet,
Whilst gouts responsive, join th' elegiac song.

Ye damsels fair, whose silver voices shrill
Sound through meand'ring folds of Echo's horn;
Let the sweet cry of liberty be still,
No more let smoking cakes awake the morn.

O, Winter! put away thy snowy pride;
O, Spring! neglect the cowslip and the bell;
O, Summer! throw thy pears and plums aside;
O, Autumn! bid the grape with poison swell.

The pension'd muse of Johnson is no more!
Drown'd in a butt of wine his genius lies:
Earth! Ocean! Heav'n! the wond'rous loss deplore,
The dregs of Nature with her glory dies.

What iron Stoic can suppress the tear;
What four reviewer read with vacant eye!
What bard but decks his literary bier!
Alas! I cannot sing—I howl—I cry—

Bristol, Feb. 12.

D.

ELEGY.

On W. Beckford, Esquire.

WEEP ON, ye Britons—give your gen'ral tear;
But hence, ye venal—hence, each titled slave;
An honest pang should wait on Beckford's bier,
And patriot anguish mark the patriot's grave.

When like the Roman to his field retir'd,
'Twas you (surrounded by unnumber'd foes),
Who call'd him forth, his services requir'd,
And took from age the blessing of repose.

With soul impell'd by virtue's sacred flame,
To stem the torrent of corruption's tide,
He came, heav'n fraught with liberty! He came
And nobly in his country's service died.

In the last awful, the departing hour,
When life's poor lamp more faint, and fainter grew;
As mem'ry feebly exercis'd her power,
He only felt for liberty and you.

He view'd death's arrows with a Christian eye,
With firmness only to a Christian known;
And nobly gave your miseries that sigh
With which he never gratified his own.

Thou, breathing sculpture, celebrat' his fame,
And give his laurel everlasting bloom;
Receive his worth while gratitude has name,
And teach succeeding ages from his tomb.

The sword of justice cautiously he sway'd,
His hand for ever held the balance right;
Each venial fault with pity he survey'd,
But murder found no mercy in his sight.

He knew when flatterers besiege a throne,
Truth seldom reaches to a monarch's ear;
Knew, if oppress'd a loyal people groan,
'Tis not the courtier's interest he should hear.

Hence, honest to his prince, his manly tongue,
The public wrong and loyalty convey'd,
While titled tremblers, ev'ry nerve unfrung,
Look'd all around, confounded and dismay'd.
Look all around, astonish'd to behold,
(Train'd up to flatt'ry from their early youth)
An artless, fearless citizen, unfold
To royal ears, a mortifying truth.

Titles to him no pleasure could impart,
No bribes his rigid virtue could controul;
The star could never gain upon his heart,
Nor turn the tide of honour in his soul.

For this his name our hist'ry shall adorn,
Shall soar on fame's wide pinions all sublime;
Till heaven's own bright, and never dying morn
Absorbs our little particle of time.

ELEGY.

HASTE, haste, ye solemn messengers of night,
Spread the black mantle on the shrinking plain;
But, ah! my torments still survive the light,
The changing seasons alter not my pain.
Ye variegated children of the spring;
Ye blossoms blushing with the pearly dew;
Ye birds that sweetly in the hawthorn sing;
Ye flow'ry meadows, lawns of verdant hue,
Faint are your colours; harsh your love-notes
thrill,

To me no pleasure nature now can yield:
Alike the barren rock and woody hill,
The dark-brown blasted heath, and fruitful field.
Ye spouting cataracts, ye fever streams;
Ye spacious rivers, whom the willow shrouds;
Ascend the bright-crown'd sun's far-shining beams,
To aid the mournful tear-distilling clouds.
Ye noxious vapours, fall upon my head;
Ye writhing adders, round my feet entwine;
Ye toads, your venom in my foot-path spread;
Ye blasting meteors, upon me shine.
Ye circling seasons, intercept the year;
Forbid the beauties of the spring to rise;
Let not the life-preserving grain appear;
Let howling tempests harrow up the skies.
Ye cloud-girt, moss-grown turrets, look no more
Into the palace of the god of day:
Ye loud tempestuous billows, cease to roar,
In plaintive numbers, through the valleys stray.
Ye verdant-vested trees, forget to grow,
Cast off the yellow foliage of your pride:
Ye softly tinkling riv'lets, cease to flow,
Or swell'd with certain death and poison, glide.
Ye solemn warblers of the gloomy night,
That rest in lightning-blasted oaks the day,
Through the black mantles take your slow-pac'd flight,
Rending the silent wood with shrieking lay.
Ye snow-crown'd mountains, lost to mortal eyes,
Down to the valleys bend your hoary head,
Ye livid comets, fire the peopled skies—
For—lady Betty's tabby cat is dead.

TO MR. HOLLAND.

WHAT numbers, Holland, can the muses find,
To sing thy merit in each varied part;
When action, eloquence, and ease combin'd,
Make nature but a copy of thy art.

Majestic as the eagle on the wing,
Or the young sky-helm'd mountain-rooted tree;
Pleasing as meadows blushing with the spring,
Loud as the farges of the Severn sea.

In terror's strain, as clanging armies drear!
In love, as Jove, too great for mortal praise,
In pity gentle as the falling tear,
In all superior to my feeble lays.

Black angers sudden rise, ecstatic pain,
Tormenting jealousy's self-cank'ring sting;
Confusing envy with her yelling train,
Fraud closely shrouded with the turtle's wing.

Whatever passions gill the human breast,
Play in thy features, and await thy nod;
In thee by art, the demon stands confest,
But nature on thy soul has stamp'd the god.

So just thy action with thy part agrees,
Each feature does the office of a tongue;
Such is thy native elegance and ease,
By thee the harsh line smoothly glides along.

At thy feign'd woe we're really distress'd,
At thy feign'd tears we let the real fall;
By every judge of nature 'tis confest,
No single part is thine, thou'rt all in all.
Bristol, July 21. D. B.

ON MR. ALCOCK OF BRISTOL,

AN EXCELLENT MINIATURE PAINTER.

YE nine, awake the chorded shell,
Whilst I the praise of Alcock tell
In truth-dictated lays:
On wings of genius take thy flight,
O muse! above the Olympic height,
Make echo sing his praise.

Nature in all her glory dress'd,
Her flow'ry crown, her verdant vest,
Her zone ethereal blue,
Receives new charms from Alcock's hand;
The eye surveys, at his command,
Whole kingdoms at a view.

His beauties seem to roll the eye,
And bids the real arrows fly,
To wound the gazer's mind;
So taking are his men display'd,
That oft th' unguarded wounded maid,
Hath with'd the painter blind.

His pictures like to nature show,
The silver fountains seem to flow; |
The hoary woods to nod:
The curling hair, the flowing dress,
The speaking attitude, confests
The fancy-forming god.

Ye classic Roman-loving fools,
Say, could the painters of the schools,
With Alcock's pencil vie?
He paints the passions of mankind,
And in the face displays the mind,
Charming the heart and eye.

Thrice happy artist, rouse thy pow'rs,
And send, in wonder-giving show'rs,
Thy beauteous works to view;
Envy shall sicken at thy name,
Italians leave the chair of fame,
And own the feat thy due.

Bristol, Jan. 29. 1769.

ASAPHIDES.

TO MISS B--SH OF BRISTOL.

BEFORE I seek the dreary shore,
Where Gambia's rapid billows roar,
And foaming pour along;
To you I urge the plaintive strain,
And though a lover sings in vain,
Yet you shall hear the song.

Ungrateful, cruel, lovely maid,
Since all my torments were repaid
With frowns or languid sneers;
With affidivies no more
Your captive will your health implore,
Nor tease you with his tears.

Now to the regions where the sun
Does his hot course of glory run,
And parches up the ground:
Where o'er the burning cleaving plains,
A long external dog-star reigns,
And splendour flames around:

There will I go, yet not to find
A fire intenser than my mind,
Which burns a constant flame:
There will I lose thy heavenly form,
Nor shall remembrance, raptur'd, warm,
Draw shadows of thy frame.

In the rough element the sea,
I'll drown the softer subject, thee,
And sink each lovely charm:
No more my bosom shall be torn;
No more by wild ideas borne,
I'll cherish the alarm:

Yet, Polly, could thy heart be kind,
Soon would my feeble purpose find
Thy sway within my breast:
But hence, soft scenes of painted woe,
Spite of the dear delight I'll go,
Forget her, and be blest.

D.

CELORIMON.

THE ADVICE.

ADDRESSED TO MISS M--- R---, OF BRISTOL.

REVOLVING in their destin'd sphere,
The hours begin another year
As rapidly to fly;
Ah! think, Maria, (e'er in grav
Those auburn tresses fade away);
So youth and beauty die.

Though now the captivated throug
Adore with flattery and song,
And all before you bow;
Whilst unattentive to the strain,
You hear the humble muse complain,
Or wreath your frowning brow.

Though poor Pitholeon's feeble line,
In opposition to the nine,

Still violates your name;
Though tales of passion meanly told,
As dull as Cumberlând, as cold
Strive to confess a flame.

Yet when that bloom and dancing fire,
In silver'd rev'rence shall expire,
Ag'd, wrinkl'd, and defac'd:
To keep one lover's flame alive,
Requires the genius of a Clive,
With Walpole's mental taste.

Though rapture wantons in your air,
Though beyond simile you're fair;
Free, affable, serene:
Yet still one attribute divine,
Should in your composition shine;
Sincerity, I mean.

Though num'rous swains before you fall;
'Tis empty admiration all,
'Tis all that you require:
How momentary are their chains!
Like you, how insincere the strains
Of those, who but admire!

Accept, for once, advice from me,
And let the eye of censure see
Maria can be true:
No more from fools or empty beaux,
Heav'n's representatives disclose,
Or butterflies pursue.

Fly to your worthiest lover's arms,
To him resign your swelling charms,
And meet his gen'rous breast:
Or if Pitholeon suits your taste,
His muse with tatter'd fragments grac'd,
Shall read your cares to rest.

D.

THE COPERNICAN SYSTEM.

THE sun revolving on his axis turns,
And with creative fire intensely burns;
Impell'd the forcive air, our earth supreme,
Rolls with the planets round the solar gleam;
First Mercury completes his transient year,
Glowing, refulgent, with reflected glare;
Bright Venus occupies a wider way,
The early harbinger of night and day;
More distant still our globe terraqueous turns,
Nor chills intense, nor fiercely heated burns;
Around her rolls the lunar orb of light,
Trailing her silver glories through the night:
On the earth's orbit see the various signs,
Mark where the sun, our year completing, shines:
First the bright Ram his languid ray improves;
Next glaring wat'ry through the Bull he moves;
The am'rous Twins admit his genial ray;
Now burning, through the Crab he takes his way;
The Lion, flaming, bears the solar power;
The Virgin faints beneath the sultry shower.
Now the just Balance weighs his equal force,
The slimy Serpent swelters in his course;
The fabled Archer clouds his languid face;
The Goat, with tempests, urges on his race;
Now in the water his faint beams appear,
And the cold Fishes end the circling year.

Beyond our globe the sanguine Mars displays
A strong reflection of primæval rays;
Next belted Jupiter far distant gleams,
Scarcely enlight'ned with the solar beams;
With four unfix'd receptacles of light,
He tours majestic through the spacious height:
But farther yet the tardy Saturn lags,
And five attendant luminaries drags;
Investing with a double ring his pace,
He circles through immensity of space. [good!
These are thy wond'rous works, first Source of
Now more admir'd in being understood.

Bristol, Dec. 23.

D. B.

THE CONSULIAD.

AN HEROIC POEM.

OF warring senators, and battles dire,
Of quails unceant, muse awake the lyre.
Where C—pb—ll's chimneys overlook the square,
And N—t—n's future prospects hang in air;
Where counsellors dispute, and cocker's match,
And Caledonian earls in concert scratch;
A group of heroes, occupied the round,
Long in the rolls of infamy renown'd.
Circling the table all in silence sat;
Now tearing bloody lean, now champing fat;
Now picking ortolans, and chickens slain,
To form the whimsies of an a-la-reine:
Now forming castles of the newest taste,
And granting articles to forts of paste;
Now swallowing bitter draughts of Prussian beer;
Now sucking tallow of salubrious deer.
The god of cabinets and senates saw
His fons, like asses, to one centre draw.

Inflated discord heard, and left her cell,
With all the horrors of her native hell:
She, on the soaring wings of genius fled,
And wav'd the pen of Junius round her head.
Beneath the table, veil'd from sight, she sprung,
And fat astride on noisy Twitcher's tongue:
Twitcher, superior to the venal pack
Of Bloomsbury's notorious monarch, Jack:
Twitcher, a rotten branch of mighty stock,
Whose interest winds his conscience as his clock:
Whose attributes detestable, have long
Been evident, and infamous in song.
A toast's demanded: Madoc swift arose.
Pactolian gravy trickling down his clothes:
His sanguine fork a murder'd pigeon prest,
His knife with deep incision fought the breast.
Upon his lips the quivering accents hung,
And too much expedition chain'd his tongue.
When thus he sputter'd: "All the glasses fill,
And toast the great Pendragon of the hill:
Mab-Uther Owein, a long train of kings,
From whom the royal blood of Madoc springs.
Madoc, undoubtedly of Arthur's race,
You see the mighty monarch in his face:
Madoc, in bagnios and in courts ador'd,
Demands this proper homage of the board." [beer,
"Monarchs!" said Twitcher, setting down his
His muscles writhing a contemptuous sneer:
"Monarchs! Of mole-hills, oyster-beds, a rock;
These are the grafters of your royal stock:
My pony Scrub can fires more valiant trace—"
The mangled pigeon thunders on his face;

His op'ning mouth the melted butter fills,
 And dropping from his nose and chin distils.
 Furious he started, rage his bosom warms;
 Loud as his lordship's morning dun he storms.
 "Thou vulgar imitator of the great,
 Grown wanton with the excrements of state:
 This to thy head notorious Twitcher sends."
 His shadow body to the table bends:
 His straining arm uprears a loin of veal,
 In these degenerate days, for three a meal:
 In ancient times, as various writers say,
 An alderman or priest eat three a day.
 With godlike strength, the grinning Twitcher plies.

His stretching muscles and the mountain flies,
 Swift, as a cloud that shadows o'er the plain,
 It flew, and scatter'd drops of oily rain.
 In opposition to extended knives,
 On royal Madoc's spreading chest it drives:
 Senseless he falls upon the sandy ground,
 Prest with the steamy load that ooz'd around,
 And now confusion spread her ghastly plume,
 And faction separates the noisy room.
 Balluntun, exercis'd in every vice
 That opens to a courtiers paradise,
 With D—n trammel'd, scruples not to draw
 Injustice up the rocky hill of law:
 From whose humanity the laurels sprung,
 Which will in George's Fields be ever young.
 The vile Balluntun, starting from his chair,
 To fortune thus address'd his private prayer:
 "Goddeſs of fate's rotundity, assist
 With thought-wing'd victory my untry'd fist:
 If I the grinning Twitcher overturn,
 Six Russian frigates at thy shrine shall burn;
 Nine rioters shall bleed beneath thy feet;
 And hanging cutters decorate each street."
 The goddess smil'd, or rather smooch'd her frown,
 And shook the triple feathers of her crown;
 Infill'd a private pension in his soul.
 With rage inspir'd, he seiz'd a Gallic roll:
 His burting arm the millive weapon threw,
 High o'er his rival's head it whistling flew,
 Curraras, for his Jewish soul renown'd,
 Receiv'd it on his ear and kist the ground.
 Curraras, vers'd in every little art,
 To play the minister's or felon's part:
 Grown hoary in the villanies of state,
 A title made him infamously great.
 A slave to venal slaves; a tool to tools:
 The representative to knaves and fools.
 But see! commercial Bristol's genius sit,
 Her shield a turtle-shell, her lance a spit.
 See, whilst her nodding aldermen are spread,
 In all the branching honours of the head;
 Curraras, ever faithful to the cause,
 With beef and ven'son their attention draws:
 They drink, they eat, then sign the mean address;
 Say, could their humble gratitude do less?
 By disappointment vex'd, Balluntun flies;
 Red lightnings flashing in his dancing eyes.
 Firm as his virtue, mighty Twitcher stands,
 And elevates for furious fight his hands:
 One pointed fist his shadow'd corps defends,
 The other on Balluntun's eyes descends:
 A darkling, snacking light his optics view,
 Circled with livid tinges red and blue.

Now fir'd with anguish, and inflam'd by pride,
 He thunders on his adversary's side:
 With patt'ring blows prolongs th' unequal fight;
 Twitcher retreats before the man of might.
 But fortune (or some higher power or god),
 Oblique extended forth a fable rod:
 As Twitcher retrograde maintain'd the fray,
 The harden'd serpent intercepts his way:
 He fell, and, falling with a lordly air,
 Crush'd into atoms the judicial chair.
 Curraras, for his Jewish soul renown'd,
 Arose; but deafen'd with a singing found,
 A cloud of discontent o'erspread his brows;
 Revenge in every bloody feature glows.
 Around his head a roasted gander whirls,
 Dropping Manilla sauces on his curls:
 Swift to the vile Balluntun's face it flies,
 The burning pepper sparkles in his eyes:
 His India waistcoat, reeking with the oil,
 Glows brighter red, the glory of the spoil.
 The fight is gen'ral; fowl repulses fowl;
 The victors thunder, and the vanquish'd howl.
 Stars, garters, all the implements of show,
 That deck'd the pow'rs above, disgrac'd below.
 Nor swords, nor mightier weapons did they draw,
 For all were well acquainted with the law.
 Let Drap—r, to improve his diction, fight;
 Our heroes, like Lord George, could cold and write.

Gogmagog early of the jocky club;
 Empty as C—br—ke's oratorical tub:
 A rusty link of ministerial chain;
 A living glory of the present reign.
 Vers'd in the arts of ammunition bread,
 He wav'd a red wheat manchet round his head:
 David-ap-Howel, furious, wild, and young,
 From the same line as royal Madoc sprung;
 Occur'd, the object of his burting ire,
 And on his nose receiv'd the weapon dire:
 A double river of congealing blood
 O'erflows his garter with a purple flood.
 Mad as a bull by daring mastiffs tore,
 When ladies scream, and greasy butchers roar:
 Mad as B—rg—e when groping through the park,
 He kiss'd his own dear lady in the dark.
 The lineal representative of kings,
 A carving weapon seiz'd, and up he springs:
 A weapon long in cruel murders stain'd,
 For mangling captive carcases ordain'd.
 But Fortune, Providence, or what you will,
 To lay the rising scenes of horror still,
 In Fero's person seiz'd a shining pot,
 Where bubbled scrips, and contracts flaming hot;
 In the fierce Cambrians breeches drains it dry,
 The chapel totters with the shrieking cry,
 Loud as the mob's reiterated yell,
 When Sawny rose, as mighty Chatham fell.
 Flaccus, the glory of a masquerade;
 Whose every action is of trifles made:
 At Graft—n's well-stor'd table ever found;
 Like G—n too for every vice renown'd.
 G—n, to whose immortal sense we owe
 The blood which will from civil discord flow:
 Who swells each grievance, lengthens every tax,
 Blind to the rip'ning vengeance of the axe.
 Flaccus, the youthful, degagé and gay,
 With eye of pity saw the dreary fray:
 Amidst the greasy horrors of the fight,
 He trembled for his suit of virgin white.

Fond of his eloquence, and easy flow
 Of talk verbose, whose meaning none can know:
 He mounts the table, but, through eager haste,
 His foot upon a smoking court-pie plac'd:
 The burning liquid penetrates his shoe,
 Swift from the rostrum the declaimer flew,
 But learnedly heroic he disdains,
 To spoil his pretty countenance with strains.
 Remounted on the table, now he stands,
 Waves his high powder'd head and ruffled hands.
 " Friends! let this clang of hostile fury cease,
 Ill it becomes the plenipos of peace:
 Shall olio's, from internal battle dress'd,
 Like bullets outward perforate the breast;
 Shall jav'lin bottles blood ethereal spill;
 Shall luscious turtle without surfeit kill."
 More had he said: when, from Dogloflock flung,
 A custard pudding trembled on his tongue:
 And, ah! misfortunes seldom come alone,
 Great Twitchee rising seiz'd a polish'd bone;
 Upon his breast the oily weapon clangs;
 Headlong he falls, propell'd by thick'ning bangs.
 The prince of trimmers, for his magic fam'd,
 Quarlendorgongos by infernals nam'd:
 By mortals Alavat in common styl'd;
 Nurs'd in a furnace, Nox and Neptune's child:
 Bursting with rage, a weighty bottle caught,
 With crimson blood and vital spirits fraught,
 To Doxo's head the gurgling woe he sends;
 Doxo made mighty in his mighty friends.
 Upon his front the stubborn vessel sounds,
 Back from his harder front the bottle hounds:
 He fell. The royal Madoc rising up,
 Repos'd him weary, on his painful crup:
 The head of Doxo, first projecting down,
 Thunders upon the kingly Cambrian's crown:
 The sanguine tumour swells; again he falls;
 On his broad chest the bulky Doxo sprawls.
 Tyro the sage, the sensible, the strong,
 As yet unnotic'd in the muse-taught song;
 Tyro, for necromancy far renown'd,
 A greater adept than Agrippa found;
 Oft as his phantom reasons interven'd,
 De Viris pension'd, the defaulter screen'd;
 Another C—rt—t remains in Cl—;
 In Fl—the—r fifty Jefferies's appear,
 Tyro stood neuter, till the champions tir'd,
 In languid attitudes a truce desir'd.
 Long was the bloody fight; confusion dire
 Has hid some circumstances from the lyre:
 Suffice it, that each hero kiss'd the ground,
 Tyro excepted for old laws renown'd;
 Who stretching his authoritative hand,
 Loudly thus issu'd forth his dread command.
 " Peace, wrangling senators, and placemen, peace,
 In the king's name, let hostile vengeance cease!"
 Aghast the champions hear the furious sound,
 The fallen unmolested leave the ground.
 " What fury, nobles, occupies your breast;
 What patriots spirits has your mind possess'd.
 Non-honorary gifts nor pensions please;
 Say, are you Covent-Garden patentees!
 How? Wilt you not what ancient sages said,
 The council quarrels, and the poor have bread.
 See this court-pie with twenty thousand dress'd;
 Be every thought of enmity at rest.
 Divide it and be friends again," he said:
 The council god return'd, and discord fled.

Bristol, Jan. 4. 1770.

C.

ELEGY.

JOYLESS I seek the solitary shade,
 Where dusky contemplation veils the scene,
 The dark retreat (of leafless branches made)
 Where sick'ning sorrow wets the yellow'd green.
 The darksome ruins of some sacred cell,
 Where erst the sons of superstition trod,
 Tott'ring upon the mossy meadow, tell
 We better know, but less adore our God.
 Now, as I mournful tread the gloomy cave,
 Through the wide window (once with mysteries dight)
 The distant forest, and the darken'd wave
 Of the swollen Avon ravishes my sight.
 But see, the thick'ning veil of evening's drawn,
 The azure changes to a sabled blue;
 The rapt'ring prospects fly the less'ning lawn,
 And nature seems to mourn the dying view.
 Self-sprighted fear creeps silent through the gloom,
 Starts at the rustling leaf, and rolls his eyes;
 Aghast with horror, when he views the tomb,
 With every torment of a hell he flies.
 The bubbling brooks in plaintive murmurs roll,
 The bird of omen, with incessant scream,
 To melancholy thoughts awakes the soul,
 And lulls the mind to contemplation's dream.
 A dreary stillness broods o'er all the vale,
 The clouded moon emits a feeble glare;
 Joyless I seek the darkling hill and dale;
 Where'er I wander sorrow still is there.
Bristol, Nov. 17. 1769.

THE PROPHECY.

When times are at the worst they will certainly mend.

This truth of old was sorrow's friend,
 " Times at the worst will surely mend."
 The difficulty's then to know
 How long oppression's clock can go;
 When Britain's sons may cease to sigh,
 And hope that their redemption's nigh.
 When vice exalted takes the lead,
 And vengeance hangs but by a thread;
 Gay peeresses turn'd out o' doors;
 Whoremasters peers, and sons of whores;
 Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
 For your redemption draweth nigh.
 When vile corruption's brazen face
 At council-board shall take her place,
 And lords-commissioners resort
 To welcome her at Britain's court,
 Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
 For your redemption draweth nigh.
 See pension's harbour large and clear,
 Defended by St. Stephen's pier!
 The entrance safe, by current led,
 Tiding round G—'s jetty head;
 Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
 For your redemption draweth nigh.
 When civil power shall snore at ease,
 While soldiers fire—to keep the peace;

When murders sanctuary find,
And petticoats can justice blind;
Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

Commerce o'er bondage will prevail,
Free as the wind that fills her sail.
When she complains of vile restraint,
And power is deaf to her complaint,
Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When raw projectors shall begin
Oppression's hedge to keep her in,
She in disdain will take her flight,
And bid the Gotham fools good night;
Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When tax is laid to save debate,
By prudent ministers of state;
And what the people did not give
Is levied by prerogative;
Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When Popish bishops dare to claim
Authority in George's name;
By treason's hand set up, in spite
Of George's title, William's right;
Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When Popish priest a pension draws
From starv'd exchequer, for the cause
Commission'd, proselytes to make
In British realms, for Britain's sake,
Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When snug in power, fly recusants
Make laws for British Protestants;
And d—g William's revolution,
As justices claim execution;
Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When soldiers, paid for our defence,
In wanton pride slay innocence,
Blood from the ground for vengeance reeks,
Till Heaven the inquisition makes;
Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When at Bute's feet poor freedom lies,
Mark'd by the priest for sacrifice,
And doom'd a victim for the sins
Of half the outs, and all the ins,
Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When stewards pass a boot account,
And credit for the gross amount;
Then, to replace exhausted store,
Mortgage the land to borrow more;
Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When scrutineers, for private ends,
Against the vote declare their friends;
Or judge, as you stand there alive,
That five is more than forty-five;

Look up, ye Britons! cease to sigh,
For your redemption draweth nigh.

When George shall condescend to hear
The modest suit, the humble prayer;
A prince to purpled pride unknown!
No favourites disgrace the throne!
Look up, ye Britons! sigh no more,
For your redemption's at the door.

When time shall bring your wish about,
Or seven years leave you fold is out;
No future contract to fulfil;
Your tenants holding at your will;
Raife up your heads! your right demand!
For your redemption's in your hand.

Then is your time to strike the blow,
And let the slaves of Mammon know
Britain's true sons a bribe can scorn,
And die as free as they were born.
Virtue again shall take her seat,
And your redemption stand complete.

SONG.

ADDRESSED TO MISS C—AM OF BRISTOL.

As Spring, now approaches with all his gay train,
And scatters his beauties around the green plain,
Come! then, my dear charmer, all scruples remove,
Accept of my passion, allow me to love.

Without the soft transports which love must inspire,

Without the sweet torment of fear and desire,
Our thoughts and ideas, are never refin'd,
And nothing but winter can reign in the mind.

But love is the blossom, the spring of the soul,
The frosts of our judgments may check, not controul,

In spite of each hindrance, the spring will return,
And nature with transports refining will burn.

This passion celestial, by Heav'n was design'd,
The only fix'd means of improving the mind,
When it beams on the senses, they quickly display,
How great and prolific, how pleasing the ray.

Then come, my dear charmer, since love is a flame,
Which polishes nature and angels your frame,
Permit the soft passion to rise in your breast,
I leave your good nature to grant me the rest.

Shall the beautiful flow'rets all blossom around,
Shall Flora's gay mantle, enamel the ground,
Shall the red blushing blossom be seen on the tree,
Without the least pleasure or rapture for me?

And yet, if my charmer should frown when I sing,
Ah! what are the beauties, the glories of spring!
The flowers will be faded, all happiness fly,
And clouds veil the azure of every bright sky.

London, May 4. 1770.

APOSTATE WILL.

IN days of old, when Wesley's pow'r
Gather'd new strength by every hour;
Apostate Will just sunk in trade,
Resolv'd his bargain should be made;

Then strait to Wesley he repairs,
 And puts on grave and solemn airs;
 Then thus the pious man address'd,
 Good Sir, I think your doctrine best;
 Your servant will a Wesley be,
 Therefore the principles teach me.
 The preacher then instruction gave,
 How he in this world should behave:
 He hears, assents, and gives a nod,
 Says every word of the word of God,
 Then lifting his dissembling eyes,
 How blessed is the sect! he cries;
 Nor Bingham, Young, nor Stillingfleet,
 Shall make me from this sect retreat.
 He then his circumstance declar'd,
 How hardly with him matters far'd,
 Begg'd him next meeting for to make
 A small collection for his sake.
 The preacher said, do not repine,
 The whole collection shall be thine.
 With looks demure and cringing bows,
 About his business strait he goes;
 His outward acts were grave and prim,
 The methodist appear'd in him;
 But, be his outward what it will,
 His heart was an apostate's still;
 He'd oft profess an hallow'd flame,
 And every where preach'd Wesley's name;
 He was a preacher and what not,
 As long as money could be got;
 He'd oft profess with holy fire,
 The labourer's worthy of his hire.

It happen'd once upon a time,
 When all his works were in their prime,
 A noble place appear'd in view,
 Then—to the Methodists, adieu;
 A Methodist no more he'll be,
 The Protestants serve best for be.
 Then to the curate strait he ran,
 And thus address'd the rev'rend man;
 I was a Methodist, 'tis true,
 With penitence I turn to you;
 O that it were your bounteous will
 That I the vacant place might fill!
 With justice I'd myself acquit,
 Do ev'ry thing that's right and fit.
 The curate straightway gave consent——
 To take the place he quickly went.
 Accordingly he took the place,
 And keeps it with dissembled grace.

April. 14. 1764.

HAPPINESS. 1769.

SINCE happiness is not ordain'd for man,
 Let's make ourselves as happy as we can;
 Possess with fame or fortune, friend or whore,
 But think it happiness—we want no more.

Hail Revelation! sphere-envelop'd dame,
 To some divinity, to most a name,
 Reason's dark-lantern, superstition's sun,
 Whose cause mysterious and effect are one——
 From thee, ideal bliss we only trace,
 Fair as ambition's dream, or bounty's face,
 But, in reality, as shadowy sound
 As seeming truth in twined mysteries bound.
 What little rest from over-anxious care
 The lords of nature are design'd to share,

To wanton whim and prejudice we owe.
 Opinion is the only god we know.
 Where's the foundation of religion plac'd?
 On every individual's sickle taile.
 The narrow way the priest-rid mortals tread,
 By superstitious prejudice mislead:
 This passage leads to heaven—yet, strange to tell!
 Another's conscience finds it leads to hell.
 Conscience, the foul-camelion's varying hue,
 Reflects all notions, to no notion true——
 The bloody son of Jesse, when he saw
 That mystic priesthood kept the Jews in awe,
 He made himself an ephod to his mind,
 And sought the Lord, and always found him kind.
 In murder,  cruelty and lust,
 The lord was with him, and his actions just.

Priestcraft, thou universal blind of all,
 Thou idol at whose feet whole nations fall,
 Father of misery, origin of sin,
 Whose first existence did with fear begin,
 Still sparing deal thy seeming blessings out,
 Veil thy Elysium with a cloud of doubt——
 Since present blessings in possession cloy,
 Bid hope in future worlds expect the joy——
 Or, if thy sons the airy phantoms slight,
 And dawning reason would direct them right,
 Some glittering trifle to their optics hold;
 Perhaps they'll think the glaring spangle gold;
 And madd'd in the search of coins and toys,
 Eager pursue the momentary joys.

* Catcott is very fond of talk and fame;
 His wish a perpetuity of name,
 Which to procure, a pewter-altar's made,
 To bear his name, and signify his trade,
 In pomp burlesqu'd the rising spire to head,
 To tell futurity a pewterer's dead.
 Incomparable Catcott, still pursue
 The seeming happiness thou hast in view!
 Unfinish'd chimneys, gaping spires complete,
 Eternal fame on oval dishes beat:
 † Ride four-inch'd bridges, clouded turrets climb;
 And bravely die—to live in after-time.
 Horrid idea! if on rolls of fame
 The twentieth century only find thy name.
 Unnotic'd this in prose or * * * *
 He left his dinner to ascend the tower.
 Then what avails thy anxious spitting pain?
 Thy laugh-provoking labours are in vain.
 On matrimonial pewter set thy hand;
 Hammer with every power thou canst command;
 Stamp thy whole soul, original as 'tis,
 To propagate thy whimsies, name and phyz——

* This pewterer is famous for producing to the world those poems which Chatterton produced to him. He is famous for ascending by a rope, with no little danger of his life, in order to place the top stone of St. Nicholas-church spire, and under it a piece of pewter recording this singular event. Nor is he less famous for passing the stream, by means of some narrow boards (on horseback, I believe) before the new bridge was completed; that it might be said (with how much propriety same must decide) he first passed the bridge. CROFT.

† The reader will recollect that poor Tom complains the soul fiend has "made him proud of heart, to ride on a high-trotting horse over four-inched bridges."—Shakspere's poor Tom, as well as our's, discovered "reason in madness." CROFT.

Then, when the tottering spires or chimnies fall,
A Catcott shall remain, admir'd by all.

Endo, who has some trifling couplets writ,
Is only happy when he's thought a wit——
Think's I've more judgment than the whole reviews,

Because I always compliment his muse.
If any mildly would reprove his faults,
They're critics envy-sicken'd at his thoughts.
To me he flies, his best-belov'd friend,
Reads me asleep, then wakes me to commend.

Say, fages—if not sleep-charm'd by the rhyme,
Is flattery, much-lov'd flattery, any crime?
Shall dragon Satire exercise his sting,
And not insinuating flattery sing?
Is it more natural to torment than please!
How ill that thought with rectitude agrees!

Come to my pen, companion of the lay,
And speak of worth where merit * *
Let lazy Barton undistinguish'd snore,
Nor lash his generosity to Hoare;
Praise him for sermons of his curate bought,
His easy flow of words, his depth of thought;
His active spirit, ever in display,
His great devotion when he draws to pray;
His faintest soul distinguishably seen,
With all the virtues of a modern dean.

Varo, a genius of peculiar taste,
His misery in his happiness has plac'd;
When in soft calm the waves of fortune roll,
A tempest of reflection storms the soul.
But what would make another man distressed,
Gives him tranquillity and thoughtless rest.
No disappointment can his thoughts invade,
Superior to all troubles not self-made——

This character let gray Oxonians scan,
* And tell me of what species he's a man.
Or be it by young Yetman criticized,
Who damns good English if not Latinized †;
In Aristotle's scale the muse he weighs,
And damps her little fire with copied lays;
Vers'd in the mystic learning of the schools.
He rings bob-majors by Leibnitzian rules.
Pulvis, whose knowledge centres in degrees,
Is never happy but when taking fees:
Blest with a bushy wig and solemn pace,
Catcott admires him for a fossile face.

When first his farce of countenance began,
Ere the soft down had mark'd him almost man,
A solemn dulness occupied his eyes,
And the fond mother thought him wondrous wife.
—But little had she read in nature's book,
For fools assume a philosophic look.

O education, ever in the wrong,
To thee the curses of mankind belong;
Thou first great author of our future state,
Chief source of our religion, passions, fate.
On every atom of the doctor's frame
Nature has stamp'd the pedant with his name:

* "To hold to every man a faithful glass,
"And show him of what species he's an ass."
Prologue to Vanburgh's "Provoked Wife."

CROFT.

† In the epistle to Aella to Canynge, is this line——

"The English, him to please must first be La-tinized."

CROFT.

But thou hast made him (ever wast thou blind)
A licens'd butcher of the human kind.
—Mould'ring in dust the fair Lavinia lies,
Death and our doctor clos'd her sparkling eyes.
O all ye powers, the guardians of the world!
Where is the useless bolt of vengeance hurl'd?
Say shall this leaden sword of plague prevail,
And kill the mighty where the mighty fall!
Let the red bolus tremble o'er his head,
And with his guardian jupel strike him dead!
But to return—in this wide sea of thought,
How shall we steer our notions as we ought?
Content is happiness, as fages say——
But what's content? the trifle of a day.
Then, friend, let inclination be thy guide,
Nor be thy superstition led aside——

THE RESIGNATION.

O God, whose thunder shakes the sky;
Whose eye this atom globe surveys;
To thee, my only rock, I fly,
Thy mercy in thy justice praise.

The mystic mazes of thy will,
The shadows of celestial light,
Are past the power of human skill,
But what th' Eternal acts is right,

O teach me in the trying hour,
When anguish swells the dewy tear,
To still my sorrows, own thy pow'r,
Thy goodness love, thy justice fear.

If in this bosom aught but thee
Encroaching sought a boundless sway,
Omniscience could the danger see,
And mercy look the cause away.

Then why, my soul, dost thou complain?
Why drooping seek the dark recess?
Shake off the melancholy chain,
For God created all to bless,

But ah! my breast is human still;
The rising sigh, the falling tear,
My languid vitals' feeble rill,
The sickness of my soul declare.

But yet, with fortitude resign'd,
I'll thank th' inflictor of the blow;
Forbid the sigh, compose my mind,
Nor let the gush of misery flow.

The gloomy mantle of the night,
Which on my sinking spirit steals,
Will vanish at the morning light,
Which God, my East, my Sun, reveals.

THE ART OF PUFFING,

BY A BOOKSELLER'S JOURNEYMAN.

Vers'd by experience in the subtle art,
The mysteries of a title I impart;
Teach the young author how to please the town,
And make the heavy drug of rhyme go down.
Since Curll, immortal, never dying name,
A double pica in the book of fame,
By various arts did various dunces prop,
And tickled every fancy in his shop:

Who can like Pottinger ensure a book?
 Who judges with the solid taste of Cooke?
 Villains exalted in the midway sky,
 Shall live again, to drain your purfes dry:
 Nor yet unrivall'd they; see Baldwin comes
 Rich in inventions, patents, cuts, and hums:
 'The honourable Boswell writes, 'tis true;
 What elfe can Paoli's fupporter do?
 'The trading wits endeavour to attain,
 Like bookfellers the world's firft idol—gain.
 For this they puff the heavy Goldfmith's line,
 And hail his sentiments, though trite, divine;
 For this the patriotic bard complains,
 And Bingley binds poor liberty in chains:
 For this was every readers faith deceiv'd,
 And Edmund swore what nobody believ'd:
 For this the wits in clofe difguifes fight,
 For this the varying politicians write;
 For this each month new magazines are fold,
 With dulnefs fill'd and transcripts of the old;
 'The Town and Country struck a lucky hit,
 Was novel, sentimental, full of wit;
 Apeing her walk, the fame fucces to find,
 'The Court and City follow far behind.
 Sons of Apollo learn, merit's no more
 Than a good frontifpiece to grace her door;
 The author who invents a title well,
 Will always find his cover'd dulnefs fell.
 Flexney and every bookfeller will buy—
 Bound in neat calf, the work will never die.

July 22. 1770.

VAMP.

* Extract from the unpublished MS. of the Satirical Poem, intituled

KEW GARDENS.

WHAT are the wages of the tuneful nine?
 What are their pleasures, when compar'd to mine?
 Happy I eat, and tell my numerous pence,
 Free from the fervitude of rhyme and fenfe.
 Though fing-song Whithead ufhers in the year
 With joy to Britain's king and fovereign dear,
 And in compliance to an ancient mode,
 Meafures his fyllables into an ode,
 Yet fuch the fcurvy merit of his mufe,
 He bows to deans, and licks his lordfhip's fhoes.
 Then leave the wicked barren way of rhyme,
 Fly far from poverty, be wife in time,
 Regard the office more, Parnaffus left;
 Put your religion in a decent drefs;
 Then may your intereft in the town advance
 Above the reach of mufes or romance.

ODE †.

CHATTERTON IN THE SHADES.

'Tis done;—the MIGHTY STRIPLING gave the word,
 Inftant round Bristol's crowded mart,
 Beams of celestial glory dart,
 And to each kindling breast poetic flames impart.

* A fac-fimile of this Extract is given by Dr. Gregory.

† Reprinted from a humorous publication, intituled
 "Rowley and Chatterton in the Shades, or Nugæ Anti-quæ et Novæ. A new Elyfian Interlude in Profe and Verfe." 8vo. 1782.—While the Antiquaries are

Give me the harp, he cried, of thoufand ftrings!
 Echo, from her mountain cll,
 O'er defert heath or fhadowy dell
 The repercuffive notes in varying pauses brings.
 Now fwell the ftrains in accent bold;
 Now tun'd to artlefs woe,
 Let the foft numbers mufically flow;
 Or to the praife of heroes old
 Let freedom's war-fong found in thund'rous terror roll'd.

Far hence all idle rhymes,
 The taste of none but giddy-paced times,
 In manlier modes I strike the deep-ton'd lyre
 And other joys infpire.

Whence is this ardour? what new motion bodes
 My agonifing foul?
 It is decreed;

Illufion come, work thy all-potent deed,
 And deal around the land thy fubtile dole.
 Be the folemn fubject drest

In antique numbers, antique veft,
 In time's proud fmiles right gorgeoufly array'd;
 With many a ftrange conceit and lore profound,
 There be the bookman's fapient art difplay'd,
 While folly gapes and wonder stares around.

See fancy wafts her radiant forms along,
 Borne on the plume fublime of everlafting fong.

Brave RICHARD * calls; the crefcent falls,
 He rears the crofs; the nations bow,
 Vengeance, arife! Great Bawdin † dies!
 Awful be the notes and flow.

JUGA'S ‡ woes demand the ftrain,
 Shall female forrow fream in vain?

Ah deck with myrtle wreath that haplefs herfe,
 Nor let fainted CHARITY §,
 Godlike maid, with upcaft eye,
 Unheeded pafs without one votive verfe.

Grief's a plant of every clime,
 Lull'd into birth from earlieft time;
 Soon it fhoots a branching tree
 Water'd with tears of mifery;
 Change, my lyre, the numbers change,
 And give afpiring thoughts an ampler range.

In bufkin'd pomp appear,
 Dread ALLA ||, regal form,
 Fate ftalking in the rear,
 Prepares the iron ftorm.

Mark where the Norman canvaſs fwells afar,
 And wafts the deftin'd troops to Albion's ftand;
 Hear HAROLD ¶! hear! the diftant found is war,
 War that fhall fweep thee from thy native land.

The meafure's clos'd, the work dispos'd,
 Hang the recording tablet high!
 The colours mix, the foul they fix,
 Confest before the entranced eye.

Confirm, Pierian powers! the bold defign,
 And ftamp with ROWLEY's name each confecrated line.

dancing in circles, under the direction of Leland, the Maſter of the Ceremonies; the author fuppoſes that their ſolemnities are interrupted by the ſhade of a YOUNG POET, who ruſhes in and ſings this irregular ode.

* Eclog. 2. † Deſcrip of Syr Charles Bawdin.

‡ Elmour and Joga. § Balade of Cbaritie.

|| Alla, a Tragical Enterlude, and Goddwyn a Tragedie.

¶ The Battle of Haſtings.

ON THE POEMS IMPUTED TO ROWLEY.

(Reprinted in "Gentleman's Magazine," 1782.
From the Bury Poet.)

ACCEPT, O CHATTERTON! too late, the wreath,
Which will not flourish upon Rowley's tomb;
Born ere our rugged language glow'd beneath
The mellowing touch of time, and caught the bloom
Of polish'd diction; born ere numbers sweet
Measur'd the varied round in harmony complete.

And ere to philosophic rule allied,
Our poetry the vague ideas taught
To know their rank; 'ere yet inventive pride
Burst the dark prison of the fetter'd thought.
Accept, ill-fated youth! to grace thy name,
The just, the dear-bought guerdon of disastrous
fame.

Rich, flowery, nervous, plaintive, gay, sublime,
In sentiment and manners deeply skill'd!—
Had but our earlier ages learn'd to climb
Those heights, and that wide maze of knowledge
fill'd,

Which to thy infant genius fate display'd,
Thy artful mimic theft had not itself betray'd!

But now, though antique gloom incrust the pile,
Wrought by thy hands, still beams through the disguise,

Th' internal symmetry, and mocks the toil,
Which offer'd mostly ruins to our eyes*.
Thy genius, form'd to polish and create,
Soar'd far above the times it strove to imitate.

Take then, O CHATTERTON! the bootless praise,
Which cannot vibrate on thy death-struck ear!
And O! if ever in remotest days,
A youth like thee shall taste the vital air,
O! may he learn from thy misfortunes known,
In conscious merit proud the works he forms to own!

Dec. 9. 1782.

SONNET TO EXPRESSION,

BY MISS HELEN MARIA WILLIAMS.

EXPRESSION, child of soul! I fondly trace
Thy strong enchantments, when the poet's lyre,
The painter's pencil catch thy sacred fire,
And beauty wakes for thee her touching grace.
But from this frighted glance thy form avert,
When horrors check thy tear, thy struggling sigh,
When frenzy rolls in thy impassion'd eye,
Or guilt sits heavy on thy lab'ring heart.
Nor ever let my shuddering fancy bear
The wailing groan, or view the pallid look
Of him † the muses lov'd—when hope forsok
His spirit, vainly to the muses demand!
For charm'd with heavenly song, this bleeding breast, [no rest.
Mourns the blest power of verse could give despair

* This idea is elegantly pursued in Knox's Essay on the subject.

† Chatterton,

VOL. XI.

MONODY TO THE MEMORY OF CHAT-TERTON.

WRITTEN BY MRS. COWLEY.

O CHATTERTON! for thee the pensive song I raise,
Thou object of my wonder, pity, envy, praise!
Bright star of genius!—torn from life and fame,
My tears, my verse, shall consecrate thy name.
Ye muses! who, as round his natal bed,
Triumphant sung, and all your influence shed;
APOLLO! thou who rapt his infant breast,
And in his dædal numbers shone confess,
Ah! why in vain such mighty gifts bestow?
—Why give fresh tortures to the child of woe?
Why thus with barbarous care illumine his mind,
Adding new sense to all the ills behind?
Thou haggard poverty! whose cheerless eye
Transforms young rapture to the pond'rous sigh;
In whose drear cave no muse e'er struck the lyre,
Nor bard e'er madden'd with poetic fire,
Why all thy spells for CHATTERTON combine?
His thoughts creative why must thou thou confine?
Subdu'd by thee, his pen no more obeys,
No longer gives the song of ancient days;
Nor paints in flowing tints from distant skies,
Nor bids wild scenery rush upon our eyes—
Check'd by her flight, his rapid genius cowers, Droops her sad plumes, and yields to thee her powers.

Behold him, muses! see your fav'rite son
The prey of want, e'er manhood is begun!
The bosom you have fill'd, with anguish torn—
The mind you cherish'd, drooping and forlorn!
And now despair her sable form extends,
Creeps to his couch, and o'er his pillow bends,
Ah! see! a deadly bowl the fiend conceal'd,
Which to his eye with caution is reveal'd—
Seize it APOLLO!—seize the liquid snare,
